TERS, PARAGRAPHS, AND SEctions, of the First Booke of the First Part of the Historie of the World.

CHAP. I.

Of the Creation and Preseruation of the World.

§. I.

That the inuisible God is scene in his Creatures.

§. II.

That the wisest of the Heathen, whose Authority is not to be despised, haue acknowledged the World to haue bene created by God.

§. III.

Of the meaning of In principio, Gen. I. I.

§. IIII.

Of the meaning of the words [Heauen and Earth,] Gen. I. I.

§. V.

That the substance of the Waters, as mixt in the body of the Earth, is by Moles understood in the Word [Earth:] and that the Earth, by the Attributes of Vnformed and Void, is described as the Chaos of the ancient Heathens.

§. VI.

How it is to be understood, that the Spirit of God moued vpon the Waters: and that this is not to be searched curiously.

§. VII.

Of the Light created, as the materiall substance of the Sunne; and of the nature of it, and difficulty of knowledge of it: and of the excellencie and vse of it: and of motion, and heate annexed vnto it.

§. VIII.

Of the Firmament, and of the Waters aboue the Firmament: and whether there bee any Cristalline Heauen, or any Primum Mobile.

A conclusion, repeating the summe of the workes in the Creation, which are reduced to three heads: The creation of matter; The forming of it; The finishing of it.

§. X.

*That Nature is no Principium per se; nor Forme, the giuer of being: and of our ignorance, how second causes should haue any pro-

§. XI.

Of Fate, and that the Stars haue great influence: and that their operation may diuers-ly be preuented or furthered.

§. XII.

Of Prescience.

§. XIII.

Of Providence.

§. XIII.

Of Predestination.

§. XV.

Of Fortune: and of the reason of some things that seeme to be by Fortune, & against Reason and Providence.

The Contents

CHAP. II.

*Of Mans estate in his first Creation;
and of Gods rest.*

§. I.
OF the Image of God, according to which Man was first created.

§. II.
*Of the intellectuall minde of Man, in which there is much of the Image of God:
and that this Image is much deformed by sinne.*

§. III.
Of our base and fraile bodies: and that the care thereof, should yeelde to the immortall Soule.

§. IIII.
Of the Spirit of life, which God breathed into man in his Creation.

§. V.
*That Man is (as it were) a little World:
with a digression touching our mortality.*

§. VI.
Of the free power, which Man had in his first Creation to dispose of himselfe.

§. VII.
Of Gods ceasing to create any more: and of the cause thereof because the vniuersall created was exceeding good.

CHAP. III.

Of the place of Paradise.

§. I.
That the seat of Paradise is greatly mistaken, and that it is no maruel that men should erre.

§. II.
A recital of strange opinions touching Paradise.

§. III.
That there was a true locall Paradise Eastward, in the Country of Eden.

§. IIII.
Why it should bee needfull to intreat diligently of the place of Paradise.

§. V.
That the Flood hath not vterly defaced the markes of Paradise, nor caused Hills in the Earth.

§. VI.
*That Paradise was not the whole Earth, as some haue thought, making the Ocean to bee
the Fountaine of those foure Rivers.*

†. VII.

Of their opinion which make Paradise as high as the Moon: and of others which make it higher then the middle Region of the ayre.

§. VIII.
Of their opinion that seate Paradise vnder the Aquinoctiall: and of the pleasant habitation vnder those Climates.

Of the change of the names of places: and that besides that Eden in Coelefyria, there is a Country in Babylon, once of this name, as is proued out of Esay 37. and Ezech. 27.

§. X.
Of diuers other testimonies of the Land of Eden: And that this is the Eden of Paradise.

§. XI.
Of the difficulty in the Text, which seemeth to make the four Rivers to rise from one streame.

§. XII.
Of the strange fertilitie and happinesse of the Babylonian soyle, as it is certaine that Eden was such.

§. XIII.
Of the riuer Gehon, and the Land of Cush: and of the ill translating of Aethiopia for Cush. 2. Chron. 21. 16.

§. XV.
A conclusion, by way of repetition of some things spoken of before.

CHAP. IIII.

Of the two cheefe Trees in the Garden of Paradise.

§. I.
That the Tree of Life was a material tree: and in what sense it is to bee taken, that Man by his eating the forbidden fruite, is made subiect to death.

§. II.
Of Becanus his opinion, that the Tree of Knowledge was Ficus Indica.

§. III.
Of Becanus his not vniuersally allegorizing of the story of his Ficus Indica.

§. IIII.
Of the name of the Tree of Knowledge of good and euill: with some other notes touching the story of Adams sinne.

of the first Booke.

CHAP. V.

Of diuers Memorable things betweene the fall of Adam, and the Flood of Noah.

§. I.
OF the cause and reuenge of Cains sinne:
and of his going out from God.

§. II.
Of Cains dwelling in the Land of Nod: and of his City Enoch.

§. III.
Of Moses his omitting sundry things concerning Cains generation.

§. IIII.
Of the diuersities in the Age of the Patri-archs, when they began their children.

§. V.
Of the long liues of the Patriarches: and some of late memory.

§. VI.
Of the Patriarchs deliuering their knowledge by Tradition: and that Enoch writ before the Flood.

Of the men of Warre before the Flood.

§. VIII.
That the Giants, by Moses so called, were indeede men of huge bodies: as also diuers in later times.

CHAP. VI.

Of Idolatrous corruptions, quickly rising, and hardly at length vanishing in the World: and of the Reliks of Truth touching these auncient times, obscure-ly appearing in Fables and old Legends.

§. I.
That in old corruptions we may find some signes of more auncient truth.

§. II.
That the corruptions themselves were very auncient: as in the Family of Noah, and in the old Egyptians.

§. III.
That in proceesse of time these lesser errors drew on greater, as appeareth in the grosse Superstitions of the Egyptians.

§. IIII.
That from the Reliques of auncient Records among the Egyptians and others, the first 1- dols & Fables were inuented: & that the first Iupiter was Cain; Vulcan, Tubalcain, &c.

§. V.
Of the three cheefe Iupiters, and also the strange story of the third.

§. VI.
Of Cham, and other wicked ones, whereof some gat some affected the name of Gods.

§. VII.
That the wiser of the auncient Heathen had farre better opinions of God.

§. VIII.
That Heathenisme, and Iudaisme, after many wounds, were at length about the same time vnder Iulian miraculously confounded.

*Of the last refuges of the Deuill, to main-

CHAP. VII.

Of Noahs Flood.

§. I.
OF Gods forewarning: and some humane testimonies: and some doubting touching the truth of Noahs Flood.

§. II.
Of the flood in the time of Ogyges: and that this was not Noahs Flood.

§. III.
Of Deucalions flood: and that this was not Noahs Flood: nor the Vmbri in Italie a remnant of any vniuersall flood.

§. IIII.
Of some other Records testifying the Vni-uersall Flood: and of two auncient Deluges in Ægypt: and of some elsewhere.

§. V.
That the Flood of Noah was supernaturall, though some say it might haue bene fore-scene by the starres.

§. VI.
*That there was no need of any new Creation of matter to make the vniuersall Flood:
and what are Cataractæ Coeli, Gen. 7. v. 11.*

§. VII.
Of some remainder of the memory of Noah among the Heathen.

§. VIII.
*Of sundry particulars touching the Arke:
as the place where it was made, the matter, fashion, and name.*

That the Arke was of sufficient capacity.

§. X.
That the Arke rested vpon part of the Hill Taurus

The Contents

Hill Taurus (or Caucasus) between the East Indies and Scythia.

†. I.

A Preterition of some questions lesse materiall: with a note of the use of this question, to find out the Metropolis of Nations.

†. II.

A proposall of the common opinion, that the Arke rested upon some of the Hilles of Armenia.

†. III.

The first Argument against the common opinion. They that came to build Babel, would have come sooner, had they come from so nere a place as Armenia.

†. IIII.

The second Argument; That the Easterne people were more ancient in populousity, and in all humane glory.

†. V.

The third Argument; From the wonderfull resistance which Semiramis found in the East-Indies.

†. UI.

The fourth Argument; From diuers considerations in the person of Noah.

†. VII.

Of the senselesse Opinion of Annius, the Commenter upon Berofus, That the Arke rested upon Montes Caspij in Armenia; & yet upon Gordiaz, which are three hundred miles distant also in Armenia, & yet in Scythia.

†. VIII.

The fifth Argument; The Vine must grow Naturally neere the place where the Arke rested.

Answer to an objection out of the wordes of the Text, The Lord scattered them from thence vpon the face of the whole Earth.

†. X.

An answer to the Objection from the name of Ararat taken for Armenia: & the height of the Hills there.

†. XI.

Of Caucasus, and diuers farre higher hills than the Armenian.

†. XII.

Of diuers incongruities, if in this Story we should take Ararat for Armenia.

†. XIII.

Of the contrary situation of Armenia unto the place noted in the Text: and that it is no maruaille, that the same ledge of hills running from Armenia to India, should keep the same name all a long, and euen in India, bee called Ararat.

†. XIII.

Of the best Vine naturally growing on the South side of the Mountaine Caucaſi, and toward the East Indies, and of other excellencies of the soile.

†. XV.

The conclusion, with a brieſe repeating of diuers chiefe points.

CHAP. VIII.

Of the first Planting of Nations after the Flood: and of the Sonnes of Noah; Sem, Ham, and Iaphet, by whom the Earth was re-peopled.

§. I.

W Hether Shem and Ham were elder then Iaphet.

§. II.

Of diuers things that in all reason are to be presumed, touching the first planting of the World; as that all Histories must yeeld to Moses: that the world was not planzed all at once, nor without great direction: and, that the knowne great Lords of the first Ages were of the issue of Ham.

§. III.

Of the Isles of the Geniles in Iaphets portion: of Berofus his too speedie seating Gomer the sonne of Iaphet in Italie; and another of Iaphets sonnes Tubal, in Spaine: and also of the Antiquitie of Longinque Nauigation.

§. IIII.

Of Gog and Magog, Tubal, and Meſech, seated first about Asia the leſſe, out of Ezech. Chap. 38, 39.

§. V.

Against the fabulous Berofus his Fiction, That the Italian Ianus was Noah.

§. VI.

That Gomer also, and his Son Togorma, of the Posterity of Iaphet, were first seated about Asia the leſſe: and that from thence they ſpred Westward into Europe, & Northward into Sarmatia.

§. VII.

Of Iauan the fourth sonne of Iaphet, and of Meſch, of Aram, & Meſhech of Iaphet.

§. VIII.

Of Alcanaz and Riphath, the two Elder sonnes of Gomer.

Of the foure ſons of Iauan: and of the double ſignification of Tharlis, either for a proper name, or for the Sea.

of the second Booke.

§. X.

That the ſeat of Chuſh, the eldeſt ſon of Ham, was in Arabia, not in Aethiopia: and of ſtrange Fables, & ill tranſlations of Scripture, grounded vpon the miſtaking of this point.

†. I.

OF Iosephus his Tale of an Aethiopheſſe; wife to Moſes, grounded on the miſtaking of the ſeat of Chuſh.

†. II.

A diſpute againſt the Tale of Iosephus.

†. III.

Chuſh ill expounded for Aethiopia. Ezechiel 29. 10.

†. IIII.

Another place of Ezechiel, chap. 30. v. 9. in like manner miſtaken.

†. V.

A place, Eſay 18. v. 1. in like manner corrupted by taking Chuſh for Aethiopia.

†. VI.

That vpon the like miſtaking, both Terhaka in the Story of Senacherib, and Zera in the Story of Aſa, are vnaduſedly made Aethiopians.

†. VII.

A farther expoſition of the place, Eſay 18.

§. XI.

Of the Plantation and Antiquities of Aegypt.

†. I.

T HAT Mizraim the chiefe Planter of Aegypt, and the reſt of the ſonnes of Ham, were ſeated in order one by another.

†. II.

Of the time, about which the name of Aegypt began to be knowne: and of the Aegyptians Lunarie yeeres, which made their Antiquities ſeeme the more fabulous.

†. III.

Of certaine vaine aſſertions of the Antiquity of the Aegyptians.

†. IIII.

Against Pererius, That it is not unlikely, but that Aegypt was peopled within two hundred yeeres after the Creation: at leaſt, that both it, and the moſt parts of the world were peopled before the Flood.

†. V.

Of ſome other reaſons againſt the opinion of Pererius.

†. VI.

Of the wordes of Moſes, Genel. 10. v. vlt. wherevpon Pererius grounded his opinion.

†. VII.

A concluſion, reſolving of that which is moſt likely, touching the Aegyptian Antiquities: with ſome words of Phur, another ſon of Ham, which peopled Lybia.

§. XII.

Of the eleuen ſonnes of Canaan, the fourth ſonne of Ham.

†. I.

OF the bounds of the Land of Canaan, with the names of his eleuen ſonnes.

†. II.

Of the portions of Zidon and Heth.

†. III.

Of the Iebusiſites and Amorites.

†. IIII.

Of the Gergeſites, Heukites, & Harkites.

†. V.

Of Simi and Aruadi.

†. VI.

Of Zemari.

†. VII.

Of Hamathi.

§. XIII.

Of the ſonnes of Chuſh, excepting Nimrod, of whom heereafter.

†. I.

T HAT the moſt of the ſons of Chuſh, were ſeated in Arabia the happy: and of the Sabaeans that robbed Iob: and of the Queen that came to Salomon.

†. II.

Iosephus his opinion of Dedan, one of the iſſue of Chuſh, to have been ſeated in the weſt Aethiopia, diſprooued out of Ezechiel and Hieremie.

§. XIII.

Of the iſſue of Mizraim: and of the place of Hieremie, chap. 9. v. 7.

§. XV.

Of the iſſue of Sem.

†. I.

OF Elam, Aſkur, Arphaxad, and Lud.

†. II.

Of Aram, and his ſonnes.

†. III.

Of the diuiſion of the earth in the time of Phaleg, one of the ſons of Heber, &c.

†. IIII.

Of the ſons of Ioſtan, the other ſon of Heber

†. V.

Of Ophir, one of Ioſtans ſons, and of Perur: and of that voyage of Salomon.

†. VI.

Of Hauilah the ſonne of Ioſtan, who alſo paſſed into the Eaſt Indies: and of Meſha, and Sepher, named in the bordering of the families of Ioſtan; with a concluſion of this Diſcourſe, touching the Plantation of the World.

CHAP.

CHAP. IX.

Of the beginning and establishing of Government.

§. I.
Of the proceeding from the first Government under the eldest of families to Regall, and from Regall absolute to Regall tempered with Lawes.

§. II.
Of the three commendable sorts of Government, with their opposites: & of the degrees of humane society.

§. III.
Of the good Government of the first Kings.

§. II II.
Of the beginning of Nobility: and of the vaine vaunt thereof without vertue.

CHAP. X.

Of Nimrod, Belus, and Ninus: and of memorable things about those times.

§. I.
That Nimrod was the first after the flood that reigned like Soueraign Lord: and that his beginning seemeth to haue bene of iust authority.

§. II.
That Nimrod, Belus, and Ninus, were three distinct persons.

§. III.
That Nimrod, not Assur, built Ninive: and that it is probable out of Esay 23, 13. that Assur built V. of the Chaldees.

§. IIII.
Of the acts of Nimrod and Belus, as farre as now they are knowne.

§. V.
That we are not to meruaile how so many kingdoms could be erected about these times: and of Vexoris of Egypt; and of Tanais of Scythia.

§. VI.
Of the Name of Belus, and other Names ascribed vnto it.

§. VII.
Of the worshipping of Images begun from Belus in Babel.

§. VII I.
Of the Warres of Ninus: and lastly, of his Warre against Zoroaster.

CHAP. XI.

Of Zoroaster, supposed to haue bene the chiefe Author of Magicke Arts; and of diuers kindes of Magicke.

§. I.
That Zoroaster was not Cham, nor the first Inuenter of Astrologie, or of Magicke: and that there were diuers great Magicians of this name.

§. II.
Of the Name of Magia: and that it was anciently farre diuers from Coniuring and Witchcraft.

§. III.
That the good knowledge in the auncient Magicke is not to be condemned; though the Devil here, as in other kinds, hath sought to obtrude euill things vnder the name and colour of good things.

§. IIII.
That Daniels milking Nabuchodonosors condemning of the Magicians, doth not iustifie all their practices.

§. V.
The abuse of things, which may bee found in all kindes, is not to condemne the right vse of them.

§. VI.
Of the diuers kindes of lawfull Magick.

§. VII.
Of diuers wayes by which the Devil seemeth to worke his wonders.

§. VII I.
That none was ever raised from the dead, by the power of the deuill: and that it was not the true Samuel which appeared to Saul.

CHAP. XII.

Of the memorable buildings of Ninus: and of his wife Semiramis: and of other her acts.

§. I.
Of the magnificent building of Ninive by Ninus: and of Babylon by Semiramis.

§. II.
Of the end of Ninus: and beginning of Semiramis reigne.

§. III.
Of Semiramis Parentage, and education: and Metamorphosis of her Mother.

§. III I.

§. IIII.

Of her Expedition into India, and death after discomfiture: with a note of the improbability of her vices.

§. V.

Of the Temple of Belus, built by Semiramis: and of the Pyramides of Egypt.

The Contents of the Chapters, Paragraphs, and Sections, in the second Booke of the first Part of the Historie of the World.

CHAP. I.

Of the Time of the Birth of Abraham: and of the vse of this question; for the ordering of the story of the Assyrian Empire.

§. I.
Of some of the successors of Semiramis: with a briefe translation to the question, about the Time of the birth of Abraham.

§. II.
A proposall of reasons or arguments, that are brought to proue Abraham was borne in the yeere 292. after the Flood, and not in the yeere 352.

§. III.
The answer to one of the Obiections proposed, shewing that Abraham made but one journey out of Mesopotomia into Canaan; and it, after his Fathers death.

§. IIII.
The answer to another of the Obiections proposed, shewing that it was not unlikely, that Terah should beget Abraham in his hundred and thirtieth yeere.

§. V.
The answer to two more of the obiections, shewing that wee may haue certainty of Abrahams age from the Scripture, though wee make not Abraham the eldest sonne: and that there was great cause, why in the storie of Abraham his two Brethren should be respected.

§. VI.
That the naming of Abraham first of the three Brethren, Gen. II. v. 26. doth not proue that hee was the eldest: together with diuers reasons, prouing that Abraham was not the eldest son of Terah.

§. VII.
A conclusion of this dispute, noting the Authors on both sides: with an admonition, that they which shorten the times, make all ancient stories the more improbable.

§. VIII.
A computation of the times of the Assyrians and others, grounded vpon the times noted in the story of Abraham.

That Amraphel, one of the foure Kings whom Abraham ouerthrew, Gen. 14. may probably be thought to haue bene Ninias the sonne of Ninus.

§. X.
Of Arich, another of the foure Kings: and that Ellas, whereof he is said to haue bin King, lyes betwene Coele Syria, and Arabia Petraea.

§. XI.
Of Tidal, another of the foure Kings.

§. XII.
That Chedorlaomer, the chiefe of the foure Kings, was not of Assyria, but of Persia: and that the Assyrian Empire at this time was much impaired.

§. XIII.
That it is not improbable, that the foure Kings had no Dominion in the Countries named, but that they had elsewhere with their Colonies planted themselves, and so reyned the names of the countries whence they came: which if it be so, we need not to say that Amraphel was Ninias, nor trouble our selues with many other difficulties.

CHAP. II.

Of the Kings of Egypt from the first peopling of it after the Flood, to the time of the delivry of the Israelites from thence.

§. I.
A Briefe of the Names and Times of the first Kings of Egypt: with a note of the causes of difficultie in resolving of the truth in these points.

§. II.
That by the account of the Egyptian Dynasties, & otherwise, it appears that Chams reigne in Egypt began in the yeere after the Flood 191.

§. III.
That these Dynasties were not diuers families of Kings, but rather successions of Regents, oftentimes many under one King.

§. IIII.
Of Cham, and his sonne Mizraim, or Ofliris.

§. V.
Of the time when Ofliris reigne ended: & that Iacob came into Egypt in the time of Orus the sonne of Ofliris.

§. VI.
Of Typhon, Hercules Ægyptius, Orus, and the two Sefostres, successively reigning after Mizraim: and of diuers errors about the former Sefostres.

§. VII.
Of Bufiris, the first oppressor of the Israelites: and of his successor Queene Thermutis, that tooke up Moses out of the water.

§. VIII.
Of the two brethren of Queene Thermutis: and what King it was under whom Moses was borne: and who it was that perished in the Red Sea.

CHAP. III.

Of the delivry of Israel out of Egypt.

§. II.
Of diuers Cities & Places in Egypt, mentioned in this story or elsewhere in the Scripture.

§. III.
Of the crueltie against the Israelites young children in Egypt: and of Moses his preservation and education.

§. IIII.
Of Moses his flying out of Egypt, & the opinions of certayne ancient Historians, of his War in Æthiopia, and of his marriage there: Philo his iudgement of his Pastorall life: and that of Pererius of the Bookes of Genesis, & Iob.

§. V.
Of Pharaohs pursuite of the Israelites: and of their passage towards the Red Sea, so farre as Succoth.

§. VI.
Of the Solarie and Lunarie yeeres: & how they are reconciled: with the forme of the Hebrew yeere, and their manner of intercalation.

§. VII.
Of the passage of Israel from Succoth, towards the Red Sea: and of the diuers wayes leading out of Egypt.

§. VIII.
Of their passage over the Red Sea: and of the Red Sea it selfe.

That the passage through the Red Sea was miraculous, and not at a low ebbe.

CHAP. IIII.

§. I.
Of the iourneying of the Israelites from the Red Sea, to the place where the Law was giuen them: with a Discourse of Lawes.

A Transition, by way of recapitulation of some things touching Chronology, with a continuance of the storie, vntill the Amalekites met with the Israelites.

§. II.
Of the Amalekites, Madianites, and Kenites, vpon occasion of the battell with the Amalekites, and Iethros comming, who being a Kenite, was Priest of Madian.

§. III.
Of the time when the law was giuen: with diuers commendations of the invention of Lawes.

§. IIII.
Of the name and meaning of the Wordes, Law, and Right.

§. V.

Of the Law of Nature.

§. VII.
Of the written Law of God.

§. VIII.
Of the unwritten Law of God, giuen to the Patriarchs by Tradition.

§. IX.
Of the Morall, Iudiciall, and Ceremoniall Law: with a Note prefixed, How the Scripture speaketh not alway in one sense, vwhen it nameth the Law of Moses.

§. X.
A proposall of nine other points to be considered, with a touch of the first.

§. XI.
Of the sixth point, to wit, of the difference and agreement of the Olde and New Testament.

§. XII.
Of the rest of the points proposed.

§. XIII.
Of the seuerall Commandements of the Decalogue: and that the difficultie is not in respect of the commandements, but by our default.

§. XIII.
If there were not any Religion, nor Iudgement to come, yet the Decalogue were most necessary to be obserued.

§. XV.
Of humane Law, written, and unwritten.

§. XVI.
That onely the Prince is exempt from humane Lawes, and in what sort.

CHAP. V.

THE PREFACE.

How unfit, and how unworthy a choice, I have made of my selfe, to undertake a worke of this mixture; mine own reason, though exceeding weakke, hath sufficiently resolved me. For had it bene begotten then with my first dawning of day, when the light of common knowledge began to open it selfe to my younger yeares: and before any wound received, either from Fortune or Time, I might yet well have doubted that the darknesse of Age and Death would have covered over both. It and mee, long before the performance. For beginning with the Creation, I have proceeded with the History of the World; and lastly purposed (some few sallies excepted) to confine my Discourse, within this our renowned Island of Great Brittain. I confesse that it had better suited with my disability, the better part of whose times are run out in other trauailes; to haue (as I could) the remoynded and sententious redress of our English affaires, than of the vniuersall: in whom, had there bin no other defect (who am all defect) then the time of the day; it were enough; the day of a tempestuous life, drawne on to the very evening ere I began. But those inward and soule piercing wounds, which at euery waking while conuersed with the dejected, sauisie those few friends, which I haue tryed by the fire of Adversitie; the former enforcing, the latter perswading, haue caused me to make my thoughts legible, and my selfe the subiect of euery opinion wise or weakke.

To the World I present them, to which I am nothing indebted: neither haue I those that were, (Fortune changing) spent much better in any age. For, Prosperity and Adversity haue euery more varied and varied vulgar Affections. And as we see it in experience, That does doe alwayes worke at those they know not, and thus it is their nature to accompany one another in those clamours: so it is with the inconsiderate multitude, who, wanting that veritie which we call Honesty in all men, and that especial gift of GOD which we call Charity in Christian men; condemne without hearing, and wound without offence given: led there vnto by vncertaine raportion; which his Maestie daily acknowledgeth for the Author of all his. Blame no man (saith Sir iacob) before thou haue enquired the matter: vnderstand first, and then resolve righteously. Rumor is, sine teste, sine iudicio, maligna, fallax. Rumor is without witnesse, without iudge, malicious and deceiueable. This vanity of vulgar opinion it was, that gaue Saint Augustine Argument to assure, that he feared the praise of good men, and detested that of the euill. And therein no man hath giuen a better rule, then his of Seneca, Conscientia satisfaciendus: nihil in famam laboramus; sequatur vel mala, dum bene merearis. Let vs satisfie our owne consciences, and not trouble our selues with fame: bee it neuer so ill, it is to be despised for we deserue well.

For my selfe, if I haue in any thing serued my Country, and prised it before my private the generall acceptation can yeeld me no other profit at this time than doth a faire sunshine day to a Sea-man after shipwracke; & the contrary no other harme than an outrageous tempest after the Port attained. I know that I lost the loue of many, for my fidelity towards Her, whom I must still honor in the dust; though further then the defence of her excellent person, I neuer persecuted any man. Of those that did it, and by what device they did it, He that is the Supream Iudge of all the world, hath taken the accompt: so as for this kinde of suffering, I must say with Seneca, Mala opinio, bene parata, delectata.

As for other men, if there be any that haue made themselves Fathers of that fame, which hath bene begotten for them: I can neither enuy at such their purchased glory, nor much lament mine owne mishap in that kind; but content my selfe to say with Virgil, Sic vos non vobis, in many particulars. To labour other satisfaction, were an effect of spleeny, not of hope: seeing it is not Truth, but Opinion, that can trauell the World without a pass-port. For were it otherwise; and were there not as many internall formes of the minde, as there are externall figures of men; there were then some possibility, to perswade by the mouth of one Advocate, euen Equity alone.

But such is the multiplying & extensive vertue of dead Earth, & of that breath-giving life which God hath cast vpon slime & dust, as that among those that were, of whom we read & heare; and among those that are, whom we see & conuerser with; euery one hath receiued a severall picture of face, & euery one a diuers picture of minde; euery one a forme apart, euery one a fancy & cogitation differing there being nothing wherein Nature so much triumpheth as in dissimilitude. From whence it cometh that there is found so great diversity of opinions; so strong a contrariety of inclinations; so many naturall & vnnaturall; wise, foolish; manly, & childish affections, and passions in mortall Men. For it is not the visible fashion and shape of plants, and of reasonable Creatures, that makes the difference of working in the one, and of condition in the other; but the forme internall.

And though it hath pleased God, to reserve the Art of reading mens thoughts to himselfe; yet as the fruit tells the name of the Tree; so do the outward workes of men (so far as their cogitations are acted) giue vs wherof to guesse at their end. Nay, it were not hard to expresse the one by the other, very neare the life: did not craft in many feare in the most; and the worlds loue in all, teach euery capacity; according to the compass it hath, to qualifie and maske ouer their inward deformities for a time. Though it be also true, Nemo potest diu personam ferre fictam: cito in naturam suam residunt, quibus veritas non subest. No man can long continue masked in a counterfeit behauiour; the things that are forced for pretences hauing no ground of truth, cannot long dissemble their owne natures. Neither can any man (saith Plutarch) so change himselfe, but that his heart may be sometimes scene at his tongues end.

In this great discord and dissimilitude of reasonable Creatures, if we direct our selues to the Multitudes, Quis honeste et iuste iudicat vulgus: The common people are full Iudges of honest things, and whose Wisdome (saith Ecclesiastes) is to be despised, if to the better sort, every vnderstanding hath a peculiar iudgement, by which it both censureth other men, & valueth it self. And therefore vnto me it will not seeme strange, though I finde these my worthles papers torne with Rats: seeing the slothfull Censurers of all ages haue not spared to taxe the Reuerend Fathers of the Church, with Ambition; the seuerest men to themselves, with Hypocrisie; the greatest louers of Iustice, with Popularity; and those of the truest valour and fortitude, with vaine glory. But of these natures which lye in wait to finde fault, and to turne good into euill, seeing Salomon complained long since: & that the very age of the world renders it euery day after other more malicious; I must leaue the professors to their easie wayes of reprehension, than which there is nothing of more facility.

Eccle. 11.
Nihil facilius,
quam reprehendere alium.

To me it belongs in the first part of this Preface, following the common & approved custome of those, who haue left the memories of time past to after ages; to giue, as neare as I can, the same right to History which they haue done. Yet seeing therein I should but borrow other mens words; I wil not trouble the Reader with the repetition. True it is that among many other benefits, for which it hath bin honoured; in this one it triumpheth ouer all humane knowledge, That it hath giuen vs life in our vnderstanding, since the world it selfe had life & beginning, euen to this day: yea it hath triumphed ouer time; which besides it nothing but eternitie hath triumphed ouer: for it hath carried our knowledge ouer the vast and deuouring space of many thousands of yeares; & giuen so faire & peircing eyes to our minde; that we plainly behold liuing now (as if we had liued then) that great world, Magni Dei sapiens opus, the wise worke (saith Hermes) of a great GOD, as it was then, when but new to it selfe. By it (I say) it is, that we liue in the very time when it was created: we behold how it was gouerned: how it was couered with waters; and againe repeopled. How Kings and Kingdomes haue flourished & fallen, and for what vertue and piety God made prosperous; and for what vice and deformity he made wretched, both the one & the other. And it is not the least debt which we owe vnto History, that it hath made vs acquainted with our dead Ancestors; and, out of the depth and darkenesse of the earth, deliuered vs their memory and fame. In a word, we may gather out of History a policy no lesse wise than eternall; by the comparison and application of other mens fore-past miseries with our owne like errors & ill deseruings. But it is neither of Examples the most liuely instruction, nor the words of the wisest men, nor the terror of future torments, that hath yet so wrought in our blind and stupified mindes; as to make vs remember, That the infinite eye and wisdom of God doth peirce through all our pretences; as to make vs remember, That the iustice of God doth require none other accuser, than our owne consciences: which neither the false beauty of our apparent actions, nor all the formalitie, which (to pacifie the opinions of men) we put on; can in any, or the least kind, cower from his knowledge. And so much did that Heathen wisdom confesse, no way as yet qualified by the knowledge of a true God. If any (saith Euripides) hauing in his life committed wickednesse, thinke he can hide it from the euermourning gods, he thinkes not well.

To repeat GODS iudgements in particular, vpon those of all degrees, which haue played with his mercies; would require a volume apart: for the Sea of examples hath no bottome. The markes, set on priuate men, are with their bodies cast into the earth; and their fortunes, written onely in the memories of those that liued with them: so as they who succeed, and haue not seene the fall of others, doe not feare their owne faults. GODS iudgments vpon the greater & greatest haue bene left to posteritie; first, by those happy hands which the Holy Ghost hath guided; and secondly, by their vertue, who haue gathered the acts and ends of men, mighty and remarkable in the world. Now to poynt farre off, and to speake of the conseruion of Angells into Demills, for Ambition: Or of the greatest and most glorious Kings, who haue gnawne the grasse of the earth with beasts, for pride and ingratitude towards GOD: Or of that wise working of Pharao, when he slue the Infants of Israel, ere they had recovered their Cradles: Or of the policy of Iezabel, in couering the Murder of Naboth by a trial of the Elders, according to the Law: with many thousands of the like: what were it other, than to make an hopelesse prooffe, that farre-off examples would not be left to the same farre-off respects, as heretofore? For who hath not obserued, what labour, practise, perill, bloudshed, and cruelty, the Kings and Princes of the world haue vndergone, exercised, taken on them, and committed; to make them-selues and their issues maisters of the world? And yet hath Babilo, Persia, Egypt, Syria, Macedon, Carthage, Rome, & therest, no fruit, flower, grasse, nor leafe, springing vpon the face of the earth, of those seeds: No; their very roots & ruines do hardly remaine. Omnia quæ manu hominum facta sunt, vel manu hominum euertuntur, vel stando & durando deficient: All that the hand of man can make, is either ouerturned by the hand of man, or at length by standing and continuing consumed. The reasons of whose ruines, are diuersly giuen by those that ground their opinions on second causes. All Kingdomes & States haue fallen (say the Politicians) by outward & forrainge force, or by inward negligence & dissension, or by a third cause arising from both: Others obserue, That the greatest haue sunck downe vnder their own weight; of which Liue hath a touch: eo creuit, vt magnitudine labore sua: Others, That the diuine providence (which Cratippus obiected to Pompey) hath set downe the date and period of euery Estate; before their first foundation and erection. But hereof I will giue my selfe a day ouer to resolve.

For seeing the first bookes of the following story, haue vnderaken the discourse of the first Kings and Kingdomes: and that it is impossible for the short life of a Preface, to trauaile after and ouer-take farre off Antiquity, and to iudge of it; I will, for the present, examine what profit hath bene gathered by our owne Kings, and their Neighbour Princes: who hauing beheld, both in diuine and humane letters, the successe of infidelitie, iniustice, and cruelty; haue (notwithstanding) planted after the same patterne.

True it is, that the iudgements of all men are not agreeable; nor (which is more strange) the affection of any one man stirred vp a-like with examples of like nature: But euery one is touched most, with that which most neerely seemeth to touch his owne priuate; Or otherwise best sweteth with his apprehension. But the iudgements of GOD are for euer vouchangeable; neither is hee wearied by the long proceffe of time, and wont to giue his blessing in one age, to that which he hath cursed in another. Wherefore those that are wise, or whose wisdom, if it bee not great, yet is true and well grounded; will be able to discerne the bitter fruites of irreligious policie, as well among those examples, that are found in ages removed farre from the present, as in those of latter times. And that it may no lesse appeare by euident prooffe, than by asseueration, That ill doing hath alwaies bene attended with ill successe; I will here, by way of preface, runne ouer some examples, which the worke ensuing hath not reached.

Among our Kings of the Norman race, we haue no sooner passed ouer the violence of the Norman Conquest, than we encounter with a singular and most remarkable example of Gods Iustice, vpon the children of Henry the first. For that King, when both by force, craft and cruelty, he had dispossessed, ouer-reached, and lastly made blinde and destroyed his elder Brother Robert Duke of Normandy, to make his owne sonnes Lords of this Land: GOD cast them all, Male and Female, Nephewes and Nieces (Maud excepted) into the bottome of the Sea; with aboue a hundred and fifty others that attended them; whereof a great many were Noble, and of the King dearly beloued.

To passe ouer the rest, till we come to Edward the Second; it is certaine, that after the murder of that King, the issue of blood then made, though it had some times of stay and stopping, did againe breake out, and that so often and in such abundance, as all our Princes of the Masculine race (very few excepted) dyed of the same disease. And although the young yeares of Edward the Third, made his knowledge of that horrible fact no more then suspitious: yet in that he afterwards caused his owne Vncle the Earle of Kent to die for no other offence than the desire of his Brothers redemption, whom the Earle as then supposed to be liuing; the King making that to be treason in his Vncle, which was indeed treason in himselfe, (had his Vncles intelligence been true) this I say made it manifest, that he was not ignorant of what had past, nor greatly desirous to haue had it other wise: though he caused Mortimer to dye for the same.

This cruelty the secret and vnspeakable iudgement of GOD reuenged on the Grand-child of Edward the Third: and so it fell out, euon to the last of that line, that in the second or third descent they were all buried vnder the ruines of those buildings, of which the Mortar had bene tempered with innocent bloud. For Richard the second, who saw, both his Treasurers, his Chancellor, and his Steward, with diuers others of his Counsaillours some of them slaughtered by the people, others in his absence executed by his enemies; yet he alwaies tooke himselfe for ouer-wise, to be taught by examples. The Barles of Huntingdon and Kent, Montague & Spencer, who thought themselves as great Politicians in those daies as others haue done in these, hoping to please the King, and to secure themselves, by the Murder of Gloucester; died soone after, with many other their adherents, by the like violent hands; and farre more shamefully then did that Duke. And as for the King himselfe (who in regard of many deedes, unworthy of his Greatnesse, cannot be excused, as the disauowing himselfe by breach of Faith, Charters, Pardons and Patents:) Hee was in the prime of his youth deposed, and murdered by his (osen Germane and vassall) Henry of Lancaster, afterwards Henry the fourth.

This King, whose Title was weak, & his obtaining the Crowne traitorous, who brake faith with the Lords at his landing, protesting to intend onely the recouerie of his proper inheritance, brake faith with Richard himselfe; and brake Faith with all the Kingdome in Parliament, to whom hee swore that the deposed King should liue. After that hee had enioyed this Realme some few yeares, and in that time had bene set vpon on all sides by his Subiects, and neuer free from conspiracies & rebellions: he saw (if soules immortal see & discern any things after the bodies death) his Grand-childe Henry the sixth, & his Son the Prince, suddenly & without mercy, murdered; the possession of the Crowns (for which he had caused so much blood to be poured out) transferred from his race; & by the Issues of his enemies worne & enioyd: enemies, whom by his own practise he supposed that he had left no lesse power-lesse, than the succession of the Kingdom questionlesse; by entailing the same upon his own Issues by Parliament. And out of doubt, humane reason could haue iudged no other wise, but that these cautious provisions of the father, seconded by the valour & signall victories of his son Henry the fifth, had buried the hopes of euery Competitor, vnder the despair of all reconquest and recovery. I say, that humane reason might so haue iudged: were not this passage of Caubaon also true; Dies, hora, momentum, euertendis dominationibus sufficit, quæ adamantinis credebantur radicibus esse fundatæ; A day, an houre, a moment, is enough to ouerturne the things, that seemed to haue beene founded & rooted in Adamant.

Now for Henry the sixth, upon whom the great storme of his Grandfathers grievous faultes fell, as it formerly had done upon Richard the Grand-childe of Edward: although he was generally esteemed for a gentle & innocent Prince, yet as he refused the daughter of Armagnac, of the House of Nauarre, the greatest of the Princes of France, to whom he was affianced (by which match he might haue defended his inheritance in France) & married the Daughter of Aniou, (by which he lost all that hee had in France) so in condescending to the unworthy death of his Vncle of Gloucester, the maine and strong Pillar of the house of Lancaster; He drew on himselfe & this kingdome the greatest ioynt-losse & dishonor that euer it sustained since the Norman Conquest. Of whom it may truly be said which a Counsellor of his own spake of Henry the third of France, Qu'il estoit vne fort gétile Prince; mais son reigne est aduenu en vne fort mauuois temps. That he was a very gentle Prince; but his reigne happened in a very vnfortunate season.

It is true that Buckingham & Suffolke were the practisers and contriuers of the Dukes death: Buckingham and Suffolke, because the Duke gaue instructions to their authority, which otherwise vnder the Queene had bin absolute; the Queene in respect of her personall wound, sprætaxque iniuria formæ, because Gloucester dissuaded her marriage. But the fruit was answerable to the seed; the success to the Counsaile. For after the cutting downe of Gloucester, Yorke grew up so fast, as he dared to dispute his right both by arguments & armes; in which quarrel, Suffolke and Buckingham, with the greatest number of their adherents, were dissolved. And although for his breach of Oath by Sacrament, it pleased God to strike down Yorke; yet his son the Earle of March, following the plaine path which his Father had troden out, despoiled Henry the Father, and Edward, the son, both of their liues and Kingdome. And what was the end now of that polittique Lady the Queene, other then this, That she liued to behold the wretched ends of all her partakers: that she liued to looke on, while her Husband the King, & her onely son the Prince, were heuen in sunder; while the Crowne was set on his head that did it. Shee liued to see her selfe despoiled of her Estate, and of her moveables: and lastly, her father, by rendering up to the Crowne of France the Earledome of Prouence and other places for the payment of fifty thousand crownes for her Ransome, to became a starke Begger. And this was the end of that subtilty, which Siracides calleth fine but vnrighteous; for other fruit hath it neuer yeelded since the world was.

And now it came to Edward the fourths turne (though after many difficulties) to triumph. For all the plants of Lancaster were rooted up; onely Earle of Richmond excepted: whom also he had once bought of the Duke of Brittain, but could not hold him. And yet was not this of Edward such a Plantation, as could any way promise it selfe stability. For this Edward the King (to omit more than many of his other cruelties) beheld and allowed the slaughter, which Gloucester, Dorset, Hastings, and others, made of Edward the Prince in his owne presence: of which tragicall Actours, there was not one that escaped the iudgement of G.O.D. in the same kinde. And He, which (besides the execution of his brother Clarence, for none other offence then he him-self had formed in his own imagination) instructed Gloucester to kill Henry the sixth, his Predecessour; taught him also by the same Art to kill his owne sons & successors Edward and Richard. For those Kings which haue sold the blood of others, at a low rate; haue but made the market for their owne enemies, to buy of theirs at the same price.

To Edward the fourth succeeded Richard the Third, the greatest Maister in mischief of all that fore-went him: who although, for the necessity of his Tragedie, he had more parts to play, and more to performe in his owne person, then all the rest; yet he so well fitted euery affection that played with him, as if each of them had but acted his owne interest. For he wrought so cunningly upon the affections of Hastings, and Buckingham, enemies to the Queene and to all her kindred, as he easily allured them to condescend, that Riuer and Grey, the Kings Maternal Vncle and halfe brother, should (for the first) be seuered from him: secondly, he wrought their consent to haue them imprisoned and lastly (for the voyding of future inconuenience) to haue their heads seuered from their bodies. And having now brought those his chiefe instruments to exercise that common precept, which the Deuill hath written on euery poore soules face, To depreesse those whom they had grieved, and to destroy those whom they had depreessed; Hee urged that argument so farre and so forcibly, as nothing but the death of the yong king him-selfe, & of his brother, could fashion the conclusion. For he caused it to be hammered into Buckinghams head, That, whensoever the King or his brother, should haue able yeares to exercise their power, they would take a most severe reuenge of that carelesse wrong, offered to their Vncle and Brother, Riuer and Grey.

But this was not his manner of reasoning with Hastings, whose fidelity to his Masters Sonnes was without suspect: and yet the Diuell, who neuer dissuades by impossibility, taught him to try him. And so he did. But when hee found by Cases by who sounded him, that he was not fordable; He first refused to kill him sitting in counsell: where in having sayled with his sword; He set the Hangman upon him, with a weapon of more weight. And because nothing else could moue his appetite, He caused his head to be stricken off, before hee ate his dinner. A greater iudgement of God, than this upon Hastings I haue neuer obserued in any storie. For the selfe same day that the Earle Riuer, Grey, and others, were (without triall of Law, or offence giuen) by Hastings aduice executed at Pomfret: I say Hastings him-selfe in the same day, & (as I take it) in the same houre, in the same low-lesse maner, had his head stricken off in the Tower of London.

The Preface.

But Buckingham liued a while longer; and with an eloquent oration perswaded the Londoners to elect Richard for their king. And having receiued the Earldome of Hereford for reward, besides the high hope of marrying his daughter to the Kings onely sonne; after many grievous vexations of mind, and unfortunate attempts; being in the end betrayed and deliuered vp by his trustiest seruant; He had his head seuered from his body at Salisbury, without the trouble of any of his Peeres. And what successe had Richard himselfe after all these mischiefs & murders, policies, and counter-policies to Christian religion? after such time as with a most mercilesse hand he had pressed out the breath of his Nephews and Naturall Lords; other than the prosperitie of so short a life, as it tooke end, ere himselfe could well looke ouer and discern it? The great outcry of innocent blood, obtained at GODS hands the effusion of his; who became a spectacle of shame and dishonor, both to his friends and enemies.

This cruell King Henry the 7. cut off; & was therein (no doubt) the immediate instrument of Gods iustice. A politticke Prince he was if euer there were any, who by the engine of his wisdom, beate downe & ouerturned as many strong oppositions both before & after he wore the crowne, as euer King of England did: I say by his wisdom, because as he euer left the reins of his affectiōs in the hands of his profit, so he alwayes wayed his vndertakings by his abilities, leaving nothing more to hazard than so much as cannot be denied it in all humane actions. He had wel observed the proceedings of Loys the eleuenth, whom he followed in all that was royall or royall-like; but he was farre more iust, and began not their processe whom he hated or feared by the execution, as Loys did.

He could neuer endure any mediation in rewarding his seruants, & therein exceeding wise for whatsoeuer him selfe gaue, he him selfe receiued backe the thanks & the loue, knowing it well that the affectiōs of men (purchased by nothing so readily as by benefits) were traynes that better became great kings, than great subjects. On the contrary, in whatsoeuer he greued his subjects, he wisely put it off on those, that he found fit ministers for such actions. How so euer, the taking off of Stanleys head, who set the Crowne on his; & the death of the yong Earle of Warwicke, son to George D. of Clarence, (he was, as the successe also did, that he held somewhat of the errors of his Ancesters for his possession in the first line ended in his grand children as that of Edward the third and Henry the fourth had done.

Now for King Henry the eight: if all the pictures and Portraues of a mercilesse Prince were lost in the World, they might all againe be painted to the life, out of the story of this King. For how many seruants did he aduance to hast (but for what vertue no man could suspect) and with the change of his fancy ruined againe; no man knowing for what offence? To how many others of more desert gaue he abundant flowers: from whence to gather hony, and in the end of Haruest burnt them in the fire? How many wiues did he cut off, & cast off, as his fancy & affection chaged? How many Princes of the blood (whereof some of them for age could hardly crawle towards the block) with a world of others of all degrees (of whom our common Chronicles haue kept the account) did he execute? yea, in his very death-bed, and when he was at the point to haue giuen his account to GOD for the abundance of blood already spilt: He imprisoned the Duke of Norfolk the Father, & executed the Earle of Surrey the son, the one, whose desertings he knew not how to value, having neuer omitted any thing that concerned his own ho-now, & the Kings seruice; the other neuer hauing committed any thing worthy of his least displeasure: the one exceeding valiant and aduised; the other no lesse valiant than learned, & of excellent hope. But besides the sorrowes which he heaped vpon the Fatherlesse, & widowes at home: and besides the vaine enterprises abroad, wherein it is thought that he consumed more Treasure, than all our victorious Kings did in their seuerall Conquests: what causelesse and cruell warres did he make vpon his owne Nephew King Iames the fifth? What Lawes & Wills did he deuise, to establish this Kingdome in his owne issues? vsing his sharpest weapons to cut off, and cut downe those branches, which sprang from the same roote that himselfe did. And in the end (notwithstanding these his so many irreligious prouisions) it pleased God to take away all his owne, without increase; though, for themselves in their seuerall kindes, all Princes of eminent vertue. For these words of Samuel to Agag King of the Amalikites, haue beene verified vpon many others: As thy sword hath made other women childlesse so shall thy mother be childlesse among other women. And that blood, which the same King Henry affirmed, that the cold aire of Scotland had frozen vpon in the North, God hath diffused by the sunshine of his grace: from whence His Maiestie now liuing, & long to liue, is descended. Of whom I may say it truly, That if al the malice of the world were infused into one eie: yet could it not discern in his life, euen to this day, any one of those foule spots, by which the consciences of all the forenamed Princes (in effect) haue bene defiled, nor any droppe of that innocent blood on the sword of his iustice, with which the most that forsooke him, haue stizmed both their hands and fame. And for this Crowne of England, it may truly be a vowed: That he hath receiued it euen from the hand of God, and hath stayed the time of putting it on, howsoeuer he were provoked to hasten it: That He neuer tooke reuenge of any man, that sought to put him beside it: That he refused the assistance of Her enemies, that wore it long, with as great glory as euer Princeesse did. That his Maiestie entred not by a breach, nor by blood; but by the Ordinary gate, which his owne right (et open; and into which, by a generall loue and Obedience, Hee was receiued. And howsoeuer His Maiesties preceeding title to this Kingdome, was performed by many Princes (witnesse the Treaty at Cambray in the yeare, 1559) yet he neuer pleased to dispute it, during the life of that renowned Lady his Predecessor; no, notwithstanding the iniury of not being declared Heire, in all the time of Her long raigene.

Neither ought we to forget, or neglect our thankfulness to GOD for the uniting of the Northern parts of Brittain to the South, to wit of Scotland to England, which though they were seuered but by small brookes and bankes, yet by reason of the long continued warre, and the cruelties exercised vpon each other, in the affection of the Nations, they were infinitely seuered. This I say is not the least of Gods blessings which His Maiestie hath brought with him vnto this Land: No, put all our petty greuanances together, & heap them vp to their height, thy wil appeare but as a Mole-hill compared with the Mountaine of this concord. And if all the Historians since then, haue acknowledged the uniting of the Red-Rose, and the White; for the greatest happinesse; (Christian Religion excepted) that euer this Kingdome receiued from GOD, certainly the peace betweene the two Lions of gold & gules, and the making them one, doth by many degrees exceed the former: for by it, besides the sparing of our british blood, heretofore and during the difference, so often & abundantly shed, the state of England is more assured, the Kingdome more enabled inabled to recouer her ancient honor and rights, and by it made more inuincible, than by all our former alliances, practices, policies & conquests. It is true that here-of we do not yet finde the effect. But had the Duke of Parma in the yeare 1588. ioyned the army which hee commanded, with that of Spaine, and landed it on the south coast; & had his Maieſty at the ſame time declared himſelfe againſt vs in the north: it is eaſie to diuine what had become of the liberty of England, certainly we would then without murmur haue brought this union a ſarre greater praiſe than it hath ſince coſt vs. It is true, that there was neuer any Comon weale or Kingdom in the world, wher ein no man had cauſe to lament. Kings liue in the world & not aboute it. They are not infinit to examine euery mans cauſe, or to relieue euery mans wants, And yet in the latter, (though to his owne preiudice) His Maieſtie hath had more compaſſion of other mens neceſſities, than of his own Coffers. Of whom it may be ſaid as of Salomon, Dedit Deus Salomoni latitudinem cordis: Which if other men do not vnderſtand with Pineda, ſo be meant by Liberality, but by Latitude of knowledge; yet may it be better ſpoken of His Maieſtie, than of any King that euer Englad had, who as well in diuine, as humane vnderſtanding, hath exceeded all that fore-went him, by many degrees.

in Sal. i. K. 4.

I could ſay much more of the Kings Maieſty, without flatterie: did I not feare the imputation of preſumption, & withall ſuſpect, that it might befall theſe papers of mine, (though the loſſe were little) as it did the Pictures of Queene Elizabeth, made by vnſkilfull and common Painters, which by her own commendement were knockt in peeces and caſt into the fire. For ill Artiſts, in ſetting out the beauty of the externall: and weake writers, in deſcribing the vertues of the internall: doe often leaue to poſterity, of well formed faces a deformed memory, and of the moſt perfect and Princely mindes, a moſt defective representation. It may ſuffice, and there needes no other diſcouſe, if the honeſt Reader but compare the cruell & turbulent paſſages of our former Kings, and of other their Neighbour-Princes (of whom for that purpoſe I haue inſerted this breife diſcouſe) with His Maieſties temperate, reuengeleſſe, and liberall diſpoſition: I ſay that if the honeſt Reader weigh them iuſtly, and with an euen hand: & withall but beſtow euery deformed child on his true Parent; He ſhall find, that there is no man that hath ſo iuſt cauſe to complaine, as the King himſelfe hath. Now as we haue tolde the ſucceſſe of the trumperies and cruelties of our owne Kings, and other great perſonages: ſo we finde, that GOD is euery where the ſame GOD. And as it pleaſed him to puniſh the vſurpation, & vnnatural crueltie of Henry the firſt, & of our third Edward, in their Children for many generations: ſo dealt He with the ſons of Loys Debonaire, the ſon of Charles the great, or Charlemaine. For after ſuch time as Debonaire of France, had torne out the eies of Bernard his Nephew, the ſon of Pepin the eldeſt ſon of Charlemaine, & heire of the Empire, and then cauſed him to die in priſon, as did our Henry to Robert his eldeſt brother: there followed nothing but murders vpon murders, poiſoning, imprifonments, & ciuill warre, till the whole race of that famous Emperour was extinguished. And though Debonaire, after he had rid himſelfe of his Nephew by a violent death; & of his baſtard Brothers by a ciuill death (hauing incloſed them with ſure gard, al the daies of their liues, within a Monaftery) held himſelfe ſecure from all oppoſition. Yet God raiſed vp againſt him (which he ſuſpected not) his own ſons, to vex him, to inuade him, to take him priſoner, & to depoſe him; his owne ſons, with whom (to ſatiſſie their ambition)

he had ſhared his eſtate, and giuen them Crownes to weare, and Kingdomes to gouerne, during his owne life. Tea his eldeſt ſon Lothaire (for he had foure, three by his firſt wife, & one by his ſecond; to wit, Lothaire, Pepin, Loys, and Charles) made it the cauſe of his depoſition. That he had vſed violence towards his brothers and kiſmen; and that he had ſuffered his Nephew (whom he might haue deliuered) to be ſlaine, eo quod, ſaith the Text, fratribus, et propinquis violentiam intulerit, et nepotem ſuum, quem ipſe liberare poterat, interfici permiferit. Becauſe he vſed violence to his Brothers and Kiſmen, & ſuffered his Nephew to be ſlaine whom he might haue deliuered.

Yet did he that which few Kings doe; namely, repent him of his crueltie. For among many other things, which he performed in the Generall Aſſembly of the States, it followes: Poſt hæc autem palam ſe erraſſe confeſſus, & imitatus Imperatoris Theodoſii exemplum, pœnitentiam ſpontaneam ſuſcepit, tam de his, quæ in Bernardum proprium nepotem gesserat. After this he did openly confeſſe himſelfe to haue erred, and following the example of the Emperour Theodoſius, hee vnder-went voluntary penance, as well for his other offences, as for that which he had done againſt Bernard his own Nephew.

This he did: and it was praiſe-worthie. But the blond that is vniuſtly ſpilt, is not againe gathered vp from the ground by repentance. Theſe Medicines, miniſtred to the dead, haue but dead rewards.

This King, as I haue ſaid, had foure Sonnes. To Lothaire his eldeſt he gaue the Kingdome of Italy, as Charlemaine, his father, had done to Pepin the father of Bernard, who was to ſucceed him in the Empire. To Pepin the ſecond ſon he gaue the Kingdome of Aquitaine: to Loys the Kingdome of Bauier: and to Charles, whom hee had by a ſecond wife called Iudith, the remainder of the Kingdome of France. But this ſecond wife, being a Mother-in-law to the reſt, perſwaded Debonaire to caſt his ſon Pepin out of Aquitaine; thereby to greaten Charles which, after the death of his ſon Pepin, he proſequuted to effect, againſt his Gracious child bearing the ſame name. In the meane while; being inuaded by his ſon Loys of Bauier, he dies for griefe.

Debonaire dead: Loys of Bauier, and Charles after wards called the bald, & their Nephew Pepin of Aquitaine, ioine in league againſt the Emperour Lothaire their eldeſt brother. They fight neare to Auxerre the moſt bloody battaile that euer was ſtroken in France in which, the marueilous loſſe of Nobility, & men of warre, gaue courage to the Saracens to inuade Italic; to the Hunnes to ſai vpon Almaine; & the Danes, to enter vpon Normandy. Charles the bald by reſon ſeizeth vpon his Nephew Pepin, kills him in a Cloyſter. Carloman rebels againſt his Father Charles the Bald, the Father burnes out the eies of his ſon Carloman; Bauier inuades the Emperour Lothaire his brother, Lothaire quits the Empire, Hee is aſſailed and wounded to the heart by his owne conſcience, for his rebellion againſt his Father, and for his other cruelties, and dies in a Monafterie. Charles the Bald, the Vncle oppreſſeth his Nephewes the ſonnes of Lothaire, hee reſurpeth the Empire to the preiudice of Loys of Bauier his elder Brother, Bauiers armies and his ſonne. Carloman are beaten; hee dies of griefe, & the Vſurper Charles is poiſoned by Zedechias a Iew his Phiſitian, his ſonne Loys le Beque dies of the ſame drinke. Beque had Charles the ſimple and two Bastards, Loys and Carloman; they rebell against their Brother, but the eldest breakes his Neck, the younger is slaine by a wild Bore; the son of Bauiere had the same ill destiny, and brake his neck by a fall out of a Window in sport, with his companions. Charles the grosse becomes Lord of all that the sonnes of Debonaire held in Germanie; wherewith not contented, he inuades Charles the simple: but being forsaken of his Nobility, of his wife, and of his understanding, he dies a distracted begger. Charles the simple is held in Wardship by Eudes Maior of the Pallace, then by Robert the Brother of Eudes, and lastly being taken by the Eagle of Vermandois, hee is forced to die in the prison of Peron: Loyes the sonne of Charles the simple breakes his neck in chasing a Wolfe, & of the two sonnes of this Loys, the one dies of poyson, the other dies in the prison of Orleans; after whom Hugh Capet, of another race, and a stranger to the French makes him selfe King.

These miserable ends had the issues of Debonaire: who after he had once appalled iniustice with authority, his sonnes and successours tooke up the jacobin; and wore that Garment so long without other prouision, as when the same was torne from their shoulders, euery man despised them as miserable & naked beggers. The wretched successeth they had, (saith a learned French-man) beues, que en ceste mort il y avoit plus du fait des hommes que de Dieu, ou de la iustice: that in the death of that Prince, to wit, of Bernard the son of Pepin, the true heire of Charlemaine, men had more meddling, than either God, or iustice had.

But to come nearer home: it is certaine that Francis the first, One of the worthiest Kings (except for that fault) that euer the French men had, did neuer enioy him selfe; after hee had commended the destruction of the Protestants of Mirandol & Cabrieres, to the Parliament of Prouence, which poore people were thereupon burnt, and murdered; men, women, and children. It is true, that the said King Francis repented him selfe of the fault, and gaue charge to Henry his sonne, to do iustice upon the Murderers; threatening his sonne with GODS iudgments, if hee neglected it. But this vnseasonable care of his, GOD was not pleased to accept for payment. For after Henry him selfe was slaine in sport by Montgomery; wee all may remember what became of his foure sonnes; Francis, Charles, Henry, and Hercules. Of which although three of them became Kings, and were married to beautifull and vertuous Ladies: Yet were they, one after another, cast out of the world, without stock or seed. And not withstanding their subtilty, and breach of faith; with all their Massacres upon those of the religion, and great effusion of blood; the Crowne was set on his head, whom they all laboured to dissolue, the Protestants remaine more in number than euer they were; and hold to this day more strong citties than euer they had.

Let vs now see if God be not the same God in Spaine, as in England & France. Towards whom wee will looke no further backe than to Don Pedro of Castile: in respect of which Prince, all the Tyrants of Sicily, our Richard the third, and the great Euan Vasilowick of Moscouia, were but pettie ones: this Castilian, of all Christian and Heathen Kings, hauing beene the most mercilesse. For besides those of his owne blood and Nobility which becaused to be slaine in his owne Court & Chamber, as Sancho Ruis the great Master of Calatraua, Ruis Gonfales, Alphonso Tello, and Don Iohn of Arragon, whom he cut in peeces and cast into the streets, denying him Christian buriall: I say, besides these, and the slaughter of Gomes Manriques, Diego Peres, Alphonso Gomes, and the great Commander of Castile; He made away the two Infants of Arragon his Cousin-germans, his brother Don Frederick, Don Iohn de la Cerde, Albuquerque, Nugnes de Guzmã, Cornel, Cabrera, Tenorio, Mendes de Toledo, Gurtiere his great Treasurer, and all his Kindred; & a world of others. Neither did he spare his two youngest brothers, innocent Princes: whom after he had kept in close prison from their Cradles, till one of them had liued sixteene yeares, and the other, foureteene; he murdered them there. Nay he spared not his Mother, nor his wife the Lady Blanch of Bourbon. Lastly, as he caused the Archbishop of Toledo, & the Deane to be killed of purpose to enioy their treasures: so did he put to death Mahomet Aben Alhamar King of Barbary, with 37. of his Nobilitie; that came vnto him for succour, with a great summe of money, to leuy (by his fauour) some companies of souldiers to returne withall. Yea, he would needs assist the Hangman with his owne hand, in the execution of the old King; in so much as Pope Urban declared him an enemie both to God and Man. But what was his end? Hauing beene formerly beaten out of his Kingdome, and re-established by the valour of the English Nation, led by the famous Duke of Lancaster: He was stabbed to death by his younger Brother the Earle of Astramara, who dispossessed all his Children of their inheritance; which, but for the Fathers iniustice and cruelty, had neuer bene in danger of any such thing.

If we can parallel any man with this King, it must be Duke Iohn of Burgoigne who, after his traiterous murder of the Duke of Orleans, caused the Constable of Armagnac, the Chancelour of France, the Bishops of Cõstance, Bayeux, Eureux, Senlis, Saintes, and other religious and reuerend Church-men, the Earle of gran Prẽ, Hector of Chartres, and (in effect) all the Officers of iustice, of the Chamber of Accompts, Treasure, and Request, (with sixteene hundred others to accompany them) to be suddenly and violently slaine. Hereby, while he hoped to gouerne, and to haue mastered France: He was soone after stricken with an axe in the face, in the presence of the Dauphin; and, without any leifure to repent his misdeeds, presently slaine. These were the Louers of other mens miseries: and miserie found them out.

Now for the Kings of Spaine, which liued both with Henry the seuenth, Henry the eighth, Queene Mary, and Queene Elizabeth; Ferdinand of Arragon was the first: and the first that layd the foundation of the present Austrian greatness. For this King did not content him selfe to hold Arragon by the usurpation of his Ancestor; & to fasten thereunto the Kingdome of Castile and Leon, which Isabel his wife held by strong hand, and his assistance, from her owne Neece the Daughter of the last Henry: but most cruelly and craftily, without all colour or pretence of right, Hee also cast his owne Neece out of the Kingdome of Nauarre, and, contrarie to faith, and the promise that he made to restore it, fortified the best places, and so wasted the rest, as there was no meanes left for any army to inuade it. This King I say, that betrayed also Ferdinand and Frederick Kings of Naples, Princes of his owne blood, and by double alliance tied vnto him; sold them to the French: and with the same Army, sent for their succour vnder Gonsaluo, cast them out; and shared their Kingdome with the French, whom afterwards he most shamefully betrayed.

This wise and politique King, who sold Heauen and his owne Honour, to make his sonne, the Prince of Spaine, the greatest Monarch of the world : saw him die in the flower of his yeares; and his wife great with child, with her untimely birth, at once & together buried. His eldest daughter married vnto Don Alpho Prince of Portugall, beheld her first husband breake his necke in her presence; and being with child by her second, dyed with it. A iust iudgement of God vpon the race of Iohn father to Alphonso, now wholly extinguished: who had not onely left many disconsolate Mothers in Portugall, by the slaughter of their children; but had formerly slaine with his owne hand, the sonne and onely comfort of his Aunt the Lady Beatrix, Duchesse of Viseo. The second Daughter of Ferdinand, married to the Arch-duke Philip, turned foole, and died mad and deprived. His third daughter, bestowed on King Henry the eight, He saw cast off by the King: he mother of many troubles in England; & the mother of a Daughter, that in her unhappy zeale shed a world of innocent blood; lost Calice to the French; and died heart-broken without increase. To conclude: all those Kingdomes of Ferdinand haue maisters of a new name; and, by a strange family are gouerned and possesst.

Charles the fift, son to the Arch-duke, Philip, in whose vaine enterprises vpon the French, vpon the Almanes, & other Princes and States, so many multitudes of Christian souldiers, and renowned Captaines, were consumed: who gaue the while a most perilous entrance to the Turkes, and suffered Rhodes the Key of Christendom, to be taken; was in conclusion chased out of France, and in a sort out of Germany, and left to the French, Mentz, Toule, and Verdun, places belonging to the Empire, stole away from Insprug; and scaled the Alpes by torch-light, pursued by Duke Maurice; hauing hoped to swallow vp all those dominions wherein hee concocted nothing saue his owne disgraces. And hauing, after the slaughter of so many Millions of men, no one foote of ground in eyther: Hee crept into a Cloyster, and made himselfe a Pensioner of an hundred thousand Duckets by the yeare to his sonne Philip, from whom he very slowly received his meane and ordinary maintenance.

His Son againe King Philip the second, not satisfied to hold Holland and Zeeland, (wrested by his ancestors from Iaqueline their lawfull Princeesse) & to possesse in peace many other Prouinces of the Netherlands: perswaded by that mischieuous Cardinall of Granuile, and other Romish Tyrants; not onely forgot the most remarkable seruices, done to his Father the Emperour by the Nobilitie of those countries; nor onely forgot the Present made him vpon his entrie, of forty millions of Florens, called the Nouale aide; nor onely forgot, that hee had twice most solemnly sworne to the Generall States, to maintaine and preserue their ancient rights, priuiledges, and customes, which they had enioyed vnder their thirty and fise Earles before him, Conditionall Princes of those Prouinces: but beginning first to constrain them, and enthrall them by the Spanish Inquisition, and then to impouerish them by many new deuised and intolerable impositions; he lastly, by strong hand and maine force, attempted to make himselfe not onely an absolute Monarch ouer them, like vnto the Kings and Soueraignes of England and France, but Turke-like, to tread vnder his feet all their Nationall and fundamentall Lawes, Priuiledges, and ancient Rights. To effect which, after he had easily obtained from the Pope a Dispensation of his formes Oathes (which Dispensation was the true cause of the warre & bloodshed since then;) and after he had tried what he could performe, by diuiding of their owne Nobilitie, vnder the gouernment ment of his base sister, Margaret of Austria, & the Cardinall Granuile; He employed that most mercilesse Spaniard Don Ferdinad Aluarez of Toledo, Duke of Alua, followed with a powerfull army of strange Nations: by whom he first slaughtered that renowned Captaine the Earle of Egmont, Prince of Gaure. & Philip Montmorency Earle of Horn: made away Montigue, & the Marquis of Bergues, & cut off in those fixe yeares (that Alua gouerned) of Gentlemen & others, eighteen thousand & fixe hundred, by the hands of the Hangman, besides all his other barbarous murders & massacres. By whose ministry when he could not yet bring his affaires to their wished ends, hauing it in his hope to worke that by subtilty, which he had failed to performe by force: He sent for gouernour his bastard brother Don Iohn of Austria, a Prince of great hope, & very gracious to those people. But he, vsing the same Papall aduantage that his predecessors had done, made no scruple to take Oath vpon the Holy Euangelists, to obserue the treaty made with the Generall States; & to discharge the Low Countries of all Spaniards, & other strangers, therein garrisoned: Towards whose Pay & Passport, the Netherlands strained themselves to make payment of 600 thousand pounds. Which monies receiued, He suddenly surpris'd the Citadells of Antwerp & Ne-meures: not doubting (being unsuspected by the States) to haue possesst himselfe of all the maistring places of those Prouinces. For whatsoever he ouertly pretended, He held in secret a contrary counsell with the Secretary Escouedo, Rhodus, Barlemont, & others, Ministers of the Spanish tyranny; formerly practised, & now againe intended. But let vs now see the effect & end of this perurie, & of all other the Dukes cruelties. First, for himselfe; after he had murdered so many of the Nobilitie; executed (as aforesaid) eighteen thousand fixe hundred in fixe yeeres, & most cruelly slaine Man, Woman, and Child, in Mecklin, Zutphen, Naerden and other places: & after he had consumed fixe and thirty millions of treasure in fixe yeares: not withstanding his Spanish want, That he would suffocate the Hollanders in their owne butter-barrells, and milke-tubbs: Hee departed the country no otherwise accompanied, than with the curse & detestation of the whole Nation, leauing his Maisters affaires in a tenfold worse estate, then he found them at his first arriual. For Don Iohn, whose haughty conceit of himselfe ouer-came the greatest difficulties; though his iudgement were ouer-weake to mannage the least: what wonders did his fearefull breach of faith bring forth, other than the King his brothers iealousie & distrust; with the untimely death that seized him, euen in the flower of his youth? And for Escouedo his sharpe-witted Secretarie, who in his owne imagination had conquered for his Maister both England & the Netherlands; being sent into Spaine vpon some new proiect, He was at the first arriual, & before any acceffe to the King, by certaine Ruffians appointed by Anthony Peres (though by better warr than his) rudely murdered in his owne lodging. Lastly, if we consider the King of Spaines carriage, his counsaile, & successe in this businesse; there is nothing left to the memory of man more remarkeable. For he hath paid aboue an hundred Millions, & the liues of aboue foure hundred thousand Christians, for the losse of all those countries; which, for beauty, gaue place to none; & for reuenue, did equall his West Indies: for the losse of a nation, which most willingly obeyed him; & who at this day, after forty yeares warre, are in despiight of all his forces become a free Estate, & far more rich and powerfull, than they were, when hee first beganne to impouerish and oppresse them.

Oh by what plots, by what forswearings, betrayings, oppressions, imprisonments, tortures, poisonings, and under what reasons of State, and politique subtlety, haue these forenamed Kings, both strangers, and of our owne Nation, pulled the vengeance of G O D vpon themselves, vpon theirs, and vpon their prudent ministers! and in the end haue brought those things to passe for their enemies, and seene an effect so directly contrary to all their owne counsailes and cruelties; as the one could neuer haue hoped for themselves; and the other neuer haue succeeded; if no such opposition had euer bene made. G O D hath sayd it and performed it euer: Perdam sapientiam sapientum, I will destroy the wisdom of the wise.

But what of all this? and to what end doe we lay before the eyes of the liuing, the fall and fortunes of the dead: seeing the world is the same that it hath bin; and the children of the present time, will still obey their parents? It is in the present time, that all the wits of the world are exercised. To hold the times we haue, we hold all things lawfull: and either we hope to hold them for euer; or at least wee hope, that there is nothing after them to be hoped for. For as wee are content to forget our owne experience, and to counterfeite the ignorance of our owne knowledge, in all things that concerne our selues; or perswade our selues, that G O D hath giuen vs letters patents to pursue all our irreligious affections, with a non obstante: so we neither looke behind vs what hath bene, nor before vs what shal be. It is true, that the quantity which we haue, is of the body: wee are by it ioyned to the earth: we are compounded of earth; and we inhabite it. The Heauens are high, farre off, and vnsearchable: we haue sense and feeling of corporall things; and of eternall grace, but by reuelation. No meruaile then that our thoughts are also earthly: and it is lesse to be wondred at, that the words of worthless men cannot cleanse them; seeing their doctrine and instruction, whose vnderstanding the Holy Ghost vouchsafed to inhabite, haue not performed it. For as the Prophet Esai cryed out long agoe, Lord, who hath beleetued our reports? And out of doubt, as Esai complained then for himselfe and others: so are they lesse beleetued, euery day after other. For although Religion, and the truth thereof, be in euery mans mouth, yea in the discourse of euery woman, who for the greatest number are but Idols of vanity: what is it other than an vniuersall dissimulation? We professe that we know G O D: but by workes we deny him. For Beatitude doth not consist in the knowledge of diuine things, but in a diuine life: for the Diuells know them better than men. Beatitudo non est diuinorum cognitio, sed vita diuina. And certainly there is nothing more to be admired, and more to be lamented, than the priuate contention, the passionate dispute, the personall hatred, and the perpetuall war, massacres, and murders, for Religion among Christians: the discourse whereof hath so occupied the World, as it hath well neare driuen the practise thereof out of the world. Who would not soone resolute, that tooke knowledge but of the religious disputations among men, and not of their liues which dispute, that there were no other thing in their desires, than the purchase of Heauen; and that the World it selfe were but vsed as it ought, and as an Inne or place, wherein to repose our selues in passing on towards our celestially habitation? when on the contrary, besides the discourse and outward profession, the soule hath nothing but hypocrisie. We are all (in effect) become Comedians in religion: and while we act in gesture and voyce, diuine vertues, in all the course of our liues we renounce our Persons, and the parts we play. For Charity, Iustice, and Truth,

haue but their being in termes, like the Philosophers Materia prima.

Neither is it that wisdom, which Salomon defineth to be the Schoole-Mistresse of the knowledge of God, that hath valuation in the world: it is enough that we giue it our good word; but the same which is altogether exercised in the service of the World, as the gathering of riches chiefly, by which we purchase and obtaine honour, with the many respects which attend it. These indeed be the markes, which (when we haue bent our consciences to the highest) we all shoote at. For the obtaining whereof it is true, that the care is our owne; the care our owne in this life, the perill our owne in the future: and yet when we haue gathered the greatest abundance, we our selues enjoy no more thereof, than so much as belongs to one man. For the rest, He that had the greatest wisdom, and the greatest ability that euer man had, hath told vs that this is the vse: When goods increate (sayth Salomon) they also increafe that eate them; and what good cometh to the Owners, but the beholding thereof with their eyes? As for those that deuour the rest, and follow vs in faire weather: they againe forsake vs in the first tempest of misfortune, and steere away before the Sea and Winde, leauing vs to the malice of our destinies. Of these, among a thousand examples; I will take but one out of Maister Dannet, and vse his owne words: Whilest the Emperour Charles the first, after the resignatio of his Estates, layed at Vlushing forwinde, to carry him his last iourney into Spaine; He conferred on a time with Seldius, his brother Ferdinands Embassadour, till the deepe of the night. And when Seldius should depart: the Emperour calling for some of his seruants, and no body answering him (for those that attended vpon him, were some gone to their lodgings, and all the rest asleepe) the Emperour tooke vp the candle himselfe, and went before Seldius to light him downe the staires; and so did, notwithstanding al the resistarce that Seldius could make. And when He was come to the staires foote, He sayd thus vnto him: Seldius, remember this of Charles the Emperour, when he shall be dead and gone, That Him, whom thou hast knowne in thy time enuironed with so many mighty Armies, and Guards of souldiers, thou hast also seene alone, abandoned, and forsaken, yea euen of his owne domestically seruants, &c. I acknowledge this change of Fortune to proceed from the mighty hand of G O D; which I will by no meanes go about to withstand.

But you will say that there are some things else, and of greater regard than the former. The first, is the reuerend respect that is held of great men, and the Honor done vnto them by all sorts of people. And it is true indeed: provided, that an inward loue for their iustice and piety, accompany the outward worship giuen to their places and power; without which what is the applause of the Multitude, but as the outcrie of an Heard of Animals, who without the knowledge of any true cause, please themselves with the noise they make? For seeing it is a thing exceeding rare, to distinguish Vertue and Fortune: the most impious (if prosperous) haue euer bene applauded; the most vertuous (if vnprosperous) haue euer bene despised. For as Fortunes man rides the Horse, so Fortune herselfe rides the Man. Who, when he is descended and on foote: the Mantaken from his Beast, and Fortune from the Man; a base groomme beates the one, and a bitter contempt spurnes at the other, with equall liberty.

The second is the greatning of our posterity, and the contemplation of their glory whom we leaue behind vs. Certainly, of those which conceiue that their soules departed take any comfort therein, it may truly be sayd of them, which Lactantius spake of certaine Heathen Philosophers, quod sapientes sunt in re stulta. For when our spirits immortall shall be once separate from our mortall bodies, & disposed by GOD: there remaineth in them no other ioy of their posterity which succeed, than there doth of pride in that stone, which sleepeth in the Wall of a Kings Palace; nor any other sorrow for their pouerty, than there doth of shame in that, which beareth vp a Beggers cotage. Nesciunt mortui, etiam sancti, quid agunt viui, etiam eorum filij, quia animæ mortuorum rebus viuientium non intersunt. The dead though holy, know nothing of the liuing, no, not of their owne children: for the soules of those departed, are not conuersant with their affaires that remaine. And if we doubt of Saint Augustine, we cannot of Iob; who tells vs, That wee know not if our sonnes shall bee honourable: neither shall wee vnderstand concerning them, whether they shalbee of low degree. Which Ecclesiastes also confirmeth: Man walketh in a shaddow, and disquieteth himselfe in vaine: hee heapeth vp riches, and cannot tell who shall gather them. The liuing (sayth he) know that they shall die, but the dead know nothing at all: for who can shew vnto man, what shall be after him vnder the Sun? He therefore accompteth it among the rest of worldly vanities, to labour and trauaile in the world, not knowing after death, whether a foole or a wise man should enioy the fruits thereof: which made me (sayth he) endeauiour euen to abhorre mine owne labour. And what can other men hope, whose blessed or sorrowfull estates after death God hath preferred? mans knowledge lying but in his hope, seeing the Prophet Esai confesseth of the elect, That Abraham is ignorant of vs, and Israel knowes vs not. But hereof wee are assured, that the long and darke night of death, (of whose following day wee shall neuer behold the dawne, till his returne that hath triumphed over it) shall couer vs ouer, till the world be no more. After which, and when we (hall againe receiue Organs glorified and incorruptible, the seats of Angelicall affections: in so great admiration (shall the soules of the blessed be exercised, as they cannot admit the mixture of any second or lesse ioy, nor any returne of foregone & mortall affection towards friends, kindred, or children. Of whom whether we shall retaine any particular knowledge, or in any sort distinguish them: no man can assure vs; & the wisest men doubt. But on the contrary, If a diuine life retaine any of those faculties, which the soule exercised in a mortall body; we shall not at that time so diuide the ioyes of Heauen, as to cast any part thereof on the memory of their felicities which remaine in the World. No, be their estates greater than euer the World gaue, we shall (by the difference knowne vnto vs) euen desest their consideration. And whatsoever comfort shall remaine of all forepast, the same will consist in the charity, which we exercised liuing: and in that Piety, Justice, and firme Faith, for which it pleased the infinite mercy of God to accept of vs, and receiue vs. Shal we therefore value honor and riches at nothing? and neglect them, as vnecessary & vaine? Certainly no. For that infinite wisdom of God, which hath distinguished his Angells by degrees, which hath giuen greater and lesse light and beauty, to Heauenly bodies: which hath made differences betwene beasts and birds: created the Eagle and the Flye, the Cedar and the Shrub, and among stones, giuen the fairest tincture to the Ruby, and the quickest light to the Diamond; hath also ordained Kings, Dukes or Leaders of the people, Magistrates, Iudges, and other degrees among men. And as honour is left to posterity, for a marke and ensigne of the vertue and vnderstanding of their Ancestors: so, seeing Siracides preferreth Death before Beggery: and that iudges, without proportionable estates, fall vnder the miserable successe of other mens pitty; I accompt it foolishnesse to condemne such a care: Provided, that worldly goods be well gotten, and that we raise not our owne buildings out of other mens ruines. For as Plato doth first preferre the perfection of bodily health; secondly, the forme and beauty; and thirdly, Diuitias nulla fraude quæritas: so Jeremy cries, Woe vnto them that erect their houses by vnrighteousnesse, and their chambers without equity: and Esai the same, Woe to those that spoyle and were not spoyled. And it was out of the true wisdom of Salomon, that he commandeth vs, not to drinke the wine of violence, not to lie in wait for blood, and not to swallow them vp aliue, who seriches we couet: for such are the wayes (sayth hee) of euery one that is greedy of gaine.

And if we could afford our selues but so much leisure as to consider, That hee which hath most in the world, hath, in respect of the world, nothing in it: and that he which hath the longest time lent him to liue in it; hath yet no proportion at all therein, setting it either by that which is past, when wee were not, or by that time which is to come, in which we shall abide for euer: I say, if both so wit, our proportion in the world, and our time in the world, differ not much from that which is nothing; it is not out of any excellency of vnderstanding, that we so much prize the one, which hath (in effect) no being: and so much neglect the other, which hath no ending: coueting those mortall things of the world, as if our soules were therein immortall, and neglecting those things which are immortall, as if our selues after the world were but mortall.

But let euery man value his owne wisdom, as he pleaseth. Let the Rich man thinke all foolles, that cannot equall his abundance; the Reuenger esteeme all negligent, that haue not trodd downe their opposites; the Politician, al grosse, that cannot merchandize their faith: Yet when we once come in sight of the Port of death, to which all windes driue vs, and when by letting fall that fatal Anchor, which can neuer be weighed againe, the Nauigation of this life takes end. Then it is, I say, that our owne cogitations (those sad & seuer cogitations formerly beaten fro vs by our Health and Felicity) returne againe, and pay vs to the uttermost for all the pleasing passages of our liues past. It is then, that we crie out to God, for mercy; then, when our selues can no longer exercise cruelty to others: and it is onely then, that we are stricken through the soule with this terrible sentence, That God will not be mockt. For if according to S. Peter, The righteous scarcely be saued: and that God spared not his Angels: where shall those appeare, who, hauing serued their appetites all their liues, presume to thinke, that the seuer Commandements of the All-powerfull God were giuen but in sport; and that the short breath, which we draw when death presseth vs, if we can but fashion it to the sound of Mercy (without any kind of satisfaction or amends) is sufficient? O quam multi, saith a reuerend Father, Cum hac spe ad æternos labores & bella descendunt! I confesse that it is a great comfort to our friends, to haue it said, that we ended wel; for we al desire (as Balaam did) to die the death of the righteous. But what shall we call a disesteeming, an opposing, or (indeed) a mocking of God: if those men do not oppose him, disesteeme him, and mocke him, that thinke it enough for God, to aske him forgiveness at leisure, with the remainder and last drawing of a malicious breath? For what doe they otherwise, that die this kinde of wel-dying, but say vnto God as followeth? We beseech thee O God, that all the falshoods, forswearings, and treacheries of our liues past, may be pleasing vnto thee; that thou wilt for our sakes (that haue had no leisure to do anything for thine) change thy nature (though impossible) and forget to be a iust God; that thou wilt loue iniuries and oppressions, call ambition wisdom, and charity foolishnesse. For I shall preiudice my sonne (which I am resolved not to doe) if I make restitution; and confesse my selfe to haue bene vniust, (which I am too proud to do) if I deliuer the oppressed. Certainly, these wise worldlings haue either found out a new God; or made One: and in all likelihood such a Leaden One, as Lewis the eleuenth wore in his Cappe; which when he had caused any that he feared, or hated, to be killed, he would take it from his head and kisse it: beseeching it to pardon him this one euill act more, and it should be the last, which (as at other times) he did, when by the practise of a Cardinal and a falsified Sacrament, he caused the Earle of Armagnack to be stabbed to death; mockeries indeed fit to be vsed towards a Leaden, but not towards the euermouing God. But of this composition are all deuout louers of the World, that they feare all that is durlesse and ridiculous: they feare the plots and practises of their opposites, and their very whisperings: they feare the opinions of men which beate but vpon shadowes: they flatter and forsake the prosperous and vnprosperous, be they friends or Kings: yea they diue vnder water like Ducks, at euery pebble stone, that's but throwne towards them by a powerfull hand: and on the contrary, they shew an obstinate and Giantlike valour, against the terrible iudgements of the Al-powerfull God: yea they shew themselves gods against God, and slaues towards men; towards men whose bodies and consciences are alike rotten.

Now for the rest: If we truly examine the difference of both conditions; to wit, of the rich and mighty, whom we call fortunate; and of the poore & oppressed, whom we account wretched: we shall find the happinesse of the one, and the miserable estate of the other so tied by God to the very instant, and both so subiect to interchange (witness the sodaine downefall of the greatest Princes, and the speedy vprising of the meanest persons) as the one hath nothing so certaine, whereof to boast; nor the other so vncertaine, whereof to bewaile it selfe. For there is no man so assured of his honor, of his riches, health, or life; but that he may be deprived of either or all, the very next houre or day to come. Quid vesper vchar, incertum est, What the euening will bring with it, it is vncertaine. And yet yee cannot tell (sayth S. Iames) what shall be to morrow. To day he is set vp, and to morrow he shall not be found: for he is turned into dust, and his purpose perisheth. And although the aire which compasseth aduersity, be very obscure: yet therein we better discern God, than in that shining light which enuironeth worldly glory; through which for the clearnesse thereof, there is no vanity which escapeth our sight. And let aduersity seeme what it will; to happy men, ridiculous, who make them-selues merry at other mens misfortunes; and to those vnder the crosse, grievous: yet this is true, That for all that is past, to the very instant, the portions remaining are equall to either. For be it that we haue haue liued many yeares, and (according to Salomon) in them all we haue reioyced, or be it that we haue measured the same length of dayes, and therein haue euermore sorrowed: yet looking backe from our present being, we finde both the one and the other, to wit, the ioy and the woe, sayled out of sight, and death; which doth pursue vs & hold vs in chace from our infancy, hath gathered it. Quicquid erat is retro est, morsteneit: Whatsoeuer of our age is past, death holds it. So as who-so-euer he be, to whom Fortune hath bene a seruant, and the Time a friend: let him but take the accompt of his memory (for we haue no other keeper of our pleasures past) and truly examine what it hath reserued eyther of beauty and youth, or fore-gone delights; what it hath saued, that it might last of his dearest affections, or of whateuer else the amorous Spring time gaue his thoughts of contentment, then vnuatuable; and he shall finde that all the art which his elder yeares haue, can draw no other vapour out of these dissolutions, than heauy, secret, and sad sighes. He shall finde nothing remaining, but those sorrows, which grow vp after our fast-springing youth; ouertake it, when it is at a stand; and ouer-top it utterly, when it beginnes to wither: in so much as looking backe from the very instant time, & fro our now being, the poore, diseased, & captiue creature, hath as little sence of all his former miseries and paines as he, that is most blest in common opinion, hath of his fore-passed pleasures & delights. For whatsoeuer is cast behind vs, is iust nothing: and what is to come, deceitfull hope hath it. Omnia quae euentura sunt, in incerto iacent. Onely those few blacke Swannes I must except: who haue had the grace to value worldly vanities at no more than their owne price; doe, by retayning the comfortable memory of a well acted life, behold death without dread, and the graue without feare; and embrace both, as necessary guides to endlesse glory.

For my selfe, this is my consolation, and all that I can offer to others, that the sorrows of this life, are but of two sorts: whereof the one hath respect to GOD; the other, to the World. In the first we complaine to GOD against our selues, for our offences against him; and confesse, Erti iustus in omnibus quae venerunt super nos, And thou O Lord art iust in all that hath befallen vs. In the second wee complaine to our selues against GOD: as if he had done vs wrong, either in not giuing vs worldly goods and honours, answering our appetites: or for taking them againe from vs haue had them; forgetting that humble & iust acknowledgment of Iob, The Lord hath giuen, & the Lord hath taken. To the first of which Saint Paul hath promised blessednesse; to the second, death. And out of doubt he is either a foole or vngatefull to GOD, or both, that doth not acknowledge, how meane soeuer his estate be, that the same is yet far greater, than that which God opoth him: or doth not acknowledge, how sharpe soeuer his afflictions be, that the same are yet far lesse; than those which are due vnto him. And if an Heathen wise man call the aduersities of the world but tributa viuendi, the tributes of liuing: a wise Christian man ought to know them, & beare the, but as the tributes of offending. He ought to beare them manlike, and resolutely; & not as those whining souldiers do, qui gementes sequuntur imperatorem.

For seeing God, who is the Author of all our tragedies, hath written out for vs, & appointed vs all the parts we are to play: and hath not, in their distribution, bene partiall to the most mighty Princes of the world; That gaue vnto Darius the part of the greatest Emperour, and the part of the most miserable begger, a begger begging water of an Enemie to quench the great drough of death; That appointed Baiazet to play the Grand Signior of the Turks in the morning, & in the same day the Foottoole of Tamerlane (both which parts Valerian had also plaid, being taken by Saporess:) that made Bellisarius play the most victorious Captaine, & lastly the part of a blinde begger; of which examples many thousands may be produced. Why should other men, who are but as the least wormes, complaine of wrongs? Certainly there is no other account to be made of this ridiculous world, than to resolute, That the change of fortune on the great Theater, is but as the change of garments on the lesse. For when on the one and the other, euery man wears but his owne skin; the Players are all alike. Now if any man, out of weaknes prise the passages of this world other wise (for saith Petrarch, Magniingenij est reuocare mentem a sensibus) it is by reason of that unhappy fantasie of ours, which forgeth in the braines of Man all the miseries (the corporall excepted) whereunto he is subiect. Therein it is, that Misfortune & Aduersitie worke all that they worke. For seeing Death, in the end of the Play, takes from all, whatsoeuer Fortune or Force takes from any one: it were a foolish madnesse in the shipwracke of worldly things, where all sinkes but the Sorrow, to saue it. That were, as Seneca saith, Fortuna succumbere, quod tristius est omni fato, to fall vnder Fortune, of all other the most miserable destinie.

The Preface.

But it is now time to sound a retreat, and to desire to be excused of this long pursuit: and withall, that the good intent, which hath moued me to draw the picture of time past (which we call Historie) in so large a Table, may also be accepted in place of a better reason.

The examples of diuine providence, euery where found (the first diuine Histories being nothing else but a continuation of such examples) haue perswaded me to fetch my beginning from the beginning of all things, to wit, Creation. For though these two glorious actions of the Almighty be so neare, and (as it were) linked together, that the one necessarily implyeth the other: Creation, inferring Providence (for what father forsaketh the childe that he hath begotten?) and Providence presupposing Creation: Yet many of those that haue seemed to excell in worldly wisdom, haue gone about to disioyne this coherence; the Epicure denying both Creation and Providence, but granting that the world had a Beginning; the Aristotelian granting Providence, but denying both the Creation and the Beginning.

Now although this doctrine of Faith, touching the Creation in time (for by faith we vnderstand, that the world was made by the word of God) be too weighty a worke for Aristotles rotten ground to beare vp, vpon which he hath (notwithstanding) founded the Defences and Fortresses of all his Verball Doctrine: Yet that the necessity of infinite power, and the worlds beginning, and the impossibility of the contrary, euen in the iudgement of Naturall reason, wherein he beleeued, had not better informed him; it is greatly to be maruailed at. And it is no lesse strange, that those men which are desirous of knowledge (seeing Aristotle hath failed in this maine point; and taught little other than termes in the rest) haue so retrencht their mindes from the following and ouertaking of truth, and so absolutely subiected them-selues to the law of those Philosophicall principles; as all contrary kinde of teaching, in the search of causes, they haue condemned either for phantasticall, or curious. But doth it follow, that the positions of Heathen Philosophers, are vndoubted grounds and principles indeed, indeed, because so called? Or that ipsi dixerunt, doth make them to be such? Certainly no. But this is true, That where naturall reason hath built any thing so strong against it selfe, as the same reason can hardly assaile it, much lesse batter it downe: the same in euery question of Nature, and finite power, may be approued for a fundamentall law of humane knowledge. For saith Charron in his booke of <sup>Charron de</sup> <sup>5. c. 11.</sup> <sup>5. c. 11.</sup> wisdom, Tout proposition humaine a autant d'autorite quel'autre, si la raison n'en fait la difference; Euery humane proposition hath equall authoritie, if reason make not the difference, the rest being but the fables of principles. But hereof how shall the vpright and vnpartiall iudgement of man giue a sentence, where opposition and examination are not admitted to giue in euidence? And to this purpose it was well said of Lactantius, Sapientiam sibi adimunt, qui sine vllio iudicio inuenta maiorum probant, & ab alijs pecudum more ducuntur. They neglect their owne wisdom, who without any iudgement approue the inuention of those that fore-went them, & suffer them-selues, after the manner of Beasts, to be led by them. By the aduantage of which sloth and dulnesse, ignorance is now become so powerfull a Tyrant: as it hath set true Philosophie, Physick, and Diuinity in a Pillory; and written ouer the first, Contra negantem Principia; ouer the second, Virtus specifica; and ouer the third, Ecclesia Romana.

The Preface.

But for my selfe, I shall neuer be perswaded, that God hath shut vp all light of Learning within the lantern of Aristotles braines: or that it was euer said vnto him, as vnto Eldras, Accendam in Corda tuo Lucernam intellectus: that God hath giuen inuention but to the Heathen, and that they onely inuaded Nature, and found the strength and bottome thereof; the same Nature hauing consumed all her store, and left nothing of price to after-ages. That these and these be the causes of these and these effects, Time hath taught vs; and not reason: and so hath experience, without Art. The Cheese-wife knoweth it as well as the Philosopher, that sowre Rennet doth coagulate her milke into a curd. But if wee aske a reason of this cause, why the sowrenesse doth it? whereby it doth it? and the manner how? I thinke that there is nothing to be found in vulgar Philosophie, to satisfie this and many other like vulgar questions. But man to couer his ignorance in the least things, who cannot giue a true reason for the Grasse vnder his feete, why it should be greener rather then red, or of any other colour; that could neuer yet discover the way and reason of Natures working, in those which are farre lesse noble creatures than himselfe; who is farre more Noble than the Heauens them-selues: Man (saith Salomon) that can hardly discern the things that are vpon the <sup>Salomon. 1. 9.</sup> Earth, and with great labour finde out the things that are before vs; that hath so short a time in the world as he no sooner begins to learne, than to die that hath in his memory but borrowed knowledge; in his vnderstanding, nothing truly: that is ignorant of the Essence of his owne soule, and which the wisest of the Naturalists (if Aristotle be he) could neuer so much as define, but by the Action & effect, telling vs what it workes (which all men know as well as he) but not what it is, which neither he, nor any else, doth know, but GOD that created it, (For though I were perfect, yet I know not my soule, saith Iob.) Man I say, that is but an Idiot in the next cause of his owne life, and in the cause of all actions of his life: will (notwithstanding) examine the Art of GOD in creating the World; of GOD, who (saith Iob) is so excellent as wee know him not; <sup>Iob. 26.</sup>

and examine the beginning of the worke, which had end before Man-kinde had a beginning of being. He will disable Gods power to make a world, without matter to make it of. He will rather giue the mothes of the Aire for a cause, cast the worke on necessity or chance; bestow the honour thereof on Nature; make two powers, the one to be the Author of the Matter, the other of the Forme; and lastly, for want of a worke-man, haue it Eternal: which latter opinion Aristotle to make himselfe the Author of a new Doctrine, brought into the World: and his Sectatours haue maintained it; parati ac coniurati, quos sequuntur, Philosophorum animis inuictis opinionones tueri. For Hermes, who liued at once with, or soone after Moses, Zoroaster, Musæus, Orpheus, Linus, Anaximenes, Anaxagoras, Empedocles, Melissus, Pherecydes, Thales, Cleanthes, Pythagoras, Plato, and many others (whose opinions are exquisitely gathered by Steuchius Eugubinus) found in the necessity of inuincible reason, One eternal and infinite Being, to be the Parent of the vniuersall. Horum omnium sententia quamuis sit incerta, eodem tamen spectat, vt Prouidentiam vnam esse consentiant. siue enim Natura, siue AEther, siue Ratio, siue mens, siue fatalis necessitas, siue diuina Lex; idem esse quod a nobis dicitur Deus: All these mens opinions (saith Laetantius) though vncertaine, come to this; That they agree vpon one Prouidence; whether the same be Nature, or light, or Reason, or vnderstanding, or destinie, or diuine ordinance, that it is the same which we call GOD. Certainly as all the Rivers in the world, though they haue diuers risings, and diuers runnings; though they some-times hide themselves for a while vnder ground, & seeme to be lost in Sea-like Lakes; doe at last finde, & fall into the great Ocean: so after all the searches that humane capacitie hath, & after all Philosophicall contemplation and curiositie; in the necessity of this infinite power, all the reason of man ends and dissolues it selfe.

As for others; and first touching those, which conceiue the matter of the World to haue beene eternal, and that God did not create the World, ex nihilo, but ex materia praexistente: the Suppositio is so weake, as is hardly worth the answering. For (saith Eusebius) Mihi videntur qui hoc dicunt, fortunam quoque Deo annectere, They seeme vnto me, which affirme this, to giue part of the work to God, & part to Fortune: in so much as if God had not found this first matter by chance. He had neither beene Author, nor Father, nor Creator, nor Lord of the Vniuersall. For were the Matter or Chaos, eternal: it then followes, That either this supposed Matter did sit it selfe to God, or God, accommodate himselfe to the matter. For the first; it is impossible, that things without sense could proportion themselves to the Workmans will. For the second; it were horrible to conceiue of God, That as an Artificer he applyed himselfe, according to the proportion of matter which he lighted vpon.

But let it be supposed, That this matter hath bin made by any Power, not Omnipotent, and infinitely wise: I would gladly learne how it came to passe, that the same was proportionable to his intention, that was Omnipotent & infinitely wise; & no more, nor no lesse, than serued to receiue the forme of the Vniuersall. For, had it wanted any thing of what was sufficient; then must it be granted, That God created out of nothing so much of new matter, as serued to finish the worke of the World: Or had there bin more of this matter than sufficed, then God did dissolue & annihilate whatsoeuer remained and was superfluous. And this must every reasonable sonable soule confesse, That it is the same worke of God alone, to create anything out of nothing, And by the same art and power, and by none other, can those things, or any part of that eternall matter, be againe changed into Nothing; by which those things, that once were nothing, obtained a beginning of being.

Again, to say that this matter was the cause of it selfe; this of all other, were the greatest idiosyncrasy. For, if it were the cause of it selfe at any time; then there was also a time when it selfe was not: at which time of not being, it is easie enough to conceiue, that it could neither procure it selfe, nor any thing else. For to be, and not to be, at once, is impossible. Nihil autem seipsum praecedit, neq; seipsum componit corpus. There is nothing that doth precede it selfe, neither doe bodies compound themselves.

For the rest; Those that saie this matter to be eternal, must of necessity confesse, that Infinite cannot be separate from Eternity. And then had infinite matter left no place for infinite forme, but that the first matter was finite, the forme which it receiued proues it. For conclusion of this part; who soeuer will make choice, rather to beleue in eternall deformity, or in eternall dead matter, than in eternall light and eternall life: let eternall death be his reward. For it is a madness of that kind, as wanteth teames to expresse it. For what reason of man (whom the curse of presumption hath not stupified) hath doubted, That infinite power (of which we can comprehend but a kind of shadow, quia comprehensio est intra terminos; qui infinito repugnant) hath any thing wanting in it selfe, either for matter or forme; yea for as many worlds (if such had bene Gods will) as the Sea hath sands? For where the power is without limitation, the worke hath no other limitation, than the workmans will. Tea Reason it selfe findes it more easie for infinite power, to deliuer from it selfe a finite world, without the helpe of matter prepared; than for a finite man, a foole and dust, to change the forme of matter made to his hands. They are Dionysius his words, Deus in vna existentia omnia praehabet: and againe, Esse omnium est ipsa Diuinitas, omne quod vides, & quod non vides; to wit, causalliter, or in better teames, non tanquam forma, sed tanquam causa vniuersalis. Neither hath the world vniuersall closed vpon all of GOD: For the most part of his workes (saith Siracides) are hid. Neither can the depth of his wisdom be opened, by the glorious works of the world, which neuer brought to knowledge all it can; for then were his infinite power bounded, and made finite. And beereof it comes; That wee seldome entitle GOD the all-shewing, or the all-willing; but the Almighty, that is, infinitely able.

But now for those, who from that ground, That out of nothing nothing is made, inferre the Worlds eternity; and yet not so saluage therein, as those are, which giue an eternall being to dead matter: It is true; if the word (nothing) be taken in the affirmatiue; and the making, imposed vpon Naturall Agents and finite power; That out of nothing nothing is made. But seeing their great Doctor Aristotle himselfe confesse, quod omnes antiqui decreuerunt quasi quoddam rerum principium, ipsumq; infinitum, That all the ancient decree a kind of beginning, and the same to be infinite; and a little after, more largely and plainly, Principium eius est nullum, sed ipsum omnium cernitur esse principium, & omnia completi ac regere: it is strange that this Philosopher, with his followers, should rather make choice out of fallhood, to conclude falsely; than out of truth, to reioiue truly. For if wee compare the world vniuersall, and all the unmeasurable Orbes of Heauen, and those marueilous bodies of the Sun, Moone, and Stars, with ipsum Infinitum: it may truly be said of them all, which himselfe affirmeth of his imaginary Materia prima, That they are neither quid, quale, nor quantum; and therefore to bring finite (which hath no proportion with infinite) out of infinite (qui destruit omnem proportionē) is no wonder in Gods power. And therefore Anaximander, Melissus, & Empedocles, call the world vniuersal, but particulam Vniuersitatis and infinitatis, a parcell of that which is the vniuersality and the infinity it selfe; & Plato, but a shadow of God. But the other, to proue the worlds eternity, vrgeth this Maxime, That, A sufficient & effectual cause being granted, an answerable effect thereof is also granted: inferring that God being for euer a sufficient and effectual cause of the world, the effect of the cause should also haue bene for euer; to wit, the world vniuersal. But what a strange mockery is this in so great a Master to cōfesse a sufficient and effectual cause of the world, (to wit, an almighty God) in his Antecedent; & the same God to be a God restrained in his conclusion; to make God free in power, & bound in wil; able to effect, vnable to determine; able to make all things, and yet vnable to make choice of the time when? For this were impiously to resolue of God, as of natural necessity; which hath neither choice, nor will, nor vnderstanding; which cannot but worke matter being present; as fire, to burne things combustible. Againe he thus disputeth, That euery Agent which can worke, and doth not worke; if it afterwarde worke, it is either thereto moued by it selfe, or by somewhat else; and so it passeth from power to Act. But God (sayth he) is immouable, and is neither moued by himselfe, nor by any other; but being alwaies the same, doth alwayes worke: Whence he concludeth, if the world were caused by God, that he was for euer the cause thereof; and therefore eternall. The answer to this is very easie, For that Gods performing in due time that, which he euer determined at length to performe, doth not argue any alteration or change, but rather constancy in him. For the same action of his will, which made the world for euer, did also with-hold the effect to the time ordained. To this answer, in it selfe sufficient, others adde further, that the patterne or Image of the World may be sayd to be eternall: which the Platonicks call, spiritualem mundum; and doe in this sort distinguish the Idæa and Creation in time. Spiritualis ille mundus, mundi huius exemplar, primumque Dei opus, vita æquali est Architecto, fuit semper cum illo, eritque semper. Mundus autem corporalis, quod fecundum opus est Dei, decedit iam ab opifice ex parte vna, quia non fuit semper; retinet alteram, quia fit semper futurus. That representatiue, or the intentionall world (say they) the sampler of this visible world, the first worke of GOD, was æqually ancient with the Architect; for it was for euer with him, and euer shal be. This materiall world, the second worke or creature of GOD, doth differ from the worker in this, That it was not from euerlasting; and in this it doth agree, that it shal be for euer to come. The first point, That it was not for euer, all Christians confesse: The other they vnderstand no other wise, than that after the consummation of this world, there shal be a new Heauen and a new Earth; without any new creation of matter. But of these things we need not here stand to argue: though such opinions be not vnworthy the propounding; in this consideration, of an eternall and vchangeable cause, producing a changeable and temporall effect. Touching which point Proclus the Platonist disputeth,

That

That the compounded essence of the World (and because compounded, therefore dissipable) is continued, & knit to the Diuine Being, by an indiuidual & inseparable power, flowing from diuine vinity; and that the Worlds naturall appetite of God sheweth, that the same proceedeth from a good and vnderstanding diuine; and that this vertue, by which the World is continued and knit together, must be infinite, that it may infinitely and euerlastingly continue and preserve the same. Which infinite Vertue, the finite World (sayth he) is not capable of, but receiueth it from the diuine infinite, according to the temporal Nature it hath successiue every momēt by little & little; euen as the whole Material World is not altogether: but the abolished parts are departed by small degrees, and the parts yet to come, do by the same small degrees succeed, as the shadow of a tree in a River, seemeth to haue continued the same a long time in the water, but it is perpetually renewed, in the continuall ebbing and flowing thereof.

But to returne to them, which denying that euer the World had any beginning, withall deny that euer it shal haue any end, and to this purpose affirme, That it was neuer heard, neuer read, neuer seene, no not by any reason perceived, that the Heauens haue euer suffered corruption; or that they appeare any way the older by continuance; or in any sort other wise than they were; which had they bene subiect to small corruption, some change would haue bene discerned in so long a time. To this it is answered, That the little change as yet perceived, doth rather proue their newnesse, and that they haue not continued so long; than that they will continue for euer as they are. And if coniecturall arguments may receiue answer by coniectures: it then seemeth that some alteration may be found. For eüer Aristotle, Plinie, Arist. Met. 2. Plin. l. 2. c. 8. Strabo, Beda, Aquinas, and others, were grossely mistaken: or else those parts of the world, lying within the burnt Zone, were not in elder times habitable, by reason of the Sunnes heate, neither were the Seas, vnder the Equinoctiall, nauigable. But we know by experience, that those Regions, so situate, are filled with people, and exceeding temperate; and the Sea, ouer which we Nauigate, passable enough. We reade also many Histories of deluges: and how that in the time of Phaeton, diuers places in the world were burnt vp, by the Sunnes violent heate.

But in a Word, this obseruation is exceeding feeble. For we know it for certaine, That stone-wals, of matter molding and friable, haue stood two, or three thousand yeares: that many things haue bene digged vp out of the earth, of that depth, as supposed to haue bene buried by the generall floud; without any alteration either of substance or figure: yea it is beleued, and it is very probable, that the gold which is daily found in Mines, and Rockes, vnder ground, was created together with the Earth.

And if bodies elementary, and compounded, the eldest times haue not invaded and corrupted: what great alteration should we looke for in Cælestiall and quintessentiall bodies? And yet we haue reason to thinke, that the Sunne, by whose helpe all Creatures are generate, doth not in these latter Ages assist Nature, as heretofore. We haue neither Gyants, such as the eldest world had: nor mighty men, such as the elder world had; but all things in generall are reputed of lesse vertue, which from the Heauens receiue vertue. Whence, if the nature of a Preface, would permit a larger discourse, we might easily fetch store of prooffe; as that this world shal at length haue end, as that once it had beginning.

And I see no good answer that can be made to this obiection: If the World were eternall; why not all things in the World Eternall? If there were no first, no cause, no Father, no Creator, no incomprehensible wisdom, but that every Nature had bene alike eternall; and Man more rationall than every other Nature: Why had not the eternall reason of Man, provided for his eternall being in the World? For if all were equall, why not equall conditions to all? Why should heavenly bodies live for ever; and the bodies of Men rot and die?

Againe, who was it that appointed the Earth to keepe the center, and gave Order that it should hang in the Aire: that the Sunne should trauaile betwene the Tropicks, and neuer exceed those bounds, nor faile to performe that Progresse once in every year: the Moone to live by borrowed light: the first Stars (according to common opinion) to be fastned like Nails in a Cart-wheele; and the Planets to wander at their pleasure? Or if none of these had power ouer other: was it out of Charity and Loue, that the Sunne by his perpetuall trauaile within those two Circles, hath visited giuen light vnto, and releued all parts of the Earth, and the Creatures therein, by turnes and times? Out of doubt, if the Sunne haue of his owne accord kept this course in all eternity: He may iustly be called eternall Charity, and euerm-lasting Loue. The same may be sayd of all the Stars: who being all of them most large and cleare fountaines of vertue and operation, may also be called eternall-vertues: the Earth may be called eternall patience; the Moone, an eternall borrower and begger; and man of all other the most miserable, eternally mortall. And what were this, but to beleue againe in the old Play of the gods? Yea in more gods by Millions, than euer Heliodorus dreamt of. But in steed of this mad folly, we see it well enough with our feeble and mortall eyes: and the eyes of our reason discern it better; That the Sun, Moone, Stars, & the Earth, are limited, bounded, and constrained: themselves they haue not constrained, nor could. Omne determinatum causam habet aliquam efficientem, quæ illud determinauerit, Euery thing bounded hath some efficient cause, by which it is bounded.

Now for Nature; As by the ambiguity of this name, the schoole of Aristotle hath both commended many errors vnto vs, and sought also thereby to obscure the glory of the high Moderator of all things, shining in the Creation, and in the gouerning of the World: so if the best definition be taken out of the second of Aristotles phisicks, or primo de Cælo, or out of the fifth of his Metaphisicks; I say that the best is but nominall, and seruing onely to difference the beginning of Naturall motion from Artificiall: which yet the Academics open better, when they call it A Seminary strength, infused into matter by the Soule of the World: who giue the first place to Providence, the second to Fate, and but the third to Nature. Prouidentia (by which they vnderstand GOD) dux & caput; Fatum, medium ex prouidentia prodiens; Natura postremum. But be it what he will, or be it any of these (God excepted) or participating of all: yet that it hath choice or vnderstanding (both which are necessarily in the cause of all things) no man hath avowed. For this is vnanswerable of Lactantius, Is autem facit aliquid, qui aut voluntatem faciendi habet, aut scientiam, He onely can be said to be the doer of a thing, that hath either will or knowledge in the doing it.

But the wil and science of Nature, are in these words truly exprest by Ficinus: Potest vbiq; Natura, vel per diuersa media, vel ex diuersis materijs, diuersa facere: sublata vero mediõrũ materialiumq; diuersitate, vel vnicũ, vel simi-limum operatur, neque potest quando adest materia non operari; It is the power of Nature by diuersity of meanes, or out of diuersity of matter, to produce diuers things: but taking away the diuersity of meanes, and the diuersity of matter, it then workes but one or the like worke; neither can it but worke, matter being present. Now if Nature made choice of diuersity of matter, to worke all these variable workes of Heauen and Earth, it had then both vnderstanding and will; it had counsaile to beginne, reason to dispose; vertue and knowledge to finish, and power to gouerne: without which, all things had bene but one and the same: all of the matter of Heauen; or all of the matter of Earth. And if we grant Nature this will, and this vnderstanding, this counsaile, reason, and power: Cur Natura potius quam Deus nominetur? Why should we then call such a cause rather Nature, than God? God, of whom all men haue notion, and giue the first and highest place to Diuine power: Omnes homines notionem decorum habent, omnesq; summum locum diuino cuidam numini assignant. And this I say in short; that it is a true effect of true reason in man (were there no authority more binding than reason) to acknowledge and adore the first and most sublime power. Vera Philosophia, est ascensus ab his quæ fluunt, & oriuntur, & occidunt, ad ea quæ vere sunt, & semper eadem: True Philosophy, is an ascending from the things which flow, and rise, and fall, to the things that are for euer the same.

For the rest; I do also account it not the meanest, but an impiety monstrous, to confound God and Nature: be it but in tearmes. For it is God, that only disposeth of all things according to his owne will: and maketh of one Earth, Vessels of honor and dishonor. It is Nature that can dispose of nothing, but according to the will of the matter wherein it worketh. It is God, that commandeth al. It is Nature that is obedient to all. It is God, that doth good vnto al, knowing and louing the good he doth: It is Nature, that secondarily doth also good, but it neither knoweth nor loueth the good it doth. It is God, that hath all things in himselfe: Nature, nothing in it selfe. It is God, which is the Father, and hath begotten all things: It is Nature, which is begotten by all things; in which it liueth and laboureth; for by it selfe it existeth not. For shall we say, that it is out of affection to the Earth, that heauy things fall towards it? Shall we call it Reason, which doth conduct euery Riuer into the salt Sea? Shall we tearme it knowledge in fire, that makes it to consume combustible matter? If it be Affection, Reason, and Knowledge in these: by the same Affection, Reason, and Knowledge it is that Nature worketh. And therefore seeing all things worke as they do, (call it by Forme, or Nature, or by what you please) yet because they worke by an impulsio, which they cannot resist; or by a faculty, infused by the supreme power: we are neither to wonder at, nor to worship, the faculty that worketh, nor the Creature wherein it worketh. But herein lyes the wonder: and to him is the worship due, who hath created such a Nature in things, and such a faculty, as neither knowing it selfe, the matter wherein it worketh, nor the vertue and power which it hath, doth yet worke all things to their last and uttermost perfection. And therefore euery reasonable man, taking to himselfe for a ground that which is granted by all Antiquity, and by all men truly learned that euer the world had; to wit; That there is a power infinite, and eternall (which also necessity doth proue vnto vs, without the helpe of Faith, and Reason, without the force of Authority) all things do as easily follow which haue bene deliuered by diuine letters, as the waters of a running river do successively pursue each other from the first fountaines.

This much I say it is, that Reason it selfe hath taught vs: and this is the beginning of knowledge. Sapientia præcedit, Religio sequitur: quia prius est Deum scire, consequens colere; Sapience goes before, Religion followes: because it is first to know God, and then to worship him. This Sapience Plato calleth absoluti boni scientiam, The science of the absolute good: and another, scientiam rerum primarum, sempiternarum, perpetuarum. For Faith (saith Isidore) is not ev-tortured by violence; but by reason and examples perswaded: fides nequaquam vi extorquetur, sed ratione & exemplis suadetur. I confesse it, That to enquire further, as of the essence of God, of his power, of his Art, and by what meane He created the world: Or of his secret iudgement, and the causes; is not an effect of Reason: Sed cum ratione insanunt, but they grow mad with reason, that inquire after it: For as it is no shame nor dishonor (saith a French Author) de faire arrest au but qu'on n'asceu surpasser, For a man to rest himself there, where he finds it impossible to passe on further: so whatsoeuer is beyond, and out of the reach of true reason, it acknowledgeth it to be so; as vnderstanding it selfe not to be infinite, but according to the Name and Nature it hath, to be a Teacher, that best knowes the end of his own Art. For seeing both Reason & Necessity teach vs (Reason, which is pars diuini spiritus in corpus humanum meris) that the world was made by a power infinite; and yet how it was made, it cannot teach vs: and seeing the same Reason and Necessity make vs know, that the same infinite power is euery where in the world; and yet how euery where, it cannot informe vs: our beleefe hercof is not weakened, but greatly strengthened, by our ignorance, because it is the same Reason that tels vs, That such a Nature cannot be said to be God, that can be in all conceiued by man.

I haue bene already ouer long, to make any large discourse either of the parts of the following Story, or in mine owne excuse: especially in the excuse of this or that passage; seeing the whole is exceeding weak and defectiue. Among the grossest, the vnfitable diuision of the bookes, I could not know how to excuse, had I not bene directed to enlarge the building after the foundation was laid, and the first part finished. All men know that there is no great Art in the diuiding euently of those things, which are subiect to number and measure. For the rest, it suites well enough with a great many Bookes of this age, which speake too much, and yet say little; Ipse nobis furto subducimur; We are stolen away from our selues, setting a high price on all that is our owne. But hercof, though a late good Writer make complaint, yet shall it not lay hold on me, because I beleue as he doth; that who so thinkes himselfe the wisest man, is but a poore and miserable ignorant. Those that are the best men of war, against all the vanities and fooleries of the World, do alwayes keepe the strongest guards against themselves, to defend them from themselves from selfe loue, selfe estimation, and selfe opinion.

Generally concerning the order of the worke, I haue onely taken counsaile from the Argument. For of the Assyrians, which after the downefall of Babel take vp the first part, and were the first great Kings of the World, there came little to the view of posterity. Some few enterprises, greater in fame than faith, of Ninus and Semiramis excepted.

It was the story of the Hebrewes, of all before the Olympiads, that ouercame the consuming disease of time; and preserved it selfe from the very cradle beginning to this day: and yet not so entire, but that the large discourses thereof (to which in many Scriptures we are referred) are no where found. The Fragments of other Stories, with the actions of those Kings and Princes which shew vp here and there in the same time, I am driuen to relate by way of digression: of which we may say with Virgil:

Apparent rari nantes in gurgite vasto;

They appeare here and there floating in the great gulfe of time.

To the same first Ages do belong the report of many Inuentions therein found, and from them deriued to vs; though most of the Authors Names, haue perished in so long a Navigation. For those Ages had their Lawes; they had diuersity of Government; they had Kingly rule; Nobility, Policy in war, Navigation, and all, or the most of needfull Trades. To speak therefore of these (seeing in a generall History we should haue left a great deale of Nakednes, by their omission) it cannot properly be called a digression. True it is that I haue made also many others: which if they shall be layd to my charge, I must cast the fault into the great heape of humane error. For seeing we digresse in all the wayes of our liues: yea, seeing the life of man is nothing else but digression; I may the better be excused, in writing their liues & actions. I am not altogether ignorant in the Lawes of History, and of the Kindes.

The same hath bene taught by many, but by no man better, and with greater breuitie, than by that excellent learned Gentleman Sir Francis Bacon. Christian Lawes are also taught vs by the Prophets and Apostles; and euery day preacht vnto vs. But we still make large digressions: yea, the teachers themselves doe not (in all) keepe the path which they point out to others.

For the rest, after such time as the Persians had wrested the Empire from the Chaldeans, and had raised a great Monarchy, producing Actions of more importance then were elssewhere to be found: it was agreeable to the Order of Story, to attend this Empire, whilest it so florished, that the affaires of the nations adioyning had reference thereunto. The like obseruance was to be vsed towards the fortunes of Greece, when they againe began to get ground vpon the Persians, as also towards the affaires of Rome, when the Romans grew more mighty then the Greeks.

As for the Medes, the Macedonians, the Sicilians, the Carthaginians, and other Nations, who resisted the beginnings of the former Empires, and afterwards became but parts of their composition and enlargement: it seemed best to remember what was knowne of them from their seuerall beginnings, in such times and places, as they in their flourishing estates opposed those Monarchies; which in the end swallowed them vp. And herein I haue followed the best Geographers: who seldome giue names to those small brookes, whereof many, ioyned together, make great Ri- uers; till such time as they become vnited, and run in maine streame to the Ocean Sea. If the Phrase be weak, & the stile not euery where like it selfe; the first shewes their legitimation and true Parent; the second will excuse it selfe vpon the Variety of Matter. For Virgil, who wrote his Eclogues, graciously auctore, vsed stronger pipes, when he sounded the wars of Aeneas. It may also be layd to my charge that I vse diuers Hebrew words in my first booke, and elssewhere: in which language others may thinke, and I my selfe acknowledge it, that I am altogether ignorant: but it is true, that some of them I find in Montanus, others in latine Character in S. Senensis; and of the rest I haue borrowed the interpretation of some of my friends. But say I had bin beholding to neither, yet were it not to be wondered at, hauing had a cleven yeares leasure, to attaine the knowledge of that, or of any other tongue; Howsoever, I know that it will be sayd by many, That I might haue bene more pleasing to the Reader, if I had written the Story of mine owne times, hauing bene permitted to draw water as neare the Well-head as another. To this I answer, that whosoever in writing a moderne History, shall follow truth too neare the heeles, it may haply strike out his teeth. There is no Mistresse or Guide, that hath led her followers and seruants into greater miseries. He that goes after her too far off, loseth her sight, and loseth himselfe: and he that walkes after her at a middle distance; I know not whether I should call that kind of course Temper or Basenesse. It is true, that I neuer trauailed after mens opinions, when I might haue made the best vse of them: and I haue now too few dayes remaining, to imitate those, that either out of extreame ambition, or extreame cowardise, or both, do yet, (when death hath them on his shoulders) flatter the world, betwene the bed and the graue. It is enough for me (being in that state I am) to write of the eldest times: wherein also why may it not be said, that in speaking of the past, I point at the present, and take the voices of those that are yet liuing, in their persons that are long since dead; and haue it laid to my charge? But this I cannot helpe, though innocent. And certainly if there be any, that finding themselves spotted like the Tigers of old time, shall find fault with me for painting the ouer anew; they shal therein accuse themselves iustly, & me falsely.

For I protest before the Maiesty of God, That I malice no man vnder the Sun. Impossible I know it is to please all: seeing few or none are so pleased with themselves, or so assured of themselves, by reason of their subiection to their private passions; but that they seeme diuers persons in one & the same day. Seneca hath said it, and so do I: Vnus mihi pro populo erat: and to the same effect Epicurus, Hoc ego non multis sed tibi; or (as it hath since lamentably fallen out) I may borrow the resolution of an ancient Philosopher, Satis est vnus, Satis est nullus. For it was for the service of that inestimable Prince Henry, the successiue hope, and one of the greatest of the Christian World, that I vnderooke this Worke. It pleased him to peruse some part thereof, and to pardon what was amisse. It is now left to the world without a Maister: from which al that is presented, hath receiued both blowes and thankses, Eadem probamus, eadem reprehendimus: hic exitus est omnis iudicij, in quo hic secundum plures datur. But these discourses are idle. I know that as the charitable will iudge charitably: so against those, qui gloriantur in malitia, my present aduersity hath disarmed me. I am on the ground already, & therefore haue not far to fall: and for rising againe, as in the Naturall priuation there is no rec<sup>t</sup> on to habit; so it is seldome scene in the priuation politike. I do therefore for beare to stile my Readers Gentle, Courteous, and Friendly, thereby to beg their good opinions, or to promise a second and third volume (which I also intend) if the first receive grace and good acceptance. For that which is already done, may be thought enough; and too much: and it is certaine, let vs claw the Reader with neuer so many courteous phrases: yet shall we euer more be thought fooles, that write foolishly. For conclusion, al the hope I haue lies in this. That I haue already found more vngentle and vncourteous Readers of my Loue towards them, and well-deseruing of them, than euer I shall do againe. For had it bene otherwise, I should hardly haue had this leasure, to haue made myselfe a fool in print.

Of the Creation, and Preservation of the World.

S. I.

That the inuisible God is scene in his Creatures.

OD, whom the wisest men acknowledge to be a Power vncfable, and Vertue infinite, a Light by abundant claritie inuisible; an Vnderstanding, which it selfe can onely comprehend, an Essence eternall and spirituall, of absolute purenesse and simplicitie; was, and is pleased to make himselfe knowne by the worke of the World: in the wonderfull magnitude whereof, (all which Hee imbraceth, filleth, and sustayneth) we behold the Image of that glorie, which cannot be measured, and withall that one, and yet vniuersall Nature, which cannot be defined. In the glorious Lights of Heauen, we perceiue a shadow of his diuine Countenance; in his mercifull prouision for all that liue, his manifold goodnesse: and lastly, in creating and making existent the World vniuersall, by the absolute Arte of his owne Word, his Power and Almightinesse; which Power, Light, Vertue, Wisedome, and Goodnesse, being all but attributes of one simple Essence, and one God, we in all admire, and in part discern per speculum creaturarum, that is, in the disposition, order, and varietie of Celestiall and Terrestriall bodies: Terrestriall, in their strange and manifold diuerstities; Celestiall, in their beautie and magnitude; which in their continuall and contrary motions, are neither repugnant, intermixt, nor confounded. By these potent effects, we approach to the knowledge of the Omnipotent cause, and by these motions, their Almighty Mouer.

In these more then wonderfull works, God (saith Hugo) speaketh vnto man, and it is true, that these be those discourses of God, whose effects, all that liue, witnesse in themselves; the sensible, in their sensible natures; the reasonable, in their reasonable soules: for according to S. GREGORY, omnis homo eo ipso quod rationalis conditus est, ex ipsa ratione, illum qui se condidit, Deum esse colligere debet: Euery man, in that he is reasonable, out of the same reason may know, that he which made him, is God. This God all men behold (saith Iob), which is according to the Fathers, Dominacionem illius conspiciere in creaturis, To discern him in his prouidence by his Creatures. That God hath bene otherwise scene, so wit, with corporall eyes, exceedeth the small proportion of my vnderstanding, ding, grounded on these places of S. John, and S. Paul, Tee haue not heard his voice at any time, neither haue yee scene his shape. And againe, Whom neuer man saw, nor can see.

And this, I am sure, agreeth with the nature of Gods simplicitie, of which S. Augustine, Ipsa enim natura, vel substantia, vel quolibet alio nomine appellandum est, id ipsum quod Deus est, corporaliter uideri non potest; That nature, or that substance, or by whatsoever name that is to be called which is God, whatsoever that be, the same cannot be corporally perceived. And of this opinion were Origen, Cyril, Chrysostome, Gregory Nazianzenus, Hierome, Augustine, Gregory the great, Euaristius, Alcuinus, Dionysius Arcopagita, Aquinas, and all others of authoritie. But by his owne Word, and by this visible World, is God perceived of men, which is also the vnderstood language of the Almighty, vouchsafed to all his Creatures, whose Hieroglyphicall Characters, are the vnumbred Starres, the Sunne and Moone, written on these large Volumes of the Firmament: written also on the Earth and the Seas, by the letters of all those liuing Creatures, and Plants, which inhabit and reside therein. Therefore said that learned CYSANVS, Mundus vniuersus nihil aliud est, quam Deus explicatus; The World vniuersall, is nothing else but God exprest. And the inuisible things of God (saith S. Paul) are scene by creation of the World, being considered in his Creatures. Of all which, there was no other cause preceding, then his owne Will, no other matter then his owne Power, no other workman then his owne Word, no other consideration then his owne infinite Goodnesse. The example and patterne of these his Creatures, as he beheld the same in all eternitie in the abundance of his owne loue, so was it at length in the most wise order, by his vnchanged Will moued, by his high Wisedome disposed, and by his almighty Power perfected, and made visible. And therefore (saith Mirandula) we ought to loue God, Ex fide, & ex effectibus, (that is) both perswaded by his Word, and by the effects of the Worlds creation: Neg, enim qui causa caret, ex causa & origine sciri, cognoscique potest, sed vel ex rerum, que facte sunt, queq; sunt & gubernantur observatione & collatione, vel ex ipsius Dei verbo: For he of whom there is no higher cause, cannot be knowne by any knowledge of cause or beginning, (saith Montanus) but either by the obseruing and conferring of things, which he hath, or doth create and gouerne, or else by the Word of God himselfe.

§. II.

That the wisest of the Heathen, whose authoritie is not to be despised, haue acknowledged the world to haue bene created by God.

His worke and creation of the World, did most of the ancient and learned Philosophers acknowledge, though by diuers termes, and in a different manner exprest, I meane all those who are entituled by S. AVGVSTINE, Summi Philosophi, Philosophers of highest iudgement and vnderstanding. Mercurius Trismegistus calleth God, Principium vniuersorum; The originall of the vniuersall: to whom hee giueth also the attributes of Mens, Natura, Actus, Necessitas, Finis, & Renovatio. And wherein hee truly, with S. Paul, casteth vpon God all power; confessing also, that the world was made by Gods almighty Word, and not by hands: Verbo, non manibus fabricatus est mundus. Zoroaster (whom Heraclitus followed in opinion) tooke the word Fire, to expresse God by (as in Deuteronomy, and in Saint Paul it is vsed) Omnia ex uno igne genita sunt; All things (saith he) are caused, or produced out of one fire.

So did Orpheus plainly teach, that the world had beginning in time, from the Will of the most High God; whose remarkable words are thus conuerted: Cum abscondisset omnia Iupiter summus, deinde in lumen gratum emisit, ex sacro corde operans cogitata & mirabilia: Of which I conceiue this sense; When great Iupiter had hidden all things in himselfe; working out of the lome of his sacred heart, he sent thence, or brought forth into gratefull light, the admirable works which he had fore-thought.

Pindarus the Poet, and one of the wisest, acknowledged also one God, the most High, to be the Father and Creator of all things; Vnus Deus, Pater, Creator summus. PLATO calleth God the cause and originall, the nature and reason of the vniuersall; Totius rerum natura, causa, & origo Deus. But hereof more at large hereafter.

Now, although the curiositie of some men haue found it superfluous, to remember the opinions of Philosophers, in matters of Diuinitie (it being true, that the Scripture hath hath not want of any forraine testimony) yet as the Fathers, with others excellently learned, are my examples herein; so Saint Paul himselfe did not despise, but thought it lawfull, and profitable, to remember whatsoever hee found agreeable to the Word of God, among the Heathen, that he might thereby take from them all escape, by way of ignorance, God rendering vengeance to them that know him not: as in his Epistle to Ti. tus, he citeth Epimenides against the Cretians, and to the Corinthians, Alexander, and in the seuenteenth of the Acts, Aratus, &c. for Truth (saith S. Ambrose) by whomsoever vttered, is of the holy Ghost; Veritas à quocumq; dicatur, à Spiritu sancto est: and lastly, let those kind of men learne this rule; Quæ sacris seruiunt, prophana non sunt; No-10 thing is prophane that serueth to the vse of holy things.

§. III.

Of the meaning of In Principio, Genes. 1. 1.

His visible World of which Moses writeth, God created in the beginning, or first of all: in which (saith Terrentian) things began to be. This word Beginning (in which the Hebrewes seeke some hidden mysterie, and which in the Iewes Targum is conuerted by the word Sapientia) cannot be referred to succession of time, nor to order, as some men haue conceiued, both which are subsequent: but onely to Creation then. For before that Beginning, there was neither primary matter to be informed, nor forme to informe, nor any being, but the Eternall. Nature was not, nor the next Parent of Time begotten, Time properly and naturally taken; for if God had but disposed of Matter already in being, then as the word Beginning could not be referred to all things, so must it follow, that the institution of Matter proceeded from a greater Power, then that of God. And by what name shall we then call such an One (saith Lactantius) as exceedeth God in potency: for it is an act of more excellency to make, then to dispose of things made? whereupon it may be concluded, that Matter could not be before this Beginning: except we faime a double Creation, or allow of two Powers, and both infinite, the impossibilitie whereof scorneth defence. Nam impossibile plura esse infinita: quoniam 30 alterum esset in altero finitum; There cannot bee more infinites then one; for one of them would limit the other.

§. IIII.

Of the meaning of the words Heauen and Earth: Genes. 2. 1.

He vniuersall matter of the world (which Moses comprehendeth vnder the names of Heauen and Earth) is by diuers diuersly vnderstood: for there are that conceiue, that by those words, was meant the first matter, as the Peripatetikes vnderstand it, to which, S. Augustine and Isidore seeme to adhere. Fecisti mundum (saith 40 S. Augustine) de materia informi, quam fecisti de nulla re, penè nullam rem: (that is) Thou hast made the world of a matter without forme; which matter thou madest of nothing, and being made, it was little other then nothing.

But this potentiall and imaginarie materia prima, cannot exist without forme. Peter Lombard, the Schoole-men, Beda, Lyranus, Comestor, Tostatus and others, affirme, that it pleased God first of all to create the Emphyrean Heauen: which at the succeeding instant (saith Beda and Strabo) he filled with Angels. This Emphyrean Heauen Stenuchius Eugubinus calleth Diuine claritie, and vncreated: an error, for which he is sharply charged by Pererius, though (as I conceiue) he rather sayled in the subsequent, when he made it to be a place, and the seat of Angels, and iust Soules, then in the former affirmation: for 50 of the first, That God lieth in eternall Light, it is written; My soule, praise thou the Lord, that couereth himselfe with light: and in the Revelation; And the Citie hath no neede of Sunne, neither of the Moone to shine in it: for the glory of God did light it. And herein also Iohn Mercer vpon Genes. differeth not in opinion from Eugubinus: for as by Heauen created in the beginning, was not meant the inuisible or supercelestiall, so in his iudgement, because it was in all Eternitie, the glorious seat of God himselfe, it was not necessary to be created; Quem mundum supercaelestem meo iudicio creari (saith Mercer) non erat necessè.

But as Moses forbare to speake of Angels, and of things inuisible, and incorporate, for the weaknesse of their capacities, whom he then cared to informe of those things, which were more manifest, (to wit) that God did not only by a strong hand deliuer them from the bondage of Egypt, according to his promise made to their forefathers: but also that he created, and was the sole cause of this aspeetable, and perceivable Vniuersall; so on the other side I dare not thinke, that any supercelestiall Heauen, or whatsoever else (not himselfe) was increate & eternall: and as for the place of God before the world created, the finite wisdom of mortall men hath no perception of it, neither can it limit the feate of infinite power, no more then infinite power it selfe can be limited: for his place is in himselfe, whom no magnitude else can contain: How great is the house of God (saith BAR VCH) how large is the place of his possessions: it is great, and hath no end, it is high and vnmearurable. 10

But leauing multiplicitie of opinion, it is more probable & allowed, that by the words Heauen and Earth, was meant the solid matter and substance, as well of all the Heauens, and Orbes supernall, as of the Globe of the Earth and Waters, which couered it ouer, (to wit) that very matter of all things, materia, Chaos, possibilitas, siue possessio. Which matter (saith Caluin) was so called, quod totius mundi semen fuerit; Because it was the seed of the Vniuersall: an opinion of ancient Philosophers long before.

§. V.

That the substance of the waters, as mixt in the body of the earth, is by MOSES vnderstood in the word Earth: and that the Earth, by the attributes of vnformed and void, is described as the Chaos of the ancient Heathen.

MOSSES first nameth Heauen and Earth (putting waters but in the third place) as comprehending waters in the word Earth; but afterwards hee nameth them apart, when God by his Spirit began to distinguish the confused Masse, and (as Basil saith) preparare naturam aquae ad fecunditatem vitalem; to prepare the nature of water to a vitall fruitfulness.

For vnder the word Heauen, was the matter of all heauenly bodies, and natures exprest: and by the name of Earth and Waters; all was meant, whatsoever is vnder the Moone, and subiect to alteration. Corrupt seedes bring forth corrupt plants; to which the pure 30 heauens are not subiect, though subiect to perishing. They shall perish (saith David) and the heauens shall vanish away like smoke, saith Esay. Neither were the waters the matter of the drie land appare: which proueth that the drie land was mixt and couered with the waters, and not yet distinguished; but no way, that the waters were the matter or seede of the Earth, much lesse of the Vniuersall. Intus tu Domine terram fundasti, Thou, O Lord, in the beginning hast founded the Earth: and againe, The Earth was couered with the Deepe (meaning with waters) as with a garment, saith David. And if by naturall arguments it may be proued, that water by condensation may become earth, the same reason teacheth vs also, that earth rarified may become water: water, aire: aire, fire; and so on the contrarie. Deus ignis substantiam per aerem in aquam conuertit, God turneth the substance of 40 fire, by aire, into water. For the Heauens and the Earth remained in the same state, in which they were created, as touching their substance, though there was afterwards added multiplicitie of perfection, in respect of beautie and ornament. Caelum verò & terra in statu creationis remanserunt, quantum ad substantiam, licet multiplex perfectio decoris & ornatus eis postmodum superaddita est. And the word which the Hebrewes call Maim, is not to be vnderstood according to the Latine translation simply, and as specificall water; but the same more properly signifieth liquor. For (according to Montanus) Est autem Maim liquor geminus, & hoc nomen propter verborum penuriam, Latina lingua plurali numero a quas fecit. For Maim (saith he) is a double liquor, (that is, of diuers natures) and this name 50 or word the Latines wanting a voice to expresse it, call it in the Plurall, Aquas, Waters.

This Masse, or indigested matter, or Chaos created in the beginning, was without forme, that is, without the proper forme, which it afterwards acquired, when the Spirit of God had separated the Earth, and digested it from the waters: And the earth was void: that is, not producing any creatures, or adorned with any plants, fruits, or flowers. But after the Spirit of God had moued vpon the waters, and wrought this indigested matter into that forme, which it now retaineth, then did the earth bud forth the herbe, which seedeth seede, and the fruitfull tree according to his kind, and God saw that it was good; which attribute attribute was not giuen to the Earth, while it was confused; nor to the Heauens, before they had motion, and adorning. God saw that it was good; that is, made perfect: for perfection is that, to which nothing is wanting. Et perfecti Dei perfecta sunt opera; The works of the perfect God, are perfect.

From this lump of imperfect Matter had the ancient Poets their inuention of Demogorgon: Hesiodus and Anaxagoras the knowledge of that Chaos, of which Ouid:

*Ante Mare, & Terras, & (quod tegit omnia) Caelum, Vnus erat toto naturae vultus in Orbe,

Before the Sea and Land was made, and Heauen, that all doth hide,
In all the World one onely face of Nature did abide:
Which Chaos high, a huge rude heape.

§. VI.

How it is to bee vnderstood that the Spirit of God moued vpon the Waters, and that this is not to bee searched curiously.

AFTER the Creation of Heauen and Earth, then void and without forme, the Spirit of God moued vpon the Waters. The Scuemy interpreters vse the word superferebatur, moued vpon or ouer: incubabat, or fouebat (saith Hierome) out of Basil; and Basil out of a Syrian Doctor; Equidem non meam tibi, sed viri cuiusdam Syri sententiam recensebo (saith Basil:) which words incubare or fouere importing warmth, hatching, or quickning, haue a speciall likenesse. Verbum translatus est ab auibus pulli sui incubantibus, quamuis spiritali, & plane inenarrabili, non autem corporali modo; The word is taken of birds hatching their young, not corporally, but in a spiritall and vnexpressible manner.

Some of the Hebrewes conuert it to this effect, Spiritus Dei volitabat; The Spirit of God did fluster: the Chaldean Paraphrast in this sense, Ventus a conspectu Dei sufflabat: or as other vnderstand the Chaldean, Flabat, pellebat, remouebat: The wind from the face of God did blow vnder, drue, or remoue, or did blow vpon, according to the 147. Psalme, 30 He caused his wind to blow, and the waters increase: but there was yet no wind nor exhalation. Arias Montanus in these words, Et Spiritus Elobim Merachsef, id est, efficaciter motians, consouens, ac agitans super facies gementi liquoris; The Spirit of God effectually and often mouing, keeping warme, and cherishing, quickning and stirring vpon the face of this double liquor. For he maketh foure originals, whereof three are agents; and the last passive and materiall, to wit, Causa, which is the diuine goodnesse: sebi, which is, fiat, suerit, Let it be, or it shall be. Qua vox verbo Dei prima prolata fuit: Which voice (saith he) was the first that was uttered by the word of God. The third, Spiritus Elobim, the Spirit of God, id est, vis quaedam diuina, agilis ac presens, per omnia pertingens, omnia complens, that is, A certayne diuine power, or strength euery where, actiue and extending, and stretching through 40 all, filling and finishing all things. The fourth he calleth Maim, id est, materies ad omnem rem consiciendam habilis; Matter apt to become euery thing. For my selfe I am resolued (Cum Deus sit superrationale omni ratione; Seeing God is in all reason above reason) that although the effects which follow his wonderfull wayes of working, may in a measure be perceiued by mans vnderstanding, yet the manner & first operation of his diuine power, cannot be conceiued by any mind, or spirit, compassed with a mortall body. Animalis homo quae Dei sunt non percipit: For my thoughts (saith the Lord in Esay) are not your thoughts, neither are your wayes my wayes. And as the world hath not knowne God himselfe: so are his wayes (according to S. PAVL) past finding out. O righteous Father, the world hath not knowne thee, saith Christ. And therefore; whether that motion, vitalitie 50 and operation, were by incubation or how else, the manner is onely knowne to God, Quomodo in omnibus sit rebus vel per essentiam, vel per potentiam, intellectus noster non capit; For, how God (saith S. Augustine, speaking of his Vbiqutie) is in all things, either by essence, presence, or power, our vnderstanding cannot comprehend. Nihil inter Deum hominemq. distaret, si consilia, & dispositiones illius maiestatis aeternae, cogitatio assequeretur humana: There would be no difference betweene God and Man, if mans vnderstanding could conceive the counsels and disposing of that eternall Maiestatie; and therefore to bee ouer-curious in searching how the all-powerfull Word of God wrought in the Creation of the World, or his all-piercing and operative Spirit distinguishing, gaue forme to the Matter of the Vniuersall, is a labour and search like vnto his, who not contented with a knowne and safe Foord, will presume to passe ouer the greatest Riuer in all parts, where he is ignorant of their depths: for so doth the one lose his life, and the other his vnderstanding. We behold the Sunne, and enioy his light, as long as we looke towards it, but tenderly, and circumspectly: we warme our selues safely, while we stand neare the fire; but if we seeke to out-face the one, to enter into the other, we forthwith become blind or burnt.

But to eschew curiositie: this is true, that the English word (moued) is most proper and significant: for of motion proceedeth all production, and all whatsoeuer is effected. And this omnipotent Spirit of God, which may indeed be truly called, Principium motus, and with MIRANDULA, Vs cause efficiens; The force of the efficient cause, S. AUGUSTINE sometimes taketh for the holy Ghost; sometime for a wind or breath, Sub nomine Spiritus, under the name of a Spirit, which is sometimes so taken: or for virtualis creatura, For a created virtuality: TERTULLIAN and THEODORET call it also a breath or wind: MERCURIUS nameth it, Spiritum tenuem intelligibilem, A pure or thin intelligible Spirit: AMALGORAS, Mentem: TOSTATVS, Voluntatem & mentem Dei; The will and minde of God; which mens, Plato in Timaeo, maketh Animam mundi, The soule of the world: and in his sixt Booke de Republica, he calleth it the Law of Heauen; in his Epistles, The Leader of things to come, and the presence of things past. But as Cyprian wrote of the Incarnation of Christ our Saviour, Mens deficit, vox silet, & nomina tantum, sed etiam Angelorum; My minde fayleth, my voice is silent, and not mine onely, but euen the voice of Angels: so may all men else say in the vnderstanding, and vtterance of the wayes and works of the Creation; for to him (saith Nazianzenus) there is nor one substance by which he is, and another, by which he can, Sed substantiale illi est, quicquid eius est, & quicquid est; Whatsoeuer attribute of him there is, and whatsoeuer he is, it is the very same substance that himselfe is.

Nazian. lib. 2.
Theol.

Wisd. cap. 1. v. 7.

But the Spirit of God which moued vpon the waters, cannot be taken for a breath or wind, nor for any other creature, separate from the infinite actiue power of God, which then formed and distinguished, and which now sustayneth, and giueth continuance to the Vniuersall. For the Spirit of the Lord filleth all the world; and the same is it which maintayneth all things, saith SALOMON. If thou send forth thy Spirit (saith DAVID) they are created: And GREGORY, Deus suo presentiali esse, dat omnibus rebus esse, ita quod, si se rebus subtraheret, sicut de nihilo facta sunt omnia, sic in nihilum defluerent vniuersa; God giueth being to all things, by being present with all things, so as if he should withdraw himselfe from them, then as of nothing the world was made, it would againe fall away and vanish into nothing. And this working of Gods Spirit in all things, VIRGIL hath exprest excellently:

Virg. Aeneid.
lib. 8. 724.

*Principio Caelum ac Terras, camposq; liquentes, Lucentemq; globum Lunae, Titaniamq; astra,
Spiritus intus alis: totamq; infusa per artus,
Mens agitat molem, & magno se corpore miscet.*

The Heauen, the Earth, and all the liquid Mayne,
The Moones bright Globe, and Starres Titanian,
A Spirit within maintaynes: and their whole masse,
A Mind, which through each part infus'd doth passe,
Fashion, and works, and wholly doth transpierce
All this great Body of the Vniuerse.

And this was the same Spirit, which moued in the Vniuersall, and thereby both distinguished and adorned it. His Spirit hath garnished the Heauens, saith Iob. So then the Spirit of God moued vpon the waters, and created in them their spiritualitie, and naturall motion; motion brought forth heate; and heate rarification, and subtilitie of parts. By this Spirit (which gaue heate and motion, and thereby, operation to euery nature, while it moued vpon the waters, which were in one indigested lump, and Chaos, disposed to all formes alike) was begotten Aire: an element superior, as lighter then the waters, through whose vast, open, subtile, diaphanicke, or transparent body, the light afterwards created might easily transpierce: Light, for the excellency thercof, being the first creature which God called good, whose creation immediately followed. This Spirit Chrysostome calleth a vitall Operation, Aquis à Deo insitum, ex qua aqua non solum motio- nem, sed & vim procreandi animalia habuerint. He calleth it, A vitall Operation giuen by God vnto the waters, whereby the waters had not onely motion, but also power to procreate or bring forth liuing Creatures.

§. VII.

Of the light created, as the materiall substance of the Sunne: and of the nature of it, and diffinitie of knowledge of it: and of the excellency and vse of it: and of motion, and hence annexed vnto it.

These waters were afterwards congregated, and called the Sea: and this Light afterwards (in the fourth day) gathered and vnited, and called the Sunne, the Organ, and instrument of created light. For this first and dispersed light did not (as I conceiue) distinguish the night from the day, but with a reference to the Sunnes creation, and the vniting of the dispersed light therein. This is proued by these words, Let there be lights in the Firmament, to separate the day from the night: which lights in the firmament of Heauen were also made for signes, and for seasons, and for dayes, and for yeares, implying a motion instantly to follow, by which, dayes and yeares are distinguished: after which succeeded Time, or together with which, that Time (which was the measure of motion) began. For that space of the first three dayes which preceded the Sunnes creation, or formal perfection, when as yet there was not any motion to be measured, and the day named in the fifth Verse, was but such a space, as afterwards by the Sunnes motion made a ciuill or naturall day. And as Waters were the matter of Aire, of the firmament, and of the lower and vpper waters, and of the Seas, and Creatures therein: Earth, the matter of Beasts, Plants, Minerals, and Mans body: so may Light (for expression sake) be called the Chaos, or materiall substance of the Sunne, & other lights of heauen: Howbeit, neither the Sunne, nor any thing sensible, is that Light it selfe, Quae causa est lucidorum, Which is the cause that things are lightsome (though it make it selfe & all things else visible) but a body most illightned, which illuminateth the Moone, by whom the neighbouring Region (which the Greeks call Ether, the place of the supposed Element of fire) is affected and qualified, and by it all bodies liuing in this our aire. For this light Auicenna calleth vehiculum & fomentum omnium celestium virtutum, & impressionum: The conductor, and preseruer or nourisher of all celestiall vertues and impressions, nothing descending of heavenly influences, but by the medium, or means of light. Aristotle calleth light, a qualitie, inherent, or cleauing to a Diaphanous body, Lumen est qualitas inherens Diaphano: but this may be better touched of the heate, which it transportheth and bringeth with it, or conducteth: which heate (say the Platonicks) Abeunt lumine resides in subiecto, The light being departed, doth reside in the subiect, as warmth in the aire, though the same be deprived of light. This light Plotinus and all the Academics make incorporall, and so doth MONTANVS, Cui nec duritia resistit, nec spatium; Which neither hardnesse resisteth, nor space leaueth.

Id. dicitur, que se, & omnia visibilia facit, Cusan. in Compend. cap. 7. & exercit. lib. 5.

Ficin. lib. de Lumin. cap. 11.

Aristotle findeth corporalitie in the beames of light; but it is but by way of repetition of other mens opinions, saith PICOLIMENEVS. Democritus, Leucippus, and Epicurus, giue materialitie to light it selfe, but improperly: for it passeth at an instant, from the Heauen to the Earth, nor is it resisted by any hardnesse, because it pierceth through the solid body of glasse, or other Cristalline matters; and whereas it is withstood by vncleane, and vnpure earthy substances, lesse hard, and more easie to inuade then the former, the same is, Quod obstaculum naturae terrenae atq; sordidum, non capit candidum luminis puritatem; Because an obstacle, by nature earthy and soule, doth not receive the pure clearnesse of light: alluding to that most diuine Light, which onely shineth on those minds, which are purged from all worldly drosse, and humane vncleannesse.

But of this created light, there is no agreement in opinion; neither doe I maruaile at it, for it cannot be found either in the Fathers, Philosophers, or Schoole-men, or other ancient or later Writers, that any of them vnderstood either it or themselves therein: all men (to cast off ignorance) haue disputed hereof, but there is no man that hath bene taught thereby. Thomas Aquinas (not inferior to any in wit) as hee hath shewed little strength of argument in refuting the opinions of Bede, Hugo, Lombard, Lyranus, and others: so is his owne iudgement herein, as weak as any mans; and most of the Schoole-men were rather curious in the nature of termes, and more subtile in distinguishing vpon the parts of doctrine already laid downe, then discoverers of any thing hidden, either in Philosophie or Diuinitie: of whom it may be truly said, Nihil sapientiae odiosius acuminis; Nothing is more odious to true wisdom, then too acute sharpnesse. Neither hath the length of time, and the search of many learned men, (which the same time hath brought brought forth and deuoured) resolved vs, whether this light be substantiall, corporall, or incorporall: Corporall they say it cannot bee, because then it could neither pierce the aire, nor those hard, solid, and Diaphanous bodies, which it doth, and yet every day we see the aire illightned: incorporall it cannot bee, because it sometime affecteth the sight of the eye with offence, and therefore by most of the Fathers so esteemed: others say, (as Patricius) that it cannot be matter, because no forme so excellent as it selfe to informe it: neither can it be any accident, which is not separable without the destruction of the subject: for light being taken from the Sunne, the Sunne is no more the Sunne in existence. Secondly, if light were proceeding from matter and forme, then either, or both must be one of these: lucide or bright, darke or opaque, Diaphanous or transparent; but darknesse cannot be parent of light; and things Diaphanous (being neither light, nor darknesse, but capable of either) cannot be the cause of either, and therefore must the matter, or forme, or both, be lucide and shining. Lucide and shining obtrayne their so being of the light; and therefore, if wee deriue this being of light from a former, then would the progresse goe on infinitely, and against nature; and therefore he concludeth, that light in the Sunne hath his being primarily, and immediately of it selfe, and is therefore the Sunnes forme, and the forme of all lucide and shining bodies: but what is taught hereby, let others iudge.

But in my vnderstanding, Lumen, (which may be Englished by the word Shine) is an intentionall Species of that, which may be Englished by Light, and so, this shining which proceedeth from the Sunne, or other lights of Heauen, or from any other light, is an Image, or intentionall Species thereof; and an intentionall Species may be vnderstood by the example of a red, or Greene colour, occasioned by the shining of the Sun through red or Greene glasse: for then we perceiue the same colour cast vpon any thing opposite; which rednesse or other colour, we call the intentionall Species of the colour in that glasse. And againe, as this light, touching his simple nature, is no way yet vnderstood: so it is disputed, whether this light first created, bee the same which the Sunne inholderth and casteth forth, or whether it had continuance any longer then till the Sunnes creation.

But by the most wise and vnchanged order, which God obserued in the worke of the World, I gather, that the Light, in the first day created, was the substance of the Sunne: for Moses repeateth twice the mayne parts of the Vniuersall; first, as they were created in matter; secondly, as they were adorned with forme: first, naming the Heauens, the Earth, the Waters, all confused, and afterward, the Waters congregated, the Earth made drie Land, and the Heauens distinguished from both, and beautified. And therefore the Earth, as it was earth, before it was vncovered, and before it was called Arida, or drie Land; and the Waters were waters, before they were congregated, and called the Sea, though neither of them perfect, or enriched with their vertuall formes: so the Sunne, although it had not his formall perfection, his circle, beautie, and bounded magnitude, till the fourth day, yet was the substance thereof in the first day (vnder the name of Light) created; and this Light formerly dispersed, was in the same fourth day vnited, and set in the Firmament of Heauen: for to Light created in the first day, God gaue no proper place or fixation; and therefore the effects named by Anticipation, (which was, to separate day from night) were precisely performed, after this Light was congregated, and had obtained life and motion. Neither did the wisdom of God finde cause why it should mooue (by which motion, dayes and nights are distinguished) till then: because there was not yet any Creature produced, to which, by mouing, the Sunne might giue light, heate, and operation.

But after the Earth (distinguished from Waters) began to bud forth the bud of the herbe, &c. God caused the Sunne to moue, and (by interchange of time) to visite every part of the inferior world; by his heate to stirre vp the fire of generation, and to giue activitie to the seeds of all natures: For, as a King, which commandeth some goodly building to be erected, doth accommodate the same to that vse and end, to which it was ordaind; so it pleased God (saith Procopius) to command the Light to be; which by his all-powerfull Word he approved, and approving it, disposed thereof, to the vse and comfort of his future Creatures.

But in that it pleased God to aske of Iob, By what way is the light parted, and where is the way where light dwelleth? we thereby know, that the nature thereof falleth not vnder mans vnderstanding; and therefore let it suffice, that by Gods grace we enioy the effects effects thereof. For this light is of the treasure of God (saith Esdras) And those which inhabit the Heauens, doe onely know the Essence thereof. *Nihil lignatum in caelo, nihil notum in terra: Nothing unknowne in Heauen, nothing perfectly knowne on earth. Res vera sunt in hoc mundo inuisibili, in mundo visibili umbræ rerum: Things themselves are in the inuisible world, in the world visible, but their shadows: Surely, if this Light be not spirituall, yet it approacheth nearest vnto spiritualitie; and if it haue any corporalitie, then of all other the most subtil and pure; for how soeuer, it is of all things seene, the most beautiful, and of the swiftest motion, of all other the most necessary and beneficiall. For it ministreth to men, and other creatures, all celestiaall influences; it dissipateth those sad thoughts and sorrowes, which the darknesse both begetteth and maintayneth; it discovereth vnto vs the glorious works of God, and carryeth vp with an Angelicall swiftnesse, our eyes vnto Heauen, that by the sight thereof, our minds being informed of his visible maruailes, may continually trauaile to surmount these perceiued Heauens, and to finde out their omnipotent Cause and Creator. *Cognitio non quiescit in rebus creatis; Our knowledge doth not quiet it selfe in things created. Et ipsa lux facit, ut cetera mundi membra digna sint laudibus, cum suam bonitatem & decorem omnibus communicet: It is the Light (saith Saint Ambrose) that maketh the other parts of the world so worthy of praise, seeing that it selfe communicateth its goodnesse and beauty vnto all: of which Ouid out of Orpheus:

*Ille ego sum, qui longum metior annum,
Omnia qui video, per quem videt omnia mundus,

The World discernes it selfe, while I the World behold,
By me the longest yeares, and other times are told,
I the worlds eye.

Lastly, if we may behold in any creature, any one sparke of that eternall fire, or any far-off dawning of Gods glorious brightnesse, the same in the beautie, motion, and vertue of this Light, may be perceiued. Therefore was God called Lux ipsa, and the Light, by Hermes named Lux sancta, and Christ our Sauour said to be that Light, which lighteth every man that cometh into the world. Yet in respect of Gods incomprehensible sublimitie, and puritie, this is also true, that God is neither a minde, nor a Spirit of the nature of other spirits; nor a light, such as can be discerned. *Deus profecto non mens est, at verò ut sit mens causa est; nec spiritus, sed causa qua spiritus extat; nec lumen, sed causa qua lumen existit. God (saith Hermes in Poemandro) certainly is not a minde, but the cause that the minde hath his being; nor spirit, but the cause by which every spirit is; nor light, but the cause by which the light existeth.*

So then the Masse and Chaos being first created, void, darke, and imformed, was by the operative Spirit of God, pierced and quickned, and the Waters hauing now receiued Spirit and motion, resolved their thinner parts into Aire, which God illightned: the Earth also by being contiguous, and mixt with waters (participating the same diuine vertue) brought forth the bud of the herbe that seedeth feede, &c. and for a meane and organ, by which this operative vertue might be continued, God appointed the Light to be vnited, and gaue it also motion and heate, which heate caused a continuance of those feuerall species, which the Earth (being made fruitfull by the Spirit) produced, and with motion begate the time and times succeeding.

§. VIII.

Of the Firmament, and of the waters above the Firmament: and whether there be any Crystalline Heauen, or any Primum mobile.

After that the Spirit of God had moued vpon the waters, and light was created, God said, Let there be a Firmament in the midst of the waters, and let it separate the waters from the waters: that is, those waters which by rarification and euaporation were ascended, and those of the Earth and Sea.

But these waters separate about this extension, which the Latine Translation calleth firmamentum, or expansum (for so Vatubus, Pagninus, and Iunius turne it) are not the Crystalline Heauen, created in the imaginations of men; which opinion Basilus Magnus calleth a childish supposition, making in the same place many learned arguments against against this fancy. For the waters about the Firmament, are the waters in the Aire above vs, where the same is more solid and condense, which God separated from the nether waters by a Firmament, that is, by an extended distance and vast space: the words Raquia, which Montanus writeth Rakiagh, and Shamajm, being indifferently taken for the Heauen and for Aire, and more properly for the Aire and Aether, then for the Heauens, as the best Hebricians vnderstand them, Quo suprema ac tenuia ab inferioris crassius distincta, interseclat, disjuncta, for that whereby the supreme and thin bodies were placed in distance, being severed and cut off from low and grosse matters: and the waters about the Firmament, exprest in the word Majm, are in that tongue taken properly for the waters about the Aire, or in the vppermost Region of the same.

And that the word Heauen is vsed for the Aire, the Scriptures euerywhere witnesse, as in the blessings of Ioseph, and in the 104. Psalm. * By these Springs shall the fowle of the Heauen dwell; and * upon Sodom and Gomorrah it rained brimstone and fire out of the Heauen; and in Isaacs blessing to Iacob, God giue thee therefore of the dew of Heauen; and in Deuteronomie the 11. But the land whither you goe to possesse it, is a land, that drinketh water of the rayne of Heauen; and in Iob, Who hath ingendered the frosts of Heauen; and in S. MATTHEW, Behold the Fowles of Heauen, for they sow not. So as in all the Scriptures of the old Testament throughout, is the word Heauen very often vsed for aire, and taken also hyperbolically for any great heighth, as, Let vs build vs a Tower, whose top may reach to Heauen, &c. And in this very place Basil auoucheth, that this appellation of Heauen for the Firmament, is but by way of similitude: his owne words be these; Et vocauit Deus firmamentum caelum. Hac appellatio alij quidem proprie accommodatur, huic autem nunc ad similitudinem; And God called the firmament Heauen: This appellation (saith Basil) is properly applyed to another (that is, to the Starry Heauen) but to this, (that is, to the Firmament diuiding the waters) it is imposed by similitude: and if there were no other prooffe, that by the Firmament was meant the Ayre, and not the Heauen, the words of Moses in the eighth Verse, conferred with the same word Firmament in the twentieth Verse, makes it manifest: for in the eighth Verse it is written, that God called the Firmament, which diuided waters from waters, Heauen; and in the 20. Verse he calleth the Firmament of Heauen, Ayre, in these words: And let the Fowle flye upon the earth in the open firmament of Heauen. And what vse there should be of this ycie, or cristalline, or waterie Heauen, I conceiue not, except it be to moderate and temper the heate, which the Primum nobile would otherwise gather and increase: though in verie truth, in stead of this heipe, it would adde an vnmeasurable greatnesse of circle, whereby the swiftnesse of that first Moueable would exceede all possibilitie of belief. Sed nemo tenetur ad impossibilia; but no man ought to be held to impossibilities; and faith it selfe (which surmounteth the heighth of all humane reason) hath for a forcible Conductor, the Word of Truth, which also may be called lumen omnis rationis & intellectus, the light of all reason and vnderstanding. Now that this supposed first Moueable, turneth it selfe so many hundred thousand miles in an instant (seeing the Scriptures teach it not) let those that can beleue mens imaginations, apprehend it, for I cannot. But of these many Heauens, let the Reader that desireth satisfaction, search Orontius, and of this waterie Heauen, Basilius Magnus in his Hexam. fol. 40. 41. &c. and Matth. Beroaldus, his second Booke, and sixt Chapter. For my selfe, I am perswaded, that the waters, called, The waters about the Heauens, are but the cloudes and waters ingendered in the vppermost Ayre.

A conclusion repeating the summe of the workes in the Creation, which are reduced to three heads: The creation of matter, The forming of it, The finishing of it.

TO conclude, it may be gathered out of the first Chapter of Genesis, that this was the order of the most wise God in the beginning, and when there was no other nature, or being, but Gods incomprehensible eternitie. First, hee created the matter of all things: and in the first three dayes he distinguished and gaue to euery nature his proper forme; the forme of leuitie to that which ascended, to that which descended, the forme of grauitie: for he separated light from darkenesse, diuided waters from waters, and gathered the waters vnder the Firmament into one place. In the last three three daies, God adorned, beautified, and replenished the World: he set in the Firmament of Heauen, the Sunne, Moone, and Starres; filled the Earth with Beasts, the Aire with Fowle, and the Sea with Fish, giuing to all that haue life, a power generatiue, thereby to continue their Species and kindes; to Creatures vegetatiue and growing, their seedes in themselves; for he created all things, that they might haue their being: and the generations of the world are preserved.

§. X.

That Nature is no Principium per se; nor forme the giuer of being: and of our ignorance, how second causes should haue any proportion with their effects.

NO for this working power, which we call Nature, the beginning of motion and rest, according to Aristotle, the same is nothing else, but the strength and facultie, which God hath infused into euery creature, hauing no other scite-abilite, then a Clocke, after it is wound vp by a mans hand, hath. These therefore that attribute vnto this facultie, any first or sole power, haue therein no other vnderstanding, then such a one hath, who looking into the Sterne of a Ship, and finding it guided by the Helme and Rudder, doth ascribe some absolute vertue to the peece of wood, without all consideration of the hand that guides it, or of the iudgement, which also directeth and commandeth that hand; forgetting in this and in all else, that by the vertue of the first act, all Agents worke whatsoever they worke: Virtute primi actus agunt agentia omnia quicquid agunt: for as the minde of man seeth by the Organ of the eye, heareth by the eares, and maketh choyce by the will: and therefore we attribute sight to the eye, and hearing to the eares, &c. and yet it is the minde onely, that giueth abilitie, life, and motion to all these his instruments and Organs; so God worketh by Angels, by the Sunne, by the Starres, by Nature, or infused properties, and by men, as by seuerall Organs, seuerall effects; all second causes whatsoever, being but instruments, conduits, and pipes, which carrie and disperse what they haue receyued from the head and fountaine of the Vniuersall. For as it is Gods infinite power, and euerywhere-presence (compassing, embracing, and piercing all things) that giueth to the Sunne power to draw vp vapours, to vapours to be made cloudes, cloudes to containe raine, and raine to fall: so all second and instrumentall causes, together with Nature it selfe, without that operatiue facultie which God gaue them, would become altogether silent, vertueless, and dead: of which excellentie ORPHEVS; Per se virescunt omnia, All things by thee spring forth in yonshfull Greene. I enforce not these things, thereby to annihilate those variable vertues which God hath giuen to his creatures, animate and inanimate, to heavenly and earthly bodies, &c. for all his workes in their vertues prayse him: but of the manner how God worketh in them, or they in or with each other, which the Heathen Philosophers, and those that follow them, haue taken on them to teach: I say, there is not any one among them, nor any one among vs, that could euer yet conceiue it, or expresse it, euer enrich his owne vnderstanding with any certaine truth, or euer edifie others (not foolishly by selfe-flatterie) therein. For (saith Lactantius, speaking of the wisdom of the Philosophers) Si facultas inueniende veritatis huic studio subiaceret, aliquando esset inuenta; cum vero tot temporibus, tot ingenijs in eius inquisitione contritis, non sit comprehensa, apparet nullam ibi esse sapientiam; If in this studie (saith he) were meanes to find out the truth, it had ere this bene found out: but seeing it is not yet comprehended, after that so much time, and so many wits haue bene worne out in the inquirie of it, it appeareth, that there is no wisdom there to be had. Nam si de vnare precisa scientia haberetur, omnium rerum scientia necessario haberetur: If the precise knowledge of any one thing were to be had, it should necessarily follow, that the knowledge of all things were to be had. And as the Philosophers were ignorant in Nature, and the wayes of her working: so were they more curious, then knowing, in their first matter and Physicall forme. For if their first matter had any being, it were not then the first matter: for, as it is the first matter, it hath only a power of being, which it altogether leaueth, when it doth subsist. And seeing it is neither a substance perfect, nor a substance inchoate, or in the way of perfection, how any other substance should thence take confection, it hath not bene taught, neyther are these formes (saith a learned Author) any thing, si ex ea exprimat potentia, que nihil est. Again, how this first matter should be sub*iclium formarum*, and passive, which is understood to precede the forme, it is hard to conceive: for to make forme which is the cause, to be subsequent to the thing caused (to wit, to the first matter) is contrarie to all reason, diuine and humane: onely it may be said, that originally there is no other difference betwene matter and forme, then betwene heate and fire, of which the one cannot subsist without the other, but in a kinde of rationall consideration. Leaving therefore these Riddles to their Louers, who by certaine scholasticall distinctions wrest and peruert the truth of all things, and by which Aristotle hath laboured to prouoe a false eternitie of the World, I thinke it farre safer to affirme with Saint AVGVSTINE, That all species and kindes are from God, from whom, whatsoeuer is naturall proceedeth, of what kinde or estimation soeuer, from whence are the seedes of all formes, and the formes of all seedes and their motions; A quo est omnis species, a quo est quicquid naturaliter est, cuiuscumq; generis est, cuiuscumq; estimationis est, a quo sunt semina formarum, forme seminum, motus seminum atq; formarum. And thus much Auerrois is forced to confesse. For all formes (saith hee) are in primo motore; which is also the opinion of Aristotle in the twelfth of his Metaph. and of Albertus vpon Dionysius.

Of Fate; and that the Starres haue great influence: and that their operations may diuersly be prevented or furthered.

And, as of Nature, such is the dispute and contention concerning Fate or Destinie, of which the opinions of those learned men that haue written thereof, may be safely receiued, had they not thereunto annexed and fastened an ineuitable necessitie, and made it more generall, and vniuersally powerfull then it is, by giuing it Dominion ouer the minde of man, and ouer his will; of which Ouid and Iuuenal:

*Ratio fatum vincere nulla valet.

An error of the Chaldeans, and after them of the Stoicks, the Pharisees, Priscillianists, the Bardisaniists, and others, as Basileus, Augustine, and Thomas haue obserued: but that Fate is an obedience of second causes to the first, was well conceived of Hermes, and Apuleius the Platonist. Plotinus out of the Astronomers calleth it a disposition from the acts of celestiaall Orbes, vnchangeably working in inferiour bodies, the same being also true enough, in respect of all those things, which a rationall minde doth not order nor direct. Plotomie, Seneca, Democritus, Epicurus, Chrysippus, Empedocles, and the Stoicks, some of them more largely, others more strictly, ascribe to Fate a binding and ineuitable necessitie; and that it is the same which is spoken and determined by God (quod de unoquoq; nostrum fatum est Deus) and the definite lot of all liuing. And certainly it cannot be doubted, but the Starres are instruments of farre greater vse, then to giue an obscure light, and for men to gaze on after Sunne-set: it being manifest, that the diuersitie of seasons, the Winters, and Summers, more hote and colde, are not so vncertained by the Sunne and Moone alone, who alway keepe one and the same course, but that the Starres haue also their working therein.

And if we cannot denie, but that God hath giuen vertues to Springs and Fountaines, to colde earth, to plants and stones, Mineralls, and to the excrementall parts of the basest liuing creatures, why should we robbe the beautifull Starres of their working powers? for seeing they are many in number, and of eminent beautie and magnitude, wee may not thinke, that in the treasure of his wisdom, who is infinite, there can be wanting (euen for euery Starre) a peculiar vertue and operation; as euery herbe, plant, fruit, and flower adorning the face of the Earth, hath the like. For as these were not created to beautifie the earth alone, and to couer & shadow her dustie face, but other wise for the vse of man and beast, to feed them and cure them; so were not those vncountable glorious bodies set in the Firmament, to no other end, then to adorne it, but for instruments and Organs of his diuine providence, so farre as it hath pleased his iust will to determine. Origen vpon this place of Genesis, Let there be light in the Firmament, &c. Gen. 1. 5. affirmeth, that the Starres are not causes (meaning per chance binding causes) but are as open Bookes, wherein are contained and set downe all things whatsoever to come; but not to be read by the eyes of humane wisdom: which latter part I beleue well, and this saying of Syracides withall: That there are hid yet greater things then these be, and we haue seene but a few of his workes. And though, for the capacite of men, wee know somewhat, yet in the true and vttermost vertues of herbes and plants, which our selues seue and set, and which grow vnder our feet, wee are in effect ignorant; much more in the powers and working of celestiaall bodies. for hardly (saith Salomon) can we discern the things that are vpon the Earth, and wish great labour finde we out those things that are before vs: who can then inuestigate the things that are in Heauen? Multum est de rebus celestibus aliquid cognoscere: It is much to know a litle of heauenly things. But in this question of Fate, the middle course is to be followed, that as with the Heathen wee doe not binde God to his creatures, in this supposed necessitie of destinie, so on the contrarie, wee doe not robbe those beautifull creatures of their powers and offices. For had any of these second causes despoyled God of his prerogative, or had God himselfe constrained the minde and will of man to impious acts by any celestiaall inforcements, then sure the impious excuse of some were iustifiable; of whom Saint AVGVSTINE: Impia peruersitate in malis factis rectissime reprehendendis ingerunt accusandum potius auctore syderum, quam commissorem scelerum. Where we reprehend them of euill deeds, they againe with wicked peruersnesse urge, that rather the Author and Creatour of the Starres, then the doer of the euill is to be accused.

But that the Starres and other celestiaall bodies incline the will by mediation of the sensitiue appetite, which is also stirred by the constitution and complexion, it cannot be doubted. Corpora celestia (saith Damasene) constituunt in nobis habitus, complexionones, & dispositiones. The heauenly bodies (saith hee) make in vs habits, complexions, and dispositions: for the bodie (though Galen inforce it further) hath vndoubtedly a kinde of drawing after it the affections of the minde, especially bodies strong in humour, and weak in vertues; for those of cholericke complexion are subiect to anger, and the furious effects thereof; by which they suffer themselves to be transported, where the minde hath not reason to remember, that passions ought to be her Vassals, not her Masters. And that they wholly direct the reasonlesse mind I am resolute: For of all those which were created mortall, as birds, beasts, and the like, are left to their naturall appetites, ouer all which, celestiaall bodies (as instruments and Executioners of Gods providence) haue absolute dominion. What we should iudge of men, who litle differ from beasts, I cannot tell: for as hee that contendeth against those inforcements, may easily master or resist them: so whosoever shall neglect the remedies by vertue and pietie prepared, putteth himselfe altogether vnder the power of his sensuall appetite; Vincitur fatum si resistas, vincit si contempseris: Fate will be overcome, if thou resist it, if thou neglect, it conquereth.

But that either the Starres or the Sunne haue any power ouer the mindes of men immediately, it is absurd to thinke, other then as aforesaid, as the same by the bodies temper may be effected. Lumen solis ad generationem sensibilibus corporum confert; & ad vitam ipsam mouet, & nutrit, & auget, & perficit: The light of the Sunne (saith Saint AVGVSTINE) helpeth the generation of sensible bodies, moueth them to life, and nourisheth, augmenteth, and perfecteth them: yet still as a Minister, not as a Master: Bonus quidem est Sol, in ministerio, non imperio: The Sunne is good to serue, not to sway (saith S. Ambrose). And Saint AVGVSTINE: Deus regit inferiora corpora per superiora; God ruleth the bodies below by those above, but hee auoucheth not, that superiour bodies haue rule ouer mens mindes, which are incorporeall.

But howsoeuer we are by the Starres inclined at our birth, yet there are many things both in Nature and Art, that encounter the same, and weaken their operation: and Aristotle himselfe confesseth, that the Heauens doe not alwaies worke their effects in inferiour bodies, no more then the signes of raine and winde doe alwaies come to passe. And it is diuers times seene, that paternall vertue and vice hath his counter-working to these inclinations. Est in iuuenis patrum virtus; In the young off-spring the Fathers vertue is, and so the contrarie, patrum vitia: and herein also there is often found an interchange; the Sonnes of vertuous men, by all ill constellation become inclinable to vice, and of vicious men, to vertue.

Egredia

Egregia est soboles, scelerato nata parente.

A worthie sonne is borne of a wicked father.

But there is nothing (after Gods referued power) that so much setteth this art of influence out of square and rule, as education doth: for there are none in the World so wickedly inclined, but that a religious instruction and bringing vp may fashion anew and reforme them; nor any so well disposed, whom (the reines being let loose) the continuall fellowship and familiaritie, and the examples of dissolute men may not corrupt and deforme. Vessels will euer retaine a saour of their first liquor: it being equally difficult eyther to cense the minde once corrupted, or to extinguishe the sweet saour of vertue first receyued, when the minde was yet tender, open, and easily seasoned; but where a fauourable constellation (allowing that the Starres incline the will) and a vertuous education doe happily arriue, or the contrarie in both, thereby it is that men are found so exceeding vertuous or vicious, Heauen and Earth (as it were) running together, and agreeing in one: for as the seedes of vertue may by the art and husbandrie of Christian counsaile produce better and more beautiful fruit, then the strength of selfe-nature and kind could haue yeelded them; so the plants apt to grow wilde, and to change themselves into weedes, by beeing set in a soyle futable, and like themselves, are made more vsaourie and filled with poyson. It was therefore truely affirmed, Sapiens adiuvabit opus astrorum, quemadmodum agricola terre naturam; A wise man assisteth the worke of the Starres, as the Husbandman helpeth the nature of the soyle. And Ptolomie himselfe confesseth thus much, Sapiens, & omnia sapientis medici dominabuntur astris, A wiseman, and the ominous art of a wise Physician shall prevaile against the Starres. Lastly, we ought all to know, that God created the Starres, as he did the rest of the Vniuersal, whose influences may be called his referued and vnwritten Lawes. But let vs consider how they bind: euen as the Lawes of men doe; for although the Kings and Princes of the World haue by their Lawes decreed, that a Thiefe and a Murderer shall suffer death; and though their Ordinances are daily by Iudges and Magistrates (the Starres of Kings) executed accordingly, yet these Lawes doe not depriue Kings of their naturall or religious compassion, or binde them without prerogative, to such a seuer execution, as that there should be nothing left of libertie to iudgement, power, or conscience: the Law in his owne nature, being no other then a deafe Tyrant. But seeing that it is otherwise, and that Princes (who ought to imitate God in all they can) doe sometimes for causes to themselves knowne, and by mediation, pardon offences both against others and themselves, it were then impious to take that power and libertie from God himselfe, which his Substitutes enioy; God being mercie, goodnesse, and charitie it selfe. Otherwise that example of Prayer by our Sauour taught; And let vs not be led into temptation, but deliver vs from euill, had bene no other but an expence of words and time; but that God (which onely knoweth the operation of his owne creatures truely) hath assured vs, that there is no inclination or temptation so forcible, which our humble Prayers and desires may not make frustrate, and breake asunder: for were it (as the Stoicks conceiue) that Fate or Destinie, though depending vpon eternall power, yet being once ordered and disposed, had such a connexion and immutable dependence, that God himselfe should in a kind haue shut vp himselfe therein: How miserable then were the condition of men (saith S. AVGVSTINE) left altogether without hope! And if this strength of the Starres were so transferred, as that God had quitted vnto them all dominion ouer his creatures; be hee Pagan or Christian that so beleueeth, the onely true God of the one, and the imaginarie gods of the other would thereby be despoyled of all worship, reuerence, or respect.

And certainly, God which hath promised vs the reward of well-doing, which Christ himselfe claimed at the hands of the Father, (I haue finished the worke which thou gauest mee to doe:) and the same God, who hath threatened vnto vs the sorrow and torment of offences; could not contrary to his mercifull nature be so vnjust, as to bind vs inuitably to the Destinies, or influences of the Starres, or subiect our soules to any imposed necessitie. But it was well said of Plotinus, that the Starres were significant, but not efficient, giuing them yet something lesse then their due: and therefore as I do not consent with them, who would make those glorious creatures of God vertuelesse: so I thinke that wee derogate from his eternall and absolute power and providence, to ascribe to them them the same dominion ouer our immortall soules, which they haue ouer all bodily substances, and perishable natures: for the soules of men, louing and fearing God, receiue influence from that diuine light it selfe, whereof the Sunnes claritie; and that of the Starres is by Plato called but a shadow. Lumen est umbra Dei, & Deus est lumen luminis; Light is the shadow of Gods brightnesse, who is the light of light: But to end this question, because this Destinie, together with Providence, Prescience, and Predestination are often confounded, I thinke it not impertinent to touch the difference in a word or two, for euery man hath not obserued it, though all learned men haue.

§. XII.

Of Prescience.

Prescience, or fore-knowledge (which the Greekes call Prognosis, the Latines præcognitio, or præscientia) considered in order and nature (if we may speake of God after the manner of men) goeth before Providence: for God fore-knew all things, before he had created them, or before they had being to be cared for; and Prescience is no other then an infallible fore-knowledge. For whatsoever our selues fore-know, except the same be to succede accordingly, it cannot be true that we fore-know it. But this Prescience of God (as it is Prescience onely) is not the cause of any thing futurely succeeding: neyther doth Gods foreknowledge impose any necessitie, or binde. For in that we fore-know that the Sunne will rise, and set; that all men borne in the World shall dye againe; that after Winter, the Spring shall come; after the Spring Summer and Haruest, and that according to the seuerall seedes that we sow, we shall reape seuerall sorts of graine, yet is not our fore-knowledge the cause of this, or any of these: neyther doth the knowledge in vs binde or constraîne the Sunne to rise and set, or men to dye; for the causes (as men perfwade themselves) are otherwise manifest and knowne to all. The eye of man (saith BOETIUS) beholdeth those things subiect to sense, as they are; the eye seeth that such a beast is an horse, it seeth men, trees, and houses, &c. but our seeing of them (as they are) is not the cause of their so being, for such they be in their owne nature. And againe out of the same Authour; Diuina providentia rebus generandis non imponit necessitatem, quia si omnia euenirent ex necessitate, præmia bonorum, & pæna malorum periret; Diuine Providence (saith he) imposeth no necessity vpon things that are to exist, for if all came to passe of necessity, there should neither be reward of good, nor punishment of euil.

§. XIII.

Of Providence.

Now Providence (which the Greekes call Prœnoia) is an intellectuall knowledge, both fore-seeing, caring for, and ordering all things, and doth not onely behold all past, all present, and all to come, but is the cause of their so being, which Prescience (simply taken) is not: and therefore Providence by the Philosophers (saith S. Augustine) is diuided into Memorie, Knowledge, and Care: Memorie of the past, Knowledge of the present, and Care of the future: and wee our selues account such a man for provident, as, remembring things past, and obseruing things present, can by iudgement, and comparing the one with the other, provide for the future, and times succeeding. That such a thing there is as Providence, the Scriptures euery-where teach vs, Moses in many places, the Prophets in their Predictions: Christ himselfe and his Apostles assure vs hereof; and, besides the Scriptures, Hermes, Orpheus, Euripides, Pythagoras, Plato, Plotinus, and (in effect) all learned men acknowledge the Providence of God: yea the Turkes themselves are so confident therein, as they refuse not to accompany and visit each other, in the most pestilent diseases, nor shun any perill whatsoever, though death therein doe manifestly present it selfe.

The places of Scripture prouoing providence, are so many, both in generall and particular, as I shall need to reape but a few of them in this place. Sing vnto God (saith DAVID) which couereth the Heauens with cloudes, and prepareth raine for the earth, and maketh the grasse to grow vpon the Mountaines, which giueth to beasts their food, and feedeth the young Rauens that cries: All these wait vpon thee, that thou mayest giue them food in due season. And thou shalt drinke of the River Cheareth (saith God to ELIAH) and I haue commanded the Ravens to feed thee there. Behold, the Fowles of the Ayre, they sow not, nor reape, and yet your heavenly Father feedeth them: Againe, Are not two Sparrowes sold for a farthing? and one of them shall not fall on the ground without your Father: yea all the haire of your head are numbred: And S. PETER, Cast all your care on him, for he careth for you: And his iudgements are written, saith DAVID.

Ier. 23. 24.

God therefore, who is euerie-where present, who filleth the Heauens and the Earth, whose eyes are upon the righteous, and his countenance against them that doe euill, was therefore by Orpheus called, oculus infinitus, an infinite eye, beholding all things, and cannot therefore be esteemed as an idle looker on, as if he had transferred his power to any other: for it is contrary to his owne Word: Gloriam meam alteri non dabo: I will not giue my glorie to another. No man commandeth in the Kings presence, but by the Kings direction; but God is euerie-where present, and King of Kings. The example of Gods vniuersall Prouidence is seene in his creatures. The Father prouideth for his children: beafts and birds and all liuing for their young ones. If prouidence bee found in second Fathers, much more in the first and Vniuersall: and if there be a naturall louing care in men, and beafts, much more in God, who hath formed this nature, and whose Diuine loue was the beginning, and is the bond of the Vniuersall: Amor diuinus rerum omnium est principium, & vinculum vniuersi (saith PLATO.) Amor Dei est nodus perpetuus, mundi copula, pariumq. eius immobile sustentaculum, ac vniuerse machine fundamentum; The loue of God is the perpetuall knot, and linke or chayne of the world, and the immouable pillar of euery part thereof, and the Basis and foundation of the vniuersall. God therefore who could only be the cause of all, can only prouide for all, and sustaine all; so as to absolute power; to euerie-where presence; to perfect goodnesse; to pure and diuine loue; this attribute transcendent hability of Prouidence is only proper and belonging.

§. XIV. Of Predestination.

NOW for Predestination; we can difference it no otherwise, from Prouidence and Prescience, then in this, that Prescience onely fore-seeth: Prouidence fore-seeth & careth for, and hath respect to all creatures, euen from the brightest Angels of Heauen, to the vnworthiest Wormes of the Earth, and Predestination (as it is vsed specially by Diuines) is onely of men, and yet not of all to men belonging, but of their saluation properly, in the common vse of Diuines, or perdition, as some haue vsed it. Yet Peter Lombard, Thomas, Bernensis Theologus, and others, take the word Predestination more strictly, and for a preparation to felicitie: diuers of the Fathers take it more largely sometimes: among whom S. Augustine speaking of two Cities, and two Societies, vseth these words, Quarum est vna, que predestinata est in aeternu regnare cum Deo, altera aeternum supplicium subire cum Diabolo; Whereof one is it, which is predestinated to reigne for euer with God, but the other is to vndergoe euermlasting torment with the Deuill: for according to NOMIVS MARCELLVS, destinare est preparare; and of the same opinion are many Protestant writers, as Calvin, Beza, Buchanan, Daneus, and such like: and as for the manifold questions hereof arising, I leaue them to the Diuines; and why it hath pleased God to create some vessels of honour, and some of dishonour, I will answer with GREGORIE, who saith, Qui in factis Dei rationem non videt, infirmitatem suam considerans, cur non videat, rationem videt; He that seeth no reason in the actions of God, by consideration of his owne infirmity perceyueeth the reason of his blindness. And againe with S. AVGVSTINE, Occulta esse causa potest, iniusta esse non potest; Hidden the cause of his Predestination may be, vniust it cannot be.

§. XV.

Of Fortune: and of the reason of some things that seeme to be by fortune, and against Reason and Prouidence.

AFTLY, seeing Destinie or Necessitie is subsequent to Gods prouidence, and seeing that the Starres haue no other dominion, then is before spoken, and that Nature is nothing, but as Plato calleth it, Dei artem, vel artificiosum Dei Organum; The art, or artificiall Organ of God: and CVSANVS, Diuini precepti instrumentum; The

The art, or artificiall Organ of God: and CVSANVS, Diuini precepti instrumentum; The instrument of the diuine precept: we may then with better reason reiect that kinde of Idolatrie, or God of fooles, called Fortune or Chance: a Goddesse, the most reuerenced, and the most reuiled of all other, but not ancient; for Homer maketh her the Daughter of Oceanus, as Pausanias witnesseth in his Messenicks. The Greekes call her ἡ τύχη, signifying a relatione being, or betiding, so as before Homers time this great Ladie was scarce heard of; and Hesiodus, who hath taught the birth and beginning of all these counterfeit gods, hath not a word of Fortune: yet afterward the grew so great and omnipotent, as from Kings and Kingdomes, to Beggars and Cottages, she ordered all things, resisting the wisdom of the wisest, by making the Possessor thereof miserable: valuing the folly of the most foolish by making their successe prosperous, in so much as the actions of men were said to be but the sports of Fortune, and the variable accidents happening in mens liues, but her pastimes: of which * PALLADIVS, Vita hominum ludus fortuna est; The life of man is the play of Fortune: and because it often falleth out, that enterprises guided by ill counsels haue equal successe to those by the best iudgement conducted, therefore had Fortune the same external figure with Sapience: wherof Athenaeus:

Longissime à Sapientia Fors distidet, Sed multa perficit tamen similitudo:

From Wisedome Fortune differs farre,
And yet in workes most like they are.

But I will forbear to be curious in that, which (as it is commonly vnderstood) is nothing else but a power imaginarie, to which the successe of humane actions and endeours were for their varietie ascribed; for when a manifest cause could not be giuen, then was it attributed to fortune, as if there were no cause of those things, of which most men are ignorant, contrary to this true ground of PLATO: Nihil est ortum sub Sole, cuius causa legitima non praeceperit; Nothing euer came to passe vnder the Sunne, of which there was not a iust preceeding cause. But Aquinas hath herein answered in one distinction, whatsoeuer may be objected; for many things there are (saith he) which happen, besides the intention of the Inferior, but not besides the intention of the Superior; Præter intentionem inferioris, sed non præter intentionem superioris, (to wit, the ordinance of God;) and therefore (saith MELANCHTON) Quod Poeta fortunam, nos Deum appellamus; Whom the Poets call Fortune, we know to be God, and that this is true, the Scripture in many places teacheth vs, as in the Law of Murder. He that smiteth a man, and he die, shall die the death; and if a man hath not laid waite, but God hath offered him into his hands, then I will appoint thee a place whither he shall flee. Now, where the Scripture hath these words, God hath offered him into his hands, we say, if he hurt him by Chance: and in Deuteronomie the nineteenth, where the slipping of an Axe from the helue, whereby another is slaine, was the worke of God himselfe, we in our phraze attribute this accident to Chance or Fortune: and in the Prouerbs the sixteenth, The lot is cast into the lap, but the whole disposition thereof is of the Lord: so as that which seemeth most casuall and subiect to Fortune, is yet disposed by the ordinance of God, as all things else; and hereof the wiser sort, and the best learned of the Philosophers were not ignorant, as Cicero witnesseth for them, gathering the opinion of Aristotle and his Sectators, with those of Plato, and the Academicks to this effect; That the same power which they called animam mundi; The soule of the World, was no other then that incomprehensible wisdom, which we expresse by the name of God, gouerning euery being as well in heauen as in earth; to which wisdom and power they sometime gaue the title of Necessitie or Fate, because it bindeth by ineuitable ordinance: sometime, the style of Fortune, because of many effects there appeare vnto vs no certain causes. To this effect speaketh S. Augustine in his questions vpon Genesis the first Booke: the same hath Seneca in his fourth of Benefits; which was also the doctrine of the Stoicks, of which Seft he was: For whatsoeuer (saith he) thou callest God, be it Nature, Fate, or Fortune, all are but one and the same, differenced by diuers termes, according as he useth, and exerciseth his power diuersly.

But it may be objected, that if Fortune and Chance were not sometimes the causes of good and euill in men, but an idle voice, whereby we expresse successe; how comes it then, that so many worthy and wise men depend vpon so many vnworthy and empty-headed fooles; that riches and honor are giuen to externall men, and without kernel:

nell: and so many learned, vertuous, and valiant men weare out their liues in poore and deiected estates. In a word, there is no other inferior, or apparent cause, beside the partialitie of mans affection, but the falshioning and not falshioning of our felues according to the nature of the time wherein we liue: for whosoeuer is most able, and best sufficient to discern, and hath withall an honest and open heart and louing truth; if Princes, or those that gouerne, endure no other discourte then their owne flatteries, then I say such an one, whose vertue and courage forbiddeth him to be base and a dissembler, shall euermore hang vnder the wheele; which kinde of deseruing well and receiuing ill, we alwaies falsly charge Fortune withall. For whosoeuer shall tell any great Man or Magistrate, that he is not iust; the Generall of an Armie, that he is not valiant, and great Ladies that they are not faire; shall neuer be made a Counsellor, a Captaine, or a Courtier. Neither is it sufficient to be wife with a wife Prince, valiant with a valiant, and iust with him that is iust, for such a one hath no estate in his prosperitie; but he must also change with the successor, if he be of contrarie qualities; faile with the tyde of the time, and alter forme and condition, as the Estate or the Estates Master changeth: Otherwise how were it possible, that the most base men, and separate from all imitable qualities, could so often attaine to honour and riches, but by such an obseruant slauish course? These men hauing nothing else to value themselves by, but a counterfait kinde of wondring at other men, and by making them beleue that all their vices are vertues, and all their dustie actions crystalline, haue yet in all ages prospered equally with the most vertuous, if not exceeded them. For according to MENANDER, Omnis insipiens arrogantia et plausibus capitur; Euerie foole is wonne with his owne pride, and others flattering applause: so as whosoeuer will liue altogether out of himselfe, and studie other mens humours, and obserue them, shall neuer be vnfortunate; and on the contrarie, that man which prizeth truth and vertue (except the season wherein he liueth be of all these, and of all sorts of goodnesse fruitfull) shall neuer prosper by the possession or profession thereof. It is also a token of a worldly wise man, not to warre or contend in vaine against the nature of times wherein he liueth: for such a one is often the authour of his owne miserie; but best it were to follow the aduice, which the Pope gaue the Bishops of that age, out of Ouid, while the Arian Heresie raged:

Ouidrem am.
lib. 1.

Dum furor in cursu est, currenti cede furori.

While furie gallops on the way,
Let no man furies gallop stay.

And if Cicero (then whom that world begat not a man of more reputed iudgement) had followed the counsaile of his brother QUINTVS, Pernisset (saith PETRARCH) in lectulo suo mori, pernisset integro caduere sepeliri; He might then haue dyed the death of nature, and bene with an vntorne and vndiscovered bodie buried; for as Petrarch in the same place noteth: Quid stultius quam desperantem (praesertim de effectu) litibus perperis implicari; What more foolish then for him that despaires, especially of the effect, to be intangled with endlesse contentions? Whosoeuer therefore will set before him MACHIAVELLS two markes to shooote at (to wit) riches, and glorie, must set on and take off a back of yron to a weak woodden Bow, that it may fit both the strong and the feeble: for as he, that first deuised to adde sayles to rowing vessels, did eyther so proportion them, as being fastened aloft, and towards the head of his Mast, he might abide all windes and stormes, or else he sometime or other perished by his owne inuention: so that man which prizeth vertue for it selfe, and cannot endure to hoise and strike his sailes, as the diuers natures of calmes and stormes require, must cut his sailes and his cloth, of meane length and bredth, and content himselfe with a slow and sure navigation, (to wit) a meane and free estate. But of this dispute of Fortune, and the rest, or of whosoeuer 50 Lords or Gods; imaginarie powers, or causes, the wit (or rather foolishnesse) of man hath found out: let vs resolue with S. Paul, who hath taught vs; that there is but one God, the Father, of whom are all things, and we in him; and one Lord, Iesus Christ, by whom are all things; and we by him; there are diuersities of operations, but God is the same which worketh all in all.

Of mans estate in his first Creation, and of Gods rest.

§. I.

Of the Image of God, according to which man was first created.

THe creation of all other creatures being finished, the heauens adorned, and the earth replenished, God said, Let vs make man in our owne Image, according to our likeness. Gen. 1. 26.
Man is the last and most admirable of Gods workes to vs knowne, ingenium miraculum homo, Man is the greatest wonder (saith PLATO out of MERCURIUS: Nature ardentissima artificum, The artificial worke of the most ardent or fire-like nature (as saith Zoroaster) though the same be meant, not for any excellencie external, but in respect of his internall forme, both in the nature, qualities, and other attributes thereof: in nature, because it hath an essence immortall, and spirituall; in qualities, because the same was by God created holy and righteous in truth; in other attributes, because Man was made Lord of the world, and of the creatures therein.

Deerat adhuc: & quod dominari in cetera posset, Natus homo est.*
More holy then the rest, and vnderstanding more,
A liuing creature wants, to rule all made before:
So man began to be.

*Sanctum, quia pars potior immortalis; animal, quia in mortalis.
In locum Ouid.

Of this Image and similitude of God, there is much dispute among the Fathers, Schoole-men, and late Writers: Some of the Fathers conceiue, that man was made after the Image of God, in respect chiefly of Empire and Dominion, as S. Chrysostome, Ambrose, and some others: which S. Ambrose denieth to the woman in these words, Et sicut Deus vnus, ab eo fieret homo vnus, & quomodo ex Deo vno omnia, ita ex vno homine omne genus esset (super faciem totius terra: Vnus igitur vnus facit, qui unitatis eius haberet imaginem; That as God is one, one man might be made by him, and that in what manner all things are of one God, likewise of one man the whole kinde should be upon the face of the whole earth: I therefore be being one, made one, that should haue the Image of his unitie. But whereas it is gathered out of the following words of the same Verse, that man was after the Image of God in respect of rule and power, it is written Dominamini in the plural number, and let them rule ouer the fish in the Sea, &c. and therefore cannot the woman be excluded. Others conceiue, that man is said to be after the image of God in respect of his immortall soule onely, because as God is inuisible, so the soule of man is inuisible; as God is immortall and incorporall, so is the soule of man immortall and incorporall; and as there is but one God which gouerneth the world, so but one soule which gouerneth the bodie of man; and as God is wholly in euery part of the world, so is the soule of man wholly in euery part of the bodie: Anima est tota in toto, & tota in qualibet parte; The soule is wholly in the whole bodie, and wholly in euery part thereof, according to Aristotle; though Chalcidius, and other learned men demie that doctrine; which that it is otherwise then potentially true, all the Aristotelians in the world shall neuer proue. These and the like arguments doe the Iewes make (saith Tostatus) and these resemblances, betwene the infinite God, and the finite Man.

The Schoole-men resemble the Minde or Soule of Man to God, in this respect especially; because that as in the Minde there are three distinct powers, or faculties (to wit) Memorie, Vnderstanding, and Will; and yet all these, being of real differences, are but one minde: so in God there are three distinct persons, the Father, Sonne, and holy Ghost, and yet but one God. They also make the Image and Similitude diuers; and againe, they distinguish betwene imaginem Dei, and ad imaginem Dei, and spinn into small threds, with subtile distinctions, many times the plainnesse and sinceritie of the Scriptures: their wits being like that strong water, that eateth thorow and dissolueth the purest gold. Victorinus also maketh the Image of God to be substantiall, but not the the similitude: sed in substantia nomen qualitatis declaratiuum; A word declaring quality in the substance. Out of which words, and that which followeth, it is inter'd, that as the image and similitude doe greatly differ: so the sinfull soule doth northerfore leaue to be the image of God, but it hath not his similitude, except it be holy and righteous. S. Augustine also against Adimantus the Manichee affirmeth, that by sinne, the perfection of this image is lost in man, and in his Retractions maintayneth the same opinion, and also affirmeth that the Similitude is more largely taken, then the Image.

But howsoever the Schoole-men and others distinguish, or whatsoever the Fathers conceive, sure I am that S. Paul maketh the same sense of the image, which Victorinus doth of the similitude, who saith: As we haue borne the image of the earthly, so shall we beare the image of the heavenly; and it cannot be gathered out of the Scriptures, that the words image and similitude were vsed but in one sense, and in this place the better to expresse each other; whatsoever Lombard hath said to the contrary. For God knowes, what a multitude of meanings the wit of man imagineth to himselfe in the Scriptures, which neither Moses, the Prophets, or Apostles, ever conceived. Now as S. Paul vseth the word (image) for both: so S. James vseth the word (similitude) for both in these words: Therewith blese we God euen the Father, and therewith curse we Men, which are made after the similitude of God. Howsoever therefore S. Augustine seemeth, out of a kind of elegancie in writing, to make some difference, as where he writeth, Constituimus imaginem in eternitate, similitudinem in moribus inueniri; We confesse that this image is found in eternitie, but his similitude in manners, that is, in the spirituall dispositions and qualities of the minde; yet thus he elsewhere speaketh plainly: Quasi verò possit esse imago aliqua in qua similitudo non sit: si enim omnino similis non est, procul dubio nec imago est; As if (saith he) there could be any image, where the similitude is not: no, out of doubt, where there is no likeness, there is no image. The verie words of the Text make this most manifest, as, Let vs make man in our image, according to our likeness: which is, Let vs make man in our image, that he may be like vs; and in the next Verse following, God himselfe maketh it plaine, for there he vseth the word (image) onely, as thus: God created the man in his image, in the image of God created he him. And to take away all dispute or ambiguity, in the first Verse of the first Chapter, the word (similitude) is vsed againe by it selfe, as, In the day that God created Adam, in the likeness of God made he him. And this similitude S. Paul Colos. the third, calleth the image. Put on (saith he) the new man, which is renewed in knowledge after the image of him, that created him. And in Syracides it is written, He made them according to his image. Now if we may beleue S. Paul before Peter Lombard and other Schoole-men, then it is as manifest as wordes can make it, that the image and similitude is but the same, for S. Paul vseth both the wordes directly in one sense. For they turned the glorie of the incorruptible God, to the similitude of the image of a corruptible man.

Zanchius laboureth to proue, that man was formed after the image of God, both in bodie and minde: Nulla pars in homine quæ non fuerit huiusce imaginis particeps, No part in a man (saith he) which was not participating Gods image: for God said, Let vs make man according to our owne image. But the soule alone is not man, but the Hypostasis or whole man compounded of bodie and soule. The bodie of man (saith he) is the image of the world, and called therefore Microcosmus; but the Idea and exemplar of the world was first in God, so that man, according to his bodie must needs be the image of God. Against which opinion of this learned man, his owne objection seemeth to me sufficient, where he allegeth, that it may be said, that Moses spake by the figure Synecdoche, as when a man is called a mortall man, yet is not the whole man mortall, but the bodie onely: so when God said, Let vs make man after our image, he meant the soule of man, and not the bodie of earth and dust: Maledictus qui deitatem ad hominis lineamenta refert (saith S. AUGUSTINE), Cursed is he that referreth the Deitie of God to the lineaments of mans bodie. Deus enim non est humane forme particeps, neque corpus humanum diuina. (saith PHILO,) God is not partaker of humane forme, nor humane body of the forme diuine. The Hebrew word for image, is Tselem, which signififieth a shadow or obscure resemblance: In imagine pertransit homo; Man passeth away in a shadow: Let vs then know and consider, that God, who is eternall and infinite, hath not any bodily shape or composition, for it is both against his Nature and his Word; an error of the Anthropomorphita, against the verie essence and Maiestie of God.

Surely

Surely Cicero, who was but a Heathen, had yet a more diuine vnderstanding then these grosse Heretikes: Ad similitudinem Dei proprius accedebat humana virtus, quam figura; The vertue which is in man (saith he) came neerer the similitude of God, then the figure. For God is a spirituall substance, inuisible, and most simple; God is a iust God: God is Mercifull: God is Charitie it selfe, and (in a word) Goodnesse it selfe, and none else simply good. And thus much it hath pleased God himselfe to teach vs, and to make vs know of himselfe. What then can be the shadow of such a substance, the image of such a nature, or wherein can man be said to resemble his vnexcogitable power and perfectnesse? certainly, not in dominion alone: for the Deuill is said to be the Prince of this World, and the Kingdome of Christ was not thereof, who was the true and perfect image of his Father; neither, because man hath an immortall soule, and therein the faculties of Memorie, Vnderstanding, and Will, for the Deuils are also immortall, and participate those faculties, being called Dæmones, because scientes of Knowledge, and subtilitie; neither because we are reasonable creatures, by which we are distinguished from beasts: for who haue rebelled against God? who haue made Gods of the vilest beasts, of Serpents, of Cats, of Owles, yea, euen of shamefull parts, of lusts and pleasures, but reasonable men? Yet doe I not condemne the opinion of S. Chrysostome and Ambrose, as touching dominion, but that, in respect thereof, man was in some sort after the image of God, if we take Dominion, such as it ought to be, that is, accompanied with Iustice and Pietie: for God did not onely make man a Ruler and Governour ouer the Fishes of the Sea, the Fowles of Heauen (or of the aire) and ouer the Beasts of the Field; but God gaue vnto man a dominion ouer men, he appointed Kings to gouerne them, and Iudges, to iudge them in equitie. Neither doe I exclude Reason, as it is the abilitie of Vnderstanding. For I doe not conceiue, that Irenæus did therefore call man, the image of God, because he was animal rationale onely; but that he vnderstood it better, with SYBILLA: Imago mea est homo, rectam rationem habens: Man, that is endued with right reason, is said to resemble God, (that is) by right reason to know, and confesse God his Creatour, and the same God to serue, loue, and obey: and therefore said Saint Augustine (who herein came neerer the Truth) Fecit Deus hominem ad imaginem & similitudinem suam in mente, God made man, in respect of the intellect, after his owne Image and similitude; and REYNERIUS; Homo, quod habet mentem, factus est ad imaginem Dei, Man was made after the Image of God, in minde, or in that he had a minde.

§. II.

Of the intellectuall minde of man, in which there is much of the Image of God: and that this Image is much deformed by Sinne.

BVt Mens is not taken here for anima physica, according to Aristotle, which is forma, vel natura hominis: The forme or nature of man; but this facultie or gift of God, called Mens, is taken for prima vis animi, the principall strength of the minde, or soule, cuius actus est perpetua veritatis contemplatio; whose act, exercise, or office, is the perpetuall contemplation of truth; and therefore it is also called intellectus diuinus, intellectus contemplatiuus, & anima contemplatiua, A diuine vnderstanding, and an intellect or minde contemplatiue. Est autem mens nostra (saith CYPRIANVS) *vis comprehendendi, & totum virtuale ex omnibus comprehendendi virtutibus compositum: Our intellectuall minde (saith he) is a power of comprehending, euen the whole, that is in this kinde powerfull, compounded of all the powers of comprehension: vnto which Mercurius attributeth so much (if his meaning accompany his words) that hee esteemeth it to be the very essence of God (which was also the error of the Manichees, and others) and no otherwise separate from God (saith he) then the light from the Sunne: for this Mens or vnderstanding (saith MERCURIUS) est Deus in hominibus: Is God in men, or rather (and which I take to be his meaning) is the image of God in man. For as the Sunne is not of the same essence or nature with the diuine light, but a body illightned, and an illumination created; so is this Mens or vnderstanding in men, not of the essence of Gods infinite vnderstanding, but a power and facultie of our soules the purest; or the lumen animæ rationalis, by the true and eternall light illightned. And this Mens others call animam animæ, The soule of the soule, or with S. Augustine, the eye of the soule, or receptacle of Sapience and diuine knowledge, que amore sapientiæ tanquam ducē sequitur, Which followeth after* after the loue of sapience as her guide (saith Philo) betweene which and reason, betweene which and the mind, called anima, between which & that power which the Latines call animus, there is this difference. Reason is that facultie by which we iudge and discoures; Anima, by which we liue. Hereof it is said, Anima corpus animat, id est, uiuificat; or the soule is that which doth animate the body, that is, giueth life: for death is the separation of body and soule; and the same strength (saith Philo) which God the great Director hath in the VWorld, the same hath this Anima, or mind, or soule in man. Animus is that, by which we will and make election; and to this Basil agreeth, which calleth this Mens, or diuine vnderstanding, perspicacem animæ partem, the perceiving part of the mind, or the light by which the Soule discerneth: dormientium mens, non anima, sopitur, & in furiosis mens extinguitur, anima manet, in men that sleepe it is this (Mens) or vnderstanding, and not the mind or soule, which resteth, during which time it is but habitual in wise men, in mad men this (Mens) is extinguished, and not the soule: for mad men doe liue, though distracted.

Therefore this word being often vsed for the Soule giuing life, is attributed absurdely to mad men, when we say that they are of a distracted minde, in stead of a broken vnderstanding, which word (mind) we vse also for opinion, as, I am of this minde, or that mind: and sometimes for mens conditions or vertues, as, he is of an honest minde, or a man of a iust minde: sometimes for affection, as, I do this for my mindes sake; and Aristotle sometimes vseth this word (Mens) for the phantasie, which is the strength of the imagination: sometimes for the knowledge of principles, which we haue without discoures: oftentimes for Spirits, Angels and Intelligences: but as it is vsed in the proper signification, including both the vnderstanding agent and possible, it is described to bee a pure, simple, substantiall act, not depending vpon matter, but hauing relation to that which is intelligible, as to his first object: or more at large thus; a part or particle of the Soule, whereby it doth vnderstand, not depending vpon matter, nor needing any organ, free from passion, comming from without, and apt to bee disseuered, as, eternall from that which is mortall, Hereof excellently MERCURIUS: Anima est imago mentis, mens imago Dei. Deus menti præst, mens anima, anima corpori; The Soule (meaning that which giueth life) is the Image of this vnderstanding, or Mens, and this (Mens) or vnderstanding is the Image of God: God is President or Ruler over this vnderstanding, this vnderstanding ouer the Soule, and this Soule ouer the bodie. This diuision and distinction out of the Platonikes and Peripateticikes, I leaue to the Reader to iudge of. That, Mens humana hath no need of any organ, Marsilius Ficinus in his ninth Booke of the Soules immortallitie labourerth to proue. Zanchius doth not differ from Ficinus in words, for (sayth he) Ad facultatem intelligentem exercendam non eget Mens organo, tanquam medio, per quod intelligat, quanquam eget obiecto in quod intueatur, & ex quo intellectum concipiat: hoc autem obiectum sunt phantasmatæ, seu rerum a sensibus perceptarum simulachra ad phantasiam prolata: To exercise the facultie of vnderstanding, the mind of man (sayth he) needeth no instrument, as a meane, by which it may vnderstand: but it needeth an object, whereon to looke, and whence to conceiue the act of vnderstanding. This object are the phantasmes, or the resemblances of things receiued from the sense & caryed to the phantasie. But in effect his conclusion seemeth to carry a contrary sense, when he maketh the Phantasie, in representing the object to the vnderstanding, to be a corporall Organum; neither can it be vnderstood to be an Organum of any thing; but of the vnderstanding. And he addeth that the resemblance of things in mans imaginatiõ, are to his vnderstanding & mind, as colours are to the sight: whence it so followeth, that the imagination or phantasie it self is to the facultie of vnderstanding, as the eye is to the facultie of seeing; & as this is an organum, so that. Of this question, How the minde in all her actions maketh vse of the bodie, & hath communion with the body, I referre the Reader to a most graue & learned Discourser in the last Reply of M. D. Bilson, late Bishop of Winchester, vnto Henry Jacob. Howsoeuer the Truth be determined, we must conclude, that it is neither in respect of reason alone, by which we discoures, nor in respect of the minde it selfe by which wee liue, nor in respect of our soules simply, by which we are immortall, that we are made after the Image of God: But most safely may we resemble our selues to God in mente, and in respect of that pure facultie which is neuer separate from the contemplation and loue of God. Yer this is not all. For Saint Bernard maketh a true difference betweene the nature and faculties of the Minde or Soule, and betweene the infusion of qualities, endowments and gifts of grace, wherewith it is adorned and enriched, which, being being added to the nature, essence, and faculties, maketh it altogether to bee after the Image of God, whose words are these: Non propterea imago Dei est, quia sui meminit Mens, sed, intelligit & diligit (which also was the opinion of Saint AUGUSTINE) sed quia potest meminisse, intelligere ac diligere eum a quo facta est, (that is) The minde (or Mens) was not therefore the Image of God, because it remembereth, vnderstandeth, and loueth it selfe, but because it can remember, vnderstand, and loue God, who created it. And that this Image may be deformed and made vnprofitable, heare BASIL: Homo ad imaginem & similitudinem Dei factus est, peccatum vero imaginis huius pulchritudinem deformauit: & inutilem reddidit, dum animam corruptis concupiscentie affectibus immergit: Man was made after the Image and similitude of GOD, but sinne hath deformed the beautie of this Image, and made it vnprofitable by drawing our minds into corrupt concupiscentie.

It is not therefore (as aforesaid) by reason of Immortalitie, nor in Reason, nor in Dominion, nor in any one of these by it selfe, nor in all these ioyned, by any of which, or by all which we resemble, or may be called the shadow of God, though by reason and vnderstanding, with the other faculties of the Soule, wee are made capable of this print; but chiefly, in respect of the habit of Originall righteoufnesse, most perfectly infused by God into the minde and Soule of man in his first Creation. For it is not by nature, nor by her liberalitie, that we were printed with the scale of Gods Image (though Reason may be said to be of her gift, which ioyned to the soule is a part of the Essentiall Constitution of our proper Species) but from the bountifull grace of the Lord of all goodnesse, who breathed life into Earth, and contriued within the Trunke of Dust and Clay, the inimitable habilitie of his owne Pietie, and Righteoufnesse.

So long therefore (for that resemblance which Dominion hath) doe those that are powerful retain the Image of God, as according to his Commandements they exercise the Office or Magistracie to which they are called, and sincerely walke in the wayes of God, which in the Scriptures is called, walking with God; and all other men so long retain this Image, as they feare, loue and serue God truly, that is, for the loue of God alone, and doe not bruite and deface his Scale by the weight of manifold and voluntary offences, and obstinate finnes. For the vniust minde cannot be after the Image of God, seeing God is Iustice it selfe; The bloud-thirstie hath it not; for God is Charitie, and Mercie it selfe: Falshood, cunning practice, and ambition, are properties of Sathan; and therefore cannot dwell in one soule, together with GOD; and to be short, there is no likelihood betweene pure light and blacke darknesse, betweene beautie & deformity, or betweene righteoufnesse and reprobation. And though Nature, according to common vnderstanding, haue made vs capable by the power of reason, and apt enough to receiue this Image of Gods goodnesse which the sensuall soules of beasts cannot perceiue; yet were that aptitude naturall more inclinable to follow and imbrace the false and dulle pleasures of this Stage-play VWorld, then to become the shadow of God by walking after him, had not the exceeding workmanhippe of GODS Wife dome, and the liberalitie of his Mercy, formed eyes to our soules, as to our bodies, which, piercing through the impuritie of our flesh, behold the highest Heauens, and thence bring Knowledge and Object to the Minde and Soule, to contemplate the euer-during Glorie, and termelesse Ioy, prepared for those, which retain the Image and similitude of their Creatour, preserving vndefiled and vrent the garment of the new man, which, after the Image of GOD, is created in Righteoufnes and Holinesse, as saith S. Paul. Now, whereas it is thought by some of the Fathers, as by Saint AUGUSTINE, with whom Saint AMBROSE ioyneth, that, by sinne, the perfection of the Image is lost, and not the Image it selfe; both opinions by this distinction may be well reconciled (to wit) that the Image of God, in man, may be taken two wayes: for either it is considered, according to naturall gifts, and consisteth therein: namely to haue a reasonable and vnderstanding nature, &c. and in this sense, the Image of God is more lost by sinne, then the very reasonable or vnderstanding nature, &c. is lost, (or sinne doth not abolish and take away these naturall gifts:) or, the Image of God is considered, according to supernaturall gifts, namely, of Diuine Grace and heavenly Glorie, which is indeed the perfection and accomplishment of the naturall Image; and this manner of similitude and Image of God is wholly blotted out and destroyed by sinne.

¶ III.

Of our base and fraile bodies: and that the care thereof should yeeld to the immortall Soule.

IN this frame and carcasfe God formed out of the dust of the Earth, or according to the signification of the word, Adam of Adamath, of red Earth, or, ex limo terre, out of the slime of the Earth, or a mixed matter of Earth and Water. Non ex qualibet humo, sed ex ghashpar adamath (id est) ex pinguisima & molissima: Not that God made an Image or Statue of Clay, but out of Clay, Earth or dust God formed and made flesh, blood, and bone, with all parts of man.

That man was formed of Earth and Dust, did Abraham acknowledge, when in humble feare he called vnto God, to saue Sodome: Let not my Lord now be angry, if I speake, I, that am but dust and ashes: And in these Houses of Clay, whose foundation is in the dust, doe our soules inhabite, according to Iob. And though our owne eyes doe euery-where behold the sudden and restless assaults of Death, and Nature assureth vs by neuer-failing Experience, and Reason by infallible demonstration, that our times vpon the Earth haue neither certaintie nor durabilitie, that our Bodies are but the Anduiles of paine and diseases, and our Minds the Hiuies of vnumbred cares, sorrowes and passions: and that (when we are most glorified) we are but those painted posts, against which Enuie and Fortune direct their darts; yet such is the true unhappinesse of our condition; and the darke ignorance which couereth the eyes of our vnderstanding, that wee only prize, pamper, and exalt this Vassall and Slaue of death, and forget altogether (or only remember at our cast-away leisure) the imprisoned immortall Soule, which can neither dye with the Reprobate, nor perish with the mortall parts of vertuous men: seeing Gods Iustice in the one, and his goodnesse in the other is exercised for euermore, as the euer-living subiects of his reward and punishment. But when is it that wee examine this great account? Neuer while we haue one vanitie left vs to spend: wee plead for Titles, till our breath faile vs; digge for Riches: while our strength enableth vs; exercise malice, while we can reuenge; and then, when Time hath beaten from vs both youth, pleasure, and health, and that Nature it selfe hateth the house of old age, we remember with Iob, that we must goe the way from whence we shall not returne, and that our bed is made ready for vs in the darke; And then I say, looking ouer-late into the bottome of our conscience (which Pleasure and Ambition had locked vp from vs all our liues,) we behold therein the fearefull Images of our actions past, and withall this terrible Inscription: That God will bring euery worke into iudgement, that man hath done vnder the Sunne.

But what examples haue euer moued vs? what perswasions reformed vs? or what threatnings made vs afraid? we behold other mens Tragedies plaid before vs, we heare what is promised and threatned: but the Worlds bright glorie hath put out the eyes of our minds; and these betraying lights, (with which wee only see) doe neither looke vp towards remelesse ioyes, nor downe towards endlesse sorrowes, till wee neither know, nor can looke for any thing else, at the Worlds hands. Of which excellently Marius Victor:

*Nil hostes, nil dira fames, nil deniq; morbi
Egerunt, fuimus, qui nunc sumus, iussu periculis
Tentati, nihilo meliores reddimur unquam,
Sub vitis nullo culparum sine manentes.*

Diseases, Famine, Enemies, in vs no change haue wrought,
What erst we were, we are; still in the same snare caught:
No time can our corrupted manners mend,
In Vice we dwell, in Sinne that hath no end.

But let vs not flatter our immortall Soules herein: for to neglect God all our liues, and know that wee neglect him, to offend God voluntarily, and know that wee offend him, casting our hopes on the Peace, which wee trust to make at parting, is no other then a rebellious presumption, and (that which is the worst of all) euen a contemptuous laughing to scorne, and deriding of God, his Lawes and Precepts. Frustra sperant, qui sic de misericordia Dei sibi blandiuntur; They hope in vaine, saith BERNARD, which in this sort flatter themselves with Gods mercie.

¶ IV.

Of the Spirit of Life, which God breathed into man in his Creation.

IN this frame and carcasfe God breathed the breath of life; and the man was a liuing Soule: (that is) God gaue a body of Earth and of corruptible matter, & Soule spirituall and incorruptible; not that God had any such bodily instruments as men vse, but God breathed the Spirit of Life and Immortalitie into man, as he breatheth his grace daily into such as loue and feare him. *The Spirit of God (saith ELIAH in Iob) hath made me, and the breath of the Almighty hath giuen me Life: In qua sententia (saith RABANVS) vitanda est paupertas sensus carnalis, ne forte putemus Deum, vel manibus corporeis de limo formasse corpus hominis, vel faucibus aut labijs suis inspirasse in faciem formati, ut viuere possit & spiraculum vita habere: Nam & Propheta cum ait, Manus tue fecerunt me, &c. Tropica hac locutione magis quam propria, (id est) iuxta consuetudinem, qua solent homines operari, loquutus est: Im which sentence (saith he) the beggerliness of carnall sense is to be avoided, lest perhaps we should thinke, either that God with bodily hands made mans body of slime, or breathed with iawes or lips vpon his face (being formed) that he might liue, and haue the Spirit of Life: for the Prophet also when he saith, I by hands haue made me, shake this Tropically, rather then properly (that is) according to the custome which men vse in working. Quantum est periculi hys, qui Scripturas sensu corporeo legunt? In what danger are they that read the Scriptures in a carnall sense? By this breath was infused into man both life and soule; and therefore this (Soule) the Philosophers call Animam, que vinificat corpus, & animat, Which doth animate, and giue life to the bodie. The inspiration of the Almighty giueth vnderstanding, saith Iob; and this spirit, which God breathed into man, which is the reasonable soule of man, returneth againe to God that gaue it, as the bodie returneth vnto the Earth, out of which it was taken, according to Ecclesiastes: And dust shall returne to the Earth, out of which it was taken, and the spirit shall returne to God that gaue it. Neither is this word (spirit) usually otherwise taken in the Scriptures, then for the soule; as when Stephen cryed vnto God: Domine, suscipe spiritum meum; Lord Iesus, receiue my spirit: and in S. Iohn, And Iesus bowed his head, and gaue up the ghost, or spirit, (which was) that his life and soule left his body dead. And that the immortall soule of man differeth from the foules of beasts, the manner of creation maketh it manifest: for it is written, Let the waters bring forth in abundance euery creeping thing, and let the Earth bring forth the liuing thing, according to his kinde, the beast of the Earth, &c. But of Man it is written, Let vs make man in our owne Image, &c. and further, that the Lord breathed in his face the breath of life. Wherefore, as from the Water and Earth were those creatures brought forth, and thence receiued life: so shall they againe be dissolved into the same first matter, when they were taken: but the life of breath euerlasting, which God breathed into man, shall according to Ecclesiastes, returne againe to God that gaue it.*

¶ V.

That man is (as it were) a little World: with a digression touching our mortalitie.

MAN, thus compounded and formed by God, was an abstract or modell, or briefe Storie of the Vniuersall: in whom God concluded the Creation, and worke of the World, and whom hee made the last and most excellent of his Creatures, being internally endued with a diuine vnderstanding, by which hee might contemplate and serue his Creatour, after whose Image hee was formed, and endued with the powers and faculties of Reason and other abilities, that thereby also he might gouerne and rule the World, and all other Gods creatures therein. And whereas God created three sorts of liuing natures, (to wit) Angelicall, Rationall, and Brutall; giuing to Angels an intellectuall, and to Beasts a sensuall nature, he vouchsafed vnto Man, both the intellectuall of Angels, the sensitiue of Beasts, and the proper rationall belonging vnto man, and therefore (saith GREGORY NAZIANZENE:) Homo est virtuosus, natura vinculum, Man is the bond and chaine which yeth together both natures: and because in the little frame of mans body there is a representation of the Vniuersall, and (by allusion) a kind of participation of all the parts there, therefore was man called Microcosmos, or the little World. Deus igitur hominem factum, velut alterum quendam mundum, dum, in breui magnum, atq; exiguu totum, in terris statuit, God therefore placed in the Earth the man whom he had made, as it were another World, the great and large World in the small and little World: for out of the Earth and Dust was formed the flesh of Man, and therefore heaue and lumpish; the bones of his body we may compare to the hard Rockes and Stones, and therefore strong and durable; of which OVID:

Et documenta damus, qua sumus origine nati:*

From thence our kind hard-hearted is, enduring paine and care, Approouing, that our bodies of a stonie nature are.

His blood, which dispereth it selfe by the branches of veines through all the body, may be resembled to those waters, which are carryed by Brookes and Riueres ouer all the Earth; his breath to the Aire, his naturall heate to the inclosed warmth which the Earth hath in it selfe, which stirred vp by the heare of the Sunne, assisteth Nature in the speedier procreation of those varieties, which the Earth bringeth forth; Our radicall moisture, Oyle, or Balsamum (whereon the naturall heate feedeth and is maintained) is resembled to the fat and fertilitie of the Earth; the haire of mans bodie, which adorne or ouer-shaddowes it, to the grasse, which couereth the vpper face and skin of the Earth; our generatiue power, to Nature, which produceth all things; our determinations, to the light, wandering & vnstable clouds, carried euery where with vncertaine winds; our cies, to the light of the Sun and Moone, and the beaue of our youth, to the flowers of the Spring, which, either in a very short time, or with the Sunnes heat dry vp, and wither away, or the fierce pusses of winde blow them from the stalkes; the thoughts of our mind, to the motion of Angels; and our pure vnderstanding (formerly called Mens, and that which alwayes looketh vpwards) to those intellectuall natures, which are alwayes present with God; and lastly our immortall soules (while they are righteous) are by God himselfe beautified with the title of his owne image and similitude: And although, in respect of God, there is no man iust, or good, or righteous: for in Angelis deprehensa est stultitia, Behold, hee found folly in his Angels (saith Iob) yet with such a kind of difference, as there is betweene the substance and the shadow, there may be found a goodnesse in man: which God being pleased to accept, hath therefore called man, the image and similitude of his owne righteousness. In this also is the little World of man compared, and made more like the Vniuersall (man being the measure of all things; Homo est mensura omnium rerum, saith Aristotle and Pythagoras) that the foure Complexions resemble the foure Elements, and the seuen Ages of man the seuen Planets: Whereof our Infancie is compared to the Moone, in which wee seeme onely to liue and grow, as Plants; the second Age to Mercurie, wherein wee are taught and instructed; our third Age to Venus, the dayes of Loue, Desire, and Vanitie; the fourth to the Sunne, the strong, flourishing, and beautifull age of mans life; the fifth to Mars, in which wee seeke honour and victorie, and in which our thoughts trauaile to ambitious ends; the sixth Age is ascribed to Iupiter, in which we beginne to take account of our times, iudge of our selues, and grow to the perfection of our vnderstanding; the last and seuenth to Saturne, wherein our dayes are sad and ouer-cast, and in which we find by deare and lamentable experience, & by the losse which can neuer be repaired, that of all our vaine passions and affections past, the sorrow only abideth: Our attendants are sicknesses, and variable infirmities, and by how much the more wee are accompanied with plentie, by so much the more greedily is our end desired, whom when Time hath made vnsociable to others, we become a burthen to our selues: being of no other vse, then to hold the riches we haue, from our Successors. In this time it is, when (as aforesaid) we, for the most part, and neuer before, prepare for our eternall habitation, which we passe on vnto, with many sighes, grones, and sad thoughts, and in the end, by the workmanship of death, finish the sorrowfull businesse of a wretched life, towards which wee alwaies trauel both sleeping and waking: neither haue those beloued companions of honour & riches any power at all, to hold vs any one day, by the glorious promise of entertainments; but by what crooked path soeuer we walk, the same leadeth on directly to the house of death: whose dores lye open at all houres, and to all persons. For this tyde of mans life, after it once turneth and declineth, euer runneth with a perpetuall Ebbe and falling Streame, but neuer floweth againe: our Lease once fallen, springeth no more,

neither doth the Sunne or the Summer adorne vs againe, with the garments of new Leaues and Flowers.

For if there were any bayting place, or rest, in the course or race of mans life, then, according to the doctrine of the Academicks, the same might also perpetually be maintained; but as there is a continuance of motion in naturall liuing things, and as the sap and iuyce, wherein the life of Plants is preserved, dotheuermore ascend or descend: so is it with the life of man, which is alwayes either increasing towards ripenesse and perfection, or declining and decreasing towards rottenesse and dissolution.

§. VI.

Of the free power, which man had in his first Creation, to dispose of himselfe.

Here be the miseries which our first Parents brought on all Mankind, vnto whom God in his creation gaue a free and vnconstrayned will, and on whom he bestowed the liberall choice of all things, with one only prohibition, to try his gratitude and obedience. God set before him, a mortall and immortall Life; a nature celestiall and terrene, and (indeed) God gaue man to himselfe, to bee his owne guide, his owne Workeman, and his owne Painter, that hee might frame or describe vnto himselfe what hee pleased, and make election of his owne forme. God made man in the beginning (saith SIRACIDES) and left him in the hands of his owne counsaile. Such was the liberalltie of God, and mans felicitie: whereas beasts, and all other creatures reasonlesse, brought with them into the World (saith Lucilius) and that euen when they first fell from the bodies of their Dams, the nature, which they could not change, and the supernall Spirits or Angels were from the beginning, or soone after, of that condition, in which they remaine in perpetuall eternitie. But (as aforesaid) God gaue vnto man all kind of Seeds and Grafts of life (to wit) the vegetatiue life of Plants, the sensuall of Beasts, the rationall of Man, and the intellectuall of Angels; whereof which soeuer he tooke pleasure to plant and cultiue, the same should surely grow in him, and bring forth fruit, agreeable to his owne choice and plantation. This freedome of the first man Adam, and our first Father, was enigmatically described by Aesclepius Atheniensis (saith Atirandula) in the person and Fable of Proteus, who was said, as often as he pleased, to change his shape. To the same end were all those celebrated Metamorphoses among the Pythagorians, and ancient Poets, wherein it was shewed, that men were transformed into diuers shapes of beasts, thereby to shew the change of mens conditions, from Reason to Brutalltie, from Vertue to Vice, from Meeknesse to Crueltie, and from Iustice to Oppression. For by the liuely Image of other creatures did those Ancients represent the variable passions, and affections of mortall men; as by Serpents were signified Deceitners; by Lyons, Oppressors, and cruell men; by Swine, Men giuen ouer to lust and sensuality; by Wolves, rauening, and greedie Men; which also S. Matthew resemblith to false prophets, Which come to you in sheepes clothing, but inwardly they are rauening Wolves: by the images of Stones and stockes, foolish and ignorant men; by Vipers, vngratefull men: of which S. Iohn Baptist, O ye generation of Vipers, &c.

Of Gods ceasing to create any more: and of the cause thereof, because the Vniuersall created was exceeding good.

Iohn 5. 17.

Gen. 1. 28.
22. 24.

IN this worke of Man, God finished the Creation; not that God laboured as a man, and therefore rested: for God commanded, and it was finished, Cui voluisse est fecisse: With whom, to will is to make, saith Beda. Neither did God so rest, that he left the World made, and the creatures therein to themselves: for my Father worketh to this day (saith Christ) and I worke; but God rested (that is) he created no new species or kinds of creatures, (but as afore-said) gaue vnto man a power generatiue, and so to the rest of liuing creatures, and to Plants and Flowers their seeds in themselves; and commanded man to multiply and fill the Earth, and the Earth and Sea to bring forth creatures according to their severall kinds: all which being finished, God saw that his works were good; not that he fore-knew not, and comprehended not the beginning and end before they were; for God made euery Plant of the field before it was in the Earth, but he gaue to all things which he had created the name of good, thereby to reach men, that from so good a God there was nothing made, but that which was perfect good; and from whose simple puritie and from so excellent a cause, there could proceed no impure or imperfect effect. For man hauing a free will and liberall choice, purchased by disobedience his owne death and mortalitie, and for the crueltie of mans heart, was the Earth afterward cursed, and all creatures of the first Age destroyed: but the righteous man Noah and his Family, with those creatures which the Arke contained, referred by God to replenish the Earth.

CHAP. III.

Of the place of Paradise.

¶ I.

That the seat of Paradise is greatly mistaken: and that it is no maruell that men should erre.

CONCERNING the first Habitation of man we reade, that the Lord God planted a Garden, Eastward, in Eden, and there he put the man whom he made, GEN. 2. 6. Of this seat and place of Paradise, all Ages haue held dispute; and the opinions and iudgements haue bene in effect, as diuers, among those that haue written vpon this part of Genesis, as vpon any one place therein, seeming most obscure: some there are, that haue conceived the being of the terrestriall Paradise, without all regard of the Worlds Geographie, and without any respect of East and West, or any consideration of the place where Moses wrote, and from whence he directed (by the quarters of the Heauens) the way how to find out and iudge, in what Region of the World this Garden was by God planted, wherein hee was exceeding respectiue and precise. Others, by being themselves ignorant in the Hebrew, followed the first Interpretation, or trusting to their owne iudgements, vnderstood one place for another; and one Errour is so fruitfull, as it begetteth a thousand Children, if the licentiousness thereof bee not timely restrayned. And thirdly, those Writers which gaue themselves to follow and imitate others, were in all things so obseruant Seētators of those Masters, whom they admired and beleueed in, as they thought it safer to condemne their owne vnderstanding, then to examine theirs. For (saith Vadianus in his Epistle of Paradise) Magnos errores (magnorum virorum auctoritate persuasi) transmittimus; Wee passe ouer many grosse errors, by the authoritie of great men led and perswaded. And it is true, that many of the Fathers were farre wide from the vnderstanding of this place. I speake it not, that I my selfe dare presume to censure them, for I reuerence both their Learning and their Pietie, and yet not bound to follow them any further, then they are guided by truth: for they were men; Et humanum est errare. And to the end that no man should bee proude of himselfe, God hath distributed vnto men such a proportion of Knowledge, as the wisest may behold in themselves their owne weakenesse:

Nulli

Nulli unquam dedit omnia Deus; God neuer gaue the knowledge of all things to any one. S. Paul confest that he knew not, whether he were taken vp into the third heauen in the flesh, or out of the flesh; and Christ himselfe acknowledgeth thus much, that neither Men, nor Angels knew of the latter day; and therefore, seeing knowledge is infinite, it is God (according to S. Iude) who is only wise. Sapientia ubi inuenitur? (saith Iob) but where is wisdom found? and where is the place of vnderstanding? man knoweth not the price thereof, for it is not found in the Land of the liuing. And therefore seeing God found folly in his Angels, mens iudgements (which inhabite in houses of clay) cannot be without their mistakings: and so the Fathers, and other learned men excusable in particulars, especially in those whereupon our saluation dependeth not.

¶ II.

A recitall of strange opinions, touching Paradise.

NOW touching Paradise, first it is to be inquired, whether there were a Paradise, or no? or whether Moses description were altogether mysticall, & allegoricall? as Origen, Philo, Fran. Georgius, with others haue affirmed, and that vnder the names of those foure Riuer, Pison, Gehon, Hidekel, and Perath, the tree of life, and the tree of Knowledge, there were deliuered vnto vs other mysteries and significations; as, that by the foure Riuer were meant the foure Cardinall vertues, Iustice, Temperance, Fortitude, and Prudence, or (by other) Oyle, Wine, Milke, and Honny. This Allegoricall vnderstanding of Paradise by Origen diuulged, was againe by Francisus Georgius receiued (saith Sixtus Senensis) whose friuolous imaginations Sixtus himselfe doth fully and learnedly answere, in the 34. Annotation of his fift Booke. fol. 338. the last Edition.

S. Ambrose also leaned wholly to the Allegoricall construction, and set Paradise in the third Heauen, and in the vertues of the mind, & in nostro principali, which is, as I conceiue it, in mente, or in our soules: to the particulars whereof he alludeth in this sort. By the place or garden of Paradise, was meant the soule or mind; by Adam, Mens, or Vnderstanding; by Eue, the Sense; by the Serpent, Delectation; by the Tree of good and euill, Sapience; and by the rest of the Trees, the vertues of the minde, or in the minde planted, or from thence springing. Notwithstanding all which, vpon the first of the Corinth. cap. 6. he in direct words alloweth both of a celestially and terrestriall Paradise; the one, into which S. Paul was rapt; the other, into which Adam was put by God. Aug. Chrysostomus was of opinion, that a Paradise had bene, but that there was not now any marke thereof on the earth: the same being not only defaced, but with all the places now not so much as existing. To which Luther seemeth to adhere.

The Manichees also vnderstood, that by Paradise was meant the whole Earth; to which opinion, Vadianus inclineth, as I conceiue his words in two severall places. First, vpon this: Fill the earth, GEN. 10. Of which he giueth this iudgement. Hoc ipso etiam quod dixit, Replete terram, dominamini vniuersis animantibus, subijcite terram, clarissime docet, totam terram extantem, & omnigenis (ut sum erat) fructibus constam, sedem & hortum illum Adæ, & posteritatis future fuisse; These words (saith he) in which God said, Bring forth fruit and multiplie, and fill the earth, and subdue it and rule ouer every creature, doe cleerely shew, that the Vniuersall earth set or filled with all sorts of fruits (as then it was) was the garden and seat of ADAM, and of his future posteritie. And afterward he acknowledgeth the place, out of the Acts the 17. Apostolus ex vno sanguine omne genus humanum adeo factum docet, ut habitarent super vniuersam faciem terre: tota igitur terra Paradisus ille erat; The Apostle (saith he) teacheth, that God hath made of one blood all mankind, to dwell ouer all the face of the earth: and therefore all the earth (saith hee) was that Paradise. Which coniectures I will answere in order. Goropius Becanus differeth not much from this opinion, but yet he acknowledgeth that Adam was first planted by God in one certaine place, and peculiar Garden; which place Goropius findeth neere the Riuer of Acesines, in the confines of India.

Tertullian, Bonauenture, and Durandus, make Paradise vnder the Equinoctiall, and Possellus, quite contrarie, vnder the North pole: the Chaldeans also for the most part, and all their Seētators, followed the opinion of Origen, or rather Origen theirs, who would either make Paradise a figure, or Sacrament only, or else would haue it seated out of this sensible word, or rayised into some high and remote Region of the Aire. Strabus, and Rabanus, were both sicke of this vanitie, with Origen, and Philo: so was our venerable Beda, and Pet. Comestor, and Moses Barcephas the Syrian, translated by Masius. But as Hopkins sayes of Philo Indeus, that he wondred, Quo male genio afflatus; By what euill Angell he was blowne up into this error: so can I not but greatly maruaile at the learned men, who so grossly and blindly wandred; seeing Moses, and after him the Prophets, doe so plainly describe this place, by the Region in which it was planted, by the Kingdoms and Prouinces bordering it, by the Riuer which watered it, and by the points of the Compasse vpon which it lay, in respect of Iudea, or Canaan.

Nonimagus also, vpon Beda, De natura rerum, beleueeth that all the earth was taken for Paradise, and not any one place. For the whole earth (saith he) hath the same beautie adscribed to Paradise. He addeth, that the Ocean was that Fountaine, from whence the foure Riuer, Pison, Gebon, Tigris, and Euphrates, had their beginning: for he could not thinke it possible, that these Riuer of Ganges, Nilus, Tigris, and Euphrates, (whereof the one ranne through India, the other through Aegypt, and the other through Mesopotamia and Armenia) could rise out of one Fountaine, were it not out of the Fountaine of the Ocean.

§. III.

That there was a true locall Paradise Eastward, in the Countrie of Eden.

Gen. cap. 2.

TO the first therefore, that such a place there was vpon the earth, the words of Moses make it manifest, where it is written, And the Lord God planted a garden Eastward in Eden, and there he put the man whom he had made. And howsoever the vulgar translation, called Hieromes translation, hath conuerted this place thus, Plantauerat Dominus Deus Paradisum voluptatis à principio; The Lord God planted a Paradise of pleasure from the beginning; putting the word (pleasure) for Eden, and (from the beginning) for Eastward: It is manifest, that in this place Eden is the proper name of a Region. For what sense hath this translation (saith our Hopkins, in his Treatise of Paradise) that he planted a garden in pleasure, or that a Riuer went out of pleasure to water the garden? But the seuentie Interpreters call it Paradisum Edenis, the Paradise of Eden, and so doth the Chaldean Paraphrast truly take it for the proper name of a place, & for a Noune appellative; which Region, in respect of the fertilitie of the soile, of the many beautifull Riuer, and goodly Woods, and that the trees (as in the Indies) doe alwaies keepe their leaues, was called Eden, which signifieth in the Hebrew, pleasantnesse or delicacie, as the Spaniards call the Countrie, opposite to the Ile of Cuba, Florida: and this is the mistaking, which may end the dispute, as touching the double sense of the word, that as Florida was a Countrie, so called for the flourishing beautie thereof, so was Eden a Region called pleasure, or delicacie, for the pleasure, or delicacie: and as Florida signifieth flourishing: so Eden signifieth pleasure, & yet both are the proper names of Countries; for Eden being the proper name of a Region (called pleasure in the Hebrew) and Paradise being the choice seate of all that Region, Paradise was truly the Garden of Eden, and truly the Garden of Pleasure.

Now, for Eastward, to translate it, from the beginning, it is also contrarie to the translation of the Seuentie; to the ancient Grecke Fathers, as Basil. Chrysostome, Theodoret, Gregorie; and to the Rabines, as Ramban, Rabbi Salomon, R. Avraham, and Chimchi; and of the Latines, Seuerinus, Damasceus &c. who plainly take Eden for the proper name of a Region, and set the word (Eastward) for ab initio: for Damasceus owne words are these, Paradisus est locus Dei manibus in Eden ad Orientem mirabiliter confusus; Paradise is a place, maruailously planted by the hands of God, in Eden, toward the East.

And after all these Fathers, Guilhelmus Parisiensis, a great learned man, and Sixtus Senensis, of later times, doe both vnderstand these words of Eden, and of the East, contrarie to the vulgar translation; Parisensis, as indifferent to both, and Sixtus Senensis, directly against the vulgar: of which these are their owne words: After this I will begin to speake of Paradise terrestriall, which God planted from the beginning, or Eastward, &c. Post hec incipiam loqui de Paradiso terrestri, quem plantasse Deum ab initio vel ad Orientem, &c. And then Senensis; Moses enim clarissime prodit, Paradisum à Deo constitum in regione terra Orientalis, quæ dicitur Heden: Heden autem esse proprium nomen apparet ex quarto capite Gen. ubi legimus CHAM habitasse ad Orientalem plagam Heden; For Moses (saith (saith he) doth shew most cleerely, that Paradise was planted of God in a Region of the East Countrie, which is called Heden: but that Heden is a proper name, it appeareth by the fourth Chapter of Genesis, where we read, that CHAM dwelt on the East border of Heden. PERE- RIVS endeouureth to qualifie this translation: for this particule (saith he) ab initio, is referred to all the time of the creation, and not to the very first day; alleging this place of Christ that although the Deuill was said to be a man-slayer from the beginning, yet that was meant but after the sixth day. But surely, as I thinke (referring my selfe to better iudgement) the Deuill was from the instant of his fall a man-slayer in disposition, though he had not whereon to practise till mans creation. And for conclusion, S. Hierome (if that be his translation) aduiseeth himselfe better in the end of the third Chapter of Genesis, conuerting the word (Eden) by (ante) and not (à principio) as, God did set a Cherubin before the Garden of Eden; Collocauit Deus ante Paradisum voluptatis Cherubin; and Pererius himselfe acknowledgeth, that this is the true sense of this place, precisely taken, according to the Hebrew. Posuit à parie Orientali horis Heden, Cherubin; He set on the East-side of the Garden of Heden, Cherubin. BECANVS affirmeth, that the Hebrew word (Be) signifieth (with) as well as (in) and so the Text beareth this sense; That God planted a Garden with pleasure (that is to say) full of pleasure. But Becanus followeth this construction, onely to the end, to find Paradise vpon the Riuer of Acissines: for there he hath heard of the Indian Fig-tree in great abundance, which he supposeth to be the tree of Knowledge of good, and euill, and would therefore draw Paradise to the Fig-tree: which conceit of his I will answer hereafter.

Now, because Paradise was seated by Moses toward the East, thence came the custome of praying towards the East, and not by imitation of the Chaldeans: and therefore all our Churches are built East and West, as to the point where the Sunne riseth in March, which is directly ouer Paradise (saith Damasceus;) affirming, that we alwayes pray towards the East, as looking towards Paradise, whence we were cast out; and yet the Temple of Salomon had their Priests and Sacrifices, which turned them selues in their seruice and diuine ceremonies, alwayes towards the West, thereby to auoid the superstition of the Egyptians and Chaldeans.

But because East and West are but in respect of places; (for although Paradise were East from Iudea, yet it was West from Persia) and the seruing of God is euery where in the world, the matter is not great which way we turne our faces, so our hearts stand right, other than this, that we who dwell west from Paradise, and pray turning our selues towards the East, may remember thereby to beseech God, that as by Adams fall we haue lost the Paradise on Earth: so by Christs death and passion wee may bee made partakers of the Paradise celestia, & the Kingdom of Heauen. To conclude, I conceiue, that there was no other myserie in adding the word (East) to Eden by Moses, then to shew, that the Region of Eden; in which Paradise was, lay Eastward from Iudea and Canaan: for the Scriptures alwayes called the people of those Nations, the Sonnes of the East, which inhabited Arabia, Mesopotamia, Chaldea, and Persia: of which Ouid:

Eurus ad Auroram, Nabataeq; regna recessit, The East wind with Aurora hath abiding Persidaq; & radijs iuga subdita matutinis. Among th' Arabian, and the Persian Hills, Whom Phœbus first salutes at his vp-rising.

And if it be objected, that Hieremie the Prophet threatening the destruction of Hierusalem, doth often make mention of Northerne Nations, it is to be noted, that the North is there named, in respect of those nations that followed Nabuchodonosor, and of whom the greatest part of his Armie was compounded; not that Babylon it selfe stood North from Hierusalem, though inclining from the East towards the North.

Now to the difference of this Translation, Peter Comestor giueth best satisfaction: for he vseth the word, From the beginning, that is, from the first part of the World, (à principio) id est (saith he) à prima orbis parte, and afterward he affirmeth, that (à principio, and ad Orientem) haue the same signification; From the beginning & Eastward is all one, à principio idem est quod ad Orientem.

But to returne to the prooff of this place, and that this Story of Mankind was not Allegoricall, it followeth in the Text of the 1. Chap. & 9. Vers. in these words: For out of the ground made the Lord God to grow euery Tree pleasant to the sight, & good for meat, &c. so as first it appeared that God created Adam elsewhere, as in the World at large, & then, put him into the Garden: and the end why, is exprest: that he might dresse it & keepe

Verse 18. keepe it; Paradise being a Garden or Orchard filled with Plants, and Trees, of the most excellent kinds, pleasant to behold, and (withall) good for meate: which proueth that Paradise was a terrestiall Garden, garnished with Fruits, delighting both the eye and taste. And to make it more plaine, and to take away all opinion of Allegoricall construction, he affirmeth that it was watered and beautified with a Riuer, expressing also the Region, out of which this Riuer sprang, which hee calleth Heden; and that Verse 10. Heden is also a Countrey neere vnto Charan in Mesopotamia, Ezechiel witnesseth. But to all these Cabalists, which draw the Truth and Story of the Scriptures into Allegories, Epiphanius answereth in these words: Si Paradisus non est sensibilis, non est etiam fons, si non est fons, non est flumen, si non est flumen, non sunt quatuor principia, non Pison, non Gehon, non Tigris, nec Euphrates, non est ficus, non folia, non comedit Eva de arbore, non est Adam, non sunt homines, sed veritas iam fabula est, & omnia ad Allegorias reuocantur: If Paradise be not sensible, then there was no fontaine, and then no Riuer, if no Riuer, then no such foure heads or branches, and then not any such Riuer as Pison, or Gehon, Tigris, or Euphrates, no such Fig-tree, or fruit, or leaues. Eve then did not eate of the fruit, neither was there any Adam, or any man, the truth was but a Fable, and all things seemed are called backe into Allegories. Words to the same effect hath S. Hierome vpon Daniel: Conticescant eorum deliramenta, qui umbras & imagines in veritate sequentes, ipsam conantur euertere veritatem, ut Paradisum & flumina, & arbores putent Allegoria Legibus se debere subruere, Let the dotage of them be silent, who following shadowes and Images in the Truth, endeavour to subvert the Truth it selfe, and thinke that they ought to bring Paradise, and the Riuer, and the Trees vnder the rules of Allegorie.

Ezech. 31. 9.

Furthermore, by the continuation and order of the Storie is the place made more manifest. For God gaue Adam free libertie to eate of euery Tree of the Garden, (the Tree of knowledge excepted) which Trees Moses in the ninth verse saith that they were good to eate; meaning the fruit which they bare. Besides, God left all beasts to Adam to be named, which he had formerly made; and these beasts were neither in the third Heauen, nor neere the Circle of the Moone, nor beasts in imagination: for if all these things were EnigmatiCALL or MySTICALL, the same might also be said of the creation of all things. And Ezechiel speaking of the glory of the Assyrian Kings vseth this speech: *All the Trees of Eden, which were in the Garden of God, enuied him, which proueth both Eden, and Paradise therein seated to be terrestiall: for the Prophets made no imaginary comparisons. But Moses wrote plainly, and in a simple stile, fit for the capacities of ignorant men, and he was more large and precise in the description of Paradise, then in any other place of Scripture; of purpose to take away all scruple from the incredulitie of future ages, whom he knew (out of the gift of Prophecie) to be apt to fabulous inuentions, and that if he had not described both the Region and the Riuer, and how it stood from Canaan, many of the vnbeleeuing Israelites and others after them, would haue misconstrued this Storie of Mankind. And is it likely, there would haue beene so often mention made of Paradise in the Scriptures; if the same had beene an Vtopia? For we find that the Valley, wherein Sodome and Gomorrha stood, (sometimes called Pentapolis, of the fiue principall Cities therein) was before the destruction (which their vnnaturall sinne purchased) compared to the Paradise of the Lord, and like to the Land of Egypt toward Zoar; In like manner was Israel resembled to the Paradise of God, before the Babylonians wasted it: which proueth plainly, that Paradise it selfe exceeded in beautie and fertilitie, and that these places had but a resemblance thereof: being compared to a seat and foyle of farre exceeding excellencie.*

Gen. 13. 10.

Besides, whence had Homer his inuention of Alcinous Gardens, as Insin Martyr noteth, but out of Moses his description of Paradise? Gen. 2. and whence are their prayes of the Elizian fields, but out of the Storie of Paradise? to which also appertaine those Verses of the Golden Age in Ouid:

Ouid. Metam. 1.

Ver erat aeternum, placidiq; tepentibus auris Mulcebant Zephyrinatos sine semine flores.

The ioyfull spring did euer last, | Sweete flowers by his gentle blast,
And Zephyrus did breede | Without the helpe of seed.

And it is manifest, that Orpheus, Linus, Pindarus, Hesiodus, and Homer, and after him, Ouid, one out of another, and all these together with Pythagoras and Plato, and their Secta-

Sectatours, did greatly enrich their inuentions, by venting the stolne Treasures of Diuine Letters, altered by prophane additions, and disguised by poetiCALL conuerfions, as if they had bin conceiued out of their owne speculations and contemplations.

But besides all these testimonies, if we finde what Region Heden or Eden was; if we proue the Riuer that ran out of it, and that the same afterwards was diuided into foure branches; together with the Kingdomes of Hauila and Cush, & that all these are Eastward from Canaan, or the Deserts of the Amorites, where Moses wrote, I then conceiue, that there is no man that will doubt, but that such a place there was. And yet I do not exclude the Allegoricall sense of the Scripture; for aswell in this there were many figures of Christ, as in all the old Testament throughout: the Storie being directly true notwithstanding. And to this purpose (saith Saint Augustine) Tres sunt de Paradiso generales sententiae: una est eorum, qui tantummodo corporaliter Paradisum intelligunt: alia eorum, qui spiritualiter tantum (id est) Ecclesiam: tertia eorum, qui utroque modo Paradisum accipiunt, (that is) There are three opinions of Paradise: the one of those men, which will haue it alsogether corporall: a second of those which conceiue it altogether spirituall, and to be a figure of the Church: the third of those, which take it in both senses; which third opinion S. Augustine approveth, and of which Suidas giueth this allowable iudgement: Quemadmodum homo sensibilis, & intelligibilis simul conditus erat: sic & huius sanctissimum nemus, sensibile simul & intelligibile, & duplici specie est pradium, (that is) As man was created at one time both sensible and intelligible: so was this holy Grove or Garden to be taken both wayes, and endued with a double forme.

¶ IV.

Why it should be needfull to intreat diligently of the place of Paradise.

But it may be obiected, that it is needlesse, and a kind of curiositie to enquire so diligently after this place of Paradise, and that the knowledge thereof is of little or no vse. To which I answer, that there is nothing written in the Scripture, but for our instruction; and if the truth of the Storie be necessarie, then by the place proued, the same is also made more apparent. For if wee should conceiue that Paradise were not on the Earth, but lifted vp as high as the Moone; or that it were beyond all the Ocean, and in no part of the knowne World, from whence Adam was said to wade through the Sea, and thence to haue come into Iudea, (out of doubt) there would be few men in the World, that would giue any credit vnto it. For what could seeme more ridiculous then the report of such a place? and besides, what maketh this seat of Paradise so much disputed and doubted of, but the conceit that Pishon should be Ganges, which watereth the East India, and Gehon, Nilus, which enricheth Egypt, and these two Riuer so farre distant, as (except all the World were Paradise) these streames can no way be comprized therein?

Secondly, if the birth and workes, and death of our Sauour, were said to haue beene in some such Countrey, of which no man euer heard tell, and that his Miracles had bin performed in the Ayre, or no place certainly knowne: I assure my selfe, that the Christian Religion would haue taken but a slender roote in the mindes of men: for times and places are approued witness of worldly actions.

Thirdly, if we should rely, or giue place to the iudgement of some Writers vpon this place of Genesis (though otherwise for their doctrine in general, they are worthy of honour & reuerence) I say that there is no fable among the Grecians or Egyptians more ridiculous: for who would beleue that there were a piece of the World so set by it selfe & separated, as to hang in the Ayre vnder the circle of the Moone? or who so doltish to conceiue, that from thence the foure riuer of Ganges, Nilus, Euphrates, and Tigris, should fall downe, and run vnder all the Ocean, & rise vp againe in this our habitable world, & in those places where they are now found? Which left any man think, that I enforce or straine to the worst, these are Peter Comestors own words. Est autē locus amantissimus, longo terre & maris tractu à nostra habitabili Zona secretus, adeo eleuatus, ut vsq; ad lunare globū attingat, &c. (that is) It is a most pleasur place, severed ffrom our habitable Zone by a long tract of Land and Sea, eleuated so, that it reacheth to the Globe of the Moone.

And Moses Barcephas vpon this place writeth in this maner: Deinde hoc quoq; responsū volumus, Paradisū multo sublimiore positum esse regione, atq; hac nostra extet terra, eoq; fieri

Bar. conuer-
ted by Masius.
v.

ut illius per precipitum delabantur fluij tanto cum impetu, quantum verbis exprimere non possis; eoz impetu impulsu pressu, sub Oceani vado rapiuntur, unde rursus profiliant ebulliantq; in hoc à nobis culto orbe: which haue this sense: Furthermore. (saith he) we giue this for an answer, that Paradise is set in a Region farre raised above this part which we inhabit; whereby it comes to passe, that from thence these Riueres fall downe with such a headlong violence, as words cannot expresse; and with that force so impulsed and prest, they are carried vnder the deepe Ocean, and doe againe rise and boyle vp in this our habitable World: and to this he addeth the opinion of Ephrazm, which is this. Ephrazm dicit Paradisum ambire terram, atq; ultra Oceanu ita positum esse, ut totius terrarū orbem ab omni circumdet regione, non aliter atq; Lune orbis Lunā cingit, (which is) That Paradise doth compass or embrace the whole Earth, and is so set beyond the Ocean Sea, as it enuironeth the whole Orbe of the Earth on euery side, as the Orbe of the Moone doth embrace the Moone. To the end therefore that these ridiculous expositions and opinions doe not bring question vnto Truth it selfe, or make the same subiect to doubts or disputes, it is necessarie to discover the true place of Paradise, which God in his wisdom appointed in the very Navel of this our World, and (as Melancthon saies) in parte terre meliore, in the best part thereof, that from thence, as from a Centre, the Vniuersal might be filled with people and planted; and by knowing this place, we shall the better iudge of the beginning of Nations, & of the worlds inhabitation: for neere vnto this did the Sons of Noah also disperse themselves after the flood, into all other remote regions & countries. And if it be a generous desire in men, to know from whence their owne forefathers haue come, & out of what regions and Nations, it cannot be displeasing to vnderstand the place of our first Ancestor, from whence all the streames & branches of Mankind haue followed & bin deduced. If then it doe appeare by the former, that such a place there was as Paradise, and that the knowledge of this place cannot be vnprofitable, it followeth in order to examine several opinions before remembred, by the Truth it selfe; & to see how they agree with the sense of the Scripture, and with common reason, and afterward to proue directly, and to delineate the Region in which God first planted this delightfull Garden.

§. V.

That the Flood hath not vterly defaced the markes of Paradise, nor caused Hills in the Earth.

And first, whereas it is supposed by Aug. Chrysostomus, that the Flood hath altered, deformed, or rather annihilated this place, in such sort, as no man can finde any marke or memorie thereof: (of which opinion there were others also, attributing to the Flood the cause of those high Mountaines, which are found on all the Earth ouer, with many other strange effects) for mine owne opinion, I thinke neither the one nor the other to be true. For although I cannot denie, but that the face of Paradise was after the Flood withered, and growne old, in respect of the first beautie: (for both the ages of men, and the nature of all things Time hath changed) yet if there had beene no signe of any such place, or if the soile and seate had not remayned, then would not Moses, who wrote of Paradise about 350. yeares after the Flood, haue described it so particularly, and the Prophets long after Moses would not haue made so often mention thereof. And though the verie Garden it selfe were not then to be found, but that the Flood, and other accidents of time made it one common field and pasture with the Land of Eden, yet the place is still the same, and the Riueres still remaine the same Riueres. By two of which (neuer doubted of) to wit, Tigris, and Euphrates, we are sure to finde in what longitude Paradise lay: & learning out one of these Riueres, which afterward doth diuide it selfe into foure branches, we are sure that the partition is at the very border of the Garden it selfe. For it is written, that out of Eden went a Riuer to water the Garden, and from thence it was diuided and became into foure heads: Now whether the word in the Latine Translation (Inde) from thence, be referred to Eden it selfe, or to Paradise, yet the diuision & branching of those riueres must be in the North or South side of the very Garden (if the riueres run as they doe, North & South) & therefore these riueres yet remaining, & Eden manifestly known, there could be no such defacing by the flood, as is supposed. Furthermore, as there is no likelihood, that the place could be so altered as future ages know it not, so is there no probability, that eyther these Riueres were turned out of their courses, or new Riueres created by the Flood which were not, or that the Flood (as aforesaid) by a violent motion, when it began to decrease, was the cause of high Hills, or deepe Vallies. For what descent of waters could there be in a Sphericall and round bodie, wherein there is nor high nor low? seeing that all violent force of waters is eyther by the strength of winde, by descent from a higher to a lower, or by the ebbe or flood of the Sea. But that there was any winde (whereby the Seas are most intraged) it appeareth not, rather the contrarie is probable: for it is written, Therefore God made a winde to passe upon the Earth, and the waters ceased. So as it appeareth not, that, vntill the waters sanke, there was any wind at all, but that God afterward, out of his goodnesse, caused the wind to blow, to drye vp the abundant slime and mudd of the Earth, and make the Land more firme, and to cleanse the Ayre of thicke vapours, and vnwholsome mists; and this we know by experience, that all downe-right raines doe euermore disfigure the violence of outrageous windes, and beat downe, and leuell the swelling and mountainous billow of the Sea: for any ebbs and floods there could be none, when the waters were equall and of one height ouer all the face of the Earth, and when there were no Indraughts, Bayes, or Gulfs to receiue a Flood, or any descent, or violent falling of waters in the round forme of the Earth and Waters, as aforesaid: and therefore it seemeth most agreeable to reason, that the waters rather stood in a quiet calme, then that they moved with any ragging or ouer-bearing violence. And for a more direct proofe that the Flood made no such destroying alteration, Ioseph auoweth that one of those pillars erected by Seth, the third from Adam, was to be seene in his dayes, which Pillars were set vp about 1426. yeares before the Flood, counting Seth to be an hundred yeares old at the creation of them; and Ioseph himselfe, to haue liued some fortie or fiftie yeares after Christ: of whom although there be no cause to beleue all that he wrote, yet that, which hee auouched of his owne time, cannot (without great derogation) bee called in question. And therefore it may be possible, that some foundation or ruine thereof might then be seene. Now that such Pillars were raised by Seth, all Antiquitie hath auowed. It is also written in Berosus (to whom although I giue little credit, yet I cannot condemne him in all) that the Citie of Enoch, built by Cain, about the Mountaines of Libanus, was not defaced by length of time: yea the ruines therof Annius (who commented vpon that inuented Fragment) saith, were to be seene in his daies, who liued in the Reigne of Ferdinand and Isabella of Castile; and if these his words be not true, then was he exceeding impudent. For, speaking of this Citie of Enoch, he concludeth in this sort: Cuius maxima & ingentis molis fundamenta visuntur, & vocatur ab incolis regionis, Ciuitas Cain, ut nostri mercatores, & peregrini referunt; The foundation of which huge Masse is now to be seene, and the place is called by the people of that Region, the City of Cain, as both our strangers and Merchants report. It is also auowed by Pomponius Mela, (to whom I giue more credit in these things) that the Citie of Ioppa was built before the Flood, ouer which Ce-pha was King: whose name with his Brother Phineus, together with the grounds and principles of their Religion, was found grauen vpon certaine Altars of stone; and it is not vnpossible, that the ruines of this other Citie, called Enoch by Annius, might bee seene, though founded in the first Age: but it could not be of the first City of the world, built by Cain, the place, rather then the time, denying it.

Gen. 2. 10.

Gen. 4. 17.

And to proue directly, that the flood was not the cause of Mountaines, but that there were Mountaines from the Creation, it is written, that the waters of the flood ouerflowed by fiftene Cubits the highest Mountaines. And Masius Damasceus (speaking of the Flood, writeth in this manner: Est supra Minyadam excelsus mons in Armenia (qui Baris appellatur) in quo confugientes multos sermo est diluuij tempore liberatos, And vpon Minyada there is an high Mountaine, in Armenia (called Baris) vnto which (as it is said) that many fled in the time of the Deluge, and that they saued themselves thereon. Now although it is contrary to Gods Word, that any more were saued then eight persons (which Masius doth not auouch, but by report) yet it is a testimonie, that such Mountaines were before the Flood, which were afterwards, and euer since, knowne by the same names; & on which Mountaines it is generally receiued that the Arke rested: but vntruly, as I shall proue hereafter. And againe it appeareth, that the Mount Sion (though by another name) was knowne before the Flood: on which the Talmudists report, that many Giants saued themselves also; but (as Annius saith) without all authoritie, either Diuine or Humane. Lastly,

Gen. 3. 11.

Lastly, it appeareth that the Floud did not so turne vpside-downe the face of the Earth, as thereby it was made past knowledge, after the waters were decreased, by this that when No<sup>a</sup> sent out the Dove the second time, she returned with an Olive-leaf in her mouth, which she had pluckt, and which (vntill the Trees were discovered) she found not: for otherwise she might haue found them floating on the water; a manifest prooffe, that the Trees were not torne vp by the rootes, nor swamme vpon the waters, for it is written: folium Oliue, raptum or decerptum, a leafe pluckt, (which is) to take from a Tree, or to tear off. By this it is apparent, (there being nothing written to the contrary) that the Floud made no such alteration, as was supposed, but that the place of Paradise might be seene to succeeding Ages, especially vnto Moses, by whom it pleased God to teach the truth of the Worlds Creation; and vnto the Prophets which succeeded him: both which I take for my warrant, and to guide me in this Discouerie.

§. VI.

That Paradise was not the whole Earth, as some haue thought: making the Ocean to be the fountaine of those foure Riuer.

Gen. 1. 28.
Ab. 17. 26.

3. 24

His conceit of Aug. Chrysamensis being answered, who onely giueth his opinion for reason, I wil in a few words examine that of the Manichees, of Noniomagus, Vadianus, Goropius Becanus, and all those that vnderstood, that by Paradise was meant the whole Earth. But in this I shall not trouble the Reader with many words, because by those places of Scripture formerly remembered, this Vniuersalitie will appeare altogether improper. The places which Vadianus alleageeth, Bring forth fruit and multiply, fill the Earth and subdue it, rule over euerie Creature, &c. with this of the Ab., and hath made of one bloud all Mankind, to dwell on all the face of the Earth, doe no way proue such a generalitie: for the World was made for man, of which hee was Lord and Gouvernor, and all things therein were ordained of God for his vse: Now although all men were of one and the same fountaine of bloud originally; and Adams Posteritie inhabited in proceffe of time ouer all the face of the Earth; yet it disproueth in nothing the particular Garden, assigned to Adam, to dresse and cultiue, in which hee liued in so blessed an estate before his transgression. For if there had beene no other choice, but that Adam had bin left to the Vniuersall; Moses would not then haue said, Eastward in Eden, seeing the World hath nor East nor West, but respectiue. And to what end had the Angell of God beene set to keepe the East-side, and entrance into Paradise after Adams expulsion, if the Vniuersall had beene Paradise? for then must Adam haue beene chased also out of the World. For if All the Earth were Paradise, that place can receiue no better construction then this, That Adam was driven out of the World into the World, and out of Paradise into Paradise, except we should beleue with Metziodorus, that there were infinite Worlds. Which to denie; he thinks all one, as to affirme, That in so large a field, as the Vniuersall, there should grow but one Thistle. Now IO-MACVS vpon Beda, seemeth to be led by this, that it was vnpossible for those three Riuer, Ganges, Nilus, and Euphrates (which water three portions of the World so farre distant) to rise out of one Fountaine, except the Ocean be taken for the Well, and the World for the Garden.

And it is true, that those foure Riuer, being so vnderstood, there could be no coniecture more probable; but it shall plainly appeare, that Pison was falsely taken for Ganges, and Gehon falsely for Nilus, although Ganges be a Riuer by Hatilah in India, and Nilus run through Ethiopia. The Seuentie write Chus for Ethiopia, and thereby the errors of the Manichees, and the mistakings of Noniomagus, Goropius, and Vadianus, with others, are made manifest. Yet was their coniecture farre more probable, then that of Ephrem, Cyrillus, and Athanasius: That Paradise was seated farre beyond the Ocean, so Sea, and that Adam waded through it, and at last came toward the Country in which he was created, and was buried at Mount Caluery in Hierusalem. And certainly, though all those of the first Age were of great stature, and so continued many yeares after the Floud, yet Adams shin-bones must haue contayned a thousand fadome, and much more, if he had foorded the Ocean; but this opinion is so ridiculous, as it needes no argument to disproue it.

§. VII.

§. VII.

Of their opinion, which make Paradise as high as the Moone: and of others, which make it higher than the middle Region of the Ayre.

Hirdly, whereas Beda saith, and as the Schoole-men affirme, Paradise to be a place, altogether removed from the knowledge of men (locus à cognitione hominum remotissimus) and Barcephus conceiued, that Paradise was farre in the East, but mounted aboue the Ocean, and all the Earth, and neere the Orbe of the Moone (which opinion, though the Schoole-men charge Beda withall, yet Peregrinus layes it off from Beda vpon Strabus, and his Master Rabanus;) and whereas Rupertus, in his Geographie of Paradise, doth not much differ from the rest, but findes it seated next or neerest heauen; It may seeme, that all these borrowed this doctrine out of Plato, and Plato out of Socrates; but neyther of them (as I conceiue) well vnderstood: who (vndoubtedly) tooke this place for Heauen it selfe, into which the Soules of the blessed were carried after death.

True it is, that these Philosophers durst not for feare of the Areopagites (in this and many other diuine apprehensions) set downe what they beleueed in plaine termes, especially Plato: though Socrates in the end suffered death, for acknowledging one onely powerfull God; and therefore did the Deuill himselfe doe him that right, as by an Oracle, to pronounce him the wisest man. Iustine Martyr affirmeth, that Plato had read the Scriptures; and S. Augustine gaue this iudgement of him, as his opinion, that (few things changed) he might be counted a Christian. And it seemeth to mee, that both Tertullian and Eusebius conceiue, that Socrates, by that place aforesaid, meant the celestiall Paradise, and not this of Eden. Solinus, I grant, reporteth, that there is a place exceeding delightfull and healthfull, vpon the top of Mount Asbo (called Acrothonos) which being aboue all Clouds of Raine, or other inconuenience, the people (by reason of their so many yeares) are called Macrobi (that is) Long-lived. A further Argument is vsed, for prooffe of the height of this place, because therein was Enoch preserved from the violence of the floud: approved by Isidore; and Peter Lombard; in which place also Tertullian conceiued, that the blessed Soules were preserved till the last iudgement; which Irenaeus, and Iustine Martyr also beleueed. But this opinion was of all Catholique Diuines reprobued, and in the Florentine Councell damned; of which Saint Augustine more modestly gaue this iudgement: Sicut certum est, ENOCH & ELIAS nunc viuere: ita ubi nunc sunt: an in Paradiso an alibi, incertum est; (that is) As it is certaine that ENOCH and ELIAS doe now liue: so where they now liue, in Paradise or elsewhere, it is vncertaine. But Barcephus giues a third cause, though of all other the weakest. For (saith he) it was necessarie that Paradise should be set at such a distance and height, because the foure Riuer (had they not fallen so precipitate) could not haue had sufficient force to haue thrust themselves vnder the great Ocean, and afterward haue forced their passage through the earth, and haue risen againe in the farre distant Regions of India, Egypt, and Armenia.

These strange fancies and dreames haue beene answered by diuers learned men long since, and lately by Hopkins, and Peregrinus, writing vpon this subiect; of whose arguments I will repeate these few: for to vse long discourse against those things, which are both against Scripture and Reason, might rightly be iudged a vanitie in the Answerer, not much inferior to that of the Inuenter.

It is first therefore alleaged, that such a place cannot be commodious to liue in: for being set so neere the Moone, it had beene too neere the Sunne, and other heauenty bodies. Secondly, because it must haue beene too ioynt a Neighbour to the Element of fire. Thirdly, because the ayre in that Region is so violently moued, and carried about with such swiftnesse, as nothing in that place can consist or haue abiding. Fourthly, because the place betwene the Earth and the Moone (according to Ptoleme and Alfraganus) is seuentene times the Diameter of the Earth, which makes a grosse account about one hundred and twentie thousand miles. Hereupon it must follow, that Paradise, being raised to this height, must haue the compasse of the whole earth for a Basis and foundation. But had it bin so raised, it could hardly be hidden from the knowledge, or eyes of men: seeing it would deprive vs of the Sunnes light, all the fore-part of the day, being seated in the East, as they suppose. Now, to fortifie the former opinions Tostatus addeth this, that those people which dwell neere those falls of waters, are deate from their infancie, like those which dwell neere the Catadupe, or ouer falls of Nilus. But this I hold as fained. For I haue seene in the Indies, far greater water-falls, than those of Nilus, and yet the people dwelling neere them, are not deafe at all. Tostatus (the better to strengthen himselfe) citeth Basil and Ambrose together: to which Pererius, Sed ego hac apud Basilium & Ambrosium in eorū scriptis, quæ nunc extant, nusquam legere memini; But I doe not remember (saith he) that I euer read those things, either in Basil or Ambrose.

2. Cor. 15. 56-57.

1. Pet. 3. 20.

But for the bodies of Enoch & Elias, God hath disposed of them according to his wisdom. Their taking vp might be into the celestiall Paradise, for ought we know. For although flesh and blood, subiect to corruption, cannot inherit the Kingdome of heauen, and the seed must rot in the ground before it grow, yet we shall not all die (saith S. Paul) but all shall be changed: which change, in Enoch & Elias, was easie to him that is Almighty. But for the rest, the Scriptures are manifest, that by the flood all perished on the earth, sauing eight persons, and therefore in the terrestriall Paradise they could not be.

Gen. 7. 19.

Exod. 14. 21.

For Tostatus his owne opinion, who soared not altogether so high as the rest, but beleued that Paradise was raised aboue the middle Region of the Aire, and twentie cubits aboue all Mountaines, that the flood did not therfore reach it: (which Scotus and other later Schoole-men also beleued; for, say they, there were no sinners in Paradise, and therefore no cause to ouerwhelme it:) this is also contrarie to the expresse letter of the Scripture: which directly, and without admitting of any distinction teacheth vs, that the waters ouer-flowed all the mountaines vnder heauen. And were it otherwise, then might we aswell giue credit to Masius, Damasenus, & the Talmudists, who affirme, that there were of the Giants that saued themselves on the Mountaine Baris, and on Sion. But to helpe this, Scotus, being (as the rest of the Schoolemen are) full of distinctions, saith; That the waters stood at Paradise, as they did in the Red Sea, and at Iordan; and as the flood was not naturall, so was Paradise saued by miracle. And Thomas Aquinas quali-fieth this high conceit with this supposition, That it was not beleued, that Paradise was so seated, as Beda and others seeme to affirme in words, but by Hyperbole and comparatively, for the delicacie and beaurie so resembled. But this I dare auow of all those Schoole-men, that though they were exceeding wittie, yet they better teach all their Followers to shift, then to resolute, by their distinctions. Wherefore not to stay long in answering this opinion of Tostatus, I confesse that it is written, that the Mountaines of Olympus, Atbo, and Atlas, ouer-reach and surmount all winds and clouds, and that (notwithstanding) there is found on the heads of the Hills both (springs and fruits; and the Pagan Priests, sacrificing on these mountaine tops, do not find the ashes (remaining of their sacrifices) blowe thence, nor thence washt off by raines, when they returne: yet experience hath resolued vs, that these reports are fabulous, and Plinie himselfe who was not sparing in the report of wonders) auoweth the contrarie. But were it granted, yet the height of these Mountaines is far vnder the supposed place of Paradise; and on these selfe Hills the ayre is so thinne (saith S. Augustine, whom herein I mistrust) that it is not sufficient to beare vp the body of a bird, hauing therein no feeling of her wings, or any sensible resistance of ayre to mount her selfe by.

§. VIII.

Of their opinion that seate Paradise vnder the Equinoctiall: and of the pleasant habitation vnder those Climats.

THose which come neerer vnto Reason, finde Paradise vnder the Equinoctiall line, as Tertullian, Bonauenture, and Durandus: iudging, that thereunder might be found most pleasure, and the greatest fertility of soile: but against it Thomas Aquinas obiection the distemperate heate, which he supposeth to be in all places so directly vnder the Sunne; but this is (non causa pro causa), for although Paradise could not bee vnder the Line, because Eden is farre from it, in which Paradise was; and because there is no part of Euphrates, Tigris, or Ganges vnder it, (Ganges being one of the foure riuers, as they suppose) yet this conceit of distemper, (being but an old opinion) is found to be very vntrue, though for the coniecture not to be condemned, considering the age when those Fathers wrote, grounded chiefly on this: that whereas it appeared, that euerie Countrie, as it lay by degrees neerer the Tropick, and so toward the Equinoctiall, did so much the more exceede in heat; It was therefore a reasonable coniecture, that those Countries which were situated directly vnder it, were of a distemper vnhabitable: but it seemeth that Tertullian conceiued better, and so did Auicenne, for they both thought them habitable enough; and though (perchance) in those daies it might be thought a fantastick opinion (as all are which goe against the vulgar) yet we now find, that if there be any place vpon the earth of that nature, beaurie, and delight, that Paradise had, the same must be found within that supposed vnhabitable burnt Zone, or within the Tropicks, and neere to the line it selfe. For hereof experience hath informed Reason, and Time hath made those things apparent, which were hidden and could not by any contemplation be discovered. Indeed it hath so pleased God to provide for all liuing creatures, wherewith he hath filled the world, that such inconueniences which we contemplate a farre off, are found by triall and the witness of mens traualles, to be so qualified, as there is no portion of the earth made in vaine, or as a fruitlesse lump to fashion out the rest. For God himselfe (saith Isa. 45. 18.) that formed the earth and made it, he that prepared it, he created it not in vaine, he formed it to be inhabited. Now we finde that these hottest Regions of the world, seated vnder the Equinoctiall line, or neere it, are so refreshed with a daily gale of Easterly winde (which the Spaniards call the Brize) that doth euermore blow strongest in the heate of the day, as the downe-right beames of the Sun cannot so much master it, that there is any inconuenience or distemperate heat found thereby. Secondly, the nights are so cold, fresh, and equall, by reason of the entire interposition of the earth, as (for those places which my selfe haue seene, neere the Line & vnder it) I know no other part of the world of better, or equall temper: Onely there are some tracts, which by accident of high Mountaines are barr'd from this ayre and fresh wind, and some few sandie parts without trees, which are not therefore so well inhabited as the rest; and such difference of soiles we finde also in all other parts of the world. But (for the greatest part) those Regions haue so many goodly Riuers, Fountaines, and little Brookes, abundance of high Cedars, and other stately trees casting shade, so many sorts of delicate fruits, euering bearing, and at all times beautified with blossome and fruit both Greene and ripe, as it may of all other parts be best compared to the Paradise of Eden: the boughes and branches are neuer vncliothed and left naked, their sap creepeth not vnder ground into the roote, fearing the iniury of the frost: neither doth Pomona at any times despise her withered Husband Vertumnus, in his winter quarters and old age. Therefore are these Countries called Terra viriosa, Vicious Countries: for Nature being liberall to all without labour, necessity imposing no industrie or trauell, idleness bringeth forth no other fruits then vaine thoughts, and licentious pleasures. So that to conclude this part, Tertullian and those of his opinion were not deceiued in the nature of the place: but Aquinas, who misliked this opinion, and followed a worse. And (to say the truth) all the Schoolemen were grosse in this particular.

Of the change of the names of places: and that besides that Eden in Calesyria, there is a Country in Babylon, once of this name, as is proued out of Es. 1. 37. and Ezech. 27.

THese opinions answered, and the region of Eden not found in any of those imaginary worlds, nor vnder Terrida Zona; it followeth that now we discover and find out the seat thereof, for in it was Paradise by God planted. The difficultie of which search resteth chiefly in this, That as all Nations haue often changed names with their Masters; so are most of these places, by Muses remembered, forgotten by those names of all Historians and Geographers, as well ancient as moderne.

Besides, we find that the Assyrians, Babylonians, Medes and Persians (Cyrus onely and few other excepted) sought to extinguish the Hebrewes. The Grecians hated both their Nation and their Religion; and the Romanes despised once to remember them in any of their Stories. And as those three Monarchies succeeded each other: so did they transforme the names of all those principall Places and Cities in the East: and after them, the Turke hath sought (what he could) to extinguish in all things, the ancient memorie of those people; which he hath subiected and intrahled.

Now besides those notable markes, Euphrates and Tigris, the better to find the way, which leadeth to the Country of Eden, we are to take for guides these two considerations (to wit) That it lay Eastward from Canaan and Judea; and that it was of all other the most beautiful and fertile. First then in respect of situation, the next Country to Judea Eastward was Arabia Petraea; but in this region was Moses himselfe when he wrote: and the next vnto it Eastward also was Arabia the Desert, both which in respect of the infertility could not bee Eden, neither haue any of the Arabians any such Riuer, as are exprest to run out of it: So as it followeth of necessity, that Eden must be Eastward, and beyond both Arabia Petraea, and Deserta. But because Eden is by Moses named by it selfe, and by the fertility, & the riuers only described, we must seeke it in other Scriptures, and where it is by the additions of the neighbour Nations better described. In the Prophet Isay I find it coupled and accompanied with other adjacent Countries, in these words, (spoken in the person of Senacherib by Rabshakeh: Hauc the gods of the Nations deliuered them, which my Fathers haue destroyed, as GOSAN, and HARAN, & RESEPH, and the children of EDEN, which were at Telassar? and in Ezechiel, where he prophesieth against the Tyrans: They of Haran, and Canneh, & Eden, the merchants of Sheba, Ashur, and Chilmad, were thy merchants, &c.

But to auoid confusion, we must vnderstand that there were 2. Edens, one of which the Prophet Amos remembreth, where he diuideth Syria into three Prouinces, whereof, the first he maketh Syria Damascene, or Decapollitan: the second part is that Valley called Auenis, otherwife Conuallis, or the tract of Chamath, where Assyria is ioyned to Arabia the Desert, & where Ptolemie placeth the City of Aueria: & the third is knowne by the name of Domus Edenis, or Calefryia, otherwife Fallis caua, or the hollow Valley, because the mountaines of Libanus and Amilibanus, take all the length of it on both sides, and border it: for Cole in Greeke is Caua in Latine. But this is not that Eden, which we seeke: neither doth this Prouince lye East from Canaan, but North, and so ioyneth vnto it, as it could not be vnknowne to the Hebrewes. Yet, because there is a little Citie therein called Paradise, the Iewes beleueed this Calefryia to be the same which Moses describeth. For the same cause doth Hopkins in his Treatise of Paradise reprehend Beroaldus, in that he confoundeth this Eden, with the other Eden of Paradise; though, to giue Beroaldus his right, I conceiue that he led the way to Hopkins, and to all other later Writers, sauing, That hee sayled in distinguishing these two Regions, both called Eden: and that he altogether misvnderstood two of the foure riuers (to wit) Pison and Gehon, as shall appeare hereafter. Now to finde out Eden, which (as Moses teacheth vs) lay Eastward from the Deserts, where he wrote, after he had passed the Red Sea; we must consider where those other Countries are found, which the Prophet Isay and Ezechiel ioyneth with it. For (saith ESAIAH) Gosan, Haran, and Reseph, and the children of Eden, which were at Telassar. Also Ezechiel ioyneth Haran with Eden, who, together with those of Sheba, Ashur, and Chilmad, were the Merchants that traded with the Citie of Tyre, which was then (saith EZECHIEL) the Mart of the people for many Isles. And it hath euer beene the custome, that the Persians conueyed their Merchandise to Babylon, and to those Cities vpon Euphrates, and Tigris, and from thence transported them into Syria, now Soria, and to the Port of the Mediterranean Sea: as in ancient times to the Citie of Tyre, afterward to Tripoly, and now to Aleppo, from whence they imbarque them at the Port of Alexandretta, in the Bay of Issicus, now Laiazzo. Ezechiel in the description of the magnificence of Tyre, and of the exceeding trade that it had with all the Nations of the East, as the onely Mart-towne of that part of the world, reciteth both the people, with whom they had commerce, and also what commodities euerie Countrey yeelded: and hauing counted the seuerall People and Countries, he addeth the particular trade, which each of them exercised: They were thy merchants (saith the Prophet) in all sorts of things, in rayments of blue silke, and of broyered workes, fine linnen, corral, and pearle: and afterwards speaking of the Merchants of Sheba and Raamah, and what kinds they traded, he hath these words: The merchants of Sheba & Raamah were thy merchants, they occupied in thy Faires, with the chiefe of all Spices, and with all precious stones and gold. Now these be indeede the riches which Persia and Arabia Felix yeeld: & because Sheba & Raamah are those parts of Arabia, which border the Sea, called the Persian Gulfe, therefore did those Nations both vent such Spice, sweet Gummes, and Pearles, as their owne Countries yeelded; and and (withall) hauing trade with their Neighbours of India, had from them also all sorts of spices, and plentie of gold. The better to conuey these commodities to that great Mart of Tyre, the Shebans or Arabians entred by the mouth of Tigris, and from the Citie of Teredon (built or enlarged by Nabuchodonozor, now called Balsara) thence sent vp all these rich merchandises by boat to Babylon, from whence by the body of Euphrates, as farre as it bended Westward, and afterward by a branch thereof, which reacheth within three daies iourney of Aleppo, and then ouer Land they past to Tyre, as they did afterward to Tripoly, (formerly Hieropolis) and thence to Alexandretta, as aforesaid. Now the Merchants of Canneh, which Ezechiel ioyneth with Eden, inhabited farre vp the Riuer, and receiued this trade from Arabia and India, besides those proper commodities which themselves had, and which they receiued out of Persia, which bordered them. S. Hierome vnderstandeth by Canneth, Seleucia, which is seated vpon Euphrates, where it breaketh into foure heads, and which tooke that name from Seleucus, who made thereof a magnificent Citie. Hierosolymitanus thinks it to be Ctesiphon, but Ctesiphon is seated downe low vpon Tigris, and Canneh cannot be on that side, I meane on the East-side of Tigris, for then were it out of the Valley of Shinar. Plinie placeth the Schenite vpon Euphrates, where the same beginneth to be foordable, which is toward the border of Syria, after it leaueth to be the bound of Arabia the Desert, and where the Riuer of Euphrates reflecteth from the Desert of Palmirena: for these people of Canneh (afterward Schenita) inhabited both borders of Euphrates, stretching themselves from their owne Citie of Canneh in Shinar Westward along the banks of Euphrates, as far as the Citie of Thapsacus, where Ptolemie appointed the Foords of Euphrates: which also agreeth with the description of the Schenite by Strabo, whose words are these: Mercatoribus ex Syria Seleucia & Babylonis euntibus iter est per Schenitas; The Merchants which traueile fro Syria to Seleucia and Babylon, take their way by the Schenites. Therefore those which take Canneth for Charran, doe much mistake it. For Charran, to which Abraham came from Vr in Chaldea (called by God) standeth also in Mesopotamia, not vpon Euphrates it selfe, but vpon the Riuer of Chaboras, which falleth into Euphrates: and the Merchants of Charran are distinctly named with those of Canneh in Ezechiel (as) they of Haran, and Canneh, and Eden, the merchants of Sheba, Ashur, & Chilmad were thy merchants. Wherefore Charran which is sometime called Charre, and Haran, and Aran, is but the same Charran of Mesopotamia; and when it is written Aran, then it is taken for the region of Mesopotamia: or Aranfluuius, the Greeke word (Mesopotamia) importing, a Country between riuers: for Mos in Greeke is Medius in Latine, and Potamos fluuius; and when it is written Haran or Aran, it is then taken for the Citie it selfe, to which Abraham came from Vr (as aforesaid.) For Strabo in the description of Arabia, giueth that tract of Land from the borders of Calefryia, to the edge of Mesopotamia, to the Schenite, who also inhabited on both sides of Euphrates, & were in after-ages accounted of these Arabians which inhabited Batanea, and the North part of the Deserts, stretching themselves toward the vnhabited Solitude of Palmirena, which lyeth betweene Syria, and Arabia the Desert. So as these of Canneh lay in the very highway from Babylon to Tyre, and were neighbours (indifferent) to Charran and to Eden: and therefore they are by the Prophet Ezechiel coupled together, They of Haran, and Canneth, & Eden, &c. But S. Hierome made a good interpretation of Canneth, or Chalne, by Seleucia: for Seleucia was anciently called Chalanne (witness Appian;) and so Rabanus Maurus calleth it in his Commentaries vpon Genesis; the name by time and mixture of languages being changed from Chalne or Canneh, to Chalanne: of which name there are two other Cities, standing in Triangle with Seleucia, and almost the next vnto it, (as) Thelbe-canne, and Mann-canne, the one a little to the West of Seleucia, and the other opposite vnto it, where these riuers of Tigris and Euphrates are ready to ioyne. Therefore, which of these the ancient Canneh was, (being all three within the bound of the valley Shinar) it is vnertaine: but it is a note as well of the importance of the place, as of the certaine seat thereof, that so many other Cities did retain a part of the name in so many ages after. Neither is it vnlikely, that these additions of Thelbe and Mann to the word Canneh, were but to make difference betweene the East and the West, or the greater and the lesse Canneh, or betweene Canneh the old, and the new: which additions to distinguish Cities by, are ordinarie in all the Regions of the World.

Now of the other City ioyned with Eden, as Haran or Charran, S. Hierome on the Ind. 1. Judges

Gen. 11.

Iudges speaketh thereof in these words: Cumq; reuerterentur, pervenerunt ad Charran, quæst in medio itinere contra Ninivem, undecimo die; When they returned, they came to Charran, (which is the mid-way against Ninive) the eleventh day.

Act. 7. 1.

This Citie is by the Martyr Stephen named Charran (speaking to the high Priest:) Ye Men, Brethren, and Fathers, hearken: The God of glory appeared to our Father ABRAHAM, while he was in Mesopotamia, before he dwelt in Charran. But the seat of this Citie is not doubted of: for it is not only remembered in many Scriptures, but, withall, exceeding famous for the death and overthrow of Craſſus the Romane, who for his insatiable greediness was called Gurgis auaritia; The gulf of auarice. Whereof Lucan:

Lucan. l. 1. 105.

Aſſyrias Latio maculauit sanguine Carras.

With Roman blood th' Aſſyrian Carre he defil'd.

Gen. 10. 10.

But this Citie Canne or Chalne is made manifest by Moses himselfe, where it is written of NIMROD: And the beginning of his Kingdomes was Babel, & Erach, & Acad, & Chalne, in the land of Sinaar or Shinar where Moses sheweth the first composition of the Babylonian Empire, and what Cities and People were subiect vnto Nimrod, all which lay in the said Valley of Shinar or neere it; and this Valley of Shinar is that Tract, afterwards called Babylonia and Chaldea, into which also Eden stretcheth it selfe. Chaldea, Babylonia, Sinaar, idem sunt (saith COMESTOR.) Three names of one Countrey: which Region of Babylonia took name of the Towre Babel; & the Towre, of the confusion of tongues. And that Shinar was Babylonia, it is proued in the eleventh Chapter of Genesis, in these words: And as they went from the East, they found a Playne in the Land of Shinar, and there they abode: in which Playne Babylon was built (as aforesaid.)

Gen. 2.

Now Shinar being Babylonia, and Canneh, in the first beginning of Nimrod's greatness, and before he had subdued any strange, or far-off Nations, being one part of his Dominion, and also named by Moses to be in Shinar, it proueth, that Canneh ioyneth to Babylonia; which also Ezechiel coupleth with Eden, and (further) affirmeth, that those of Eden were also the Merchants, which traded with the Tyrians: and Eſay in the threats of Senacherib against Hierusalem (with other Nations that Senacherib vaunted that his Fathers had destroyed) nameth the children of Eden which were at Telassar. But before I conclude where Eden it selfe lyeth, it is necessarie to describe, those other Countreies, which Ezechiel ioyneth therewith in the places before remembered, as, those of Sheba and Raamah. It is written in Genesis the tenth: Moreover the ſonnes of HAM were CUSH, &c. And the ſonnes of CUSH were SEBA, and HAVILAH, and SABTAH, and RAAMAH, &c. And the ſonnes of RAAMAH were SHEBA, &c. and anon after, CUSH begat NIMROD: so as Sheba was the grand-child of Cush, and Nimrod the ſonne of Cush, whose elder brother was Sebah: though some there are that conceiue to the contrarie, that Nimrod was the elder in valour and vnderstanding, though not in time and precedence of birth; who inhabited that part of Shinar, where Babel was built, afterwards Babylonia. His brother Raamah or Regma tooke that part adioyning to Shinar, toward the Sea side and Persian gulf (called afterward Raama and Sheba, by the Father and his Sons, which possessed it.) For (saith EZECHIEL) the merchants of Raamah and Sheba were thy merchants, they occupied in thy Faies with the chiefe of all ſpices, and all precious ſtones, and gold. So as Sheba was that Tract of Countrey, which parteth Arabia Deserta from Arabia Felix, and which ioyneth to the Sea where Tigris and Euphrates fall out, and render themselves to the Ocean. This part, and the confining Countrey Strabo calleth Catabria, where the best Myrrhe and Frankincense is gathered; which people haue an interchange or trade with Elana, lying on the East side of the Persian gulf. By this it appeareth who were the Shebeans, spoken of by Ezechiel, and said to haue bene the Merchants of Tyre, for gold, spices, and precious stones: of which they had not only plenty of their owne, but were also furnished from that part of India (called Elana, according to Strabo) for exchange of their Aromatiques, and other proper commodities. For as Strabo reporteth out of ERATOSTHENES: In Persia ora insula est, in qua multi & pretiosi uniones gignantur: in alijs vero, clari & perclucidi lapilli. ERATOSTHENES (saith Strabo) affirmeth, that in the beginning of the Persian gulf, there is an Island, in which there are many precious pearles bred: and in other, verie cleare and shining stones. Now, the difference betweene Sheba, the sonne of Raamah, and Seba, the sonne of Cush, is in this, That Seba is written with the Hebrew (Samech) and Sheba with (Schin.)

but whatsoever the difference may be in the Hebrew Orthographie, their Countreies and Habitations are diuers. For Sheba is that which bordereth the Persian Sea and Saba (whence the Queene of Saba) neighboured the Red Sea; and so that place of the 72. Psalme: expounded, Reges Arabum & Saba, hath in the Hebrew this sense: Reges Sheba & Saba.

The Shebeans, Ezechiel nameth together with the Edenites, because they inhabited vpon the Out-let of the same Riuer, vpon which the Edenites were seated: and so those of Sheba, towards the Sea-coast, and vpon it, paſt vp the Countrey, by Tigris and Euphrates, being ioyned in one maine streame, and so through the Region of Eden, which Tigris boundeth, thereby the better to conuey their merchandise toward Tyre. And as the Cities of Charran, and Canneh, border Eden on the West and Northwest: so doth Sheba on the South, and Chilmad on the North-east. Chilmad being a Region of the higher Media, as appeareth in the Chaldean Paraphraſt, which Countrey by the Geographers is called Coromitena, (L) placed by exchange for (R.) which change the Hebrewes also often vse.

Thus much of those Countreies which border Eden, and who altogether traded with the Tyrians: of which, the chiefe were the Edenites, inhabiting Telassar: for these Senacherib vaunted, that his Fathers had destroyed; and this place of Telassar lay most convenient, both to receiue the Trade from Sheba and Arabia, and also to conuey it ouer into Syria, and to Tyris. Now to make these things the more plaine, wee must remember, that before the death of Senacherib, many parts of the Babylonian Empire fell from his obedience, and after his death these Monarchies were vtterly disioyned.

For it appeareth both in Eſay the 37. and in the second of Kings, by the threats of Rabsache, the while the Armie of Aſſyria lay before Hierusalem, that the Cities of Gofan, Haran, Reſeph, and the Edenites at Telassar, had resisted the Aſſyrians, though by them (in a sort) mastered and recovered. Haue the gods of the Nations deliuered them, whom my Fathers haue destroyed, as Gofan, and Haran, Reſeph, and the children of Eden, which were at Telassar? But it appeared manifestly after Senacherib's death, that these Nations formerly contending, were then freed from the others subiection: for Eſar-Haddon held Aſſyria, and Merodach Baladan, Babylonia. And after that the Armie of Senacherib, commanded by Rabsache which lay before Hierusalem (Ezechias then reigning) while Senacherib was in Egypt, was by the Angell of God destroyed: the King of Babel sent to Ezechias, both to congratulate the recouerie of his health, and his victory obtained ouer the Aſſyrians. After which overthrow, Senacherib himselfe was slaine by his owne ſonnes in the Temple of his Idols, Eſar-Haddon succeeding him in Aſſyria. To the Babylonian Ambassadors sent by Merodach, Ezechias shewed all his treasures, as well proper as consecrate, which inuited the Kings of Babylon afterward to vndertake their conquest and subuerſion. So as, the ſuſpition of warre encreasing betweene Babylon and Aſſyria, the Edenites which inhabited the borders of Shinar towards the North, and towards Aſſyria, were employed to beare off the incursions of the Aſſyrians; and their Garrison-place was at Telassar: and the very word (Telassar) saith Iunius, signifying as much, as a Bulwarke against the Aſſyrians. This place Hierosolymitanus takes for Reſem, others for Seleucia: but this Telassar is the same, which Am. Marcellinus in the Historie of Italian (whom he followed in the enterprize of Persia) calleth Tbilutha in stead of Telassar, who describeth the exceeding strength thereof in his 2. Booke: It is seated in an Island of Euphrates vpon a ſteepe and vnaſſailable Rocke, in ſo much as the Emperour Julian durſt not attempt it; and therefore it was a conuenient place for a Garrison against the Aſſyrians, being also a paſſage out of Mesopotamia into Babylonia, and in which the Edenites of the Countrey adioyning were lodged to defend the same. This place Ptolomie calleth Teridata, hauing Reſeph (which he calleth Reſepha) on the left hand, and Canneh; (which he calleth Thelbe-canne) on the right hand, not farre from whence is also found the Citie of Mann-canne vpon Tigris, and all these seated together, as Eſay and Ezechiel haue ſorted them. But the vnderſtanding of these places is the more difficult, because Aſſyria (which the Chaldeans call Aſturia) and Mesopotamia, were ſo often confounded: the one taken for the other by interchange of Dominion. Aſſyria & Mesopotamia in Babylonia nomen tranſierunt (saith NIGER.) Aſſyria and Mesopotamia tooke the name of Babylonia. Laſtly, it appeareth by those adiacent Regions by the Prophets named, in what part of the World Eden is seated, seated, as, by Charran or Haran in Mesopotamia: also by Canneh and Reseph, according to the opinion of Vatablus, who in these words translateth this place: Plantauit autem Iehouah Deus hortum in Eden, ab Oriente, The Lord God planted a Garden in Eden, Eastward: that is: (saith he in his Annotations.) Iussit nasci arbores in Eden, Regione Orientali, in finibus Arabiae & Mesopotamiae, He commanded Trees to grow in Eden, an Eastern Region in the borders of Arabia and Mesopotamia.

¶ X.

Of diuers other testimonies of the Land of Eden; and that this is the Eden of Paradise.

And for a more particular pointing out of this Eden, it seemes by the two Epistles of the Nestorian Christians, that inhabit Mesopotamia, which Epistles in the year 1552. they sent to the Pope about the confirming of their Patriarch, and Andreas Masius hath published them, translated out of Syriac into Latine. By these Epistles (I say) it seemes wee may haue some farther light for the prooffe of that, which we haue said about the Region of Eden in those parts. For in them both there is mention of the Island of Eden in the Riuer Tigris, or at least, Tigris in both these Epistles is called the Riuer of Eden. This Island, as Masius in his Preface to these Epistles saith, is commonly called Gozoria (as it were, the Island, by an eminencie.) It hath (saith hee) ten miles in circuit, and was sometimes walled round about, which name of the Island Eden may (doubtlesse) remaine to this day; though in the rest of the Region so called this name be swallowed vp, with the same of those flourishing Kingdomes of Mesopotamia, Assyria, Babylonia, and Chaldea. This Island of Eden hath vp the Riuer, and not farre beyond it, the Citie of Hasan-Cepha, otherwise Fortis Petra: below it, it hath Mosel or Mosel, from which (as in that which followeth it shall appeare out of Masius) it is not aboute twelue miles distant. Neither is it to trouble vs, that Mosel or Mosel, by Marius Niger is remembred among the Cities higher vp Tigris, in these words. Iuxta autem Tigrim, Ciuitates sunt Dorbeta prope Taurum montem, quae nunc Mosel dicitur; magna sane, &c. (that is) By Tigris are these Cities, Dorbeta nere unto mount Taurus (which is now called Mosel) which is a great one, &c. This opinion of Niger, displacing Mosel, and making it to be Dorbeta (I say) needs not here to trouble vs: seeing for this matter, the testimonie of Masius informed by the Christians that dwelt there (the Seat of whose Patriarch it is) ought to be of credit, auowing that this Mosel (or Mosal) is in the Confinnes of Mesopotamia and Assyria, seated vpon Tigris, and in the neighborhood of Ninue; and that it is the famous Seleucia Parthorum. The Nestorian Christians in their former Epistle, call it Attur in these words: Ex omnibus Ciuitatibus & pagis quae sunt circum Ciuitatem Mosal (hoc est) Attur in uicinia Ninues; Of all the Cities & Townes which are about the Citie of Mosal (that is) Attur in the neighbourhood of Ninue. As also Niger acknowledgeth Ctesiphon, a Citie thereabout to be called Assur, (which is the same as Attur, after the Dialect of those Nations, which change Sh into T.) Neither is it much that he should mistake Ctesiphon, (which is not farre off Seleucia) for Seleucia, to be Assur. By this then we may come somewhat nere the end of our purpose. For the Ile of Eden, which lyeth in the brest of Tigris, is but twelue miles from Mosal, and that ancient Citie, which Ptolomie and Tacitus call Ninus, and the Scriptures Ninue, Philoftratus, and Simeon Sethi, Mosula, and Iohn Lean Mosal, others Mosse, (though it be not the same with Mosal) is set but a little higher vpon the same Riuer of Tigris, nere Mosal: so that we are like to find this Ile of Eden hereabout. For the same Andreas Masius, which placeth it about Mosal, makes it to be below Hasan-chepha, which is vpon the same Riuer of Tigris.

The onely difficultie is this, that some perhaps may thinke, that the words of the Nestorians in both their Epistles, speake not of any Ile in Tigris, called the Ile of Eden, but of an Ile in Tigris, a Riuer of Eden. But this sense of their words in my opinion seemeth the more vnprobable. And yet if this were the meaning heere, we haue a testimony from the Learned of those parts, that not onely Euphrates, but also Tigris was a Riuer of Eden, and that the name of Eden in those parts is not yet quite worne out, though the Region hath bin subiect to the same change, that all other Kingdomes of the world haue bene, and hath by conquest, and corruption of other Languages, receiued new and differing names. For the South part of Eden, which stretcheth ouer Euphrates, was after after the flood called Shinar, and then of the Tower of Babel, Babylonia, and the North part of Eden is that Tract of Mesopotamia, Assyria, and Armenia, which embraceth both the bankes of Tigris, betweene Mount Taurus, and Seleucia. And of this Region of Eden that ancient Ethicus maketh mention, (not that latter Ethicus, Disciple of Callimicus, otherwise by Plutarch and Athenaeus called Istri, who liued in Egypt in the Reigne of Philadelphus, but another of a farre higher and remote time) the same being made Latine out of Greeke by Saint Hierome. And though by corruption of the ancient Copie it be written in Ethicus, Adonis for Eden; yet Adonis being a Riuer of Phoenicia, cannot be vnderstood to be the Region named by Ethicus. For Ethicus makes it a Countrey, and not a Riuer, and ioyneth it with Mesopotamia and Ethiopia, calling the land of Chus Ethiopia, after the Vulgar, and Septuagint. And lastly, the Riuer which watereth the Regions, (saith Ethicus) falleth into the Gulfe of Persia: which Riuer he calleth Armodius, for Tigris; Tigris being but a name imposed for the swiftnesse thereof. And out of Armenia both Tigris and Euphrates haue their originall: for out of Eden came a Riuer, or Riuers, to water the Garden, both which Riuers (to wit) Tigris and Euphrates, come out of Armenia, and both of them trauesse Mesopotamia, Regions first of all knowne by the name of Eden for their beaurtie and fertilitie. And it is very probable, that Eden contained also some part of Armenia, and the excellent fertilitie thereof in diuers places, is not vnworthy the name of Eden. For in some part therof (saith Strabo) the leaues are alway green, & therfore therein a perpetuall Spring. Also STEPHANVS de urbibus mentioneth the Citie of Adana vpon Euphrates, and the name of Eden was in vse in Amos time, though he speake not of Eden in the East, but of Eden in Calesyria. But to the end I may not burden the Readers patience with too long a Discourse, it may suffice to know, that Euphrates and Tigris (once ioyned together, and afterward separate) are two of those foure heads, into which these Riuers which are said to water the Garden of Paradise, were diuided: whose courses being knowne, Eden, (out of which they are said to come) cannot be vnknowne. Now that Hiddekel and Perath were Tigris and Euphrates, it is agreed by all: for the Seuentie and all others conuert Perath by Euphrates: & Hiddekel Tigrim omnes exponunt: & all men vnderstand Hiddekel by Tigris (saith Vatablus.) And because that which I haue said of the Ile of Eden, shall not be subiect to the censure of selfe-inuention, I haue heere vnder set downe the words out of the two generall Epistles of the Nestorians, as MASIVS (ad verbum) hath conuerted them into Latine. The occasion of those Letters and Supplications to the Pope were, that the Nestorian Christians, which inhabit Mesopotamia, Assyria, Persia, Babylonia, & haue to this day (at least in Queene Marius time they had) fiftene Churches in one Citie called Seleucia Parthorum, or Mosel vpon the Riuer of Tigris; hauing no sufficient authoritie to choosethemselues a Patriarch (which cannot be done without foure or three Metropolitane Bishops at least) sent to the Bishop of Rome, in the yeare of Christ 1552. (as afore-said) a Petition to obtaine allowance vnto such an Election as themselues had made: hauing three hundred yeare before that vpon the like defect, sentone Marius thither to be confirmed; and in this negotiation they made knowne to the Bishop of Rome the state of the Christian Church in those parts: for vpon the death of their Patriarch (who of a couetous desire to enrich himselfe had forborne to institute Metropolitane Bishops, when the places fell void) they all assembled themselves together to consult of the Church-gouernment. And because all the Patriarchs for an hundred yeares had bene of one House and Family to the preiudice of the Church, and that there yet remained one Bishop of the same Stocke and Kindred, who aspired to the same dignitie which his Predecessors had held, the rest of the Professors refused to allow him. Vpon which occasion, and for the choice of a Gouernour more sufficient, the Teachers in all the Churches assembled themselves. The words of the generall Epistle to the Pope are these about the middle of the said Epistle: Verum nos non acceptauimus neq. proclamauimus ipsum, sed subito conuenimus ex omnibus locis Orientalibus, & ex omnibus Ciuitatibus & Pagis quae sunt circum Ciuitatem Mosel (hoc est) Attur, in uicinia Ninues, ex Babylonia, ex Charrha, ex Arbella, ex Insula quae est in medio Tigris, fluminis Eden, ex Tauris Persia, ex Nisibi, &c. which is: But we did neither accept of this man, neither pronounced him: but suddenly we assembled our selues out of all parts of the East and out of all the Cities and Villages which are about Mosel (or Attur) neighbouring Ninue, & out of Babylon, Carrha, Arbella, and out of the Island which lyeth in the middle of Tigris, gris, a River of Eden, or rather, out of the Ile of Eden, which lyeth in the River Tigris. And in a second Epistle at the same time sent, they vse these words: Neg. supersunt apud nos Metropolitae, quorum est ordinare Catholicum, sed soli pauci Episcopi, Episcopus Arbela, Episcopus Salmasi, Episcopus Adurbeigan, et vestigio conuenimus in Insulam, quae est intra Tigrim flumen, Eden, fecimusq. compactum inter nos, &c. (which is) Neither are there remaining among vs any Metropolitan Bishops to whom it belongs to ordaine a Patriarch, but onely a few Bishops, as the Bishop of Arbela, the Bishop of Salmasus, and the Bishop of Adurbeigan: but lo, we assembled speedily in the Iland Eden, which is in Tigris, and agreed betwene our selues, &c.

Now this Iland of Eden Masius describeth with other places; which being well conceiued, the Nestorian Epistles, and the state of the Church may be in those parts (saith he) the better vnderstood. And after he hath distinguished the foure sorts of Christians in those parts of the World, and in the South part of Africa, which hee calleth Nestorians, Iacobites, Maronites, and Copti, he goeth on in these words: Mox audita illius morte, concurrisse aiebant tumultuario in istam quam modo dixi Tigris Insulam, quae duodecim circiter passuum millibus supra Mosal posita, decem fere millia passuum suo ambitu continet, muris undiq. cincta, & a paucis alijs quam Christianis hominibus habitata: which is, Now hearing of the death of the Patriarch, (as those that came to Rome reported) they ran tumultuously together into that Iland of Tigris or Eden before spoken of, which Iland is situated about twelue miles aboue Mosel, containing very neere ten miles in compasse, and euerie where inuironed with a wall, inhabited by a few other men then Christians. And afterward he maketh a recapitulation of the Christian Churches; among the rest hee addeth the Ile of Eden by the name of Geserta, Insula Tigris: siue Geserta. Furthermore, describing the Citie of Hosan-cepha, or Fortis Petra, he placeth it supra praedictam Tigris Insulam rupi aspera impositam; Aboue the aforesaid Iland of Tigris, being seated on a steepe Rocke. Of this Iland of Geserta, Andrew Theuet maketh mention in his tenth Booke of his general Cosmographie in these words: Geserta ou Gesire est au milieu de la riuiera du Tigre, & pense que c'est une terre des plus fertiles de toute l'Asie, Geserta or Gesire is in the middle of Tigris, the Soyle the most fertile of all Asia.

By this we see that the ancient name of Eden liueth, and of that Eden which lyeth Eastward from Arabia Petraea, and the Desert where Moses wrote, and that Eden which bordereth Charran according to Ezechiel, and that Eden which is seated according to the assertion of the said Prophet, and ioyned with those Nations of Reseph, Canneh, and Charran, and the rest which traded with the Tyrians, and is found at this day in the parting of the two Regions of Assyria and Babylonia, where the Edenites in Thelassar were garriſond to resist the Assyrians, whose displantation Senacherib vaunted of (as aboue written) and lastly, the same Eden, which embraceth Tigris, and looketh on Euphrates, two of the knowne Riuer of those foure, which are by all men ascribed to Paradise.

¶ X I.

Of the difficultie in the Text, which seemeth to make the foure Riuer to rise from one streame.

BVit it may be objected, that it is written in the Text, That a Riuer went out of Eden and not Riuer, in the plurall, which scruple Matthew Beroaldus hath thus answered in his Chronologie: The Latine Translation, saith hee, hath these words: Et fluius egrediebatur de loco voluptatis ad irrigandum Paradisum, qui inde diuidebatur in quatuor capita: Quae verba melius consentient cum rei narratione, & eiusdem explicatione, si ita reddantur. Et fluius erat egrediens ex Edene, (hoc est) fluius procedebant ex Edene regione ad rigandum pomarium, & inde diuidebatur, & erat in quatuor capita: which is, And a Riuer went out of the place of pleasure to water Paradise, and thence was diuided into foure heads: which words (saith Beroaldus) doe better agree with the narration and explication of the place, if they be thus translated: And a Riuer was going forth of Eden (that is) Riuer went forth, and ran out of the Region of Eden to water the Orchard; and from thence it was diuided, and they became foure heads. The Tigris differeth from the Vulgar or Latine, for it conuerteth it thus: Et fluius egrediebatur de delicijs, And a Riuer went out of pleasure, in stead of Eden; and the Latine addeth the word locus, or place, Et fluius egrediebatur de loco voluptatis; And a Riuer went out of the place of pleasure: and so the word (place) may rightly be referred to Eden, which was (of all other) a Region most delightfull and fertile; and so also the word (inde) and thence was diuided, hath reference to the Countrey of Eden, and not to the Garden it selfe.

And for the word (Riuer) for Riuer, it is vsuall among the Hebrewes: for it is written: Let the Earth bud forth the bud of the Herbe that seedeth Seed, the fruiſfull Tree, &c. Here the Hebrew vseth the Singular for the Plurall, Herbe and Tree, for Herbs and Trees; and againe, We eate of the fruit of the Tree, in stead of (Trees:) And thirdly, The man and his wife hid themselves from the presence of God; In medio ligni Paradisi; In the middle of the Tree of the Garden, for (Trees.) And of this opinion is Dauid Kimli, and Vatablus, who vpon this place of Genesis say, that the Hebrewes doe often put the Singular for the Plurall, as illud, for unumquodq. illorum, and hee giueth an instance in this question it selfe, as, A Riuer (for Riuer) went out of Eden.

And this answer out of diuers of the Learned, may, nor without good reason, bee giuen to the obiection, That Moses speaketh but of one Riuer, from which the heads should diuide themselves. Howbeit I denie not, but with as good (and perhaps better) reason, we may expound the foure heads, to bee foure notable passages into famous Countries. And so we may take the word (Riuer) Verse the tenth for one Riuer (to wit) Euphrates, as this name comprehendeth all the branches thereof. For this Riuer, (after he is past the place, where we suppose Paradise to haue bin, diuides it selfe, & ere long yeeldeth foure notable passages into seuerall Countries, though not all the way downe streame, (for this is no where in the Text) where it is noted, that following the Riuer downward, there is conueyance into the Countries named in the Text, though part of the way to one of the Countries (to wit, to Assyria) were vp Tigris.

To this end the Text speaking of Hiddekel, as it riseth from the Riuer of Eden, doth not say it compasseth or waltheth the whole Region of Assyria, (as it had vsed this phrase of Pison and Gehon) but that it runneth toward Assyria. The first branch Pison, is Nabar-malcha, (by interpretation) Basilus, or flumen regium, which runneth into Tigris vnder Apamia, whence ariseth the name of Pasi-tigris, (as it were) Piso-tigris. This leadeth to the Land of Hauila or Susana. The second branch Gehon, is that which in Historians is Nabarsares or Narragas, for Nabar-ragas: both which names signifie flumen deriuatum (a Riuer deriued,) also Acracanus, quasi Ranosus, by reason of the froggie Fennes which it maketh: this Gehon leadeth to the first seate of Chus, about the borders of Chaldea and Arabia, and it is lost at length in the Lakes of Chaldea. The third branch, Hiddekel, may be expounded the vpper streame of Pison, or Basilus, which runneth into Hiddekel properly so called (that is, into Tigris) aboue Seleucia, where it sheweth a passage vp Tigris into Assyria: where, because at length it is called Hiddekel, or Tigris, hauing before no knowne proper name, the Text in this place calleth it Hiddekel from the beginning. The fourth Perath, or Euphrates, so called per excellentiam, being the bodie of the Riuer Euphrates, which runneth through Babylon and Otris. But, be it a Riuer, or Riuer, that come out of Eden, seeing that Tigris and Euphrates are noted in the Text, there can bee no doubt, but that Paradise was not farre from these Riuer: for that Perath in Moses is Euphrates, there can be no question; and (indeed) as plaine it is that Hiddekel is Tigris. For Hiddekel goeth (saith Moses) Eastwards towards Assur, as we find, that Tigris is the Riuer of Assyria proprè dicta, whose chiefe Citie was Ninie, as in Genesis the tenth it is written: That out of that Land (to wit) Babylonia, Nimrod went into Assur, and builded Ninie, which was the chiefe Citie of Assyria.

And as for the kind of speech here vsed in the Text, speaking of foure heads; though the heads of Riuer be (properly) their Fountaines, yet here are they to be vnderstood, to be spoken of the beginning of their diuision from the first streame. Caput aquae (saith VLEIANVS) illud est, vnde aqua nascitur; si ex fonte nascatur, fons, si ex flumine, vel ex lacu, priminitia, &c. If the beginning of the water be out of a Fountaine, then is the Fountaine taken for the head: if out of a Lake, then the Lake; and if from a maine Riuer any branch be separate and diuided, then where that branch doth first bound it selfe with new bankes, there is that part of the Riuer, where the branch forsaketh the maine streame, called the head of the Riuer.

D. XII.

Of the strange fertilitie and happinesse of the Babylonian Soile, as it is certaine that Eden was such.

Herod. Clia. li. i. T may also bee demanded, whether this Region of Eden, by vs described, bee of such fertilitie and beautie, as Eden the seat of Paradise was: which if it be denied, then must we also consider, that there was no part of the Earth, that retained that fertilitie and pleasure, that it had before the curse: neither can we ascribe the same fruitfulness to any part of the Earth, nor the same vertue to any plant thereon growing, that they had before the flood; and therefore this Region of Eden may be now no such flourishing Countrey, as it was when it was first created in his perfection. Yet this I finde written of it: First, in Herodotus, who was an eye-witnesse, and speaketh of the very place it selfe; for the Ile of Eden is but twelue miles or thereabout from Ninive, and so from Mosul. Ex Euphrate exiens in Tigrim, alterum flumen, iuxta quod Urbs Ninus sita erat. Hec regio, omnium quas nos vidimus, optima est, &c. Where Euphrates runneth out into Tigris, not farre from the place where Ninus is seated, This Region, of all that we haue scene, is most excellent; and he addeth afterward: Cereis autem fructu procreando adeo ferax est, ut nunquam non ferè ducenta reddat, &c. (that is) It is so fruitful in bringing forth Corne, that it yeeldeth two hundred fold: The leaues of Wheate and Barley being almost foure fingers broad: As for the height of Millet and Sesame, they 20 are euen in length like vnto Trees, which although I know to be true, yet I forbear to speake hereof, well knowing, that those things which are reported of this fruitfulness, will seeme very incredible to those, which neuer were in the Countrey of Babylon. They haue commonly in all the Countrey Palme Trees growing of their owne accord, the most of them bearing fruit, out of which they make both Meates, and Wine, and Honey, ordering them as the Fig Trees. Thus farre Herodotus.

To this Palme-tree so much admired in the East India, Strabo and Niger adde a fourth excellencie, which is, that it yeeldeth bread, Ex quibus panem, & mel, & vinum, & acetum conficiunt; Of which these people make Brad, Wine, Honey, and Vinegar. But Antonius the Eremite findeth a fift commoditie, not inferior to any of those foure, which is, that from this selfe-same Tree there is drawne a kind of fine Flaxe, of which people make their Garments, and with which in East India they prepare the cordage for their ships; and that this is true, Athanasius in the life of Antonius the Eremite, confesseth, saying: That he receiued a Garment made thereof from the Eremite himselfe, which he brought with him out of this Region. So therefore those Trees, which the East Indies so highly esteeme and so much admire (as indeede the Earth yeeldeth no Plant comparable to this) those Trees (I say) are in this vpper Babylon, or Region of Eden, as common as any Trees of the Field. Sunt etiam (saith STRABO) passim per omnem Regionem Palmae sua sponte nascentes; There are of Palms ouer all the whole Region, growing of their owne accord. Of this place Quintus Curtius maketh this report: *Euntibus a parte leua Arabia odororum fertilitate nobilis, regio campestris interest inter Tigrim & Euphratem, iacens tam ubere & pingui solo, ut à pastu repelli pecora dicantur, ne satietas perimat; (that is) As you trauaile on the left hand of Arabia (famous for plentie of sweet Odours) there lyeth a Champaine Countrey placed betweene Tigris and Euphrates, and so fruitful and fat a soile, that they are said to driue their Cattell from pasture, lest they should perishe by satietie. Bis in anno segetes Babylonij secant; The Babylonians cut their Corne twice a yeare (saith Niger.) And as Countreys generally are more fruitfull to the Southward, then in the Northern parts: so we may iudge the excellencie of this by that report which Strabo maketh of the South part of America, which is the North border of Eden, or a part thereof; his words be these in the Latine: *Tota enim haec regio frugibus & arboribus abundat mansuetis, itemq. semper virentibus; This Region aboundeth with pleasant fruits, & Trees alwayes greene: which witnesseth a perpetuall Spring, not found elswhere but in the Indies only, by reason of the Sunnes neighbourhood, the life & stirrer vp of Nature in a perpetuall actiuitie. In briebe, so great is the fertilitie of the ground, that the people are constrained twice to mow downe their Corne fields, and a third time to eate them vp with Sheep: which husbandry the Spaniards wanting in the Valley of Mexico, for the first fortie yeares, could not make our kind of Wheate beare Seed, but it grew vp as high as the Trees, and was fruitlesse. Besides, those fields are altogether without weeds (saith (saith Plinie) who addeth this singularity to that soile, That the second yeere the very stubble (or rather falling downe of the feedes againe) yeeldeth them a Haruest of Corne without any further labour: his words are these: Perbata tantæ sunt, ut sequenti anno sponte restibilis fiat seges. Plin. Nat. hist. lib. 18. c. 17.

D. XIII.

Of the Riuer Pison, and the Land of Hauilah.

After the discouerie of Eden, and the testimonies of the fertilitie thereof, it resteth to proue that Pison and Gehon are branches of Tigris, and Euphrates. For that the knowledge and certaintie of these two Riuers should trouble so many wise men it is strange to me, seeing necessitie it selfe (Tigris and Euphrates being knowne) findeth them out: for Euphrates or Tigris, or both, be that Riuer or Riuers of Eden, which water Paradise, which Riuer or Riuers Moses witnesseth afterward, diuided into foure heads, whereof the one is called Pison, the other Gehon, &c. Could there bee a stranger fancie in the world, then when we finde both these (namely) Tigris and Euphrates in Assyria and Mesopotamia, to seeke the other two in India and Egypt, making the one Ganges, and the other Nilus? Two Riuers as farre distant, as any of fame knowne or discouered in the world: the Scriptures making it so plaine, that these Riuers were diuided into foure branches, and with the Scriptures, Nature, Reason and Experience bearing witness. There is no error, which hath not some slipperie and bad foundation, or some apparance of probabilitie, resembling truth, which when men (who studie to bee singular) finde out, (straining reason according to their fancies) they then publish to the world matter of contention, and jangling: not doubting but in the variable deformitie of mens minds, to find some partakers or sectators, the better by their helpe to nurse and cherishe such weake babes, as their owne inuentions haue begotten.

But this mistaking (and first for the Riuer of Pison) seemeth to haue growne out of the not-distinguishing of that Region in India, called Hauilah, from Hauilah, which adioyneth to Babylonia, afterward knowne by the name of Susiana. For Hauilah vpon Tigris took name from Hauilah the sonne of Cush; and Hauilah in India, from Hauilah the sonne of Isctan, the one remembered by Moses in the description of Paradise the other where Moses setteth downe the generations of Noah, and his sonnes after the flood. For the sonnes of Cush were Seba, Hauilah, Sabrah, and Raamah, and the sonnes of Isctan were Ophir, and Hauilah, &c. of which latter (to wit) of Ophir and Hauilah the sonnes of Isctan, that land of Ophir, (whence Salomon had gold) and Hauilah adioyning had their names. Now because Ganges is a great and a famous Riuer of the East India, and Hauilah a Countrey of the same, and is situated vpon Ganges, hence it came that Ganges was taken for Pison, which Riuer is said by Moses to water the land of Hauilah. Or perhaps it was supposed that those foure Riuers, named by Moses, must of necessitie be foure of the greatest in the world; whence (supposing that Ganges was the next great and famous Riuer after Tigris and Euphrates) they chose out this Riuer to make one of the foure. And yet certainly there is another Riuer, whom in these respects they should rather haue chosen then Ganges; for the Riuer Indus on this side India, for beautie, for neerenesse, & for abilitie, giueth no way place to Ganges, but exceedeth it in all. And how can any reasonable man conceiue, that Ganges can be one of the foure heads, seeing Indus commeth betweene it and Tigris? and betweene Tigris and Indus is all that large Empire of Persia, consisting of many Kingdomes. And againe, farther towards the East, and beyond Indus, are all those ample Dominions of India intra Gangem, which lie betweene those two proud Riuers of Indus and Ganges now called the Kingdom of Mogor. So as if Indus be not accounted for any of the foure, because it is removed from Tigris by all the breadth of Persia, then how much lesse Ganges, which falleth into the Ocean, little lesse then fortie degrees to the Eastward of Indus? Surely, whosoeuer readeth the Storie of Alexander, shall finde, that there is no Riuer in Asia, that can exceede Indus. For Hydaspis was of that beidth and depth, as Alexander thereon in great Gallies transported himselfe, and the greatest part of his armie, and in sayling downe that branch of Indus, found it so large and deepe, and by reason thereof so great a billow, as it endangered his whole Fleete, which was ready to bee swallowed vp therein: Hydaspis (as afore said) being but one of many branches of Indus, comparable to it, and as great great as it, hauing besides this, the Riuer of Coas, of Suafius, Acefines, Adri (otherwife Hiroti, Hippalis, and Zaradus, all which make but one Indus, and by it are swallowed vp with all their Children and companions, which being all incorporated and made one streame, it crosseth athwart Asia, and then at Cambaia viliteth the Ocean Sea.

Gen. 2. 15.

But because Pifon, which compasseth Hauilah, as also Gehon, which watereth Cush, must some-where be ioyned with the rest in one bodie, or at least be found to proceede out of the same Countrey of Eden, out of which the other two heads doe proceede, out of doubt they cannot eyther the one or the other, be Ganges, or Nilus: for Nilus riseth in the vttermost of the South, and runneth Northward into the Mediterran Sea; and the Riuer Ganges riseth out of the Mountaine Imaus, or (as others will haue it) Caucasus, which diuides the Northerne Scythia from India, and runneth from North to South into the Indian Ocean. And as for Perath and Hiddekel (that is, Euphrates and Tigris) the one of them is begotten in Armenia, neere Georgiana or Iberia, the other not farre off in the same Armenia, by the Gordiean Mountaines, so as Ganges, who onely trauielleth in her owne India, and Nilus through Ethiopia and Egypt, neuer saw the land of Eden, or ioyned themselues in one channell, either with themselues, or with either of the other; and therefore could not at any time from thence be separated, or diuided into foure heads or branches, according to Moses.

27. 20. 12.

Therefore the Riuer Pifon, which enricheth Hauilah, is the same which by ioyning it selfe with Tigris, was therefore called Pis-tigris, or Piso-tigris, of Pifon and Tigris, which Riuer watereth that Hauilah, which Hauilah the Sonne of Cush gaue name vnto, and not Hauilah of India, so called of Hauilah the Sonne of Ischan, who inhabited with his brother Ophir in the East. And this Hauilah of the Cushites had also Gold, Bdellium, and the Onyx stone. This Bdellium is a Tree, of the bignesse of an Oliue, whereof Arabia hath great plenty, which yeeldeth a certaine gum sweeter to smell to, but bitter in taste, called also Bdellium. The Hebrewes take the Load-stone for Bdellium. Beroaldus affirmeth, that Edela in Hebrew signifieth Pearle: so doth Engubinus; and Hierome calls it Oleaster: be it what it will, a tree bearing Gum or Pearle: Hauilah or Susiana hath plenty of both. Now this Countrey of Susiana or Hauilah stretcheth it selfe toward the North, as farre as the Altars of Hercules, and from thence imbraceth all the Tract of Land Southward, as farre as the Persian Gulfe, on the East side thereof: from which East side had the Shebans (which traded with the Citie of Tyre according to Ezekiel) their great plenty of gold, which Strabo also witnesseth, as was shewed before.

Struch.
Eloph. de Par.

The Greekes had a conceit, that Pifon was Danubius: the Rabbines take it for Nilus. Aben-ezra (sayth Hopkins) out of Rabbi Saadia, translateth Pifon into Nilus: But Nilus findeth the same impossibility that Ganges doth: and Danubius hath the Sea of Hellespont and all Asia the lesse, betwene it and Tigris. Now Pifon, which runneth through Hauilah or Susiana, doth to this day retaine some signe of this name; for where it and Tigris embraceth each other vnder the Citie of Apamia, there doe they agree of a ioynr and compounded name, and are called Piso-tigris. And it is strange vnto me, that from so great antiquitie there should be found remaining any resembling sound of the first name: for Babylon it selfe, which dwelleth so neere these Riuer, is by some writers knowne by the name of Bandas, as, by Postellus, by Castaldus, of Baldach: by Barins, of Bagdad; and of Bougedor, by Andrew Theuet; and yet all those that haue lately seene it, call it Bagdet. To this Riuer of Pifon, Ptolomie indeede with many others giue the name of Basilus or Regius, and Gehon they terme Mahar-sares and Marsias, and Baar-sares. So is Euphrates, neere the Spring and Fountaine, by Strabo and Plinie called Pixrates: by Iunius, Puckperah, out of the Hebrew (that is) The profusion, or comming forth of Euphrates: where it breaketh through the Mountaine Taurus, it takes the name of Omyra. Plutarch calls it Medus and Zaranda: the Hebrewes Parath, (sayth Ar. Montanus): Pagninus, Perath: Iosephus, Phorah; Eusebius, Zozimus: Ammianus, Chalymicus: Gistlanus, and Colinutius terme it Cobar: which Ezekiel calleth Chebar; but this is but a branch of Euphrates. The Affrians know it by the name of Armalchar, or Nahor Malcha: but now commonly it is called Frat.

The same confusion of names hath Tigris, as Diglito, and Diglath, Scilax, and Solax: of the Hebrewes it was called Hiddekel: now of the inhabitants Tegil.

But Mercer vpon Genesis conceiueh rightly of these Riuer: for Euphrates and Tigris (sayth he) streame into foure branches, two of which keepe their ancient names, and the other other two are called Pifon and Gehon. The reason, why these two riuer ioyned in one (below Apamia) lose their names, and are called Pis-tigris, and the memorie of Euphrates extinguished, is, because the best part of Euphrates running through the channell of Gehon, sinketh into the Lakes of Chaldea not farre from Vr, the Citie of Abraham, and fall not intirely into the Persian Sea, as Tigris accompanied with Pifon doth.

This error that Pifon was Ganges, was first broched by Iosephus, (whose fields, though they be fertile, yet are they exceeding full of weeds) and other men (who take his authoritie to be sufficient in matter of description, whereupon depended no other important consequence (were not curious in the examination thereof. For Epiphanius, 10 Augustine, and Hierome, take this for currant; whereof it followed, that as Pifon was transported into the East India, to find out Hauilah: so was Gehon drawne into Africa, to compass Ethiopia. But if Hauilah, whereof Moses speaketh in the description of Paradise, be found to be a Region, adioining to Babylon on the one side, and Cush (which is falsly interpreted Ethiopia) fastened to it on the other side, wee shall not neede then to worke wonders (that is) to impose vpon men the transportation of Riuer, from one end of the world to the other, which (among other vses) were made to transport men. Now it was in the Valley of Shinar, where Cush the Sonne of Ham first sate downe with his sonnes Shebah, Hauilah, Sabiah, Raamah, Nimrod, &c. and of Hauilah, the sonne of Cush, did that Region take name, which Pifon compasseth; and the land (called Cush) 20 which Gehon watereth, tooke name of Cush himselfe. For as the sonnes of Ischan, Ophir and Hauilah, seated themselues as neere together as they could in India, so did the sonnes of Cush in Shinar or Babylonia, where Nimrod built Babel: for Hauilah or Chauilah was first Chusea of Cush; then Chusa, Susa, and Susiana.

From this Hauilah vnto the Deserts of Sur, did the Israelites and Amalechites possesse all the interciuent Countreies: for Saul smote the Amalechites from Hauilah to Sur: which 1 Sam. 15. 7. Sur, the Chaldean Paraphrast conuerteth Hagra, and Hagra bordereth the red Sea; but this was not meant from Sur vpon the Red Sea, to Hauilah in the East India, for Saul was no such trauailer or Conquerour, and therefore Hauilah must be found neerer home, where the sonnes of Ismael inhabited, and which Countrey Saul wasted: for Amalec & the Amalechites possesse that necke of Countrey, betwene the Persian Sea, and the Red Sea; Hauilah being the extreme of the one towards the East; and Sur of the other, towards Egypt and the West, leauing that great body of Arabia felix towards the South, and they spred themselues with the Midianites and Edumians, from the East part, or backe side of the Holie Land, to the bankes of Euphrates, comprising the best part of Arabia Petraea and Deserta.

§. XIII.

Of the Riuer Gehon and the Land of Cush: and of the ill translating of the Ethiopia for Cush, 2. CHRON. 11. 16.

40 Now, as Hauilah in the East India drew Pifon so farre out of his way thither, so I say did Cush (being by the Senentie translated Ethiopia) force Gehon into Africa. For Cush being taken for Ethiopia by the Greekes whom the Latines followed, Gehon consequently was esteemed for Nilus. But Ethiopians are, as much, as blacke or burnt faces, whose proper Countrey is called Thebaides, lying to the Southward of all Egypt. And although there bee many other Regions of Ethiopians, and farre South in Africa, yet those of Thebaides are those so often remembered in the Egyptian stories, and out of which Nation they had many times their Kings of Egypt: all which Ethiopians are very neere, or else directly vnder the Equinoctiall line, which is very far from that land inhabited by the Chusites; who are neither blacke of colour, nor in any sort neighbouring Terrida Zona. But this translation of the Septuagint, Pererius doth qualifie in this manner: There are (sayth he) two Ethiopia's, the East, and the West: and this diuision he findeth in Strabo, out of Homer. Now because there is no colour to make Chus Ethiopia in Africa, Pererius will make Chush and the land of the Chusites (which is Arabia Petraea, and a part of Arabia the Happy, with the Region of Madian) to bee the East Ethiopia.

Now if it be granted, that Cush and the land of the Chusites, be that tract from Sur to Hauilah, according to the Scripures: Habitanis Ismael ab Hauilah vsq. Sur, quare respicit Gen. 25. 18. Egyptum

Num. 12. 1.

Aegyptum introeuntibus Assyrios; ISMAEL dwelt from Hauilah unto Sur, that is, towards Egypt, as thou goest toward Assyria; The same sufficeth to proue that Gehon cannot bee Nilus, but a Riuer which watereth Cush, and not Ethiopia. But this place of Scripture, Habitauit ISMAEL, &c. hath this sense: Ismael dwelt from Hauilah, which is the way of Assyria, or the Countrey bordering Assyria; and Sur, which lyeth toward Egypt, which is as much to say, as, The issues of Ismael (whereof there were twelue Princes) whom God had promised to make a great people, inhabited all those Regions betwene the border of Egypt and Assyria. And that they were (according to the Word of God) so increased and multiplyed, it well appeared, when Zearah the Chusite, which others call Tharamiba, brought an Armie of ten hundred thousand against Asa King of Iuda. Which Armie came not out of Ethiopia beyond Egypt; for that had bene a strange progresse for such a multitude, as ten hundred thousand, hauing so mightie a King as the King of Egypt, betwene Palestina and Ethiopia. But these were the Chusites, Amalechites, Madianites, Ismaelites, and Arabians. For it is written, that after Asa (strengthened by God) had defeated this world of an Armie, hee in following his victorie tooke some of the Cities of King Zearah round about, as Gerar. Now that Gerar is a Citie of the Ethiopians, it cannot bee suspected: for these bee the wordes of the Scripture disprouing it: And ABRAHAM departed thence toward the South Countrey, and dwelt betwene Cadeish and Sur, and sojourned in Gerar: Now Sur is that part, vpon which Moses and the Israelites first set their fete after they passed the Red Sea, where the Amalechites in Rephidim set on them, supposing that they had bene wearie, and vnable to resist. Againe, in the storie of Isaac it is written: Wherefore ISAAC went to ABIMELECH, and the Philistims unto Gerar: and I am sure Abimelech and the Philistims were no Ethiopians. And lastly, Moses himselfe, where hee describeth the bounds of Canaan, hath these wordes: Then the border of the Canaanites was from Sydon, as thou comest to Gerar: for Sydon was the frontier of Canaan towards the North, and Gerar by Gazah towards the South. But indeed, howsoever Pererius doth with an honest excuse salue his translation of Chus for Ethiopia, yet it appeareth plainly, that the Septuagint and Iosephus did altogether misvnderstand this place. And first, for Homers East and West Ethiopia, they are both found elsewhere. For Plinie in his fift Booke and eighth Chapter, citeth Homer for an Authour of these two Ethiopias. But the East Ethiopia is that which compasseth Nilus to the South of Egypt, and is the South border thereof; now a part of the Empire of the Abyssines, vnder Prester Iohn; And the West Ethiopia is that, which ioyneth it selfe with the Riuer Niger, which wee call Senega and Gambia: for thereabouts are these Ethiopians called Perossi, Duratites, with diuers other names, which Plinie numbred. But all these are in Africa, and beyond the Desarts thereof, saith Plinie out of Homer, Agrippa, and Iuba; which Regions indeede (I meane that of Niger, and that of Prester Iohn, and the Troglodytes) lye due East and West. But as for Cush and the Region of the Ismaelites, &c. they are extended directly North from that Ethiopia, which is beyond Egypt. Now, that Iosephus was exceeding grosse herein, it appeareth by that fiction, vvhich hee hath of Moses vhen hee serued Pharaoh, in the warres against the Ethiopians: for in that (to make Chus, Ethiopia) hee transporteth Madian by miracle ouer the Red Sea, and beyond all Egypt, and setteth it in Ethiopia, as shall bee shewed more at large in the Chapter of the Worlds Plantation. Againe, that Gehon was improperly translated Nilus, Pererius confesseth, and layeth it rather to the corruption of the Greeke Copie, than otherwise. And whereas the Septuagint haue conuerted this place of the Prophet Hieremie; And what hast thou now to doe in the way of Egypt, to drinke the water of Nilus? Quid tibi vis in via Egypti; ut bibas aquam Gehon? to this saith PERERIVS, pro seculo Hebraice ibi non est vox Gehon, sed Sichor, quae significat nigrum & turbidum; Truely (saith PERERIVS) the word Gehon in this place, is not found in the Hebrew, but Sichor, which significeth blacke and troubled water.

Furthermore, this is a manifest and vnanswerable argument, that Chus was ill taken for Ethiopia. Moses married the daughter of Iethro, Prince and Priest of Madian, whom both the Greeke and Latine call a Madianite, and not Ethiopiassam, as (with Iosephus) the Geneua conuert it, though it helpe it a little with a marginall note. Now it is without dispute, that Zipporah was of the Countrey of Madian, which is that part of Arabia

Arabia Petraea, bordering the Red Sea, for it is written in the second of Exodus, that MOSES fled from PHARAO into the Land of Madian, and sate downe by a Well, &c. and againe, in the third of Exodus; When MOSES kept the sheepe of IETHRO his father in law, Priest of Madian, &c. Indeede, these foure nations are euery where mixt in the Scriptures, because they dwell confusedly together (to wit) the Madianites, the Ismaelites, the Amalekites, and the Chusites, which were all in one generall word, Arabians, and in the Scriptures sometimes called by one of those names, and sometimes by another, as in Gen. 37. v. 25. 27. & 28. that Ioseph was sold to the Ismaelites; and in the same Chapter, v. 36. it is written, that the Madianites sold Ioseph to Putiphar, Pharaoh's Steward. The Geneuians, in a marginall note (to auoid this confounding of the Nations) say, that Moses wrote according to their opinion, who tooke the Madianites and Ismaelites to be all one. But Moses wrote not after any mans opinion, he wrote the truth, and these were all Arabians, & so in this very place it appeareth by their merchandise, which they brought with them, when they bought Ioseph: for their Camels were laden with Spicery and Balme, and Myrrhe, which are the trades of Arabia felix: from whence chiefly, and from the East India, all the World is serued with Myrrhe and Frankincense; and their Spices they receiued from the East side of the Arabian Gulfe, as aforesaid. And in the 39. Chap. it is said: That Putiphar bought Ioseph of the Ismaelites, which the Chaldean Paraphrast in the same place calleth Arabians. Now, to make this the more manifest, it is written in the first of Iudges, That when Israel had sowne, then came vp the Madianites, and the Amalekites, and they of the East, and came vpon them: they of the East, were Arabians of the Desert; so as where before in the buying of Ioseph, the Madianites and the Ismaelites were confused, here the Madianites and Amalekites are made one Nation. For in the prosecution of the Story of Gedeon, the Madianites onely are named, as comprehending both Nations; and in the eighth Chapter, v. 24. these Nations are all called Ismaelites, and neither Madianites nor Amalekites. As when Gedeon desired, that euery man would giue him the golden care-rings, which they had taken after the victory against Zebah and Zalmunna, Kings of Arabia, amounting to 17000. shickles of gold, it is written: For they had golden care-rings, because they were Ismaelites. And these Ismaelites were a great and valiant Nation, and euer in action of warre. Manus eius contra omnes, & manus omnium contra eum; His hand (saith God of ISMAEL) shall be against all men, and euery mans hand against him. Of these Ismaelites came the Mahometan Arabians, though some Writers thinke Mahomet to be of the Schenite. And these Ismaelites, which inhabite chiefly in Cedar, and the Desarts of Sur and Pharan (saith Iosephus) vse poyson vpon their Arrowes, as the Indians doe. Towards the South-east are the Madianites, and Chusites: and beyond them, towards the Desarts of Arabia, the Amalekites; and all are one Nation, and all Arabians.

Lastly, the ill translation of Ethiopia for Chus, is among other places, made most apparant, in the second of Chronicles, in these wordes: So the Lord stirred up against IEREMIAH the spirit of the Philistines, and the Arabians, which confine the Ethiopians; so Hierom reades it: the Geneua translation hath it, which were besides the Ethiopians. Now, how far it is off betwene the Philistines, and the Negro's, or the Ethiopians, euery man that looketh in a Map may iudge. For the Philistines and Arabians doe mixe & ioyn with the Land of the Chusites, and are distant from Ethiopia about two and thirtie, or three & thirtie degrees, and therefore not their next neighbours, but all Egypt, and the Desarts of Sur and Pharan, are betwene them. So as this place of the second of Chronicles, should haue bene translated in these wordes: So the Lord stirred up against IEREMIAH, the spirits of the Philistines, and the Arabians, which confine and border vpon the Chusites, who indeed are their next neighbours. * Nulla superest dubitatio quin Ethiopia in Sacris literis sit Arabia propinqua; There remaineth no doubt (saith Steuchius) but Ethiopia in the Scriptures, is taken for that Countrey, which ioyneth to Arabia.

Now may we thinke is it probable, or possible, that Moses could be ignorant of Nilus? No, he knew it, no living man so well, and therefore would neuer haue named Gehon, for Nilus, or Nilus, for Gehon. Surely, if Moses had meant Nilus, when hee named Gehon, he would haue called the Riuer (into which he was cast vpon Reeds, and preferred by God, working compassion in the Daughter of Pharaoh) a Riuer of Egypt, where he was borne & bred, & wrought so many miracles. Besides, the Riuer of Nilus is often named in the Scriptures, but neuer by the name of Gehon. And if Moses had told the

C. 23. v. 3.

C. 1. v. 15.

Israelites, that Nilus had beene a Riuer of Paradise, they might iustly haue thought, that he had derided them: for they had liued there all dayes of their liues, and found no such Paradise at all, nor any memory, or speech thereof; except we shall beleue the Paradise of Hesperides, where (saith Plinie) there was nothing found in his time, but wilde Oliues in stead of golden Apples. But Nilus is twice called Sichor, once in Esay, & once in the Prophet Hieremie; and yet in those places it is not said to be a Riuer of Ethiopia, but of Egypt. For in a word, the Israelites had neuer any communion or affaires with the Ethiopians, nor any intelligence, or trade, beyond Egypt, to the South; but the Enemies which they had on the South, and East parts, were these Nations of the Chusites, Philistines, Ismaelites, Amalekites, and Madianites: who being often gouerned by many little Kings, or Reguli, were distinguished in names, according to the Fathers and heads of those Nations; but in one generall name were all Arabians. On the North side of Canaan, they were afflicted with the Calefyrians, with the Magogians, Tubalines, and others their adherents; and thirdly within themselves, the Nations, which remained of the ancient Canaanites, held the strongest Cities vpon the Sea-coast (as) Tyre, Sidon, Acon, Gaza, and many others: yea, Hierusalem it selfe was with-held from Israel (from the dayes of Moses, euen vnto the time of Dauid) by the Iebusites.

That which now remaineth of most difficultie is, that it doth not appeare, that any part of Gehon watereth that part of Arabia the stony, which the Chusites inhabited in the times of the Kings of Israel: and in this Desart it was that Matt. Beroaldus lost himselfe in seeking out Paradise: for he was driuen (to my vnderstanding) to create two Riuers, and call them Gehon, and Pison; to the end that the one might water Chus, and the other Hauilah, for I find none such in rerum natura, as he hath described: by which Riuers he also includeth within Paradise, euen Arabia the Desart.

And as he well proued that Pison was not Ganges; nor Gehon, Nilus, so where to find them else, where it seemeth he knew not. Certainly this Riuer of Gehon, which he maketh to fall into the Mediterranean at Gaza, and whose Springs he findeth farre East in Arabia, is but imaginary: for the Current by Gaza is but a small streame, rising betwene it and the Red Sea, whose head from Gaza it selfe is little more then twenty English miles, as shall appeare hereafter. But questionlesse, hence it comes that many were mis-raken. They all considered of the habitations of the Chusites, as they were planted when the state of Israel stood, and when it flourished, being then their neere Neighbours, & neuer looked backe to the first seates and plantation of Chus. For after the Flood, Chus and his Children neuer rested, till they found the Valley of Shinar, in which, and neere which himselfe with his sonnes first inhabited. Hauilah tooke the Riuer-side of Tigris chiefly on the East, which after his owne name he called Hauilah, (now Susana;) Ramamah, and Sheba farther downe the Riuer, in the entrance of Arabia felix. Nimrod seated himselfe in the best of the Valley, where he built Babel, whereof that Region had afterwards the name of Babylonia. Chus himselfe and his brother Mizraim first kept vpon Gehon, which falleth into the Lakes of Chaldea, and in proceesse of time, and as their people increased, they drew themselves more Westerly towards the Red or Arabian Sea: from whence Mizraim past ouer into Egypt, in which Tract the Chusites remained for many yeeres after. Now because there could be no such Riuer found in Arabia the stonie, which they might entitle Gehon, they translated Chus Ethiopia, and Gehon, Nilus. And if wee doe examine this mistaking by example, wee shall the better perceiue it as it was. For let vs suppose, that Brute, or whosoever else that first peopled this Iland, had arriued vpon the Riuer of Thames, and calling the Iland after his name Britannia, it might bee said that Thames or Tems was a Riuer that watered Britannia: and when afterwards in proceesse of time, the same Brute had also discovered and conquered Scotland, which hee also intituled by the same name of Britannia, after ages might conclude that Scotland was no part thereof, because the Riuer of Tems is not found therein. Or let vs suppose that Europa, the Daughter of the King of Tyre in Phenicia, gaue the name to Europe, according to Herodotus, and that the first discoverers thereof arriued in the mouth of some Riuer in Thrace, which then watered as much of Europe, as hee first discovered, shall wee in like sort resolute that France, Spain, and Italie, &c. are no parts of Europe, because that Riuer is not found in them, or any of them? in like manner was it said by Moses in his description of Gehon, that it watered the whole Land of Chus; but not the whole Land which

which the Chusites should or might in future time conquer, people, and inhabite, seeing in after-ages they became Lords of many Nations, and they might (perchance) haue beene Masters in time, (as the Saracens, which came of them, were) of a great part of the world. For (though the Babylonian Empire, which tooke beginning in Nimrod the sonne of Chus, consisted at the first but of foure Cities, (to wit) Babel, Erech, Acad, and Chalne, yet we find, that his Successours within a few yeeres after commanded all the whole World in effect: and the fame of Babel consumed the memorie of Chus. For of this Tower of Confusion did all that Land take the name of Babylonia: and the greatnesse of that Empire founded by Nimrod a yonger sonne, obscured the name and nation of his father Chus in those parts, vntill they crept farther off, and in places not yet entituled, and farther from the Babylonian Empire, where the Chusites retayned their names, which also they fastned to the Soile and Territorie by themselves afterwards inhabited and held. And we may not thinke, that Chus or any of his, could in haste creepe through those desert Regions, which the length of 130. yeeres after the Flood had (as it were) fortified with Thickets, and permitted euery Bush and Bryar, Reede and Tree to ioyn them (as it were) into one mayne body and Forrest. For if we looke with iudgement and reason into the Worlds plantation, we shall find, that euery Family seated themselves as neare together as possible they could; and though necessitie enforced them, after they grew full of people, to spread themselves, and creepe out of Shinar or Babylonia, yet did they it with this aduice, as that they might at all times resort, and succour one another by Riuer, the fields being then (without all doubt) impassable. So Nimrod, who out of wit and strength vsurped dominion ouer the rest, sate downe in the very confluence of all those Riuers, which watered Paradise: for thither it was to which the greatest troupes of Noahs children repayed; and from the same place whence Mankind had his beginning, from thence had they againe their increase. The first Father of men Adam, had therein his former habitation. The second Father of Mankind Noah, began from thence his dispersion.

Now as Nimrod the yongest, yet strongest, made his choice of Babel (as aforesaid) which both Tigris and Euphrates cleansed and enriched; so did Hauilah place himselfe vpon Piso-Tigris: Ramamah and his sonne Sheba farther downe vpon the same Riuer, on the Sea-coast of Arabia: Chus himselfe vpon Gehon, the fairest branch of Euphrates. And when they began to spread themselves farther off, yet they alwayes fastened themselves to the Riuers sides: for Ninive, Charra, Reseph, Canneh, &c. in Chaldea, and the other first-peopled Cities were all founded vpon these nauigable Riuers, or their branches, by which the one might giue succour and assistance to the other; as is already often remembered.

p. XV.

A conclusion by way of repetition of something spoken of before.

40 BVt now to conclude this dispute, it appeareth to me by the testimonies of the Scriptures, that Paradise was a place created by God, and a part of this our Earth and habitable World, seated in the lower part of the Region of Eden, afterward called Aram fluuiorum, or Mesopotamia, which taketh into it also a portion of Shinar and Armenia: this Region standing in the most excellent temper of all other, (to wit) 35. degrees from the Equinoctiall, and 55. from the North-pole: in which climate the most excellent Wines, Fruits, Oyle, Graine of all sorts are to this day found in abundance. And there is nothing that better proueth the excellency of this said soile and temper, then the abundant growing of the Palme-trees, without the care and labour of man. For wherein fouer the Earth, Nature, and the Sunne can most vaunt, that they haue excelled, yet shall this Plant be the greatest wonder of all their workes: this Tree alone giueth vnto man whatsoever his life beggeth at Natures hand. And though it may be said, that these Trees are found both in the East and West Indies, which Countries are also blessed with a perpetuall Spring and Summer; yet, lay downe by those pleasures and benefits the fearefull and dangerous Thunders and Lightnings, the horrible and frequent Earthquakes, the dangerous diseases, the multitude of venomous Beasts and Wormes, with other inconueniences, and then there will bee found no comparison betwene the one and the other.

What

What other excellencies this Garden of Paradise had, before God (for mans ingratitude and crueltie) cursed the Earth, we cannot iudge; but I may safely thinke, that by how much Adam exceeded all liuing men in perfection, by being the immediate workmanship of God, by so much did that chosen and particular Garden exceede all parts of the Vniuersall World, in which God had planted (that is) made to grow the Trees of Life, of Knowledge; Plants onely proper, and becomming the Paradise, and Garden of so great a Lord.

The summe of all this is, That whereas the eyes of men in this Scripture haue beene dimme-sighted (some of them finding Paradise beyond our knowne World: some, about the middle Region of the Ayre: some, eleuated neere the Moone: others as farre South as the Line, or as farre North as the Pole, &c.) I hope that the reader will be sufficiently satisfied, that these were but like Castles in the Ayre, and in mens fancies, vainely imagined. For it was Eastward in Eden (saith Moses) Eastward, in respect of Iudea, that God planted this Garden, which Eden wee finde in the Prophets where it was, and whereof the name (in some part) remaineth to this day. A Riuer went out of Eden to water this Garden, and from thence diuided it selfe into foure branches; and we find that both Tigris and Euphrates swimming through Eden, doe ioync in one, and afterward taking wayes apart, doe water Chus and Hauilah according to Moses: the true seates of Chus and his Sonnes then being in the Valley of Shinar, in which Nimrod built Babel. That Pison was Ganges, the Scripture, Reason, and experience teach the contrary: for that which was neuer ioyned, cannot be diuided; Ganges, which inhabiteth India, cannot be a branch of the Riuers of Eden; That Gehon was Nilus, the same distance maketh the same impossibilitie, and this Riuer is a greater stranger to Tigris & Euphrates, then Ganges is: for although there are betwenne Tigris and Ganges about foure thousand miles, yet they both rise in the same quarter of the World; but Nilus is begotten in the Mountaines of the Moone, almost as farre off as the Cape of good hope, and falleth into the Mediterran Sea: and Euphrates distilleth out of the Mountaines of Armenia, and falleth into the Gulfe of Persia: the one riseth in the South, and trauielleth North: the other riseth in the North, and runneth South, three score and three degrees the one from the other. In this leafe following, I haue added a Chorographical description of this terrestriall Paradise, that the Reader may thereby the better conceiue the preceding Discourse; and this is the reward I looke for, that my labour may but receiue an allowance suspended, vntill such time as this description of mine be reproved by a better.

CHAP. IIII.

Of the two chiefe Trees in the Garden of Paradise.

§. I.

That the tree of Life was a materiall tree: and in what sense it is to be taken, that man by his eating the forbidden fruit, is made subiect to death.

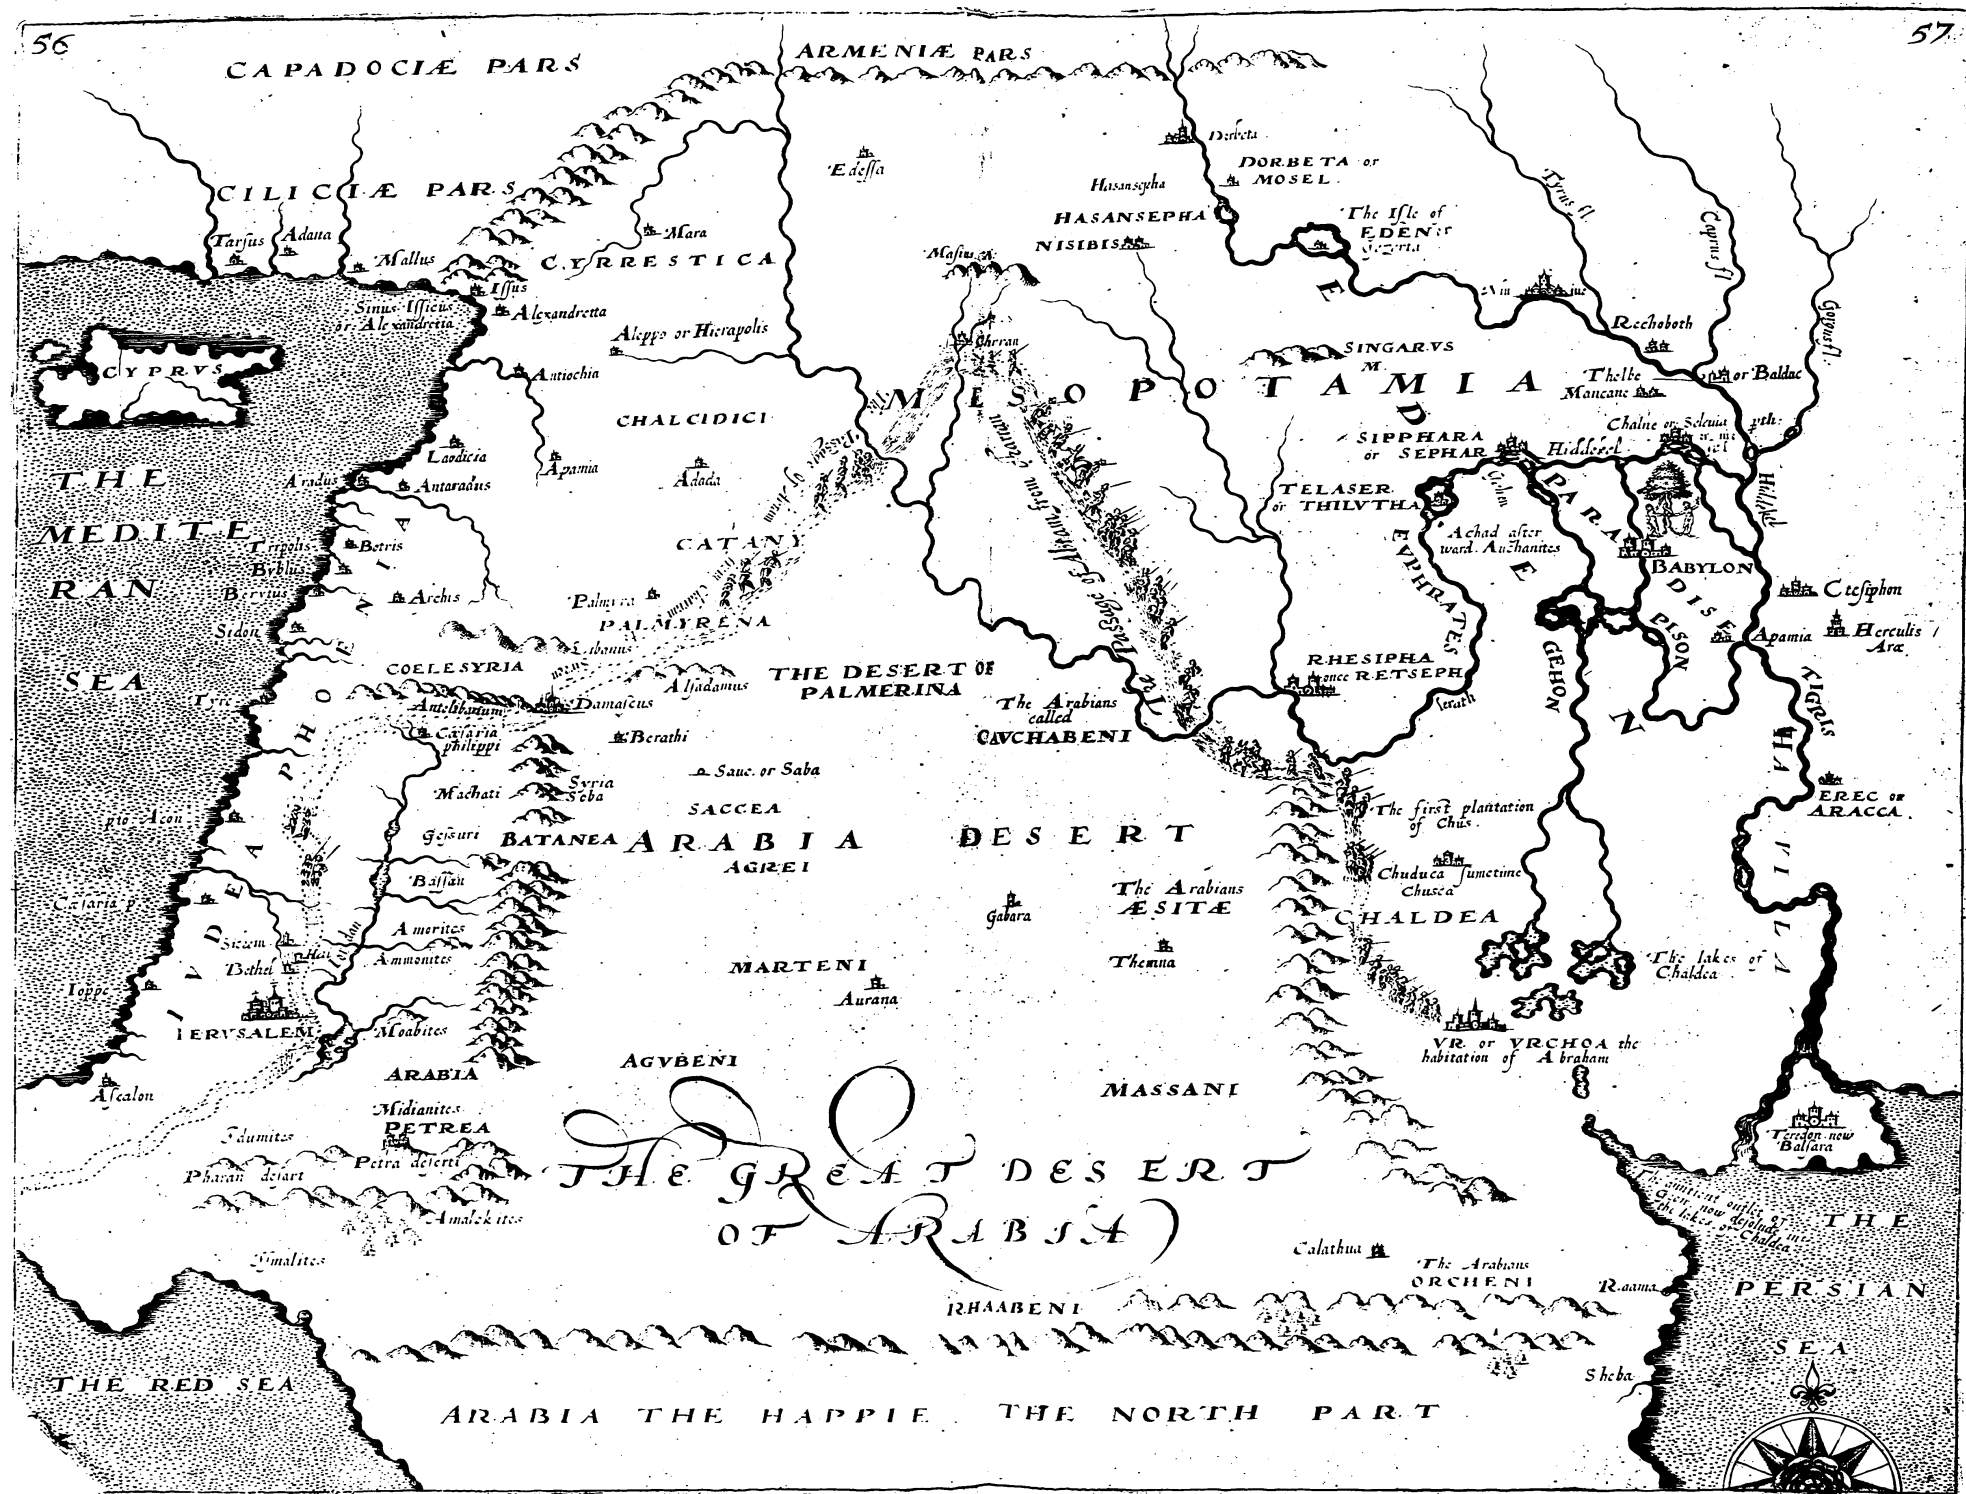

Or eating the forbidden fruit of the tree of Knowledge was Adam driuen out of Paradise, in exilium vite temporalis, into the banishment of temporall life, saith Bedæ. That these Trees of Life and Knowledge were materiall Trees (though Figures of the Law and of the Gospell) it is not doubted by the most religious and learned Writers: although the wits of men, which are so volatile, as nothing can fixe them, and so slipperie, as nothing can fasten so them, haue in this also deliuered to the World, an imaginarie doctrine.

The Tree of Life (say the Hebrewes) hath a plurall construction, and is to be vnderstood, Lignum vitarum, The Tree of liues, because the fruit thereof had a propertie, to preserve both the growing, sensitiue, and rationall life of man; and not onely (but for Adams transgression) had prolonged his owne dayes, but also given a durefull continuance to all posteritie; and that, so long, as a body compounded of Elements could last.

And although it is hard to thinke, that flesh and bloud could be immortall, but that it must once perish and rot, by the vnchanged Law of God imposed on his creatures,

Man

Man (notwithstanding) should haue enioyed thereby a long, healthfull, and vngriued life: after which (according to the opinion of most Diuines) he should haue bene translated, as Enoch was. And as before the Flood, the dayes of men had the long measure of eight hundred or nine hundred yeeres; and soone after the flood, of two hundred yeeres and vpwards, euen to five hundred: so if Adam had not disobeyed Gods first and easie Commandement, the liues of men on Earth might haue continued double, treble, or quadruple to any of the longest times of the first age, as many learned men haue conceiued. Chrysostome, Rupertus, Tostatus, and others were of beleefe, that (but for Adams fall and transgression) Adam and his Posteritie had bene immortall. But such is the infinite Wisdome of God, as he foresaw that the earth could not haue contained Man-
 10 kind; or else, that millions of soules must haue bene vngenerated, and haue had no being, if the first number, wherewith the Earth was replenished, had abode thereon for euer: and therefore that of Chrysostome must bee vnderstood of immortalitie of bodies, which should haue bene translated and glorified.

But of what kind or Species this Tree of Life was, no man hath taken on him to teach: in which respect many haue conceiued, that the same was not materiall, but a meere Allegorie, taking their strength out of Salomon, where Wisdome is compared to the Tree of Life, and from other places, where also Christ is called the Tree of Life, and out of the Apocalypsis, I will giue to him that ouercometh, to eate of the Tree of Life, which 20 is in the Paradise of God. But to this place Saint Augustines answer may suffice, (which is) That the one doth not exclude the other, but that, as there was a terrestriall Paradise, so there was a celestia. For although Agar and Sara were Figures of the Old, and New Testament, yet to thinke that they were not Women, and the Maide and Wife of Abraham, were meere foolishnesse. And so in this place the sense of the Scripture is manifest. For God brought out of the earth euery Tree faire to the sight, and sweete to taste; the Tree also of Life in the midst of the Garden: which sheweth, that among the trees, which the Earth by Gods commandement produced, the tree of Life was one, and that the fruit thereof was also to be eaten. The report of this Tree was also brought to the ancient Poets: for as from the indigested matter or Chaos, Hesiodus, Homer, Ouid, and others, 30 stole the inuention of the created World; so from the Garden of Paradise they rooke the Plat forme of the Orchard of Alcinous; and another of the Hesperides; and from the Tree of Life, their Nectar and Ambrosia; for Nectar, according to Suidas signifieth making young, and Ambrosia, immortalitie; and therefore said to bee the meate and drinke of the gods.

D. II.

Of BECANVS his opinion, that the Tree of Knowledge was Ficus Indica.

Now for the Tree of Knowledge of good and euill, some men haue presumed 40 further, especially Goropius Becanus, who giueth himselfe the honour to haue found out the kind of this Tree, which none of the Writers of former times could euergesse at, whereat Goropius much maruaileth. But as hee had an inuentiue braine, so there neuer liued any man, that beleued better thereof, and of himselfe. Surely, howsoeuer his opinion may be valued, yet hee surpeth the praise due to others; at least if the inuention bee at that price at which hee setteth it. For Moses Barcephas fastened on this coniecture about fixe hundred yeeres before Becanus was borne: and Barcephas himselfe referreth the inuention to an antiquitie more remote, citing for his Author Philoxenus Maburgensis, and others, whose very words Goropius vseth, both concerning the Tree, and the reasons wherewith hee would induce other men to that be-50 leefe. For Moses Barcephas in his Preatise of Paradise (the first Part and fol. 48.) saith, That the Tree of Knowledge was Ficus Indica; The Indian Fig-Tree, of which the greatest plentie (saith Becanus) are found vpon the bankes of Acclines, one of the Ri- uers which falleth into Indus; where Alexander built his Fléece of Gallies in, or neere the Kingdome of Porus.
 This Tree beareth a fruit of the bignesse of a great Peaze, or (as Plinie reporteth) somewhat bigger, and that it is a tree, se. semper serens; Alwayes planting it selfe; that it spreadeth it selfe so farre abroade, as that a troope of horsemen may hide themselues vnder it. Strabo saith, that it hath branches bending downwards, & leaues no lesse then a shield. Lib. vi. cap. 24.
Ariobolus

Aristobolus affirmeth, that fiftie Horsemen may shadow themselves vnder one of these Trees. Onciscritus sayeth this number to foure hundred. This tree (saith Theophrastus) exceedeth all other in bignesse, which also Plinie and Onciscritus confirme: to the trunk of which, these Authors giue such a magnitude, as I shame to reapeate. But it may bee, they all speake by an ill-vnderstood report. For this Indian Fig-tree is not so rare a plant, as Becanus conceiueh, who because hee found it no where else, would needes draw the Garden of Paradise to the Tree, and set it by the Riuer Acesines. But many parts of the world haue them, and I my selfe haue seene twentie thousand of them in one Valley, not farre from Paria in America. They grow in moist grounds, and in this manner: After they are first shot vp some twentie or thirtie foot in length (some more, some lesse, according to the soile) they spread a very large top, hauing no bough nor twigge in the trunk or stemme: for from the vtmost end of the head branches there issueth out a gummy iuyce, which hangeth downward like a cord or sinew, and within a few moneths reacheth the ground; which it no sooner toucheth but it taketh roote, and then being filled both from the top boughes, and from his owne proper roote, this cord maketh it selfe a Tree exceeding hastily. From the vtmost boughes of these yong Trees there fall againe the like cords, which in one year and lesse (in that World of a perpetuall Spring) become also trees of the bignesse of the neather part of a Lance, and as straight, as arte or nature can make any thing, casting such a shade, and making such a kind of Groue, as no other Tree in the world can doe. Now, one of these Trees 20 considered with all his yong ones, may (indeed) shrowd foure hundred or foure thousand Horsemen, if they please; for they couer whole Vallies of ground where these Trees grow neare the Sea-banke, as they doe by thousands in the inner part of Trinidado. The cordes which fall downe ouer the bankes into the Sea, shooting alway downward to finde roote vnder water; are in those Seas of the Indies, where Oysters breede; intangled in their beds, so as by pulling vp one of these cordes out of the Sea, I haue seene fise hundred Oysters hanging in a heape thereon; whereof the report came, that Oysters grew on Trees in India. But that they beare any such huge leaues, or any such delicate fruit, I could neuer finde, and yet I haue trauielled a dozen miles together vnder them: but to returne to Gyropius Becanus. This Tree (saith 30 hee) was good for meate and pleasing to the sight, as the Tree of Knowledge of good and euill is described to bee.

Secondly, this Tree hauing so huge a trunk (as the former Authors report; and Becanus beleueh) it was in this Tree that Adam and Eue hid themselves from the presence of God, for no other tree (saith he) could contayne them. But first it is certayne, that this Tree hath no extraordinarie magnitude, as touching the trunk or stemme, for among ten thousand of them it is hard to finde any one bigger then the rest, and these are all but of a meane size. Secondly, the words of Moses translated, in media ligni, are by all the Interpreters vnderstood in the plurall number (that is) in the midst of the Trees. But his third argument (or rather the argument of Moses Bar-ce- 40 phat, word for word) is, That when Adam and Eue found themselves naked, they made them breeches of Fig-leaues; which proueth (indeed) that either the tree it selfe was a Fig-tree, or that a Fig-tree grew neare it: because Adam being posselt with shame, did not run vp and downe the Garden to seeke out leaues to couer him, but found them in the place it selfe; and these leaues of all other were most commodious by reason of their largenesse, which Plinie auoweth in these words: Latitudo foliorum peltæ effigiem Amazonia habet; The breadth of the leaues hath the shape of an Amazonian shield: which also Theophrast confirmeth; the forme of which Targets Virgil toucheth:

Penthesilæa furens.

The Amazons with Crescent-formed shield
PENTHESILÆA leades into the field.

Here Becanus desireth to bee beleued, or rather threatneth vs all that reade him, to giue credit to his borrowed discourse, vsing this confident (or rather cholericke) speech: Quis erit tam impudenter obstinatus, si hæc à nobis de sic hæc ex antiquis scriptoribus cum MOSES narratione comparet, ut audeat dicere aliam arborem inueniri posse, quæ cum illa magis quadret? Who will be so impudently obstinate, if he compare these things which we haue reported of this Fig-tree, and out of ancient Writers deliuered, with the narration of MOSES, as to dare to auow, that any other Tree can bee found, which doth more properly answer, or agree therewith? But for my selfe, because I neither find this Tree, sorting in body, in largenesse of leaues, nor in fruit to this report, I rather incline to the opinion of Philo: That the Earth neuer brought forth any of these trees neither before nor after; but I leaue euery man to his owne beliefe, for the matter is of no great weight as touching his kinde: onely thereby, and by the easie Commandement by God giuen to Adam, to forbear to feede thereon, it pleased God to make triall of his obedience: Prohibita, non propter aliud, quam ad commendandum puræ ac simplicis Obedientie bonum; Being forbidden, not for any other respect, then thereby to commend the goodness of pure and simple Obedience. Auguste de Ciuit. Dei, l. 13. c. 20.

¶ III.

OF BECANUS his not vnnittily allegorizing of the story of his Ficus Indica.

BUT in this I must doe Becanus right, that he hath very wittily allegorized this Tree, allowing his supposition of the Tree it selfe to bee true. The effects whereof, because his discourses are exceeding ample, I haue gathered in these few words. As this Tree (saith he) so did Man grow straight and vpriht towards God, vntill such time as he had transgressed and broken the Commandement of his Creator; and then like vnto the boughes of this tree, he began to bend downward, and stooped toward the earth, which all the rest of Adams posteritie after him haue done, rooting themselves therein, and fastning themselves to this corrupt world. The exceeding vmbagiousnesse of this tree, he compareth to the darke and shadowed life of man, through which the Sunne of iustice being not able to pierce, wee haue all remayned in the shadow of death, till it pleased Christ to climbe the tree of the Crosse for our enlightning and redemption. The little fruit which it beareth, and which is hard to find among so many large leaues, may be compared (saith hee) to the little vertue, and vnperceiued knowledge among so large vanities, which obscure and shadow it ouer. And as this 30 fruit is exceeding sweet, and delicate to the taste and palate: so are the delights and pleasures of the world most pleasing, while they dure. But as all those things which are most mellifluous, are soonest changed into choiler and bitterness: so are our vanities and pleasures conuerted into the bitterest sorrowes and repentances. That the leaues are so exceeding large, the fruit (for such leaues) exceeding little, in this, by comparison we behold (saith he) the many cares and great labours of worldly men, their sollicitude, their outward shewes, and publike ostentation, their apparent pride and large vanities; and if we seeke for the fruit, which ought to bee their vertuous and pious actions, we find it of the bignesse of the smallest peaze; glorie, to all the world apparent; goodness, to all the world inuisible. And furthermore, as the leaues, body, and 40 boughes of this Tree, by so much exceed all other Plants, as the greatest men of power and worldly abilitie surpass the meanest: so is the little fruit of such men, and such trees, rather fitting and becomming the vnworthiest Shrub, and humblest Bryar, or the poorest and basest Man, than such a flourishing statelinesse, and magnitude. Lastly, whereas Adam, after hee had disobeyed God, and beheld his owne nakednesse and shame, sought for leaues to couer himselfe withall, this may serue to put vs in minde of his and our sinnes, as often as we put on our garments, to couer and adorne our rotten and mortall bodies: to pamper and maintayne which, wee vse so many vncharitable and cruell practices in this world.

¶ IPII.

Of the name of the tree of Knowledge of good and euill: with some other notes touching the storie of ADAMS sinne.

NOW, as touching the sense of this tree of Knowledge of good and euill, and what operation the fruit thereof had, and as touching the propertie of the Tree it selfe, Moses Bar-cephus an ancient Syrian Doctor (translated by Masius) giueth this iudgement: That the fruit of this Tree had no such vertue or qualitie, as that by the tasting thereof, there was any such knowledge created in Adam, as if hee had beene ignorant before; but as Iunius also noteth: Arbor scientia boni & mali (ideſt) experientia boni & mali ab euentu; The Tree of Knowledge of good and euill (that is) the experience of good and euill by the euent. For thus much we may conceiue, that Adam being made (according to the Hebrew phrase) by the workmanſhip of Gods owne hand, in greater perfection then euer any man was produced by generation, being (as it were) the created Plant, out of whoſe ſeed, all men liuing, haue growne vp; and hauing receiued immortalitie from the breath or ſpirit of God, he could not (for theſe reſpects) bee ignorant, that the diſobeying of Gods Commandement was the fearefulleſt euill, and the obſeruation of his Precepts the happieſt good. But as men in perfect health doe (notwithſtanding) conceiue, that ſickneſſe is grieuous, and yet in ſo ſuch degree of torment, as by the ſuffering and experience in themſelues they afterwards witneſſe: ſo was it with Adam, who could not be ignorant of the puniſhments, due to neglect and diſobedience; and yet felt by the prooſe thereof in himſelfe another terror then he had fore-thought, or could imagine. For looking into the glaſſe of his owne guiltie ſoule, he beheld therein the horror of Gods iudgements, ſo as he then knew, he feelingly knew, and had triall of the late good, which could not be prized, and of the new purchaſed euill, which could not be expreſſed. He then ſaw himſelfe naked both in body and mind; that is, deprived of Gods grace and former felicitie: and therefore was this tree called the tree of Knowledge, and not becauſe the fruit thereof had any ſuch operation, by any ſelfe qualitie or effect: for the ſame phraſe is vſed in many places of the Scriptures, and names are giuen to Signes and Sacraments, as to acts performed, and things done. In ſuch ſort as this tree was called the tree of Knowledge, by cauſe of the euent (as is aforeſaid:) ſo was the Well of contention therefore called Eſek, and the Well of hatred Sinath, becauſe the Heardſmen of Iſaac and Gerar contended for them; and the heape of Stones, called the heape of witneſſe, betweene Iacob and Laban, not that the ſtones bare witneſſe, but for a memorie of the Coudenant. So Iacob called the houſe of God Bethel: and Hagar; the Well in the Deſart, Vientis, & videntis.

But Adam being both betrayed and maſtered by his affections, ambitious of a farther knowledge then he had perceiued in himſelfe, and looking but ſlightly (as all his iſſues doe) into the miſeries and ſorrowes incident, and greatly affecting the ſuppoſed glorie which he might obtayne by taſting the fruit forbidden, he was transported and blowne forward, by the gentle winde of pleaſing perſwaſions, vnwares; his progreſſion being ſtrengthened by the ſubtile arguments of Satan, who laboured to poiſon mankind in the very roote, which he moyſtned with the liquor of the ſame ambition, by which himſelfe periſhed for euer.

Bar. ſem. 2. 12.

But what meanes did the Deuill find out, or what instruments did his owne ſubtilty preſent him, as fitteſt and apteſt to worke this miſchiefe by? euen the vnquiet vanitie of the woman; ſo as by Adams harkning to the voice of his wife, contrary to the expreſſe commandement of the liuing God, Mankind by that her incantation became the ſubiect of labour, ſorrow, and death: the woman being giuen to man for a Comforter and Companion, but not for a Counſeller. But becauſe thou haſt obeyed the voice of thy wife, &c. (ſaid God himſelfe.) Cursed is the earth for thy ſake, in ſorrow ſhalt thou eat of it all thy life. It is alſo to be noted, by whom the woman was tempted; euen by the moſt vgly and vnworthy of all beaſts, into whom the Deuill entred and perſwaded.

Gen. 3. 17.

Secondly, what was the motiue of her diſobedience: euen a deſire to know what was moſt vnfitting her knowledge, an affection which hath euer ſince remained in all the poſteritie of her ſexe. Thirdly, what was it that moued the man to yeeld to her perſwaſions? euen the ſame cauſe which hath moued all men ſince to the like content, namely, an vnwillingneſſe to grieue her and make her ſad, leſt hee ſhould pine and be ouercome with ſorrow. But if Adam in the ſtate of perfection, and Salomon the ſonne of Dauid, Gods choſen ſeruant, and himſelfe a man endued with the greateſt wiſedome, did both of them diſobey their Creator, by the perſwaſion and for the loue they bare to a Woman, it is not ſo wonderfull as lamentable, that other men in ſucceeding ages haue beene allured to ſo many inconuenient and wicked practices, by the perſwaſions of their wives, or other beſoued Darlings, who coner open and ſhadow many malicious purpoſes with a counterſeit paſſion of diſſimulate ſorrow and vnquietneſſe.

Of the cauſe and the reuenge of CAINS ſinne: and of his going out from God.

HE ſame Pride and Ambition which began in Angels, and afterward poſſeſt Adam, Cain alſo inherited: for Cain (enuious of the acception of his Brothers Prayer and Sacrifice) ſlue him, making himſelfe the firſt Man-ſlayer, and his Brother the firſt Martyr: the reuenge of which vnnaturall Murther, although, it pleaſed God to mitigate, when Cain cryed out that his puniſhment was greater then he could beare. For the ſame offence chiefly (wherewith the Sonnes of Adam, as it were, vrged and prouoked God) hee deſtroyed all Mankind; but Noah and his Family: for it is written, The Earth alſo was corrupt before God: of which in the ſame place Moses giueth a reaſon, for ſaith he, The Earth was filled with crueltie: and anon after, God himſelfe made the cauſe knowne vnto Noah, ſaying; An end of all fleſh is come before me, for the Earth is filled with crueltie thorough them, and behold, I will deſtroy them with the Earth, or from the Earth. Neither waſt this crueltie meant to haue bene in taking away the liues of men only, but in all ſorts of Iniuſtice and Oppreſſion. After this Murther of Abel, Cain went out from the preſence of the Lord, and dwelt in the Land of Nod, towards the Eaſt ſide of Eden: in which words, The going out of Cain from the preſence of the Lord, is not to be vnderſtood after the literall ſenſe; God being wholly in all parts of the World: Totus in celo eſt, totus in terra, non alternis temporibus, ſed vtrumq; ſimul; God (ſaith Saint AUGUSTINE) is wholly in Heauen, and wholly in Earth, not by enterchanged times, but all at once; And that this is true, Dauid witneſſeth: Iſt be in Heauen (ſaith DAVID) thou art there; in Hell, thou art there alſo. But what is meant thereby? Exijt à facie Dei (ſaith CHRYSOSTOME) Cain went out from the preſence of the Lord (that is) he was left of God, diſfauoured and bereaued of his protection.

Of CAINS dwelling in the Land of Nod: and of his Citie Enoch.

HIS word Nod or Naid, S. Hierome and many others vnderſtand to ſignifie wandering or incertaine habitation: vexation or agitation, ſaith Iunius; but the ſequentie conuert it otherwiſe, and take Nod for the proper name of a Countrey, and ſo doth Iosephus. But it ſeemeth to me, that Cain was rather a Vagabond or Wanderer in his cogitations, then any thing elſe, and that his thoughts and conſcience had no quiet or reſt, in regard of the Murther committed, iuſtly fearing (by his owne words) the like violence: And whoſoeuer findeth me (ſaith CAIN) ſhall ſlay me. Now that Nod or Naid was a Region wherin Cain inhabited, appeareth by the word (dwelt) for dwelling ſignifieth an abiding: and wee call thoſe people Wanderers and Vagabonds that haue no dwelling place. And to make this dwelling and abiding more manifeſt, Moses teacheth in what part of the Earth this his habitation was, which he affirmeth towards the Eaſt ſide of Eden. Secondly, it is ſaid by Moses, that after Cain departed from the preſence or fauour of God, he built a Citie, and called it by the name of his firſt-borne, Enoch; which ſheweth that he feared to wander, and rather ſought to fortifie himſelfe againſt reuenge. Cyrillus ſaith, that Cain and Abel were figures of Chriſt, and of the Iewes; and that as Cain after that he had ſlaine Abel vniuſtly, had thenceforth no certaine abiding in the World: ſo the Iewes, after they had crucified the Sonne of God, became Runnegates: and it is true, that the Iewes had neuer ſince any certaine Eſtate, Common-weale, or Prince of their owne vpon the Earth. Now this Land of Nod, Iunius taketh to be in Arabia Deſerta, a Region of Nomades; but Arabia the Deſert is not Eaſtward, or on the Eaſt part of Eden, neither are theſe Nomades any particular People or Nation. For all theſe, in what part of the World ſoeuer, which in old time liued by Paſtorage, and ſed (as we call it in Ireland) vpon white meate, without tilling of the ground, are called by the Greekes, Nomades, and by the Latines, Pastores vagi; as the Northerne Tartarians, the Getulians, and Numidians in Africa, the ancient Brittans, and the Northerne Irish: yea, such were the Inhabitants of Italie it selfe, till such time as Italus (who gaue them that name) taught them the Husbandry of tillage, vsed at this day. But the Region Eastward from Eden is that part of Assyria, called by Ptolemie, Calena, which also might be deriued of Carena, the country of Cain. And that Cain inhabited in those parts it may be gathered by the first possession of his Father Adam; for thus it is written, GEN. 3. Therefore the Lord God sent him forth from the Garden of Eden to till the Earth whence hee was taken: and in the Verse following: Thus hee cast out man, &c. and at the East side of the Garden of Eden he set the Cherubins: which sheweth that the entrie into Paradise was from the East, by which entrance Adam was cast out, and therefore inhabiting on that side of Paradise which was Eastward, according to the Text, Cain also in the same Region sought his dwelling place. Now, if the word Nod or Naid doe signifie profugus, that is, a fugitiue, we can giue no longer time to this vncertaine habitation of Cain, then till he built the Citie of Enoch, the first of the World, which hee inclosed either for his owne defence, or (as Iosephus writeth) to oppresse others thereby. So as for mine own opinion, I am resolu'd with the Septuagint, that Nod was the proper name of a Region; and for the word (Vagabond) which Cain vseth of himselfe, it seemeth by the perclose of the same Verse, that (Vagabond) is therein vnderstood for such an one as trauaileth in feare of reuengement: for whosoever findeth me (saith Cain) shall slay me; or else (Vagabond) is taken for a man without protection, and cast out from the fauour of God.

And because these Henochians, so called of the Citie Enoch, were the first Societie and ciuill assembly of all other, it is likely that the fame of these people (either for crueltie, strength, or other actions) liued in the memorie of Noah and his Sonnes; so that after the Flood (as there were of all sorts of natures, some veruiously, some impiously disposed, and euery actiue minde setting before it whom to follow or imitate) those people, which delighted in crueltie and oppression tooke on them their names whose natures they most liked and allowed; of whom these Henochians were not the least. Perchance the place it selfe where Enoch stood before the Flood, and whereof the Monuments might remayne (as the Pillars or the foundation of Ioppe did) gaue occasion to the Planters of that place to call themselves by the same name: for of those Henochians there were many Nations in the borders of Pontus, and Colchis in Iberia, Segdiana, and Bactria, and of the same name many Mountaines, as those which are otherwise called Coraxici. And seeing that it is hard to find out the truth of these things, which the most aged Time hath couered ouer or defaced, we may (according to the counsell of Plato) exceedingly reioyce, and therewith satisfie our selues, if of so grear and almost worn-out Antiquity, if of the eldest peoples names & Nations there remain any print or foot-steps to Posterity.

In * Plinie, P. Metla, Strabo, Valerius Flaccus, Lucan, Stephanus, wee finde those Henochi described, though diuersly written, as in Plinie, sometimes Heniochi, in Mela Eniochi, in Flaccus Heniochi, in Lucan Enochij, all which inhabit vpon the Sea Euxinus, but yet none of these are on the Eastside of Eden, or (according to Moses wordes) Eastward from Eden. For Moses, in all places where he describeth any Region, was so exceeding precise, as sometime he vseth the word East or South without borrowing or addition, at other times with a borrowing, as Eastward or Southward, or towards the East or South. In the place of Genesis the eleuenth hee writeth the word (East) simply and directly. And as they went from the East, they found a Plaine in the Land of Shinar, but in this of Cain he addeth the word (towards) as, in the Land of Nod, towards the East side of Eden; which may be taken, as inclining some one point or two either to the North or to the South of the East.

But as we may coniecture that these Nations tooke name of Enoch the Citie of Cain, or of the Region wherein it stood, when the same was repeopled after the Flood: so it is probable that these Henochij of Colchis, & other parts adioynning, were not the first of that name, after the Sonnes of Noah began to fill the World againe: because, had this Enoch the City of Cain stood in any of these parts, it had then bin seated North, and not East or Eastward from Eden. But as Plinie findeth their habitation towards Pontus, so afterwards hee goeth on Eastward, till hee tracke them or trace them out to their originall. For hee calleth these of Colchis (now Atengrelia) Sanni Heniochi; Ptolomie Zani; beyond which an hundred and fifty mile Eastward hee findeth another Nation of them about Iberia and Albania; and beyond these he againe discouereth a third Nation, from whence all the rest tooke beginning, which inhabited on the West side of the Mountaines of Paro-pamisus, betwene them and the great Riuer of Oxus, which bordereth Bactria on the North side; and these Henochij are due East from the Region of Egen, and Eastward from the very Garden it selfe.

And although wee cannot bee assured, that these Henochij tooke name from the memorie of the Citie of Enoch directly, yet because they inhabited due East from Paradise, and afterwards spred themselves Westward (as all Noahs Sonnes did that came into Shinar) the coniecture is farre more probable, then that of Annius the Frier, who sets Enoch in Phenicia, quite contrary to Moses word: Phenicia from all parts of Eden being directly West.

And besides these seuerall Nations of the Henochij, Stephanus findeth a Region called Henochia, and the same also in the East, with diuers Mountaines about Bactria and Sogdiana, of the same name. Onely the Gracians (according to their fabulous inuentions of all things else) out of the word (Heniochi) which signifieth Carts or Coach-men; make these Nations to haue sprung from the Waggoners of Castor and Pollux (to wit) Amphites and Telchius, who attended them in the enterprize of Iason into Colchis. And though I doe not deny, but that Iason with other Greekes ranged the Coasts of Asia the lesse in an open Boat or kind of small Galley, * of whom I shall speake in his owne time: yet no man doubreth but that the Tale of the Golden Fleece was for the most part Poeticall; and withall that in such an open Boat, which could hardly carry their owne Rowers, being 54. there was no place, and lesse vse of Coach-horses or Waggoners.

¶ III.

Of Moses his omitting sundry things concerning Cains Generation.

BV of the remembrance and testimonies of the name of the Citie of Enoch in prophane Storie, thus much may suffice; Now it followeth to answer some few Obiections against certaine particulars in the fourth and fifth Chapter of Genesis: against which for the first it is demanded, how it was possible for Cain (hauing no other assistance then his Sonne Enoch) to performe such a Worke as the building of a Citie, seeing there is thereto required so many hands, and so great a masse of all sorts of Materials? To which it is answered, that we are first to consider, That of Cain (because he was the Parent of an impious Race) Moses vseth no ample declaration; and so it best agreeth with his diuine Reason, seeing that he containeth the whole Storie of the first Race, which lasted by the least account, 1656. yeares, in fise thort Chapters. Yet thus much may euery man borrow of his owne weakest reason, That seeing it pleased God to bestow on the first Generations of mens liues so long a measure, as 800. and 900. yeares, that in such a space Cain had not want of leisure and means to build many such Cities as Enoch, be the capacite answering to what other of the World soeuer: for in what Age of Cains life he built it, the Scriptures are silent: as of whose times, and the times of his Issues Moses had the least care. And as it was said of Cain, that he built a City: so was it said of Noah, that his three Sonnes peopled all the World; but in both, the proceffe of time required to be vnderstood: which aduice seeing Moses vseth where the space lesse requireth it, as knowing that hee writ the Scriptures to reasonable men, wee may easily vnderstand, that such was his meaning also in all reports of like nature. For in making but a difference betwene the Birth of Abel, and Oblation of Cain, he spake it in this sort, Fuit autem post dies multos or a fine dierum (that is) in proceffe of time, it came to passe that Cain brought an Oblation. And therefore it is in like sort to bee vnderstood of Cain, that many yeares fore-gone, and when his people were increased, hee built the Citie of Enoch or Henoch.

And where it is written, as of Cain, that hee built Enoch, so of Salomon, that hee built the Temple of Hierusalem; yet it is well knowne of Salomon, that he employed in that Worke, 150000. Labourers: for this phrase or speech is common with our selues to say, The King inuaded; when he caused an inuasion to be made: and hee built, when he commanded such a building. And therefore seeing we find that Moses had no regard to the ages, to the birth, or to the death of any of Cains Issues, it is not to be maruailed at, why he also passeth

Pis. Hierog. l. 1.

The Egyptians affirme, that the longest time of mans life is a hundred yeares, because the heart in a perfect bodie waxeth and groweth to strength fiftie yeares, and afterwards by the same degree decayeth and withereth. Epigenes findeth in his Philosophie, that the life of man may reach to the period of an hundred and twentie yeares, and Berosus to a hundred and seuentene yeares. These opinions Plinie repeateth and reproveth, producing many Examples to the contrarie. In the last taxation, number and reuiue of the eighth Region of Italie, there were found in the Roll (saith Plinie) foure and fiftie persons of an hundred yeares of age: seuen & fiftie of an hundred and ten: two, of an hundred and fife and twentie: foure, of an hundred and thirtie: as many that were hundred and fife & thirtie, or hundred and seuen and thirtie yeares old: & last of all three men of an hundred and fortie: and this search was made in the times of Vespasian the Father and the Sonne.

Pis. l. 7. c. 48.

The simple dyet and temperate life of the Essaens gaue them long account of many yeares: so did it to the Secretaries of Egyptian Ceremonies, to the Persians Magicians and Indian Brachmans. The Greeks affirme out of Homer, that Nestor liued three Ages, and Tiresias six, Sybilla three hundred yeares, Endymion of the lesse Asia little lesse: Also Masanissa of Numidia liued very long, and Dando of Illyria. Among the Kings of Arcadia many liued three hundred yeares (saith Ephorus). Hellanicus affirmeth of the Epeians, that some of them liue full two hundred yeares: and so doth Diodorus Siculus of the Egyptians; and that these reports are not fabulous; Iosephus bringeth many witnesseth with himselfe, as Mare-shon, Berosus, Mochus, Esaius, Hieronymus, Egyptius, Hecateus, Ephorus; and others. And Anthony Fume an Historian of good reputation reporteth, that in the yeare 1570. there was an Indian presented to Solyman, Generall of the Turkes Armie, who had out-liued three hundred yeares. I my selfe knew the old Countesse of Desmond of Inchiquin in Muster, who liued in the yeare 1589. and many yeares since, who was married in Edward the Fourth time, and held her Ioynture from all the Earles of Desmond since then; and that this is true, all the Noblemen and Gentlemen of Munster can witness. Strozzius Cicogna, out of Torquemada Maffeus, and the like Authors, telleth of some that haue not only far exceeded the terme prescribed by Epigenes; but bene repayed from the withered estate of decrepit Age to fresh youth. But for length of life, if wee note but the difference betweene the abilitie of men in those dayes wherein Galen the Physician liued, it may easily proue vnto vs what Reeds we are in respect of those Cedars of the first Age. For Galen did ordinarily let blood six pound weight, whereas we (for the most part) stop at six Ounces. But to conclude this part, there are three things (not counting Constellations) which are the naturall causes of a long and healthfull life; (to wit) strong Parents, a pure and and thin Ayre, and temperate vse of dyet, pleasure, and rest: for those which are built of rotten timber, or mouldring stone, cannot stand long vpright; on Ayre we feed alwayes and in euery instant, and on meates but at times: and yet the heavy load of abundance, wherewith we oppresse & ouercharge Nature, maketh her to snike vnawares in the mid-way; and therefore with a good constitution, a pure Aire, and a temperate vse of those things which Nature wanteth, are the only friends and companions of a long life.

§. VI.

Of the Patriarchs deliuering their knowledge by Tradition: and that Enoch writ before the Flood.

Fourth scruple hath bene made, How the certaine knowledge of the Creation came to Moses, seeing there was no Storie thereof written, and if any such had bene, yet it is conceiued, that all memorie of Antiquitie perished in the vniuersall Flood.

But if we consider the curiosity and policie of elder ages, we shall find, that knowledge was the greatest treasure that men sought for, and which they also couered and hid from the vulgar sort, as Jewels of inestimable price, fearing the irreuerent construction of the ignorant and irreligious: so as whatsoever was attained vnto concerning God, and his working in nature, the same was not left to publique dispute, but deliuered ouer by heart and tradition from wise men to a posteritie equally zealous; Ex animo in animum sine litteris, medio intercedente verbo: From minde to minde without Letters, by way of tradition or word of mouth. And it was thought by *Esdra*s, Origen, and Hilarius, (as Mirandula conceiue) that Moses did not onely vpon the Mount receiue the Law from God, but with all, secretiorum & veram legis enarrationem; a more secret and true explanation of the Law; which (saith he, out of the same Authors,) he deliuered by mouth to Iosuah, and Iosuah to the Elders: For to teach these mysteries, which he called secretiora, to the rude multitude, were no other quàm dare sanctum canibus; & inter porcos spargere Margaritas, then to giue holy things to Dogges, and to cast Pearles before Swine. In succeeding times this vnderstanding and wisdome began to be written in Ciphers, and Characters, and Letters bearing the forme of beasts, birds, and other creatures; and to be taught onely to such as serued in their Temples, and to their Kings and Priests. Of the first the Cabala of the Iewes was an imitation: the inuention of the other is ascribed to Zoroaster, Mercurius, Cadmus, and others; but falsely.

This Cabala importeth a Law, receiued by tradition and vnwritten. Cabala in Hebrew is receptio in Latine, and a receiuing in English. And this custome was also held by the Druids and Bards of our ancient Brittaines, and of later times by the Irish Chroniclers called Rymers. If then such as would seeme wisest in the vse of reason, will not acknowledge, that the storie of the Creation or beginning of all things was written by inspiration, the holy Ghost guiding the hand of Moses; yet it is manifest, that the knowledge thereof might by tradition (then vsed) be deliuered vnto him by a more certaine presumption, then any or all the testimonies which prophane antiquity had preferred and left to their successors: which their wise men (as they terme them) did lay vp and defend from the iniurie of the time and other hazzards. For, leauing to remember that Adam instructed Seth, and Seth his children and successors, which cannot be doubted of, it is manifest, that Methusalem liued together with Adam himselfe two hundred fortie and three yeares, and Noah with Methusalem no lesse then fife hundred yeares: and before Noah died, Abraham was fiftie and eight yeares old; from whence this knowledge by an easie and ordinarie way might come to Israel, and so to Moses.

But besides this tradition, it is questionlesse, that the vse of letters was found out in the verie infancie of the World, proued by those prophecies written on pillars of stone and bricke by Enoch, of which Iosephus affirmeth, that one of them remaind euen in his time (meaning belike some ruine or foundation thereof), which pillars by others are ascribed to Seth. But of these prophecies of Enoch, Saint Iude testifieth; and some part of his Bookes (which contained the course of the Starres, their names and motions) were afterward found in Arabia felix, in the Dominion of the Queene of Saba (saith Origen) of which Tertullian affirmeth that he had seene and read some whole Pages. It is not therefore strange, that Moses came to the knowledge of the Creation, and storie of

of the first Age, seeing he might receiue it both by tradition and letters, had not the spirit of God instructed and inspired him as it did: which also his many and strange miracles (performed before he wrote the Scriptures) make more manifest.

Now for the Bookes of Enoch, howsoever some men make question of them, sure I am that Tertulian, Origen, Augustine, Beda, Procopius, Gazens, (with others) cite them in their writings: although Medina, for an argument to proue them vnwritten traditions, allegeth that Pope Gelasius among other the Apocryphall Scriptures (which he reiecteth) named not these of Enoch; but that whatsoever was remembered out of them, the same was deliuered by Tradition from the Iewes. But I rather thinke with Pererius, that such a Booke there was, and that the same was corrupted after the death of the Apostles, and many things added thereunto by Hēreūkes, who tooke occasion vpon the antiquitie thereof; and out of that place of Michaël contending with the Deuill about the bodie of Moses, to frame and adde thereunto many inuentions of their owne. One of the greatest arguments against these Bookes, is, that neyther Philo, nor Iosephus (the most diligent searchers of Antiquitie) make mention thereof. But against it I will set this opinion of Saint Avgvstine, Scriptisse quidem nonnulla diuina ENOCH illum septimum ab ADAM negare non possumus: That ENOCH the seuenth from ADAM did write diuers diuine things we cannot denie. Now his writings which came afterwards to light, were suspected because of the antiquitie, and of fables of Giants, supposed to be begotten of Angels, and others; and by so much the more, because no such Booke was found amongst those Canonically Scriptures, kept by the diligence of the Hebrew Priests in Armario Iudaico (saith Tertulian) who yet affirmeth that this Booke might be preferred by Enoch. Surely, that Enoch wrote the prophecies remembered by Iude, no man can denie; how they were deliuered to posteritie I know not, whether by the Iewes Cabala, or by what other meanes, the same is but mans coniecture. And (certainely) by the knowledge ascribed to Noah of the motions of the Heauens, and of the Natures and coniunctions of the Starres; and afterwards to some of his sonnes, to Zoroaster, and then to Abraham, it is verie probable that Noah had scene and might preferue this Booke. For it is not likely, that so exquisite knowledge therein (as these men had) was suddenly inuented and found out, but left by Seth to Enoch, and by Enoch to Noah, as hath bene said before. And therefore if letters and arts were knowne from the time of Seth to Enoch, and that Noah liued with Methusalelem, who liued with Adam, and Abraham liued with Noah, it is not strange (I say) to conceiue how Moses came to the knowledge of the first Age, be it by letters, or by Cabala and tradition, had the vndoubted word of God need of any other prooffe then self-authority.

§. VII.

Of the men of renowne before the Flood.

Now let vs consider the relation of Moses, who nameth seuen descents of Cains children, and of Adam by Seth ten: Seth being giuen by God in stead of Abel; and of Seth was Enosh begotten, in whose time men began to professe Religion, and to offer sacrifice in publique. For although Adam instructed his children in the knowledge of God their Creator, as appeared by the sacrifice offered by Cain and Abel; yet it seemeth that after the birth of Enosh men began publicly to call on the name of the Lord, that is, they serued and praised God by Communion and in publique manner, or calling vpon the name of the Lord, and thereby were the sonnes of God or the godly distinguished from the wicked. From the birth of Enosh the sonne of Seth, to the time of Enoch the sonne of Iared, there is nothing remembered by Moses, but their owne births, the births of their sonnes, the length of their liues, and deaths. But of Enoch it is written, That he walked with God, and he was no more seene: for God tooke him away. By that, that he walked with God, was meant, that he was a iust and vpright man, and that he feared, loued, and obeyed God. For the same phrase Moses vseth of Noah: Noah was a iust and vpright man in his time, and Noah walked with God. The Seuentie conuert it, Enoch placuit Deo; ENOCH pleased God. And although Aben-Ezra and others vnderstand this place, (tulit cum Deus: scilicet, mortuus est; God tooke him away, (that is) he dyed, which (indeed) agreeth both with the phrase of the Scripture, and with our manner of speech to this day, to say, God tooke him away, when he died; yet the difference which Moses maketh betwene the pietie of Enoch, and the rest of the Patriarchs, patriarchs, and by omitting the word (death) which he vseth to all else, makes it manifest, that Enoch was not dissolved as the rest. For to all the rest of the Patriarchs, Moses vseth these words, And he dyed; but of Enoch he spake otherwise, saying onely, he was missing, or he was not seene. Et non inueniebatur (saith the Apostle to the Hebrewes) quia Deus cum transiit; And he was not found, for the Lord tooke him away. In the same place it is expressly added, that he saw not death.

But whether this taking away of Enoch were not with the same kind of changing, which S. Paul promisseth, when he saith, that when the end shall come, we shall not all dye, but all shall be changed, I leaue it to the learned Diuines.

After Enoch, Moses passeth ouer to Methusalelem and Lamech, remembering (as of the rest) the times of their birth and death: sauing that Lamech prophesied of his sonne Noah, saying, This same shall comfort vs concerning our worke, and sorrow of our hand: as touching the earth which the Lord hath cursed. Of Noah, Moses writeth more amply, then of any of the rest of Adams children by Seth, being the last of the ten generations of the first Age, whom God (with his Familie) preferred, because hee was an vpright man in his time, and feared God.

But of the warre, peace, gouernement, and policie of these strong and mightie men, so able both in body and wit, there is no memorie remayning: whose stories if they had bin preferred, and what else was then performed in that newnesse of the World, there could nothing of more delight haue bene left to posteritie. For the exceeding long liues of men (who to their strength of body and naturall wits had the experience added of 800. and 900. yeares) how much of necessitie must the same adde of wisdom and vnderstandings? Likely it is, that their workes excelled all whatsoeuer can be told of after-times, especially in respect of this old age of the World, when wee no sooner begin to know, but we begin to die; according to Hippocrates: Vita brevis, ars longa, temporis paucitas; (which is) Life is short, Art is long, and Time is headlong. And that those people of the first age performed many things worthy admiration, it may be gathered out of these words of Moses; These were mightie men, which in old time were men of renowne. But these men of renowne (whom the Scripture afterwards calleth Giants, both for strength of body, and crueltie of mind) trusted so much to their owne abilities, as they forgot altogether the pietie of Seth, and the waies wherein Enoch walked: for all the imaginations of their hearts were euill, onely euill, and continually euill. And this wickednesse was not only found in the issues of Cain, but it was then vniuersal, when the children and sonnes of God (or of the godly) were corrupted and misled by their idolatrous wiues, the Daughters of Cain, or of those other men, louing themselves and the world only.

That these sonnes of God were Angels, which being taken with the beautie of women, accompanied them and begat Giants, some of the Fathers supposed, namely, Lafantius and Eusebius, misled by Iosephus: of whom I cannot doubt, but that they afterward changed their former opinions. And of this mistaking many Writers haue taken great aduantage, and haue troubled themselves with large answers and very needlesse: the question being vncapable of dispute, especially since S. Chrysostome and S. Augustine haue answered it largely long agoe. For, that good and godly men were honoured with the title of Gods children, it doth euery where appeare in the Scripture; and on the contrary, to thinke that Angels, who (as Christ witnesseth) behold the face of God, (that is) alwaies attend his Commandements, should after a separation from the rest which fel with Lucifer, forsake the glorious presence of their Creator, and become Incubi, or Succubi, contrarie both to Nature and Grace, were more then madnesse to imagine.

§. VIII.

That the Giants by Moses so called, were indeed men of huge bodies: as also diuers in later times.

Of these Giants which Moses calleth mightie men, Goropius Becanus an Antuerpian (who thought his owne wit more Giganticall then the bodies of Nimrod or Hercules) hath written a large discourse, intituled Gigantomachia, and strayed his braines to proue, that there were neuer any such men: his reasons (whosoever desires to lose time) he may finde them in the Treatises before named. It is true that Cyrollus reproues the Grecians Poets for their monstrous fictions: who affirme shamelesly, That

That the Giants haue in elder times not onely cast vp Mountaines vpon Mountaines, but remoued Ilands out of the Sea, with like fooleries. And for that inuention of casting vp Hills, and making warre with the Gods, no doubt but that the same was borrowed out of the storie of Nimrod, as before remembered; and euen out of this Scripture, That the Sonnes of God saw the Daughters of Men, of whom the first Giants were begotten, was that conceit taken of Orpheus and Hesiodus, That Giants were the sonnes of the Heauen and the Earth; meaning by the Heauens the sonnes of God, and by the Earth the Daughters of men: which verses of Orpheus are by Iohn Cassian (who hath written a wittie discourse of this subiect) thus changed into Latine:

*Nomine caelestes illos dixere Gigantes,
Orti quod terrâ fuerint & sanguine cali.*

From the Earth, and from thy bloud, O heauen, they came,
Whom thereupon the Gods did Giants name.

But what will not Opiniators and selfe-beleeuing men dispute of, and make doubt of, if they cannot conceiue that there were in the first Age such kind of men; and of which there haue beene in all times since? Seeing the Scriptures auow the one manifestly, and common experience the other?

And for that superlatiue straying of words, and the meaning of them, that the name of Giants was giuen to Oppressors and Tyrants, and not to strength of body and eminent stature: such men might with better reason call them Oppressors, because they were Giants, and therefore had abilitie to oppresse; then say, That they were called Giants onely, because Oppressors. For first, Moses himselfe calleth them mightie men; which sheweth a strength surpassing others: and afterwards, men of renowne, (that is) of great vnder-taking and aduenterous action. And if the same stature of body, and abilitie had not beene found among diuers Nations after the generall flood, then might this place of Moses haue more willingly harkened to a dispute, and yielded to interpretation.

But besides all these famous Giants found in prophane Histories (which I will referue to accompanie the Giants of Albion, in the storie of Britanie) the Scriptures doe cleerely and without all allegorickal construction auow, That, besides Nimrod, there were found of these Giants in the time of Abraham, of Moses, of Iosua, and of Dauid; namely, the Rephaims in Asteroth; the Zuzai or Zanzummims in Ham, and the Emims, which dwelt anciently in the Land of Moab: whom Moses (for stature) compareth with the Anakims, which dwelt in Hebron; for they also were taken for Giants as the Anakims: Likewise, where Moses speaketh of the Land of Ammon, he vseth these words: That also was taken for a land of Giants, for Giants dwelt therein afore-times: & whom the Ammonites call Zamzummims: a people that was great, and many, and tall as the Anakims. And these Giants called Rephaims in Asteroth and Karnaim, and the Zuzai or Zanzummims, Chedorlaomer King of Elam ouer-threw, assisted by other Kings his associates. Also the Prophet Amos found among the Ammonites men of Giant-like stature, whom he compareth to the Cedar, and whose strength to the Oaks; and the Prophet Baruch, These were the Giants famous from the beginning, that were of so great stature, and so expert in warre. Particularly it is written of Og, King of Basan, that his bed of yron was nine cubits long, and foure cubits broad: for onely Og King of Basan remained of the remnant of the Giants, who commanded the Kingdome of Basan, foure hundred yeares after the Expedition of Chedorlaomer. Moreouer, those Discoverers and Searchers of the Land of Promise (sent by Moses from Cadesbarne in Paran) made report at their returne of the great stature of those people in generall, and especially of the sonnes of Anak, in these words: All the people which we saw in it are men of great stature: for there we saw Giants, the sonnes of ANAK, which come of the Giants, so that we seemed in our fights like Grasse-hoppers, and so wee were in their sight, (that is) the Searchers found in their owne iudgements a marvellous difference betweene the Anakims and themselves: inasmuch that the Israelites were so stricken with feare, as they rather fought and desired to return againe into Egypt, and were more willing to endure their former slauerie, then to fall by the strokes of those fearefull Nations. Furthermore, the Scriptures put vs out of doubt, that Goliath the Philistine of Gath, was a Giant of fixe cubits and a span long: the Armour which he wore weighed fixe thousand shickles of brasse: the shaft of his speare was like a Vcauers beame, and his speare-head weighed fixe hundred shickles of yron. Also in Samuel there is mention of another Goliath of another Goliath, surnamed Gerhens, because he was of Gath: and of three other Giants; of which the first was slaine by Iehonathan, Dauids Nephew, who had twelue fingers, and as many toes: a man of great stature, and his fingers were by sixes, euen foure & twenty.

Also that Samson was of surpassing strength, no man doubteth, who tore a Lion as it had beene a Kid, and after slue thirtie of the Philistines, and (after that) a thousand more of them with a Iaw-bone of an Asse: And lastly, hee tooke the gates of Azzah, and the two Posts, and lifted them away with the barres, and put them vpon his shoulders, and carried them to the top of the Mountaine before Ebron. If then it be approved by euery iudgement, that both Nature and the Heauens waxe old, and that the great age of Time hath (with it selfe) infeeblid and almost worne out the vertue of all things, then I say, That as in all other kindes the Earth (before that Sinne had increased the curse and corruption) brought forth her young ones more strong and beautifull, than it did in after-ages: so also those Giants, those mightie men, and men of renowne as farre exceeded the proportion, nature, and strength of those Giants, remembred by Moses of his owne time, and after him their successors, as the ordinarie proportion of all men in generall, soone after the flood and in times farre off, exceeded the bulkes and bodies of men which are now borne in the withered quarter and Winter of the World. If therefore Giants were common in the third and fourth age, much more in the first flourishing youth and newnesse of the world.

But the wickednesse (especially in crueltie and oppression) of these men was such, as God therefore by the flood gaue end to all flesh, but to the iust Noah and his Family. And God repented him that hee had made man, which S. Augustine thus expoundeth: Neq. enim sicut hominem, ita Deum facti sui penitet, cuius est de omnibus omnino rebus tam fixa sententia, quam certa prescientia. Sed si non veretur Scriptura talibus verbis, non se quodammodo familiarius insinuat omni generi hominum, quibus vult esse consultum: ut & perterreat superbientes, & excitet negligentes, & exerceat quarentes, & aliat intelligentes; God (saith he) doth not repent him of any thing which he hath done: (as men vse to doe) but if the Scripture did not vse those words or the like, it should not (in a sort) insinuate it selfe familiarly to all sorts of men, for whom it would provide: that it might terrifie the proud, stir up the negligent, exercise the searchers of truth, and nourish those that vnderstand.

CHAP. VI.

Of idolatrous corruptions, quickly rising, and hardly at length vanishing in the world: and of the Reliques of Truth touching these ancient times, obscurely appearing in Fables and old Legends.

§. I.

That in old corruptions we may finde some signes of more ancient truth.

Ere before we proceed any further, the occasion offereth it selfe for vs to consider, how the Greekes and other more ancient Nations, by fabulous inuentions, and by breaking into parts the Storie of the Creation, and by deliuering it ouer in a mysticall sense, wrapping it vp mixed with other their owne trumperie, haue sought to obscure the truth thereof; and haue hoped, that after-ages, being thereby brought into many doubts, might receiue those inter-mixt discourses of God and Nature, for the inuentions of Poets and Philosophers, and not as any thing borrowed or stolne out of the Bookes of God. But as a skilfull and learned Chymist can as well by separation of visible elements draw helpfull medicines out of poyson, as poyson out of the most healthfull herbes and plants (all things hauing in themselves both life and death) so, contrarie to the purposes and hopes of the Heathen, may those which seeke after God and Truth finde out euery-where, and in all the ancient Poets and Philosophers, the Storie of the first Age, with all the works and manuailes thereof, amply and liuely exprest.

§. II.

§. II.

That the corruptions themselves were verie ancient : as in the Family of NOAH, and in the old Egyptians.

BVt this defection and falling away from God, which was first found in Angels, and afterwards in Men (the one hauing erred but once, the other euer) as concerning mankind it tooke such effect, that thereby (the liberall grace of God being with-drawne) all the posteritie of our first Parents were afterwards borne and bred in a world, suffering a perpetuall Eclipse of spirituall light. Hence it was that it produced plants of such imperfection and harmefull qualitie, as the waters of the general flood could not so wash out or depure, but that the same defection hath had continuance in the very generation and nature of mankind. Yea, euen among the few sonnes of Noah, there were found strong effects of the former poyson. For as the children of Sem did inherite the vertues of Seth, Enoch, and Noah; so the sonnes of Cham did possesse the vices of the sonnes of Cain, and of those wicked Giants of the first Age. Whence the Chal-deans began soone after the flood to ascribe diuine power and honour to the Creature, which was onely due to the Creatour. First, they worshipped the Sunne, and then the fire. So the Egyptians and Phœnicians did not onely learne to leaue the true God, but created twelue seuerall gods, and diuine powers, whom they worshipped; and vnto whom they built Altars and Temples. For Herodotus saith, Duodecim Deorum nomina primos Egyptios in usu habuisse, atque Græcos ab illis cepisse mutatos, cosq. prius aras, & i- magines, & templa Dijs sibi erexisse; The Egyptians (saith he) first deuised the names of the twelue gods, which the Greekes receiued from them, who first erected vnto themselves Altars, Images, and Temples for the gods.

Herod. in Euterpe.

§. III.

That in proceſſe of time these lesser errors drew on greater : as appeareth in the grosse Superſtitious of the Egyptians.

BVt as men once fallen away from vndoubted truth, doe then after wander foreuer more in vices vnknewne, and daily trauaile towards their eternall perdition :
so did these grosse and blind Idolaters euery Age after other descend lower and lower, and shrinke and slide downwards from the knowledge of one true and very God; and did not thereby erre in worshipping mortall men onely, but they gaue diuine reue-rence, and had the same respect to Beasts, Birds, Fishes, Fowles, Windes, Earth, Water, Ayre, Fire, to the Morning, to the Euening, to Plants, Trees and Rootes, to Passions and Affections of the Minde, to Palenesse, Sicknesse, Sorrowes, yea to the most vnworthy and basest of all these. Which barbarous blasphemie, Rhodius Anaxandrides derideth in this manner :

Nat. Com. l. 1. c. 7.

Bonem colis, ego Deū mactō bouem.

Tu maximum Anguillam Deum putas : ego

Obsoniorum credidi suauissimum.

Carnes suillas tu caues, at gaudeo
His maximè : canem colis, quem verbero
Edentem ubi deprehendo foris obsonium.

I sacrifice to God the Beefe, which you adore.

I broyle the Egyptian Eccles, which you (as god) implore:

You feare to eate the flesh of Swine, I finde it sweet.

You worship Dogges, to beate them I thinke meet,

When they my store deuoure.

And in this manner I VVENAL.

Porrum aut cape nefas violare aut frangere morsu :
O sanctas gentes, quibus hæc nascuntur in hortis
Numina !

The Egyptians thinke it sinne to root vp, or to bite
Their Leekes or Onyons, which they serue with holy rite:
O happy Nations, which of their owne sowing Haue store of gods in euery Garden growing !

§. IIII.

§. IIII.

That from the reliques of ancient Records among the Egyptians and others, the first Idols &
Fables were inuented : and that the first IVPITER was CAIN, VULCAN, TUBALCAIN, &c.

BVt in so great a confusion of vanities, where among the Heathens themselves there is no agreement or certainty, it were hard to find out from what example the beginnings of these inuentions were borrowed, or after what ancient pattern they erected their building, were it not certayne, that the Egyptians had knowledge of the first Age, and of whatsoever was done therein, partly from some inscriptions vpon stone or metall remayning after the Flood; and partly from Mizraim the sonne of Cham, who had learnt the same of Cham, and Cham of his father Noah. For all that the Egyptians write of their ancient Kings, and date of times, cannot be fayned. And though other Nations after them had by imitation their Iupiters also, their Saturnes, Vulcans, and Mercuries with the rest, which S. Augustine out of Varro; Eusebius out of many pro-phane Histories; Cicero, Diodorus Siculus, Arnobius, and many more haue obserued, to wit, the Phœnicians, Phrygians, Cretians, Greek, and other Nations; yet was Cain the sonne of Adam (as some very learned men conceiue) called and reputed for the first and ancient Iupiter; and Adam for the first Saturne : for Iupiter was said to haue inuented the founding of Cities; and the first Citie of the World was built by Cain, which he called Enoch, of whom were the Henochij before remembred. And so much may be gathered out of Plato in Protagoras, which also Higinius in his 275. Chapter confirmeth. For, besides that many Cities were founded by diuers men; Tamen primam latissimam à primo & antiquissimo Ioue ædificatam : yet the first and largest was built by the first and most ancient IVPITER, seated in the East parts, or in India, according to that of Moſes :
And CAIN dwelt towards the East side of Eden, &c. where also the Henochij were found after the Flood. And therefore was Iupiter by the Athenians called Policus, a Founder of Cities, and Herceios, an incloser or strengthener of Cities; (say Phornutus and Pauſa-nias) and that to Iupiter Herceios there were in very many places Altars and Temples erected. And that there were Cities built before the Flood, Plato also witnesseth, as may be gathered in this his affirming, that soone after mankind began to increaſe, they built many Cities; which as his meaning he deliuereth in plaine termes, in his third Booke of Lawes : for he saith, that Cities were built an exceeding space of time before the destruction by the great Flood.

This first Iupiter of the Ethnickes was then the same Cain, the sonne of Adam, who marrying his owne Sister (as also Iupiter is said to haue done) inhabited the East, where Stephanus de urbibus placeth the Citie Henochia. And besides this Citie of Henoch, Philo Iudeus conceiue that Cain built sixe others, as Maich, Jared, Tehe, Iesca, Selet and Gebat: but where Philo had this I know not. Now as Cain was the first Iupiter, and from whom also the Ethnickes had the inuention of Sacrifice: so were Tubal, Tubal and Tubalcain (inuentors of Pastorage, Smiths-craft, and Musick) the same, which were called by the ancient prophane Writers, Mercurius, Vulcan, and Apollo; and as there is a likelihood of name betweene Tubalcain and Vulcan: so doth Augustine expound the name of Noema or Naamath, the sister of Tubalcain, to signifie Venusta, or beautifull, Voluptas, or pleasure; as the wife of Vulcan is said to be Venus, the Ladie of pleasure and beautie. And as Adam was the ancient and first Saturne, Cain the eldest Iupiter; Eua, Rhea, and Noema or Naamah the first Venus: so did the Fable of the diuiding of the World betweene the three Brethren the Sonnes of Saturne arise, from the true Storie of the diuiding of the Earth betweene the three Brethren the Sonnes of Noah: so also was the Fiction of those Golden Apples kept by a Dragon, taken from the Serpent, which tempted Eua: so was Paradise it selfe transported out of Asia into Africa, and made the Garden of the Hesperides:
the prophecies, that Christ should breake the Serpents head, and conquer the power of Hell, occasioned the Fables of Hercules killing the Serpent of Hesperides, and descending into Hell, and captiuating Cerberus: so out of the taking vp of Henoch by God, was borrowed the conuersion of their Heroes (the inuentors of Religion, and such Arts as the life of man had profit by) into Starres and Heauenly Signes, and (withall) that leauing of the World, and ascension of Astræa; of which Ouid:

Vltima cælestium terras Astræa reliquit;

Astræa last of heauenly Wights the Earth did leaue:

For although thereby the Ethnicks would vnderstand Iustice it selfe to haue fayled, as it is a vertue abstract, and may bee considered without a person; yet as it is visuall among the ancient Poets to describe Vertues and Vices by the persons of men and women, as Desire by Cupid, Valour by Mars, Beautie or Lust by Venus, so doe they also the persons of Men by like Vertues and Vices, and therefore by Iustice and Astraea, Enoch: the iustice and pietie of Enoch being in the same manner exprest, as that of Noah was by Moses, for Noah was said to be a iust man; And NOAH walked with God. And of Enoch it is written, That hee walked with God, and hee was no more seene: for God tooke him away.

From this storie also of the first Age, and from that part where Moses remembreth the Giants begotten by the sonnes of good men vpon the daughters of the wicked (whom Moses calleth mightie men, and men of renowne) did they steale those wondrous great acts of their ancient Kings, and powerfull Giants; and againe their warre vndertaken against the gods, from the building of the Tower of Babel by the Giant Nimrod, as Saint Augustine termeth him. Which warre of their Giants, Cornelius Seuerus thus describeth:

Tentaure (nefas) olim detrudere mundo Sydera, captiuuq; Iovis transferre Gigantes Imperium, & victo leges imponere calo.

The Giants did aduance their wicked hand
Against the Starres, to thrust them headlong downe;
And robbing Ioue of his Imperiall Crowne,
On conquered Heauens to lay their proud command.

Whereby was meant that Nimrod purposed to raise the building of Babel to that height, as God neither by drawing waters from the deepe, nor by any coniunction of the starres, should bury them vnder the moysture of a second Floud, but that by this building (if they had beene herein victorious) they would haue giuen the Law to Heauen it selfe. Also the making of leagues, peace and couenants among Heathen Nations and Kings, confirmed by sacrifice, whereof Virgil both in the eight and twelfth of his Aeneides hath a touch, was (as it seemeth) borrowed from Moses, Exod. 24. Who when he read the Booke of the Couenant, sprinkled the people with bloud.

We find also many remembrances of Seth, the paternall Ancestor of Enoch and Noah: for Amenophis, the same King of Egypt, which reigned at such time as Moses carried thence the children of Israel, (as of late some learned men, mistaking his time, supposed) called his sonne and succellour Setho, of Seth; and of the same Seth (as many men of good iudgement haue granted) were the Princes of Thrace, called Seuthes, whereof there were many very famous. But herein was the memorie of Seth most manifestly preferred, that the Egyptians worshipped Seth, as their most ancient parent, and of the first tradition: in honour of whom they called a principall Prouince Sethetica. We also finde in Bithynia the Citie of Sethia, and others of the same name elsewhere. And sure, from the Egyptians did the Gracians borrow this kinde of Theologie, though they scorned to acknowledge any antiquitie preceding their owne; and that they might not seeme to learne elsewhere, they gaue the same names to their owne Idols, which the Egyptians did to theirs.

d. V.

Of the three chiefe IVPITERs; and the strange storie of the third.

BVt of all those armies of Iupiters remembred by the Ancients, Cicero maketh but three, because those were of most fame: which other Writers haue also done, who fought out, and laboured in their originals.

The first was Iupiter, the sonne of Ether and Dies, so called, because the one had reference to his celestiall conditions (for ether is as much as shining or pure fire;) the other discovered his naturall vertues, which dayes and times make more perfect, and are the witnesses of mens actions.

The second was said to be the sonne of Calum or Heauen, for the same former respect; and this Iupiter was an Arcadian, and King of Athens.

The

The third of whom all the Gracian fables were deuised, was of Creet (now Candia) the sonne of Saturne and Ops. The name deriued from the Latine is taken of Iuuans Pater, from the Greeke word Zeus, it signifieth life, but somewhat strayned. Boccas in his Genealogie of the gods, conceiueth, that his name was borrowed from Iupiter the Planer; but whether that starre had such a name, before the same was giuen to men, I know not. Iupiter is hot and moist, temperate, modest, honest, aduenturous, liberall, mercifull, louing, and faithfull, (that is) giuing these inclinations. And therefore those ancient Kings beautified with these conditions, might be called thereafter Iupiter; but howsoeuer they were, or were not with those vertues enriched, yet, by imitation, all Kings in the eldest times assumed those Titles and Sir-names: great Princes affecting as high Titles of honour and reputation in the world, (howsoeuer deserued) as the worthiest; that euer were, acquired by their well deseruings. Ioues omnes Reges vocarunt antiqui; The Ancients called all Kings IVPITERs, as Tzetzes in his Varia historia confirmeth: Reges olim Iovis vocarunt omnes; In old times all Nations called their Kings IVPITERs. But where this last and most remembered Iupiter was borne, it is vncertaine. Some there are that make him of Creet: others, that he was but sent thither by his mother Ops or Opis, to be fostered and hidden from the furie of Titan his vnkle: because it was conditioned betweene Saturne and Titan, that Saturne being a yonger brother, and reigning (for his owne life) by Titans permission, hee should put to death all his male children, lest the Titans might be interrupted by any of them in their succession; which agreement, because Saturne performed in his first borne, it is fayned that Saturne deuoured his owne children. Hereof Lycophron, thus turned into Latine;

*Haud fit pinguior,
Cradis sepulchrum quod sit ipse filijs.* | Saturne to be the fatter, is not knowne,
By being the graue and buriall of his owne.

This composition betweene Titan and Saturne, Sybilla also witnesseth in these;

*Conceptis verbis; TITAN iurare coegit
SATVRNVM, de se natum ne nutriat vllum,
Quo possint regnare senis post fata Nepotes.*

Things thus agreed: Titan made Saturne sweare
No sonne to nourish; which by reigning might Vsurpe the right of Titans lawfull heire.

But Opis the mother of Iupiter, being deliuered at once both of Iupiter and Iano, conueyed Iupiter (first called Lysanias) into Creet, as shee did afterwards his two brothers, Neptune and Pluto: where he was brought vp in Gnosus, the chiefe Citie of that Iland, by Cresta the King, or by the Curetes, a people and nation thereof.

Other challenge him to be of Thebes, and a Thebane: others call him an Arcadian: others make him of Messena. The like contention is found among the Greekes touching his education and first fostering. Some affirme, that hee was fed by Hony-bees: in recompence whereof hee changed their blacke coats and skins into yellow; a reward well fitting such a god: others, that he was nourished by Beares: others, by Goats: and of all these the idle Greekes haue many pretty tales. But in the end when Titan had knowledge, that Saturne had broken his faith, he set on him, and tooke him and his wife prisoners, whom Iupiter againe rescued and deliuered.

But lastly, the father and the sonne equally ambitious, the one doubted the other. Saturne being the lesse powerfull fled into Italie, and left his Kingdomes in Greece to his sonne. And although this Prince at the first purchased great honour, and for his many vertues the name of Iupiter was giuen him; yet, after hee was once settled and became potent, he gaue himselfe ouer wholly to palliardize and adulterie, without all respect of Honour, Law, or Religion. And it is reported by such as doe ascribe the actions of many to one Iupiter, that not therewith satisfied, hee was afterwards knowne to offend in the sinne of Sodomie with Ganimedes and others; and did not onely begin with incest, marrying his owne sister Tuno, but he rauished, betrayed, stole away; and tooke by strong hand all the beautifull women borne in his time, within the limits of his owne Kingdomes, or bordering them. Among whom these hereafter written were of greatest fame, Niobe, Laodemia, and Alcmena, the wife of Amphytrion, by whom hee had Pelafgus, Sarpidon, Argus, and Hercules: by Taygete he had Taygetus; of whom the Mountayne Taygetus tooke name, with another sonne called Saon, of whom Saona:

by Antiope he had Amphion and Zetus : by Lada ; Castor and Pollux , Helen and Clytemnestra : by Danae , Perseus : by Iordana , Deucalion : by Charme (the daughter of Eubolus) Britomartis : by Protegeia , he had Atthis the father of Endymion : and by Io (the daughter of Inachus) Epaphus , the founder of Memphis in Egypt : which Epaphus married Libya , of whom that Countrey tooke name , for so the Greeks afterward called Africa . Hee rauished Aegina the daughter of Aepolus , and carryed her into the Iland Oenopia or Oenotria , afterward called Aegina , on whom he begat Aeacus : by Torthebia hee had Archefilaus and Carbius : by Ora , Colaxes : hee had also Dardanus by Electra , who built Dardanium , afterward Ilium and Troy . He begat the brothers Talici , on Thalia , and on Caramantis , Hiarbas . He had besides these (if they belye not their chiefe God) Phileus and Pilumnus , inueters of Bakers craft ; and I know not how many more ; but I know well that he could not be father to all these , who were borne in ages so farre differing . And of these his seuerall rauishments , betrayings , stealing away of mens wiues , daughters , and sonnes , buying of virgins , and the like , came in all those ancient fables of his transformations into thowres of gold , eagles , bulls , birds , and beasts ; and of him , and by him (in effect) all that rabble of Gracian forgeries . And yet did not the Greeks and Romans feare to entitle this Monster , Optimus Maximus , though Cicero in his second Booke , de natura Deorum , affirme , that hee deserued nothing lesse ; and in his Oration , pro domo sua , reprocheth Clodius for his incest , by the name of Iupiter . His buriall was in Crete (saith LVCIAN .) Cresenses non solum natum apud se 20 sepulchrum Iovem restantur , sed etiam sepulchrum eius ostendunt ; The Cretians or Candians do not onely auow that IVPITER was borne and buried among them , but they shew his grave and sepulchre : which Epiphanius also confirmeth , forin his time there remayned the monuments of his tombe in the Mountayne Iasius . This Callimachus in his hymnes also witnesseth , but as offended thereat , saith thus :

The Cretians euer lyars were, they care not what they say:
For they a tombe haue built for thee, O King, that liu'ft alway.

Diodorus Siculus tels by way of report from the Libyan fables, confirmed (as hee saith) by some Greece Writers, that the originall of these gods was from the Westerne parts of Africk. For there among the Atlantide reigned one Vranus (which signifieth Heauen) called so for his great skill in Astrologie, and for his knowledge, and benefits to the people, honoured by them as a god, after his death. He had by many wiues 45. sons; but by his principall wife Titea, he had seuenteen sonnes and two daughters, all which were called after their mothers name the Titames. Of Titea, likewise it is said, that shee for her goodnesse was canonized as a goddesse, being dead, and called the Earth, as her husband was stiled Heauen. But of all the children of Titea, her daughter Basilea (which name founding as Queene in English, shee is by the Latine translator of Diodorus called Regina) excelling the rest as farre in vertue as in yeares, was by generall consent of her brethren, and of the people, appointed to rule as Queene after her fathers death, being as yet a Virgin. Shee tooke to husband her brother Hyperion, to whom shee bare a sonne and a daughter, called Sunne and Moon. The beautie and towardnesse of these children moued her brethren to enuy, and bred in them a feare of being excluded from the succession: wherefore they tooke the boy and drowned him in the Riuer Eridanus, now called Pae. The losse of this child caused his sister to breake her owne necke; and the losse of both her children made the mother to play many mad pranks, dancing with Cymbals, after a wilde fashion, in sight of all the people, before whom shee is said to haue vanished away. Ere shee dyed, her sonne (as the fable hath it) signified vnto her in a dreame, that hee and his sister, by the prouidence of God, should become immortall, that also the Sunne and Moon should bee called by their names, and that their death should bee reuenged vpon the murderers. According to which it is said, that the people did so call those two Planets. and vntill held her selfe as a goddesse, and termed her the great Mother, which name they had formerly giuen to her, for her motherly care in cherishing her brethren whilst they vvere young. Hyperion and his Race being extinguished, the other soanes of Vranus diuided the Kingdom. Of these Atlas and Saturne vwere chiefe. Atlas reigned ouer the countries lying about the Mountaynes, which afterward bare his name; a iust and wise Prince, deeply skilfull in Astrologie, and for inuention of the Spheare, said to haue supported Heauen.

He had many sonnes; but the principall of them called Hesperus, being of his fathers qualities and studies, was said to haue beene carried away by the winde, from the top of an high Hill in the midst of his contemplations, and his name in honour of him, imposed by the people vpon the morning starre. The seuen daughters of Atlas were also said to haue beene excellent Ladies, who accompanying such as came to be Deified, or registred among the Worthies, brought forth children, answerable in qualitie to those that begat them. Of these it is held, that the seuen starres called Pleiades tooke name. Saturne, the brother of Atlas, reigned in Sicilia, part of Africk and Italie. Iupiter, another of the sonnes of Vranus, reigned in Crete; who had ten sonnes which he called Curetes; he called that Iland after his wiues name, Idea, in which Ile he dyed, and was buried. But this Iupiter must not haue beene that great one, but vnder to the great Iupiter, if these fables of the Libyans were true. Saturne (as these Libyans tell the tale) was a great Tyrant, and fortified strong places, the better to keepe his people in subiection. His sister Rhea was married to Hammon, who reigned in some part of Africk. Hammon louing others as well as his wife, or better, got a daughter called Minerua, neare to the Riuer Triton, who thereupon was called Tritonia. Hee also begat on Amalthea a sonne called Bacchus, whom hee caused secretly, for feare of his life, to be brought vp at Nysa, an Iland in the Riuer Triton, vnder the tuition of his daughter Minerua, and certayne Nymphs. To Amalthea he gaue in reward a goodly Country, that lay on the Sea-coast, bending in forme of a horne, whence grew the tale of Amalthea's plentifull horne, famous among the Poets. When Rhea heard these newes, shee fled from her husband to her brother Saturne, who not onely enterrayned her as a sister, but tooke her to wife, and at her instigation made warre vpon Hammon, vanquished him by assistance of the Titanes, and made him flee into Crete. The Curetes, Iupiters children before mentioned, held the Iland at that time; which was new named Crete by Hammon, after the name of Crete the Kings daughter, whom hee tooke to wife, and had with her (women, as may seeme, being very gracious in those times) the Kingdome. Bacchus was growne a proper yong man, had found out the making of wine, the arte of planting trees, and many things else commodious for mankind; before the flight of his mother in law. Now therefore hearing report of all that had hapned, and that Saturne was comming against him with the Titanes; hee leuyed an Armie, to which the Amazons, liuing not farre from Nysa, added great forces, in loue of Minerua, who was entred into their profession. So Bacchus leading the men, and Minerua the women, they set forward against Saturne, met him, ouerthrew him; and taking many of the Titanes prisoners, returned to Nysa; where pardoning the prisoners, that promised to become his true followers, he prepared for a second Expedition. In the second Expedition he behaued himselfe so well, that he vvan the loue of all the people by vvhom he passed; insomuch that partly for good affection to him, partly in hatred of Saturnes rigorous government, he was greatly strengthened, and the enemie as much infeebled by daily reuolts. Comming to the Citie of Hammon, he wan a battaile of Saturne, before the very walls. After which, Saturne with his wife Rhea fled by night, setting the Towne on fire to despight Bacchus. But they were caught in their flight, pardoned by Bacchus, and kindly entreated. Saturne had a yong sonne by Rhea, called Iupiter. This child, Bacchus tooke with him in a great Expedition that he made into the East Countries; and comming into Egypt, he left this Iupiter, being then a boy, Gouernour of the Country; but appointed vnto him as an Quer-seer, one Olympus, of whom Iupiter grew to be called Olympius. Whilest Bacchus traualled through all Nations, as farre as into India, doing good in all places, and teaching many things profitable to the life of man; the Titanes had found out his father Hammon in Crete, and began to warre vpon him. But Bacchus returned out of India, with whom Iupiter from Egypt, and his sister Minerua, together with the rest, that afterwards were held as gods, loyning all their forces, went into Crete, ouerthrew the Titanes, chased them, tooke, and slue them, and freed the world of them all. After all this, when Hammon and Bacchus were dead, they were deified; and the great Iupiter, the sonne of Saturne, succeeding them, reigned Lord alone ouer all the world, hauing none of the Titanes left aliue, nor any other to disturbe him. Betweene this tale of the Libyan gods, and the Egyptian fables of Osiris, there is a rude resemblance, that may cause them both to be taken for the crooked Images of some one true historie. For the Expeditions of Osiris, and of Bacchus; the waies of the Giants in the one storie, of the Titanes in the other; the Kingdome of Egypt giuen by Hercules Lybicus to Orus, by Bacchus to Iupiter, the rattles of Iris, and the cymbals of Basilica, with many petty circumstances, neerely enough resemble each other, howsoever not alike fitted to the right persons. Sanchoniasso (as Ensebius cites him) would haue all these to be Phenicians, and is earnest in saying, That it is a true storie, and no allegorie. Yet hee makes it seeme the more allegoricall, by giuing to Vranus or Heauen for daughters, Fate and Beautie, and the like, with addition of much fabulous matter, omitted by Diodorus, though Diodorus haue enough. To the Genealogie he adds Elus or the Sonne, as father of Vranus, and among the children of Vranus, Iapetus, Betulus, and Dagon (whom Diodorus doth not mention by their names) giuing withall to Vranus the proper name of Terrenus or Indigena, and of Ilus to Saturne, but omitting Iupiter of Crete. The Pedigree of them is this:

of CHAM, and other wicked ones, whereof some gat, some affected the name of Gods.

EF Iupiter Belus, the sonne of Saturnus Babylonicus, otherwise Nimrod, it seemeth that Cicero had not heard, (at least by that name) who was more ancient than any of the former three by him remembered: for long after these times were the Greekes but Saluages, if they seeke no farther off for their Gods.

But the Egyptians, euen after the flood, began (somewhat before this Chaldean Iupiter) to intitle Cham, the parent of their owne Mizraim, Iupiter Chammon, or Hammon. For the Erymologie of this word (Hammon) which the Greekes deduce ab arenis, from the sands, is ridiculous (saith Peucer;) neither yet is his owne much better, who brings it from Hammath, which signifieth heate: because the said Temple of Iupiter Hammon was seated in Libya, where the ayre is exceeding hot and scorching. And as for the antiquitie of the latter Iupiter (among the Greekes and Romans the most renowned) it is certaine that he was borne not long before the warre of Troy, as by many of his soanes is made manifest; namely, Castor, Pollux, Hercules, Sarpedon, and others, which liued in that age of Priamus, vnder whom, and with whom Troy was destroyed.

Now seeing that mortall men, and the most wicked, were esteemed immortall among the Heathen; it was not to be wondred at, that Alexander Macedon, Tyberius, Nero, Caligula, and others, sought to be numbred among them, who were as deformed monsters as the rest: For by what reason could the same Deities be denied vnto Laurentia and Flora, which was giuen to Venus? Seeing they were as notorious and famous harlots as she was.

p. VII.

That the wiser of the ancient Heathen had farre better opinions of God.

BUT that euer Pythagoras, or Plato, or Orpheus, with many other ancient and excellently learned, beleued in any of these fooleries; it cannot bee suspected, though some of them (ouer-busily) haue mixed their owne inuentions with the Scriptures: for, in punishment for their fictions, did Pythagoras hang both Homer and Hesiodus in hell, where he fained that they were perpetually stung and pinched with Serpents. Yet it cannot be doubted, but that Homer had read ouer all the books of Moses, as by places stolne thence, almost word for word, may appeare; of which Iustine Martyr remembreth many in that Treatise conuerted by Mirandula. As for Plato, though hee dissembled in some things, for feare of the Inquisition of the Areopagites, yet Saint Augustine hath already answered for him (as before remembred) Et mirifice is: delectatus est, quae de vno Deo tradita fuerant; And he was greatly delighted in the doctrine of one God, saith Iustine Martyr. Now howsoever Lactantius pleased to reprehend Plato, because (saith he) Plato sought knowledge from the Egyptians, and the Chaldeans, neglecting the Iewes, and bookes of Moses: Ensebius, Cyrillus, and Origen, finde reason to beleue the contrarie, thinking that from thence hee tooke the grounds of all by him written of God, or fauouring of Diuinitie: and the same opinion had Saint Ambrose of Pythagoras.

But whether it were out of the same vanitie, which possesse all those learned Philosophers and Poets, that Plato also published (not vnder the right Authors names) those things which hee had read in the Scriptures; or fearing the seueritie of the Areopagites, and the example of his Master Socrates, by them put to death by poyson, I cannot iudge. Iustine Martyr (as it seemeth) ascribeth it wholly to Platoes feare, whose wordes among many other of the same effect, are these; PLATO MOSIS mentionem facere, ob id, quod unum solum Deum docuerat; sibi apud Athenienses non putauit, veritus Areopagum; PLATO fearing the Areopagites thought it not safe for him among the Athenians to make mention of Moses, that hee taught that there is but one God. But for that Diuinitie which he hath written in TIMEO; id ipsum de Deo descripsit quod & MOSES; He described and taught the same of God (saith IUSTINE MARTYR) which MOSES did. For where it pleased God by his Angell to answer MOSES, Ego sum existens (which is) I am; and existens misit me ad vos; I am hath sent me vnto you, herein did Plato (saith Iustine Martyr) no otherwise differ then that MOSES vied the word (qui) and Plato the word quod: MOSES enim qui existis (inquit,) PLATO quod quod existit; For MOSES saith, He who is; PLATO, That which is. Now of Gods incomprehensible nature, and of the difficultie either to conceiue, or expresse the same, hee giueth this testimonie: Genitorem vniuersitatis tam difficile est inuenire, quam inuentum impossibile digne profari; It is as hard to find out the Creator of the vniuersall, as it is impossible, if he were found, to speake of him worthily. And what can be more agreeable to the Maieſtie of Gods Nature, then this propertie by Plato acknowledged? Deus bonus, & quidem, Deus causa bonorum: malorum autem omnium non causa; God is absolutely good, and so (assuredly) the cause of all that is good: but of any thing that is euill he is no cause at all: and againe, Charitas Dei fuit causa factionis mundi, & originis omnium rerum; The love of God was the cause of the worlds creating, and the originall of all things. APULEIUS the Platonist: Summus Deus infinitus est, non solum loci exclusione, sed etiam nature dignitate: Et nihil est Deo similis & gratius, quam vir animo perfectus bonus; The most high God is also an infinite God, not only by exclusion of place, but by the dignitie of nature: neither is there any thing more like or more acceptable to God then a man of a perfect heart. THALES affirmed that God comprehended all things, and that God was of all things the most ancient: Quia nunquam esse cepit; Because he neuer had any beginning. ZENO, that God beheld euen the thoughts of men. Athenodorus, that therefore all men ought to be carefull in the actions of their life, because God was euery where present and beheld all done. But what can be more agreeable to MOSES storie of the Creation, then this opinion and description of the Worlds beginning in Euripides, Scholler of Anaxagoras?

*Calum terraq; vnus forme fuit:
Sed cum fuissent abinuicta amplexu mutuo,
Emerſit omnis in lucem res progenita,
Arbores, aues, fere, quaq; affert mare,
Genusq; mortalium.*

Heauen and Earth one forme did beare:
But when diſioyned once they were
From mutuall embraces;
All things to light appeared then;
Of trees, birds, beasts, fishes, and men
The still-remayning races.

And as in Pythagoras, in Socrates, and in Plato: so we find the same excellent vnderstanding in Orpheus, who euery where expressed the infinite and sole power of one God, though he vse the name of Iupiter, thereby to auoide the enuie and danger of the time; but that hee could attribute those things to the sonnes of men, and mortall creatures, which hee doth to this Iupiter, there is no man who hath euer heard of God, that can imagine.

Nomina Deorum (saith MIRANDULA) quos ORPHEVS canit, non decipientium demonum, à quibus malum & non bonum prouenit; sed naturalium virtutum diuinarumq; sunt nomina; The names of those Gods whom ORPHEVS doth sing, are not of deceiuing Devils, from whom euill comes, and not goodnesse; but they are the names of naturall & diuine vertues. Yea, that he yet reacheth higher, and speaketh of God himselfe, this his instruction to Musæus, and the Hymne following teach vs: Respicens verò ad diuinum hunc sermonem ei diligenter animum aduerte, intendens cordis rationis capax conceptaculum: rectam autem ascendende viam, & solum aspice mundi Regem. Vnus est ex se genitus, ex eo omnia nata sunt: ipse verò in illis versatur, nec quisquam cum intueri potest mortalium, sed ipse nihilominus omnes intuetur.

Then marking this my sacred speech, but truely lend Thy heart; that's reason's sphere, and the right way ascend,
And see the worlds sole King. First, he is simply one Begotten of himselfe, from whom is borne alone
All else; in which hee's still, nor could it ere befall
A mortall eye to see him once, yet hee sees all.

And againe the same Author,

*IUPITER omnipotens, & primus, & ultimus idem;
IUPITER est caput & medium: IOVIS omnia munus.
IUPITER est fundamen humi & stellantis Olympi.
IUPITER & mas est, & femina nescia mortis.

Et pelagi radix, SOL, LVNA, est IUPITER ipse
Rex & origo simul rerum est, & terminus idem.
Nam prius occuluit, magno post numine, sacrum
Cor referans bonus in dulcem dedit omnia lucem.*

The first of all is GOD, and the same last is he.
GOD is the head and midst, yea from him all things be.
GOD is the Base of earth, and of the starred skie.
He is the male and female too, shall neuer die.
The spirit of all is GOD, the SVNNE and MOONE, and what is higher.
The King, th'originall of all, of all the end.
For close in holy brest he all did comprehend,
Whence all to blessed light, his wondrous power did send.

Now besides these former testimonies, that all the learned men of ancient times were not so stupid and ignorant, as the Egyptians, Grecians, and other Nations by them infected were, I will onely repeat two or three other opinions, and leaue the Reader to those large and learned Collections of Iustine Martyr, Clemens, Lactantius, Eusebius, Eusebinus, Pencer, Plessis, Danaus, and others. For Cleanthes the Stoick, being demanded of what nature God was, described him by these attributes and properties: Bonus, iustus, sanctus, seipsum possidens, vtilis, speciosus, optimus, seuerus, liber, semper commodus, tutus, gloriosus, charitas, &c. Good, iust, holy, possessing himselfe, profitable, beautifull, best, seuer, free, alwayes doing good, safe without feare, glorious and selfe-charitie. EPICHRMVS affirmed, that God who beheld all things, and pierced euery nature, was onely and euery where powerfull: agreeing with DEMOCRITVS: Rex omnium ipse solus; Hee is the only King of Kings: and with Prodarus the Poet, Deus vnus, Pater, creator summus, atq; optimus artifex, qui progressus singulis diuersos secundum merita prabet; One God, the Father, the most high Creator, and best artificer, who giueth to euery thing diuers proceedings according to their deserts. This God (saith ANTISTHENES) cannot bee resembled to any thing, and therefore not elsewhere knowne; Nisi in patria illa perenni, cuius imaginem nullam habes: Saue onely in that euermolting Countrey, whose image thou hast none at all. Hereof also XENOPHANES COLOPHONIUS: Vnus Deus inter deos & homines maximus, nec corpore, nec mente mortalibus similis; There is one God among gods and men most powerfull, neither corporally, nor mentally like unto mortals: and XENOPHON, Deus qui omnia quatit, & omnia quiescere facit, magnus potensq; quod omnibus patet: qualis autem forma sit, nemini patet, nisi ipsi soli, qui luce sua omnia perlustrat; God who shaketh all things, and setteth all things at rest, is great and mightie, as is manifest to all: but of what forme hee is, it is manifest to none, save onely to himselfe, who illuminateth all things with his owne light. Finally, Plato saith: Totius rerum nature causa, & ratio, & origo Deus, summus animi genitor, eternus animantium sospitator, assiduus mundi sui opifex, sine propagatione genitor, neq; loco, neq; tempore villo comprehensus, eosq; paucis cogitabilis, memini effabilis; God is the cause, ground, and originall of the whole nature of things, the most high Father of the soules, the eternall preseruer of liuing creatures, the continual framer of his world, a begetter without any propagation, comprehended neither in any place, nor time; therefore few can conceiue him in thought, none can expresse what hee is. Therefore was it said by S. Hierome, Si enim cunctos Philosophorum reuoluas libros, necesse est ut in eis reperias aliquam partem vasorum Dei, ut apud PLATONEM, fabricatorem mundi, Deum: apud ZENONEM Stoicorum Principem, inferos & immortales animas &c. If thou consider all the bookes of the Philosophers, thou canst not but find in them some part of the Vessels of God, as in PLATO, God the Creator of the world: In ZENO Prince of the Stoicks, Hell and immortal soules, &c. And this is certaine, that if we looke into the wisdom of all Ages, wee shall finde that there neuer was man of solid vnderstanding or excellent iudgement: neuer any man whose minde the Arte of education hath not bended; whose eyes a foolish superstition hath not afterward blinded; whose apprehensions are sober, and by a pensiuus inspection on aduised; but that he hath found by an vnresistable necessitie, one true God, and euermolting being, all for euermolting, and all for euermolting sustayning; which no man among the Heathen hath with more reuerence acknowledged, or more learnedly exprest, then that Egyptian Hermes, howsoeuer it sayed afterward in his posteritie: all being at length by deuilish policie of the Egyptian Priests purposely obscured; who inuented new gods, and those innumerable, best sorting (as the Deuill perswaded them) with vulgar capacities, and fittest to keepe in awe and order their common people.

That Heathenisme and Iudaisme, after many wounds, were at length about the same time vnder IULIAN miraculously conformed.

BVt all these are againe vanished: for the inuentions of mortall men are no lesse mortall then themselves. The Fire, which the Chaldeans worshipped for a God, is crept into euery mans chimney, which the lacke of fuell starueth, water quenched, and want of ayre suffocated: Iupiter is no more vexed with Iunoes ielousies; Death hath perswaded him to chastitie, and her to patience; and that Time which hath deuoured it selfe, hath also eaten vp both the Bodies and Images of him and his: yea, their stately Temples of stone and durefull Marble. The houses and sumptuous buildings erected to Baal, can no where be found vpon the Earth, nor any monument of that glorious Temple consecrated to Diana. There are none now in Phenicia, that lament the death of Adonis; nor any in Libya, Creta, Thessalia, or elsewhere, that can aske counsaile or helpe from Iupiter. The great god Pan hath broken his Pipes, Apolloes Priests are become speechlesse; and the Trade of riddles in Oracles, with the Deuills telling mens fortunes therein, is taken vp by counterfeit Egyptians, and coozening Astrologers.

But it was long ere the Deuill gaue way to these his ouer-throws and dishonours: for after the Temple of Apollo at Delphos (one of his chiefe Mansions) was many times robbed, burnt, and destroyed; yet by his diligence the same was often enriched, repayed, and reedified againe, till by the hand of God himselfe it receiued the last and vtter subuersion. For it was first robbed of all the Idols and Ornaments therein by the Eubæan Pirates: Secondly, by the Phlegians vterly sackt; Thirdly, by Pyrrhus the sonne of Achilles: Fourthly, by the Armie of Xerxes: Fifthly, by the Captaines of the Phoenices: Sixthly, by Nero, who carried thence fife hundred brazen Images: all which were new made, and therein againe set vp at the common charge. But whatsoeuer was gathered betwene the time of Nero and Constantine, the Christian Armie made spoile of, defacing as much as the time permitted them; notwithstanding all this it was againe gloriously rebuilt, and so remayned till such time as Julian the Apostata sent thither to know the successe of his Parthian enterprise, at which time it was vterly burnt and consumed with fire from Heauen; and the Image of Apollo himselfe, and all the rest of the Idols therein molten downe and lost in the earth.

The like successe had the Iewes in the same Iulians time, when by his permission they assembled themselves to rebuild the Temple of Hierusalem: for while they were busied to lay the foundations, their buildings were ouerthrowne by an Earthquake, and many thousands of the Iewes were ouerwhelmed with the ruines, and others slaine, and scattered by Tempest and Thunder: though Am. Marcellinus report it more fauourably for the Iewes, ascribing this to the nature of that Element. For, saith hee, Allypius and the Ruler of the Prouince of Iudea, being by Julian busied in the reedifying of this Temple, flaming Balls of fire issuing neere the foundation, and oft consuming the Workemen, made the enterprise frustrate.

p. IX.

NOW the Deuill, because hee cannot play vpon the open Stage of this World (as in those dayes) and being still as industrious as euer, findes it more for his aduantage to creepe into the mindes of men; and inhabiting in the Temples of their hearts, workes them to a more effectuall adoration of himselfe then euer. For whereas hee first taught them to sacrifice to Monsters, to dead stones cut into faces of Beasts, Birds, and other mixt Natures; he now sets before them the high and shining Idoll of glorie, the All-commanding Image of bright Gold. He tels them that truth is the Goddesse of dangers and oppressions: that chastitie is the enemy of Nature; and lastly, that as all vertue (in generall) is without taste: so pleasure satisfieth and delighteth euery sense: for true wisdom (saith he) is exercised in nothing else, then in the obtaing of power to oppresse, and of riches to maintayne plentifully our worldly delights. And if this Arch-politician find in his pupils any remorse, any feeling or feare of Gods future Iudgement, he perswades them that God hath so great neede of mens soules, that he will accept them at any time, and vpon any conditions: interrupting by his vigilant endeouours all offer of timefull returne towards God, by laying those great blockes of rugged pouertie, and despised contempt in the narrow passage leading to his diuine presence. But as the minde of man hath two Ports, the one alwaies frequented by the entrance of manifold vanities; the other desolate and ouer-growne with grasse, by which enter our charitable thoughts and diuine contemplations: so hath that of death a double and twofold opening: worldly miserie passing by the one, worldly prosperitie by the other: at the entrance of the one wee find our sufferings and patience to attend vs: (all which haue gone before vs to prepare our ioyes) at the other our cruelties, couetousnesse, licentiousnesse, iniustice, and oppressions (the Harbingers of most fearefull and terrible sorrow) staying for vs. And as the Deuill our most industrious enemy was euer most diligent: so is he now more laborious than euer: the long day of Mankind drawing fast towards an euening, and the Worlds Tragedie and time neere at an end.

CHAP. VII.

Of NOAH'S Flood.

p. I.

Of Gods fore-warning: and some humane testimonies: and some doubting touching the truth of NOAH'S Flood.

F this destruction it pleased God to giue warning vnto Noah: who (saith Josephus) fearing to perish among the rest, Secedens cum suis in aliam regionem migravit: He departed with his children, and trauielled into another Region. And of these Giants from whom Noah withdrew himselfe, Berosus writeth in this manner; That they exceeded in all sorts of inhumane and vnnatural wickednesse, and that they were contemptores & religionis & Deorum, contempters of religion and of the Gods: among which mightie men (saith Berosus) unus erat qui Deorum venerantior, & prudentior cunctis, &c. vnic nomen erat NOAH, There was one more wise and reuerencing the Gods then the rest, whose name was NOAH: who with his three sonnes Sem, Iaphetus, and Cham, and with their Wiues, and the Wife of Noah, (namely, Titea the great, Pandora, Noela, and Noegla) preserued themselves in the Arke. This Arke God commanded Noah to prepare: And God jayd vnto NOAH, Make thee an Arke of Pine-trees: thou shalt make Cabines in the Arke, and shalt pitch it within, and without with Pitch. For God made Noah to know that an end of all flesh was at hand, and that the graues of the rebellious and cruell Generations were already fashioned in the Cloudes, which soone after should swallow vp and couer all liuing creatures, which breathed in the Ayre: Noah and his family excepted.

But this vniuersall graue of waters, and generall Deluge hath not bene received by all: for diuine testimonies doe not perswade all naturall men to those things, to which their owne reason cannot reach: Dum obvolata in obscuro veritas latet: Whilst the truth lieth wrapt up in obscuritie. Many there are who haue disputed against the vniuersalitie of this ouerflowing, and haue iudged that this Flood of Noah fell but in some particular places and Kingdomes: moued so to thinke, because in elder ages there haue bene many other Floods (as they suppose) of that nature. Hereof Nicholaus Damascenus writeth in this manner, as his words are cited by IOSEPHVS: Est super Minyadam excelsus mons in Armenia, qui Baris appellatur, in quo multos confugiens sermo est diluuij tempore liberatos, & quendam simul in Arca deuenit in huius vertice habuisse, lignorumq; reliquias multo tempore conseruatas, qui fortasse is fuit, de quo etiam MOSES Indecorum Legislator scribit: thus saith this Author. There is (saith he) about Minyada (or the Countrey of Minya) an exceeding high Mountaine in Armenia, called Baris: on which it is reported, that many hauing fled thither, were saued in the time of the Deluge: and that one was carried in an Arke, and rested vpon the top of the Mountayne, whereon there remayned a long time after certayne pieces thereof; and this might bee the same, of which MOSES the Law-giner of the Iewes maketh mention. And of this opinion were the

But Berosus (who after Moses was one of the most ancient, howsoeuer he haue bene since deformed and corrupted) doth in the substance of all agree with Moses as touching the generall Flood, taking from thence the beginning of his History in these words: Anie aquarum eladem famosam, qua vniuersus perijt Orbis, &c. Before that famous destruction of Waters, by which the World vniuersall perished: witnessing withall, that Noah with his wife Titia, and his three Sons with their wiues (in all eight persons) were only saued.

§. II.

Of the Flood in the time of OGYGES: and that this was not Noahs Flood.

10

BVt from the vanitie of the Greeks, the Corrupters of all truth, (saith Lactantius) who without all ground of certainty vaunt their Antiquitie, came the error first of all: who therein flattering themselves also, sought to perswade the world, that there was no Flood preceded the Flood of Ogyges, King of the Thebans in Baotia, or rather of Attica; and therefore (saith Rhodoginus;) OGYGM id appellat Poeta, tanquam peruetus dixeris; ab OGYGE vetustissimo: The Poets gaue the name of OGYGIA to things exceeding ancient, as of OGYGES the most ancient.

Rho. l. 15. c. 33.

Euseb. de prep. Euaug. lib. 1. c. 3. Ca. 22.

But let Ogyges be as ancient as those men can make him, yet it is manifest, that he liued but in Iacobs time (though Eusebius makes him later, and in Moses time) and was borne 67. yeeres after him. There is also an opinion, that Ogyges was Cadmus (and then was he farre later) as Rhodoginus in the ninth Booke of his Antiquities remembreth: Sunt tamen qui in Egypto regnasse autumant hunc: unde sit CADMVS qui in Graeciam profectus Thebas condidit, a boue iugulato sic nuncupatus, quoniam Syrorum lingua bos dicitur Thebe. There are (saith he) who thinke that this OGYGES did reigne in Egypt, whereby he should be CADMVS, who trauieling into Greece built Thebes, so named of a Beefe slaine: because in the Syrian Language, a Beefe is called Thebe.

But this Flood of Ogyges fell in the yeere of the World 3440. according to Eusebius, who followed the account of the Septuagint: and the Flood of Noah in the yeere 2242. after the same account; and so there came 1200. betweene these Floods, wanting but two, though herein Eusebius was much mistaken, and corrected this opinion in his Chronologie. Now although the very yeere and time of this ouerflowing in Achaia, or rather Attica, be not precisely set downe, but that there is a great difference among Writers, yet who soeuer makes it most ancient, finds about 500. yeeres difference betwene that and the generall Flood.

Lib. 1. c. 7.

For Paulus Orosius affirms, that this tempest fell vpon the Athenians, but 1040 yeeres before Rome built. Bucholzerus saith, it was 1043. elder then Rome; which was founded (according to the same Bucholzerus) in the worlds yeere 3219. though after the account which I follow. (and whereof I will giue my reasons in the Story of Abraham) it was built in the Worlds yeere 3280. Now the generall Flood preceded the building of Rome (saith Bucholzerus) 1563. yeeres: and the Flood of Ogyges (as before) 1043. Hence it followeth by easie calculation, that (if he place Ogyges in his true age) the difference betweene these two Floods must be 520. yeeres, to which we (allowing 60. more) find 580. And that this of Ogyges was not the same of Noah (except we call Noah, Ogyges Priscus, as some doe) it appears by this, that the Flood of Ogyges then King of Attica or Ogygia, did not extend it selfe any further then the banks of Archi-pelago, or the Aegean Sea. For whereas Mela, Plinie, and Solinus witnesse, that the Citie of Ioppe in Iudea was founded before the Flood; and that (notwithstanding the waight of Waters) there remained on certayne Altars of stone the Title of the King, and of his Brother Phineus, with many of the grounds of their Religion: sure, it is no where found among prophane Historians nor in the Scriptures, that euer the Flood of Ogyges spred it selfe ouer any part of Syria, much lesse ouer all the Earth. But that it drowned both the Regions of Africa about Athens, and that of Achaia in Peloponnesus, it is very probable. For it seemeth that at that time it was, when Helice and Bura were swallowed vp (Cities seated on the North part of Peloponnesus) of which Ouid:

Bura

Ouid. Metam. lib. 15. 303.

Bura and Helice, on Achaian ground
Are sought in vaine, but vnder Sea are found.

Of this Flood of Ogyges was inuented the Fable of Apollo and Diana. For Latona, the daughter of Caus, the Sonne of Titan, being beloued and forced by Iupiter, and by him gotten with child, Ino thereat enraged, permitted her (as they say) no part of the Earth to be deliuered on; and withall, caused the monstrous Serpent Pyhon to follow & affright her, where soeuer she trauelled: till at length arriuing at the Ile of Orygia, she was there received; in which she was deliuered, first of Diana, and then of Apollo, being Twins: whereof Barlaam makes this exposition: That at such time as the Deluge (which happened in Ogyges his reigne) ceased, out of the abundant moisture of the Earth (heat by putrifaction being thereto mixed) there were exhaled such thick mists and foggies, that in Attica, and along the Coasts of the Aegean Sea, neyther the beames of the Sunne by day, nor of the Moone by night, could pierce the ayre, or be perceiued by the inhabitants: so as when at length (the Earth being dried; and these vapours dissipated) the ayre began to be cleare, the people of Orygia espyed the light of the Moone somewhat before day, and in the same morning the Sunne also appeared: fabulously (because Diana represented the Moone, and Apollo the Sunne) they were reported to be borne in the Ile of Orygia, thereof afterwards called Delos; which signifieth manifestation.

Plin. l. 4. c. 15.

And surely it is not improbable, that the Flood of Ogyges being so great, as Histories haue reported it, was accompanied with much alteration of the ayre, sensibly discerned in those parts, and some vnusuall face of the Skyes. Varro in his Bookes de gente populi Romani (as he is cited by Saint Augustine) reporteth out of Cassor, that so great a mirade happened in the Starre of Venus, as neuer was scene before, nor in after-times: For the colour, the greatnesse, the figure, and the course of it, were changed. This fell out, as Adraffius Cyricenus, and Dion Neapolites, famous Mathematicians, affirmed, in the time of Ogyges.

Aug. de Ciuil. Dei. l. 2. cap. 8.

Now concerning the course of that or any other Planet, I doe not remember, that I haue any where read of so good Astrologers flourishing among the Greekes, or elsewhere in those dayes, as were likely to make any calculation of the reuolutions of the Planets so exact, that it should need no reformation. Of the colour and magnitude. I see no reason, why the difference found in the Starre of Venus, should be held miraculous; considering, that lesser mists and foggies than those which couered Greece with so long darknesse, doe familiarly present our senses with as great alterations in the Sunne and Moone. That the figure should varie, questionlesse it was very strange: Yet I cannot hold it any prodigie: for it stands well with good reason, that the side of Venus which the Sunne beholds, being enlightened by him, the opposite halfe should remaine shadowed; whereby that Planet would, vnto our eyes, descrying onely that part whereon the light falleth, appeare to be horned, as the Moone doth seeme; if distance (as in other things) did not hinder the apprehension of our senses.

A worthy Astrologer now liuing, who by the helpe of perspective Glasses hath found in the Starres many things vnknowne to the Ancients, affirmeth so much to haue bene discovered in Venus, by his late obseruations. Whether some watric disposition of the ayre might present as much to them that liued with Ogyges, as Galileus hath scene through his Instrument; I cannot tell: sure I am, that the discouerie of a truth formerly vnknowne, doth rather conuince Man of ignorance, than Nature of error. One thing herein is worthy to be noted, that this great, but particular Flood of Ogyges, was (as appeareth by this of Saint Augustine) accompanied with such vnusuall (and therefore the more dreadfull, though naturall) signes, testifying the concurrence of causes with effects in that inundation; whereas the Flood of Noah, which was generall, and altogether miraculous, may seeme to haue had no other token, or fore-shewing, then the long preaching of Noah himselfe, which was not regarded: for they were eating and drinking, when the Flood came suddenly, and tooke them all away.

§. III.

§. III.

Of DEVCALIONS Flood: and that this was not NOAH'S Flood: nor the Vmbri in Italie a remnant of any universall Flood.

A Second Flood of great fame, and of which the time is more certaine, was that of Deucalion in Thessalia; of which, S. Augustine out of Varro: Hic temporibus (ut Varro scribit) regnante Atheniensibus CEREAUS, successore CECROPS (ut autem nostris, EVSEBIUS & HIERONYMUS) adhuc eodem CECROPE permanente, diluvium fuit, quod appellatum est DEVCALIONIS: (that is) In these times (as Varro reporteth) CEREAUS the successor of CECROPS governing the Athenians, or (as our EVSEBIUS and HIERONYMUS say) CECROPS yet living; that Flood (called DEVCALIONS) happened.

And in the beginning of the eleventh Chapter of the same eighteenth Booke, he vseth these words: Eduxit ergo MOSES ex Aegypto populum Dei novissimo tempore CECROPS Atheniensium Regis, cum apud Assyrios regnaret ASCATADES, apud Sicyonios MARATHVS, apud Argiados TRIOPAS: MOSES led the people of God out of Egypt about the latter times of CECROPS King of the Athenians, ASCATADES reigning over the Assyrians, over the Sicyonians MARATHVS, and over the Argives TRIOPAS. So as leaving the curiositie of a few yeeres, more or lesse, it appeareth, that this Flood of Deucalion was eyther at the egression of the children of Israel out of Egypt, or neere it: and then after Noah 753. yeeres, according to Functius, who makes Cecrops to live in the yeere of the World 2409. 10 or if we follow Mercator, then 739. yeeres after Noah, and in the yeere of the World 2395. But if Deucalion were borne in the age of the World 2356. according to Codoman; then giving vnto Deucalion 40. yeeres of age when this Flood happened, it falleth within one yeere of Mercators account. But Deucalion by all approved Historians is said to have bene 82. yeeres old at that time. Now Clemens Alexandrinus dates the time of this Flood of Deucalion, and the conflagration and burning in Phaetons time, by the reigne of Crotopus, King of the Argives; but Crotopus lived King of the Argives six yeeres after Israel departed Egypt, which makes twentie yeeres difference, according to Functius, who will have this Flood and Burning to have fallen 14. yeeres before Moses left Egypt: for he gave of the Worlds yeeres to the Flood and Burning the yeere 2440. 30 and to Moses his egression the yeere 2454. And yet Cedrenus thinks that Moses was more ancient, and lived with Inachus; but that cannot be true: for then had the Flood of Deucalion, and the burning of Phaeton, preceded the Flood of Ogyges, which is denyed by all: for that of Thessalie (called Deucalions) followed that of Attica (called Ogygia) at least 250. yeeres, or thereabouts. Eusebius in his Chronologie makes it 230. and so doth P. Orosius: Eusebius about the 50. yeere of Moses life, and Cyrillus about the 67. and both after Noahs Flood 770. yeeres: for these be Clemens Alexandrinus his words: Fuit autem in Graecia tempore quidem PHORONEI, qui fuit post INACHVM inundatio qua fuit tempore OGYGIS: There happened in Greece in the time of PHORONEVS, who lived after INACHVS, the Flood of OGYGES. Now if the Flood of Ogyges in Attica were 1020. or 40 1016. yeeres before the first Olympiad, according to Eusebius and Orosius; (as before) then is it manifest, that taking 763. out of this number of 1020. it falls out, that Ogyges Flood happened before the Hebrewes left Egypt 250. yeeres, or 260. yeeres, according to the difference betweene the opinions of Eusebius and Orosius. And for my selfe (who rather follow those Chronologers, which giue 60. yeeres more to Abraham after the Flood, then the rest) I reckon the times which come betweene these Floods in this sort. The generall Flood was in the yeere of the World 1656. Jacob was borne in the yeere of the World 2169. so as from the beginning of the Flood to Jacobs birth, there were consumed 513. yeeres. Ogyges Flood happened 100. yeeres after Jacob was borne; and therefore after the generall Flood 613. yeeres. Now Deucalion was borne in the yeere of the World 2356. and had lived 82. yeeres, when his Kingdome of Thessalie was overwhelmed; (which added to 2356. make 2438.) his Flood was after Noahs Flood ended, 782. yeeres. And hereto Annus his Xenophon agreeth, who makes 700. yeeres betweene the generall Flood and Deucalions birth; to which adde 82. yeeres of his Age (as before) and then the Flood of Thessalie followed the generall 782. yeeres. The words of that Xenophon are these: Ab inundatione terrarum ad ortum DEVCALIONIS, secundo anno SPHAE RI, septingenti supputantur anni, qui natus anno duos & octoginta Thessaliam vidit inundatam: From the drowning of the World to the birth of DEVCALION, in the second

yeere of SPHAE RVS, are numbred 700. yeeres, and when DEVCALION was 82. yeeres old, he saw Thessalia drowned. This Flood happened in the Winter time about Parnassus: witnesseth Aristotle in the first of his Metears. And Varro (whom Saint Augustine so often citeth for his excellent Learning, especially in Antiquities) findeth this Flood of Deucalion to have happened in the time of Ceramus, who succeeded Cecrops: Orosius thinkes it somewhat later, Amphitryon reigning in Athens, the third from Cecrops. Onely this of Deucalion was very great, and reached not onely over Thessalie it selfe, and the Regions adioyning Westward, but it covered the greatest part of Italie: and eyther the same, or some other particular Flood then happening, oppressed Egypt, sayth Eusebius. 10 And therefore did the Greekes eyther thinke it, or faine it to be vniuersall; and Deucalion then King, sauing himselfe and some others on the Mountaine of Thessalie (of all other the highest, sayth Solinus) was by reason thereof (as Strabo witnesseth) sayd to be the preferer of Mankind. That this Flood covered a great part of Italie, Plinie and Solinus make it probable, who affirme, that the people then inhabiting Italie, were therefore called Latines: quia ab imbris diluvij superfuissent; and therefore also were they esteemed the most ancient Nation, as Strabo confirmeth in his first Booke, and Trecentius in his second: which Vmbri these Authors make the Parents of the Sabines; and the Sabines to be the Parents of the Samnites, Piceni, Lucani, Brutij, and all others inhabiting anciently the banks of the Mediterrane Sea. But that these Vmbri were not the Inhabiters 20 of Italie before the Flood of Noah, and so tooke name by sauing themselves vpon the Appenine Mountaines, the Scriptures teach vs; shewing who, and who onely then were preferred: which is sufficient. Report hath adventured further, telling vs, that the first people which after the generall Flood inhabited Italie, were the Camefones; (so named from Camele, whom Cato in originibus, another of Annus his Authors, names for a confort of Ianus) which people lived altogether a savage life, till such time as Saturne arriving on those Coasts, deuised Lawes to gouerne them by: the memorie of whose Acts in that Region, Diodor and Thallus amongst the Greekes, Nepos Celsus and Varro among the Latines haue preferred; and of whom Virgil:

40 And afterward in the Verses following he speaketh of the Ausones, and after them, of the Sicani: Nations, which againe sought to displant the Ancient Inhabiters:

*Tum manus Ausonia, & gentes venere Sicani,
Then came the Ausonian Bands, and the Sicani Tribes.*

Virg. l. 8. Aen.

Of these Sicani (which left Spaine, and sat downe in Italie) Thucydides and Plinie giue testimonie: who were againe expelled by the Ligy, sayth Thucydides. After all these plantations and replantations came the Vmbri, descended of the Gauls (sayth Annus) not of those Gauls of France, but of those of Scythia, who commanded a great part of Italie, even all 50 Hetruria and Campania; as Herodotus, Plinie and Dionysius haue assured vs: and therefore this Flood of Deucalion was long after that of Noah. For all those Nations were planted in Italie, and dispossessed of Italie againe, before the Vmbri were ever heard of, or had being. So that Kingdome was first called Camefones, then Latium or Saturnia, then Ausonia then Sicania; before the Vmbri (in whose time Deucalions Flood happened) possessed the same, about 306. yeeres before the Warre of Troy: Lycadon then governing Arcadia, who being the father of two and twentie sonnes, the youngest called Oenotrius invaded Italie, who gaue it the name of Oenotria. This name it held vntill Italus of the same Nation changed it into Italie, after his owne name, about 250. yeeres before the fall of Troy. After these, came came the Pelagi, of whom Plinie in his third Booke and fifth Chapter, and Strabo in his fifth, Thucydides in his sixth, speakes at large: and after them the Lydi, vnder Tyrrhenus their Captaine, that gaue name to the Tyrrheni; who casting thence the Vmbri, tooke from them three hundred Castles, and built therein twelue Cities; to which (after they had posselt and past ouer the Appenine Mountaines) they added diuers others, whereof Telsina (afterward Bononia) was one.

Now that there was not anciently such a Nation, as these Vmbri, in those parts, I doe not affirme; hauing respect to the testimonies before repeated. And Stephanus thinks, that the name was deriued from the Greeke word Ombros; but that these Vmbri of Italie were descended of the Nation of Scythians (called Galli) it shall be shewed hereafter.

§. IIII.

Of some other Records testifying the vniuersall Flood: and of two ancient Deluges in Egypt: and of some elsewhere.

Saint Augustine out of Varro affirmeth, that the Greekes and Latines made not any mention of the vniuersall Flood, because they had nothing of Antiquitie foregoing that of Ogyges; and therefore (according to Rhodoginus, before remembred) were all things among the Greekes (which antiquitie had worne out of knowledge) called Ogygia, which we in English commonly call (worme-eaten) or of defaced date. But as all the parts of the Earth were successiually planted and peopled; and as all Nations had their proper times, and not their beginning at once and at the instant: so did euery Familie, which afterward became a great People, with whom the knowledge of diuine Letters was not receiued, finde no Parent of more antiquitie, than such as they had themselves, nor allow of any before their owne; and as the Gracians, so did others vaunt themselves to be Indigene, and growing out of the Earth, or inuent some other prophane or ridiculous beginning. But the Chaldeans had certaine knowledge of Noahs Flood, as Berosus witnesseth; and Nicolaus Damascenus maketh particular mention thereof (as is aforesaid) though he also affirme by heare-say, that some Giants saued themselves vpon the Mountaines Baris in Armenia, but speaketh not thereof as from any authoritie approved: vsing the word Sermo est; That such a speech there was. And Eusebius remembreth a place out of the ancient Historian Abydenus: who writeth, that Sisithrus, to preserue himselfe from a Flood fore-told him by Saturnus, fled to the Hills of Armenia by ship, ad Armenian nauigio confugiebat: who the third day (after the Waters were fallen) sent forth birds, that finding no land to rest on, returned againe; which hee also did a second time, but at the third returne the birds feet were couered with mudde and slime. To this effect are Eusebius words out of Abydenus, which may seeme a true description (though in other termes) of Noahs Flood.

Cyrrillus also affirmeth, that Alex. Polyhistor maketh mention of this generall Flood. And Plato in Timeo produceth an Egyptian Priest, who recounted to Solon out of the holy Bookes of Egypt, the storie of the Flood vniuersall, which (saith he) happened long before the Gracian inundations. Fryer Annius his Xenophon remembreth a third Flood, which also Diodorus Siculus confirmeth, somewhat more ancient then that of Ogyges in Attica. For he named the generall Flood for the first, which happened (saith he) vnder the old Ogyges, Sub prisco Ogyge, which was Noah; he calleth the second Niliaca: Hercules and Prometheus then liuing, 44. yeeres before that of Attica, in the 34. yeere of Belochnus King of the Assyrians, though I doe not beleue him as touching the time. But this Flood couered a great part of the nether Egypt, especially all that Region subiect to Promethus; and hereof came the fable of the Vulture on Promethus his Liuer, afterward slaine by Hercules of Egypt: which fiction Diod. Siculus deliuereth in these words: *Fluuium propter cursus velocitatem, profunditatemque, aquarum Aquilam tunc appellatum, Herculem cum consilij magnitudine, tum virtute, voluere vestigio compressisse, & aquarum impetum ad priorem cursum conuertisse. Unde & Graci quidam Poete rem gestam in fabulam vertentes, HERCULEM tradunt Aquilam PROMETHEI securi depascensem occidisse; This Flood (meaning of Nilus) for the swiftnesse of his course, as also for the depth, was in those dayes called the Eagle: but Hercules by his great iudgement and vertue did againe compress and straighten the River, so farre extended and ouerspread, turning it into the old channels: Whence certaine Greeke Poets (conuerting this labour and worke of Hercules into a fable)* fable) denised, that Hercules slew the Eagle which fed on Promethus his Liuer; meaning that he deliuered Promethus of that sorrow and torment, which for the losse of his People and Countrey (by the Waters destroyed and couered ouer) he suffered.

A fourth Flood chanced about Pharus in Egypt, where Alexander Macedon built Alexandria, as Annius conceiueh out of his Xenophon, who in this briefe fort writeth of all these Inundations: Inundationes plures fuisse: prima nouimestris inundatio terrarum sub prisco OGYGE: secunda Niliaca, &c. There were many Inundations (saith this same Xenophon) the first, which was vniuersall, of nine Moneths, and this happened vnder the first OGYGES: the second was Niliaca, and of one Moneths continuance, in the time of Hercules and Prometheus, Egyptians: a third of two Moneths, vnder Ogyges Atticus: the fourth of three Moneths, in Thessalia, vnder Deucalion: and a fifth of the like continuance (called Pharonica) vnder Proteus of Egypt, about the time of Helens rape. Diodorus in his fifth Booke and eleuenth Chapter, taking the Samotheas for his Authors, remembreth a Flood in Asia the lesse, and elsewhere, of no lesse destruction then any of the other particular Inundations, saying, that the same happened before that of Deucalion; the Sea of Pontus and Hellepont breaking in ouer the Land.

But there haue been many Floods in diuers times, and ages, not inferior to any of these two last remembred, Niliaca and Pharonica in Egypt: as in the yeere of our Redemption 590. when in October of the same yeere, Gregorie then being Bishop of Rome, there happened a maruellous ouerflowing in Italie, and especially in the Venetian Territorie, and in Liguria, accompanied with a most fearefull storme of thunder and lightning: after which followed the great Plague at Rome, by reason of the many dead Serpents cast vp and left vpon the Land, after the Waters decreased and returned. And in the yeere 1446. there perished 10000. people, by the breaking in of the Sea at Dordrecht in Holland: of which kind I take that Flood to be of Achaia or Attica. Before that, and in the yeere 1238. Trihemius speaketh of an Earthquake, which swallowed many thousands: and after that, of a Flood in Friseland, in which there perished 100000. persons. Siroxius Sigos. in his Magia omnisaria, telleth of an Inundation in Italie, in the time of Pope Damasus, in which also many Cities of Sicily were swallowed: another in the Papacie of Alexander the sixth: also in the yeere 1515. Maximilian being Emperor. He also remembreth a peccilious ouerflowing in Polonia, about Craconia, by which many people perished. Likewise Viginier a French Historian speaketh of a great Flood in the South part of Languedoc, which fell in the yeere of our Lord 1557. with so dreadfull a tempest, as all the people attended therein the very end of the World, and Iudgement Day; saying, That by the violent descent of the Waters from the Mountaines, about Nismes there were remoued diuers old heapes and mountures of ground, and many other places rogne vp and rent: by which accident there was found both Coyne of Silver and Gold, diuers pieces of Plate, and Vessels of other Mettall, supposed to be hidden at such time as the Goths invaded that Prouince, in the yeere 1156.

§. V.

That the Flood of NOAH was supernaturall, though some say it might haue beene fore-seene by the Starres.

NOW how soeuer all these Floods, and many other, which haue couered at severall times severall Regions, not onely in these parts of the World, but in America also, (as I haue learned of some ancient Southsayers among them) may be ascribed to naturall causes and accidents; yet that vniuersall Flood (in the time of Noah) was powred ouer the whole face of the Earth by a power aboue Nature, and by the especiall commandement of God himselfe, who at that time gaue strength of influence to the Starres, and abundance to the Fountaines of the Deepe: whereby the irruption of Waters was made more forcible, then any abilitie of Nature could effect, or any second causes by whatsoeuer vnion could performe, without receiuing from the Fountaine of all power strength, and faculties supernaturall. Henricus Mechliniensis, a Scholler of Albertus Magnus, in his Commentaries vpon the great coniunctions of Albu Masar obserueth, that before the Flood of Noah, the like coniunction of Jupiter and Saturne, happened in the last degree of Cancer, against that constellation since called the Ship of Argos; by which the Flood of Noah might be fore-told, because Cancer is both a watric Signe, and the House of the Moone, which is the Ladie of the Sea, and of Moysture, according to the rules of Astronomie, and common experience. And this opinion Petrus de Aliaco vpon Genesis confirmeth, affirming, that although Noah did well know this Floud by diuine reuelation, yet (this coniunction being notorious) he could not be ignorant of the second causes thereof: for those were not onely signes, but also working causes, by strength receiued from the first cause, which is God himselfe: and further, that by * Cataclysmus Cæli (Englified the Windores of Heauen) Moses meant this great and watric coniunction; the word (Cataclysmus) signifying flowing downe or comming downe. Now (saith P. de Aliaco) it pleased God to ordaine by the course of the Heauens such a constellation, by which all men might behold therein their destruction towards, and thereby forsake those wicked ways wherein they walked, and call vnto God for mercy.

Of this iudgement was Gul. Parisiensis, who vnderstood, that the words Cataclysmus Cæli, or Windores of Heauen, were to be taken for the former coniunction, or for these watric Signes, Cancer, Pisces, Pleiades, Hyades, and Orion; and of the Planets, Mars, Venus, and the Moone: which are the forcible causes of the greatest Inundations. His owne words are these: Nondum intelligo Prophetam Hebræorum Cataclysmus Cæli vocasse, nisi partes illas Cæli, quæ generatiue sunt pluuiarum & inundationum aquarum, quales sunt signa aquatica, vt Cancer, &c. as aforesaid. As yet (saith he) I perceiue not what the Prophet of the Hebrewes meaneth by those words (Cataclysmus Cæli, or Windores of Heauen) whilse he thereby vnderstand those Celestiall powers, by whose influences are engendered the Raine, and

But in a word, as it might please God, that in the course of his vnsearchable Wisdome this coniunction should at such time be: so did he (as aforesaid) adde vigor and faculty, and gaue to euery operation encrease of vertues, violent eruptions to Springs and Fountaynes, commanding them to cast out the whole treasure and heape of their waters; taking retention from the Clouds, and condensing ayre into water by the ministerie of his Angels, or howsoeuer else best pleased his All-powerfulnesse.

¶ VI.

That there was no need of any new Creation of Matter to make the vniuersall Floud: And what are Cataclysmus Cæli;

GEN. 7. VERS. II.

NOW if it be objected, that God doth not create any thing of new; (for God resteth the seuenth day: (that is) he did not then after create any new species) which granted, it may seeme that then all the Earth and Ayre had not waters sufficient to couer the habitable World: fifteen Cubits above the highest Mountaines. Of this proposition, whether God hath so restrained himselfe, or no, I will not dispute; but for the consequent (which is) that the World had want of water to ouer-couer the highest Mountaines, I take that conceit to be vnclearned and foolish: for it is written, that the Fountaines of the great Deepe were broken up (that is) the waters forsooke the very bowels of the Earth; and all whatsoeuer was disperst therein, pierced and brakethrough the face thereof. Then let vs consider, that the Earth had about one and twentie thousand miles, the Diameter of the Earth according to that circle seuen thousand mile, and then from the Superficies to the Center some three thousand five hundred miles: Take then the highest Mountaine of the World, Caucasus, Taurus, Olympus, or Atlas; the Mountaines of Armenia or Syria, or that (of all other the highest) in Tenueris, and I doe not finde, that he that looketh highest, stretcheth above thirte miles vpright: It is not then impossible, answering reason with reason; that all those waters mixed within the Earth three thousand five hundred miles deepe, should not well helpe to couer the space of thirte miles in height, this thirte miles vpright being found in the depths of the Earth one hundred and sixteene times: for the Fountaines of the great Deepe were broken up, and the waters drawne out of the bowels of the Earth. Secondly; if we consider what proportion the Earth beareth to the extension of the Ayre ouer and about it; wee shall finde the difference exceeding great. If then it pleased God to condense but so much of this Ayre, as euery where compasseth and embraceth the Earth, which condensation is a conuerſion of Ayre into Water, a change familiar in those Elements; it will not seeme strange to men of iudgement, yea but of ordinarie vnderstanding; that the Earth (God so pleasing) was couered ouer with Waters, without any new Creation.

Lastly,

Lastly, for the opinions of Gulielmus Parisiensis, and Aliacensis, to which I may adde Berosus and others, That such a coniunction there was, fore-shewing that destruction by Waters which followed; and that by the word Cataclysmus Cæli; or Windores of Heauen, was meant this coniunction; there needes no other answer then that obseruation of Ludonicus Vines, who affirmeth, That by the grauest Astrologian it was obserued, that in the yeere 1524. there should happen the like coniunction as at Noahs Floud; then which (saith he) there was neuer a more faire, drie, and seasonable yeere: the like destruction was prophesied of the yeere 1588. But Picus Earle of Mirandula proueth, that there could not be any such coniunction at that time.

- 10 To conclude, I find no other mysterie in the word Cataclysmus Cæli, then that the clouds were meant thereby: Moses vsing the word Windores of Heauen (if that be the sense of the word) to expresse the violence of the Raynes, and powring downe of Waters. For whoseoeuer hath seene those fallings of water, which sometimes happen in the Indies, which are called the Spowts, (where clouds doe not breake into drops, but fall with a restless violence in one body) may properly vse that manner of speech which Moses did; That the Windores or Floud-gates of Heauen opened: (which is) That waters fell contrary to custome, and that order which wee call naturall. God then loosened the power retentive in the vppermost ayre, and the waters fell in abundance: Behold (saith Iob) he which holdeth the Waters, and they drie up, or better in Latine, Et omnia secantur; 10b. 12. v. 15.
- 20 And all things are dried up; but when he sendeth them out, they destroy the Earth: And in the 26. Chapter: He bindeth the Waters in the Clouds. But these Bonds God loosed at that time of the generall Floud, and called vp the Waters which slept in the great Deepe, and these ioyning together, couered the Earth, till they had performed the worke of his will: which done, he then commanded them to returne into their darke and vast Caues, and the rest (by a winde) rarified againe into ayre, formerly condensed into drops. Gen. 8. 11.

¶ VII.

Of some remainder of the memorie of NOAH among the Heathen.

- 30 NOA H commanded by God; before the fall of those Waters, entred the Arke which he had built, with his owne Wife, and his Sonnes, and his Sonnes Wiues, taking with them of euery Creature which tooke life by generation, seuen of the cleane, and of the vncleane, two: Noah, according to Philo, signifieth quietnesse: after others, and according to the prophesie of his Father Lamech, cessation; to whom after-times gaue many Names, answering his antiquitie, zeale, vertue, and other qualities: as, The first Ogyges, because in the time of the Grecian Ogyges there was also a great Floud of Achaia: Saturne they called him, because he was the Father of Nations: Others gaue him the Name of Prometheus, who was said to steale away Iupiters fire; fire in that place being taken and vnderstood for the knowledge of God and heauenly things. Others thinke, that he was so called for his excellent wisdome and foresight. He had also the Name of Ianus, (id est) vinosus, because Iain signifieth Wine in the Hebren. And so Tertullian findes him written in Libris Ritualibus; in the Bookes of Ceremonies, preceding both Saturne, Frangus; and Ioue: which three enioyed an elder time then all the other ancientest fayned gods. And this Name Iain is taken from the Hebrew and Syrian, and not from the Latine: for it was in vse before there was any Latine Nation, or any Kingdome by that Name knowne. Of the antiquitie of Ianus, Fabius Pictor giueth this testimonie: IANI ætate nulla erat Monarchia, quia mortalibus pectoribus nondum hæserat vlla regnandi cupiditas, &c. Vinum & Far primis populis docuit IANVS ad sacrificia: primus enim Aras & Pomaria & sacra docuit. In the time of IANVS (saith he) there was no Monarchie: for the desire of rule had not then folded it selfe about the hearts of men. IANVS first taught the people to sacrifice Wine and Meate: he first set up Altars, instituted Gardens and solitarie Groves, wherein they used to pray; with other holy Rites and Ceremonies. A greater testimonie then this there cannot be found among the Heathen, which in all agreeeth so well with the Scriptures. For first, whilst Noah flourished, there was not any King, or Monarch; Nimrod being the first that tooke on him soueraigne authority. Secondly, Noah after the Floud was the first that planted the Vine, and became a Husbandman; and therefore offered the First-fruits of both (to wit) Wine and Meale. Thirdly, he was the first that rayted an Altar, and offered sacrifice to God; a thanksgiving for

of the Moone; which is the Ladie of the Sea, and of Moysture, according to the rules of Astronomie, and common experience. And this opinion Petrus de Aliaco vpon Genesis confirmeth, affirming, that although Noah did well know this Floud by diuine reuelation, yet (this coniunction being notorious) he could not be ignorant of the second causes thereof: for those were not onely signes, but also working causes, by strength receiued from the first cause, which is God himselfe: and further, that by * Catarraſta Cæli (Englished the Windores of Heauen) Moses meant this great and watric coniunction; the word (Catarraſta) signifying flowing downe or comming downe. Now (saith P. de Aliaco) it pleased God to ordaine by the course of the Heauens such a constellation, by which all men might behold therein their destruction towards, and thereby forsake 10 those wicked wayes wherein they walked, and call vnto God for mercy.

Of this iudgement was Gul. Parisiensis, who vnderstood, that the words Catarraſta Cæli, or Windores of Heauen, were to be taken for the former coniunction, or for these watric Signes, Cancer, Pisces, Pleiades, Hyades, and Orion; and of the Planets, Mars, Venus, and the Moone: which are the forcible causes of the greatest Inundations. His owne words are these: Nondum intelligo Prophetam Hebraeorum Catarraſtas Cæli vocasse, nisi partes illas Cæli, quæ generatiue sunt pluuiarum & inundationum aquarum, quales sunt signa aquatica, vt Cancer, &c. as aforesaid. As yet (saith he) I perceiue not what the Prophet of the Hebrewes meaneth by those words (Catarraſta Cæli, or Windores of Heauen) vntlesse he thereby vnderstand these Celestiall powers, by whose influences are engendred the Raine, and 20 inundations of Waters, such as are the watric Signes of Cancer, &c.

But in a word, as it might please God, that in the course of his vnsearchable Wisdome this coniunction should at such time be: so did he (as aforesaid) adde vigor and faculty, and gaue to euery operation encrease of vertues, violent eruptions to Springs and Fountaynes, commanding them to cast out the whole treasure and heape of their waters; raking retention from the Clouds, and condensing ayre into water by the ministerie of his Angels, or howsoeuer else best pleased his All-powerfulnesse.

¶ V. I.

That there was no need of any new Creation of Matter to make the vniuersall Floud: And what are Catarraſta Cæli;

GEN. 7. VERS. II.

NOW if it be objected, that God doth not create any thing of new; (for God resteth the seuenth day: (that is) he did not then after create any new species) which granted, it may seeme that then all the Earth and Ayre had not waters sufficient to couer the habitable World fifteen Cubits above the highest Mountaines. Of this proposition, whether God hath so restrained himselfe, or no, I will not dispute; but for the consequent (which is) that the World had want of water to ouer-couer the highest Mountaines, I take that conceit to be vnclearned and foolish: for it is written, that the Fountaines of the great Deepe were broken up (that is) the waters forsooke the very bowels 40 of the Earth; and all whatsoeuer was disperst therein, pierced and brake through the face thereof. Then let vs consider, that the Earth had about one and twentie thousand miles, the Diameter of the Earth according to that circle seuen thousand mile, and then from the Superficies to the Center some three thousand five hundred miles: Take then the highest Mountain of the World, Caucasus, Taurus, Olympus, or Atlas; the Mountaines of Armenia or Syria, or that (of all other the highest) in Tennuris, and I doe not finde, that he that looketh highest, stretcheth about thirtie miles vpright: It is not then impossible, answering reason with reason; that all those waters mixed within the Earth three thousand five hundred miles deepe, should not well helpe to couer the space of thirtie miles in height, this thirtie miles vpright being found in the depths of the Earth one hundred and sixteene times: for the Fountaines of the great Deepe were broken up, 50 and the waters drawne out of the bowels of the Earth. Secondly; if we consider what proportion the Earth beareth to the extension of the Ayre ouer and about it; wee shall finde the difference exceeding great. If then it pleased God to condense but so much of this Ayre, as euery where compasseth and embraceth the Earth, which condensation is a conuersion of Ayre into Water, a change familiar in those Elements; it will not seeme strange to men of iudgement, yea but of ordinarie vnderstanding; that the Earth (God so pleasing) was couered ouer with Waters, without any new Creation.

Lastly,

Lastly, for the opinions of Guilielmus Parisiensis, and Aliacensis, to which I may adde Berosus and others, That such a coniunction there was, for the wing that destruction by Waters which followed; and that by the word Catarraſta Cæli; or Windores of Heauen, was meant this coniunction; there needes no other answer then that obseruation of Ludonius Vines, who affirmeth, That by the grauest Astrologian it was obserued, that in the yeere 1524. there should happen the like coniunction as at Noahs Floud; then which (saith he) there was neuer a more faire, drie, and seasonable yeere: the like destruction was prophesied of the yeere 1588. But Petrus Earle of Mirandula proueth, that there could not be any such coniunction at that time.

- 10 To conclude, I find no other myserie in the word Catarraſta Cæli, then that the clouds were meant thereby: Moses vsing the word Windores of Heauen (if that be the sense of the word) to expresse the violence of the Raynes, and powring downe of Waters. For whosoer hath seene those fallings of water, which sometimes happen in the Indies, which are called the Spowts, (where clouds doe not breake into drops, but fall with a resistlesse violence in one body) may properly vse that manner of speech which Moses did; That the Windores or Floud-gates of Heauen opened: (which is) That waters fell contrarie to custome, and that order which wee call naturall. God then loosened the power retentive in the vppermost ayre, and the waters fell in abundance: Behold (saith 106 c. 12. v. 15. 10s) he which holdeth the Waters, and they drie up, or better in Latine, Et omnia siccantur; 20 And all things are dried up; but when he sendeth them out, they destroy the Earth: And in the 26. Chapter: He bindeth the Waters in the Clouds. But these Bonds God looked at that time of the generall Floud, and called vp the Waters which slept in the great Deepe; and these ioyning together, couered the Earth, till they had performed the worke of his will: which done, he then commanded them to returne into their darke and vast Caues, Gen. 8. 1. and the rest (by a winde) rarified againe into ayre, formerly condensed into drops.

¶ VII.

Of some remainder of the memorie of Noah among the Heathen.

- 30 NOA H commanded by God, before the fall of those Waters, entred the Arke which he had built, with his owne Wife, and his Sonnes, and his Sonnes Wiues, taking with them of euery Creature which tooke life by generation, seuen of the cleane, and of the vncleane, two: Noah, according to Philo, signifieth quietnesse: after others, and according to the propriety of his Father Lamech, cessation; to whom after-times gaue many Names, answering his antiquitie, zeale, vertue, and other qualities: as, The first Ogyges, because in the time of the Grecian Ogyges there was also a great Floud of Achaia: Saturne they called him, because he was the Father of Nations: Others gaue him the Name of Prometheus, who was said to steale away Jupiters fire; fire in that place being taken and vnderstood for the knowledge of God and heauenly things. Others thinke, that he was so called for his excellent wisdom and foresight. He had also the 40 Name of Ianus, (id est) vinosus, because Iain signifieth Wine in the Hebrew. And so Tertullian findes him written in Libris Ritualibus, in the Bookes of Ceremonies, preceding both Saturne, Franeus, and Ioue: which three enioyed an elder time then all the other ancientest fayned gods. And this Name Iain is taken from the Hebrew and Syrian, and not from the Latine: for it was in vse before there was any Latine Nation, or any Kingdom by that Name knowne. Of the antiquitie of Ianus, Fabius Pictor giueth this testimonie: IANI atate nulla erat Monarchia, quia mortalibus pectoribus nondum hæsereat vlla regnandi cupiditas, &c. Vinum & Far primis populis docuit IANVS ad sacrificia: primus enim Aras & Pomeria & sacra domum. In the time of IANVS (saith he) there was no Mo- 50 narchie: for the desire of rule had not then folded in selfe about the hearts of men. IANVS first taught the people to sacrifice Wine and Meate: he first set up Altars, instructed Gardens and solitarie Groves, wherein they used to pray, with other holy Rites and Ceremonies. A greater testimonie then this there cannot be found among the Heathen, which in all agreeth so well with the Scriptures. For first, whilst Noah flourished, there was not any King, or Monarch; Nimrod being the first that tooke on him soueraigne authority. Secondly, Noah after the Floud was the first that planted the Vine, and became a Hus- Gen. 9. 20. bandman; and therefore offered the First-fruits of both (to wit) Wine and Meale. Thirdly, he was the first that rayfed an Altar, and offered sacrifice to God; a thankgiuing Gen. 8. 12. for for his mercifull goodnesse towards him. Noah was also signified in the Name of Biffons (which was given to Ianus) because he beheld the times both before and after the Flood. Quia præterita nouerit, & futura profpexerit, saith ARNOBIVS; Because he knew what was past, and provided for what was to come. He was also in the person of Ianus shadowed by the Name of Chaos, and Semen Orbis, The Seed of the World: because as out of that confused Heape was drawne all the kinds of Beasts and Plants, so from Noah came all Mankind. Whereof Ouid in the person of Ianus:

Me Chaos antiqui (nam sum res prisca) vocabant, Aspice quàm longi temporis acta cano.

The ancient call'd me Chaos: my great yeares
By those old times, of which I sing, appears.

He was also intituled Calum and Sol, Heauen and the Sunne, for his excellent knowledge in Astronomie: Vermisus, Bacchus, and Liber Pater; not that latter, which Diod. Siculus and Alex. Aphrodisens so call, because he was the restorer of the Greekes to their former libertie, but in respect of the Flood. For the Greekes called Liber γῆς, and his Nurfes Hyades, of Rayne, because Noah entred the Brow or Necke of Taurus, and ever after a Monument of Noah's Flood. He was also by others surnamed Triton, a Marine god, the sonne of Neptune; because he liued in safetie on the Waters. So was he knowne by the name of Diomysus, quasi diuinos mentem pungens, Bite-braine, or Wit-finger, though Diodorus 20 conceiue otherwise, and deriue that name à pater & loco; Of his Father, and the place of his Birth, (to wit) of Ioue, and Nisa, a Towne of Arabia felix, saith Suidas out of Orpheus. Hee had also the by-name of Taurus, or Taurophagus; because hee first yoked Oxen, and tyll'd the ground: according to that of Moses; And NOAH became an Husbandman. Now howsoeuer the Grecians vaunt of their Theban Bacchus (otherwise Diomysus) it is certaine, that the Name was borrowed, and the Inuention stolne from Noah. But this Name of Bacchus, more anciently Boacchus, was taken (saith Gul. Stuckius, and out of him Daneus) from Noachus, (N) being changed into (B); and it is the more probable, because it cannot be doubted but that Noah was the first planter of the Vine after the Flood: and of Noah (the first and ancient Bacchus) were all those fables deuised, of 30 which Diodorus complayneth in his fourth Booke and fifth Chapter. This first Bacchus (to wit) Noah, was surnamed Nysus, of the Mountaine Nysa in India; where the Grecian Bacchus neuer came, whatsoever themselves faime of his enterprises: and these Mountaines of Nysa ioyne with those of Parapanisus; and those other Easterne Mountaines, on which the Arke of Noah rested after the Flood.

Furthermore, to the end that the memorie of this second Parent of Mankind might the better be preserved, there were founded by his Issues many great Cities, which bare his Name, with many Riuers and Mountaines; which oftentimes forgot that it was done in his regard, because the many Names giuen him brought the same confusion to places as to himselfe. Notwithstanding all which, we find the Citie of Noah vpon the banks of 40 the red Sea, and elsewhere: the Riuer of Noas in Thrace, which Strabo calleth Noarus; Ptolomie, Danus; diuiding Illyria from Pannonia. Thus much for the Name.

¶ VIII.

Of sundry particulars touching the Arke: as the place where it was made, the matter, fashion, and name.

NOW in what part of the World Noah built the Arke, it doth not appeare in the Scriptures, neyther doe I finde any approoued Author that hath written thereof: Onely Goropius Becanus in his Indo-Scythia conceiue, that Noah built his Arke 50 neere the Mountaines of Caucasus, because on those Hills are found the goodliest Cedars: for when Alex. Macedon made the warre amongst a people, called Nysæi, inhabiting the other side of Caucasus, he found all their Burials and Sepulchers verbught ouer with Cedar. To this place (saith Becanus) Noah repaired, both to separate himselfe from the reprobate Giants, who rebelled against God and Nature, as also because he would not be interrupted in the building of the Arke; to which also he added the conueniencie of Riuers, to transport the Timber which he vsed, without troubling any other Carriages.

Onely

Onely this we are sure of, that the Arke was built in some part of the Easterne World; and to my vnderstanding, not farr from the place where it rested after the Flood. For Noah did not vse any Mast or Sayle (as in other Ships) and therefore did the Arke no otherwise moue, then the Hulke or Body of a Ship doth in a calme Sea. Also, because it is not probable, that during these continuall and downe-right Raines there were any Windes at all, therefore was the Arke little moued from the place where it was fashioned and set together: for it is written, God made a Wind to passe vpon the Earth, and the Waters ceased. And therefore, it may be gathered, that during the fall of the Waters, there was not any Storme or forcible Winde at all, which could drive the Arke any great distance from the place where it was first by the Waters lifted vp. This is also the more probable, if that ancient opinion be true, as it is very likely, that the Arke had fundum planum, a flat bottom, and not rayled in forme of a Ship, with a sharpenesse forward, to cut the waues, for the better speed.

This kind of Vessell the Hebrewes call Thebet, and the Greekes Larnax, for so they termed Deuotions Ship: and some say, that the Hill Parnassus, to which in eight dayes hee arriued, was first called Larnassus, and by the change of (L) into (P) Parnassus; but Pausanias thinks that it tooke name of a Sonne of the Nymph Cleodora, called Parnassus, 101. 27. the Inuentor of Auguration.

Percerus findes the word (Parnassus) to haue no affinitie with the Greeke, but thinks it 20 deriued from the Hebrew word Nahus, which signifieth Auguration and Divination: or from Har or Parai, as in his Chapter of Oracles in the Lease before cited.

Iosephus calls the Arke Machina, by the generall name of a huge Frame; and Epiphanius Epiph. in Ancor. out of the Hebrew, Aron: but herein lyeth the difference betwene Aron and Thebet. That Aron signifieth properly the Arke of the Sanctuarie, but Thebet such a Vessell, as swimmeth, and beareth it selfe vpon the Waters.

Lastly, this Arke of Noah differed from the fashion of a Ship in this, that it had a Co-uer and Rooft, with a Crest in the middelt thereof; and the sides declining like the Rooft of an Houfe; to the end, both to cast off the Waters, and that thereunder Noah himselfe and his children might shelter, and separate themselves from the noysomentie of the 30 many Beasts, which filled the other roomes and parts of the Arke.

Of what Wood the Arke was built, it is vncertaine. The Hebrew word Gopher once and in this place onely vsed, is diuersly vnderstood: and though the matter be of little importance, yet this difference there is, That the Chena Translation calls it Pine-tree; the Rabbins, Cedar; the Senenie, square Timber; the Latine, smooth Timber. Others will haue it Cypres Trees, as dedicated to the dead, because Cypres is worne at Funerals. But out of doubt, if the word Gopher signifie any speciall kind of Timber, Noah obeyed the voyce of God therein; if not, he was not then curious as touching the kind or nature of the wood, hauing the promise of God, and his grace and mercie for his defence. For with Noah God promised to establish his covenant. Plinie affirmeth, that in Egypt it 40 was the vse to build ships of Cedar, which the wormes eate not; and he auoweth, that hee saw in Ytica, in the Temple of Aspolo Cedar beames, laid in the time of the foundation of the Citie, and that they were still found in his time, which was about 1188. yeares after: prouing thereby, that this kind of wood was not subiect to putrifying or moulding in a very long time. But in that it is easie to cut, light to carie, and of a sweete sauour, lasting also better then any other wood, & because neere the place where the Arke rested, there are found great store of these Cedars trees, as also in all the mountains of the East, besides those of Libanus; it is probable enough that the Arke might be of that wood: which hath besides the other commodities the greatest length of Timber; and therefore fittest to build ships withall. Percerus conceiue, that the Arke had diuers sorts of Timber, 50 and that the bottome had of one sort, the decke and partition of another; all which may be true or false, if Gopher may be taken for Timber in generall. True it is, that Cedar will serue for all parts of a Ship, as well for the Body, as for Masts and Yards. But Noah had most respect to the direction receiued from God: to the length, breadth, and height; and to the partitions of the Arke; and to pitch it, and to diuide it into Cabines: thereby to seuer the cleane beasts from the vncleane, and to preserve their severall sorts of food; and that it might be capable of all kind of liuing creatures, according to the numbers by God appointed. All which when Noah had gathered together, hee cast his confidence wholly on God; who by his Angels steered this Ship without a Rudder, and directed it without without the helpe of a Compas, or the North starre. The Pitch which Noah vsed, is by some supposed to haue beene a kind of Bitumen, whereof there is great quantitie about the Valley of Sedome and Gomorrah, now the dead Sea, or Asphaltes, and in the Region of Babylon, and in the West India: and herein it exceedeth other Pitch, that it melts not with the Sunne, but by the fire onely, after the manner of hard Wax.

§. IX.

That the Arke was of sufficient capacite.

THe Arke, according to Gods commandement, had of length three hundred 10 Cubites, fiftie of bredth, and thirte deepe or high: by which proportion, it had fixe parts of length to one of bredth, and ten times in length to one of depth; of which S. Augustine: Proculdubio figura est peregrinantis in hoc seculo Civitatis Dei, (hoc est) Ecclesie, que fit salua per lignum, in quo pependit Mediator Dei & hominum, homo Christus Iesus: nam & mensura ipsa longitudinis, altitudinis, latitudinis, eius significat corpus humanum, in cuius veritate ad homines prænunciatus est venturus, & venit, &c. Without doubt (sayth he) it is a figure of the Citie of God, trauiailing in this World as a stranger (that is) of the Church, saned by the Tree whereupon the Mediator betweene God and Man, the Man Iesus Christ did hang: for euen the very measure of the length, height, and bredth, answereth the shape of Mans body, in the truth whereof the comming of Christ 20 was fore-told and performed.

By what kind of Cubite the Arke was measured, it hath beene a disputed question among the Fathers, and others; and the differences are in effect these: The first kind of Cubit (called the Common) containeth one foot and a halfe, measured from the sharpe of the elbow to the point of the middle finger. The second (the Palme-Cubit) which taketh one handfull more then the common. The third is called Regium Cubitus, or the Persian Cubit, which exceedeth the common Cubit three ynches. The fourth is the sacred Cubit, which containeth the common or vulgar Cubit double, wanting but a quarter or fourth part. Lastly, there is a fift Cubit, called Geometrical, which containeth fixe 30 common Cubits. But of all these sorts, which were commonly measured by the vulgar Cubit, the alteration and diminution of mens statures hath made the difference: For as there is now a lesse proportion of bodies, so is the common Cubit, from the sharpe of the elbow to the point of the middle finger, of lesse length then it was in elder times.

S. Augustine considering the many sorts of Beasts and Birds which the Arke held, with their food and water, was sometimes of opinion, that the Arke had proportion after the Geometrical Cubit, which containeth almost fixe of the Common: For measuring the Arke by the vulgar Cubit, it did not exceed the capacite of that Vessell built by Hiero of Syracuse, or the Ship of Ptolomie Philopater. But S. Augustine (who at the first was led by Origen) changed his iudgement as touching the Geometrical Cubit; and found, vpon better consideration, that there needed not so huge a Body to preserve all 40 sorts of Creatures, by God appointed to be reserued. For it was not needfull to take any kindes of Fishes into the Arke, because they were kept liuing (saith S. Augustine) in their owne element. Non fuit necesse conseruare in Arca que possent in aquis viuere; non solum mersa sicut Pisces, verum super-natantia, sicut multe alites: It was not needfull to conserue those Creatures in the Arke, which could liue in the Waters; and not onely Fishes which can liue vnder water, but also those Fowles which sit and swim on them. And againe, Terra, non aqua, maledicta, quia Adam non bubus, sed illius fructum vetitum comedit: It was the Earth, and not the Waters, which God cursed; for of the forbidden fruit of the Earth, and not of the Sea, did Adam eat. So as S. Augustine gathereth hereupon (as 50 aforesaid) that so huge a Frame needed not.

And if we looke with the eyes of iudgement hereunto, we shall finde nothing monstrous therein; although the imaginations of men, who (for the most part) haue more of mischiefe and of ignorance, then of any reuerend reason, finde many impossibilities in this worke of God. But it is manifest, and vndoubtedly true, that many of the Species, which now seeme differing, and of severall kindes, were not then in rerum natura. For those Beasts which are of mixt natures, eyther they were not in that age, or else it was not needfull to preserve them, seeing they might be generated againe by others: as the Mules, the Hyems, and the like; the one begotten by Asles and Mares, the other by Foxes and Volues. And whereas by discouering of strange Lands, wherein there are found diuers Beasts and Birds differing in colour or stature from those of these Northerne parts; it may be supposed by a superficiall consideration, that all those which weare red and pyed Skins, or Feathers, are differing from those that are lesse painted, and were plaine russet or blacke; they are much mistaken that so thinke: And for my owne opinion, I find no difference, but onely in magnitude, betweene the Cat of Europe, and the Owne of India; and euen those Dogges which are become wilde in Hispagnola, with which the Spaniards vsed to deuoure the naked Indians, are now changed to Volues, and begin to destroy the breed of their Cattell, and doe also oftentimes teare 10 asunder their owne Children. The common Crow and Rooke of India is full of red feathers in the drownd and low Islands of Caribana; and the Black-bird and Thrush hath his feathers mixt with blacke and carnation, in the North parts of Virginia. The Dog-fish of England is the Sharke of the South Ocean: For if colour or magnitude made a difference of Species, then were the Negro's, which wee call the Blacke-Mores, non animalia rationalia, not Men; but some kind of strange Beasts: and so the Giants of the South America should be of another kind, then the people of this part of the World. We also see it dayly, that the natures of Fruits are changed by transplantati- 20 on, some to better, some to worse, especially with the change of Clymate. Crabs may be made good Fruit by often grafting, and the best Melons will change in a yeere or two to common Cowcumbers, by being set in a barren Soyle. Therefore taking the kindes precisely of all Creatures, as they were by God created, or out of the Earth by his Ordinance produced; the Arke, after the measure of the common Cubit, was sufficiently capacious to contayne of all, according to the number by God appointed: For if we adde but halfe a foot of measure to the common Cubit, which had a foot and a halfe of Giandy stature (and lesse allowance we cannot giue to the difference betweene them and vs) then did the Arke containe 600. foot in length, and 100. foot in bredth, and 60. foot deepe.

But first of all, to make it manifest that the Geometrical Cubit is not vsed in the Scripture, the stature of the Giants therein named may suffice. For if the Bed of Os, 30 King of Basan, had beene nine Geometrical Cubites long, it had taken 54. Cubites of the common, which make 80. foot: and Goliath, who had the length of six Cubites and a handfull, which makes nine foot and a handfull (a proportion credible) if these Cubites had beene Geometrical, then had beene 54. foot in height, and vpwards, which were monstrous and most incredible: for (according to this proportion) had the head of Goliath beene nine foot long, and farre waightier and bigger then all Dauids bodie, who carried it away.

Again, if the Geometrical Cubit had beene vsed for a Measure in the Scripture, as many Commenters haue obserued, then had the Altar (appointed to containe fixe Cubites of length, fixe of bredth, and three of height) haue reached the length of 27. foot 40 vpright, and so must their Priests haue ascended by steps or Ladders to haue performed their Sacrifices thereon, which was contrarie to Gods Commandement, giuen in these words: Thou shalt not goe up with steppes vnto mine Altar, that thy shame be not discouered thereon; and therefore was the Altar but three common Cubites high, which make 40 foure foot, that their Priests standing thereby might execute their Office: Wherefore I may conclude, that the Cubit mentioned in the Scriptures was not the Geometrical, but the ordinarie Cubit of one foot and a halfe, according to the measure of Giandy stature; which measure (doubtlesse) might giue much the more capacite to the Arke, although it be also probable, that as the Men were, so were the Horses whereon they rode, and all other creatures of a correspondent size. And yet (as I take it) though by 50 this meanes there were not any whit the more roome in the Arke, it were not hard to conceiue, how all the distinct Species of Animals, whose liues cannot be preserved in the Waters, might according to their present quantities be contained in a Vessell, of those dimensions which the Arke had; allowing to the Cubit one foot and a halfe of our now vsuall measure: whence it followeth of necessitie, that those large Bodies which were in the dayes of Noah might haue roome sufficient in the Arke, which was measured by a Cubit of length proportionable.

How the appointed number of creatures to be saued, (that is) seuen of the cleane, two of the vnclane (with necessarie foode) might haue place in the Arke, But so hath very learlearnedly declared: the briefe summe of whose discourse to that purpose, is this. The length of the Arke was three hundred Cubits, which multiplied by the breadth, namely fiftie Cubits, and the product by the height of thirtie Cubits, sheweth the whole Concauitie to haue bene 450000. Now whereas the posts, walls, and other partitions of Lodgings may seeme to haue taken vp a great part of the hollow: the height of the rooffe, which (the perpendicular being one Cubit) contained 7500. cubicall Cubes, was a sufficient recompence: If therefore in a Ship of such greatnesse we seeke roome for 80. distinct Species of Beasts, or (lest any should be omitted) for 100. severall kinds, we shall easily find place both for them, and for the Birds, which in Signesse are no way answerable to them, and for meat to sustaine them all. For there are three sorts of Beasts, whose bodies are of a quantitie best knowne; the Beeffe, the Sheepe, and the Wolfe: to which the rest may be reduced, by saying, (according to Aristotle) that one Elephant is answerable to foure Beeces, one Lyon to two Wolves, and so of the rest. Of Beasts, some feede on vegetables, others on flesh. There are one and thirtie kinds of the greater sort, feeding on vegetables: of which number, onely three are cleane, according to the Law of Moses, whereof seven of a kind entred into the Arke, namely, three couples for breede, and one odde one for sacrifice: the other eight and twentie kinds were taken by two of each kinde, so that in all there were in the Arke one and twentie great Beasts cleane, and six and fiftie vncleane, estimable for largenesse as ninetie one Beeces; yet for a supplement (lest perhaps any Species be omitted) let them be valued, as a hundred and twentie Beeces. Of the lesser sort feeding on vegetables, were in the Arke sixe and twentie kinds, estimable with good allowance for supply, as fourescore Sheepe. Of those which deuoure flesh were two and thirtie kinds, answerable to threescore and foure Wolves. All these two hundred and eightie Beasts might be kept in one storie or roome of the Arke, in their severall Cabbines; their Meat in a second: the Birds and their prouision in a third, with place to spare for Noah and his family, and all their necessities.

§. X.

That the Arke rested vpon part of the Hill Taurus (or Caucasus) betweene the East Indies, and Scythia.

†. I.

A preterition of some questions lesse materiall: with a note of the vse of this question, to finde out the Metropolis of Nations.

What time Noah tooke to build the Arke, I leaue to others to dispute: but he receiued the Commandement from God a hundred yeeres before the waters fell; and had therefore choice of time and leysure sufficient. As for the number of Deckes and Partitions, which Origen diuides into foure, S. Augustine into three, I will not trouble the Reader with the controuersie: or whether those creatures which sometimes rest on the Land, other times in the Waters, as the Crocodiles (now called Alegartos) the Sea-Cowes or Sea-Horses, were kept in the Arke, or no, I thinke it a needlesse curiositie; and yet to this sayth Pererius, and others before him, that a Fish-pool might be made as well within the Arke, as in Hiero his Ship of Syracuse. Lastly, to consider or labour to disproue the foolerie of the Hebrewes, who suppose that the Arke was lightened by a Carbuncle, or had Windows of Crytall to receiue in Light, and keepe out Water, were but to reuiue the buried vanities of former times. But that which I seeke most to satisfie my selfe and others in, is in what part of the World the Arke rested after the Flood: because the true vnderstanding of some of these places (as the Seat of the terrestriall Paradise, and the resting of the Arke) doe onely and truly teach the Worlds Plantation, and the beginning of Nations, before and after the Flood; and all storie, as well generall as particular, thereby may be the better vnderstood.

†. II.

A proposall of the common opinion, that the Arke rested vpon some of the Hills of Armenia.

And first, for the true place where the Arke rested after the Flood, and from what part of the World the Children of Noah traualled to their first settlement and plan-plantation, I am resolu'd (without any presumption) that therein the most writers were viterly mistaken. And I am not led so to thinke out of my Humour or newnesse of opinion, or singularity; but doe herein ground my selfe on the originall and first truth, which is the word of God, and after that vpon reason, and the most probable circumstances thereon depending. For whereas it is written, that the Arke staied vpon one of the mountaines of Ararat, which the Chaldean Paraphrast hath conuerted Kardu, meaning the hills Gordai or Gordiei in Armenia the greater. (as the words Gordai and Kardu, seeme to be one and the same) of which opinion also the most of our Interpreters are; I finde neither Scripture nor reason which teacheth any such thing: (to wit) that it rested on that part of Ararat, which is in the greater Armenia. Nicolaus Damascenus calls this mountaine of Ararat, Baris, being the same which the Chaldean nameth Kardu, to which mountaine the Fryer Ammius (citing this place out of Iosephus) makes him finde another adioyning, called Ocila, and to say that the Arke (of which Moses the Lawgiuer of the Hebrewes wrote) did first take ground on this Ocila. But I doe not finde any such mountaine in being, as this Ocila; neither is there any mention of it in the place of Iosephus. Sirabo remembreth a Promontorie in Arabia felix, of that name, and Plinie findes a Mart-towne so called in the same, which Ptolomie calls Ocilis, Pinetus Acyla, and Niger Zidon. But this Ocila of Damascenus, or rather of Ammius, seemeth to bee one and a part of the Armenian mountaines. Berosus calleth those mountaines of Armenia Gordiei, and Curtius Cordeus: Ptolomie Gordai and Gordiei: of which the Countie next adioyning is by this Nicolaus Damascenus called Nimada, perhaps (as Becanus coniectures) for Milyada or rather Minni: which word is vsed for Armenia Minor. And the very word of Armenia seemes to be compounded of this word Minni, and Aram: as if we should say Minni of Syria; for that Armenia also was a part of Syria, Plinie witnesseth. Epiphanius placeth the Cardyes about these mountaines, whom others call Gordieni or Gordeni. The mountaines are seated apart from all other to the North of that Ledge of the mountaines called Taurus, or Niphates: in the plaines of Armenia the great, neere the Lake Thapsitis: whence the Riuer of Tigris floweth in 75. degrees of longitude, and 41. and 42. degrees of latitude. One of the mountaines Gordiei (that which surmounteth the rest) Epiphanius calls Lubar, which in the Armenian signifieth a place of descent: but this out of Iosephus; which name (saith Ianius) was of the euent, because of Noahs comming downe with his children. But this also I take to be a supposed euent; seeing any hill, from whence on euery side we must descend, may thus be called: as Iunius corrects the place in Iosephus noibaque (Kubaris). That the place is thus to be read, he coniectureth, because Ioseph. l. 1. c. 4. sayes, the place is called αὐτοβάσιον (as it were the descent or comming downe) and Epiphanius. l. 2. contr. Hares. calls it ἀναβασις: which word in the Armenian and Egyptian tongue signifieth descent, of Lubar, which is to descend; whence also Lubra is a Synagogue, because it was commonly built on some high place: whereof also the Latine Delubrum may seeme to bee deriued; and Act. 6. 9. they that belonged to the Synagogue of the Egyptians are called Liberiani, for Lubra tenu. Yet this opinion hath bene embraced from age to age, receiuing a habit of strength by time, and allowance without any farther examination; although the name of Lubar might otherwise rightly be giuen, especially to that mountaine, by reason that the passage was more faire, vp and downe vnto it, then to any of the rest adioyning.

†. III.

The first argument against the common opinion. They that came to build Babel, would haue come sooner, had they come from so neere a place as Armenia.

But there are many arguments to perswade me, that the Arke of Noah did not rest it selfe in any part of Armenia, and that the mountaine Ararat was not Baris, nor any one of the Gordian mountaines.

For first, it is agreed by all which follow Berosus, that it was in the 130. yeece, or in the yeece 131. after the flood, when Nimrod came into the valley of Shinar, which Valley was afterward called Babylonia, Chush, and Chaldea. If then the Arke had first found land in Armenia, it is very vnprobable, that the children of Noah which came into that valley could haue spent so many yeeres in so short a passage: seeing the Region of Mesopotamia was onely interiacent, which might by easie iourneies haue bene past ouer in twenty twentie dayes; and to hasten and helpe which passage the nauigable riuer of Tigris offered it selfe, which is euery where transpassable by boates of great burden: so as where the Desart on the one side resisted their expedition, the riuer on the contrary side serued to aduance it; the riuer rising out of the same Ledge of mountaines, or at the foote of them, where the Arke of Noah was first supposed to settle it selfe; Then if the Nations which followed Nimrod still doubted the surprise of a second flood (according to the opinions of the ancient Hebrewes) it soundeth ill to the eare of reason, that they would haue spent many yeeres in that low and ouerflowne Valley of Mesopotamia, so called of the many Riuer which imbroyder or compasse it: for the effects witnessed their affections, and the workes, which they vnderooke, their vnbeliefe; being no sooner arrived in Shinar, but they began to prouide themselves of a defence (by erecting Babel) against any future or feared inundation. Now at Babel it was that Nimrod began his Kingdome, the first known Citie of the world founded after the flood, about 131. yeeres, or as others suppose ten yeeres later: though (for my selfe) I rather thinke, that they vnderooke that worke in two respects, first, to make themselves famous, To get vs a name (saith the Text:) Secondly, thereby to vsurpe dominion ouer the rest.

Gene. 10. 10.
Berus. l. 1.

†. IIII.

The second argument, That the Easterne people were most ancient in populositie, and in all humane glory.

For a second Argument: The ciuilitie, magnificence and multitude of people (wherein the East parts of the world first abounded) hath more weight then any thing which hath beene, or can be said for Armenia, and for Noahs taking land there. And that this is true, the vse of Printing and Artillerie (among many other things which the East had) may easily perswade vs, that those Sunne-rising Nations were the most ancient. The certaintie of this report, that the East Indians (time out of minde) haue had Gunnes and Ordnance of batterie, confirmed by the Portugals and others, make vs now to vnderstand, That the place of Philostratus in vita Apollonij Tiamai. l. 2. c. 14. is no fable, though exprest in fabulous words: when he saith, that the wise men, which dwell betwene Hyphasis and Ganges, vse not themselves to goe forth into battaile: but that they driue away their enemies with thunder and lightning sent from Iupiter. By which meanes there it is said, that Hercules Egyptius and Bacchus, ioyning their forces were defeated there; and that this Hercules there cast away his golden shield. For the inuention of letters was ignorantly ascribed to Cadmus, because hee brought them first into Greece: of which the people (then rude and sauage) had reason to giue him the honour, from whome they received the benefit. But it is true, that letters are no lesse ancient then Seth or Enoch were: for they are said to haue written on pillars of stone (as before remembred) long before the flood. But from the Easterne world it was that Iohn Cuthenberg a Germane, brought the deuice of Printing: by whom Conradus being instructed, brought the practise thereof to Rome: and after that Nicholaus Gerson a Frenchman, bettered both the letters and inuention. And notwithstanding that this mysterie was then supposed to be but newly borne, the Chinaes had letters long before either the Egyptians or Phenicians; and also the Art of Printing, when as the Greekes had neither any ciuil knowledge, or any letters among them.

And that this is true, both the Portugals and Spaniards haue witnessed, who about an hundred yeeres since discouered those Kingdomes, and doe now enioy their rich trades therein: for the Chinaes account all other Nations but Saluages, in respect of themselves.

And to adde strength to this argument the conquest and storie of Alex. Macedon may iustly be called to witnesse, who found more Cities and sumptuositie in that little Kingdome of Perus, which lay side by side to the East India, then in all his other trauals & vnder takings. For in Alexanders time learning and greatnesse had not trauielled so far to the West as Rome: Alexander esteeming of Italie but as a barbarous Countrie, and of Rome as of a Village. But it was Babylon that stood in his eye, and the fame of the East pierced his eares. And if we looke as farre as the Sun-rising, and heare Paulus Venetus what hee reporteth of the vttermost Angle and Island thereof, wee shall finde that those Nations haue sent out, and not receiued, lent knowledge, and not borrowed it from the West. For the farther East (to this day) the more ciuill, the farther West the more saluage.

And

And of the Isle of Iapan (now Zippingari) Venetius maketh this report: Incola religioni, literis, & sapientie sunt addictissimi, & veritatis indagatores acerrimi; nihil illis frequentius oratione, quam (more nostro) sacris in delubris exercent: unum cognoscunt Principem; unum Deum adorant, The Islanders are exceedingly addicted to religion, letters, and Philosophie, and most diligent searchers out of truth: there is nothing among them more frequent then prayer, which they vse in their Churches, after the manner of Christians. They acknowledge one King, and worship one God. The antiquitie, magnificence, ciuilitie, riches, sumptuous buildings, and policie in gouernment, is reported to be such by those who haue bene employed into those parts, as it seemeth to exceede (in those formerly named, and denoted by other particulars) all other Kingdomes of the world.

†. V.

The third argument, From the wonderfull resistance which SEMI RAMIS found in the East Indies.

But for a third argument, and also of a treble strength to the rest, I lay the inuasion of Semiramis before the indifferent and aduised Reader: who may consider in what age shee liued, and how soone after the worlds new birth shee gathered her Armie (as Diodorus Siculus out of Cresias reporteth) of more then three Millions to inuade India, to which hee adioyned also 500000. Horse, and 100000 Waggon: whereof if wee beleue but a third part, it shall suffice to proue that India was the first planted and peopled Countrie after the flood. Now as to touching the time wherein shee liued: All Historians consent, that shee was the wife of Ninus; and the most approued Writers agree, that Ninus was the Sonne of Belus, and Belus of Nimrod, that Nimrod was the Sonne of Cush, Cush of Cham, and Cham of Noah. And at such time as Nimrod came to Shinar, hee was then a great Nation, as by the building of the Citie and Tower of Babel may appeare; and being then so multiplied and increased, the two descents cast betwene Nimrod and Semiramis, brought forth in that time those multitudes, whereof her Armie was composed. Let vs then see with whom shee encountered in that warre with this her powerfull Armie: euen with a multitude, rather exceeding, then equalling her owne, conducted by Staurobates King of India beyond Indus; of whose multitudes this is the witnesse of Diod. Siculus. STAUROBATES, autis maioribus quam quae erant SEMIRAMIS copijs. STAUROBATES gathering together greater troupes then those of SEMIRAMIS. If then these numbers of Indians had beene increased but by a Colonie sent out from Shinar, (and that also after Babel was built, which no doubt tooke some time in the performance (this encrease in the East, and this Armie of Staurobates must haue been made of stone, or somewhat else by miracle. For as the numbers which Semiramis gathered might easily grow vp in that time, from so great a Troupe as Nimrod brought with him into Babylonia (as shall bee demonstrated hereafter in the Storie of Israel) so could not any such time, by any multiplication naturall, produce so many bodies of men, as were in the Indian Armie victorious ouer Semiramis, if the Colonies sent thither had beene so late as Babel ouerturned, and the confusion of Languages. For if wee allow 65. yeeres time after the Flood; before Nimrod was borne: of which, thirty yeeres to Cush hee begat Seba, after whom hee had Hauilah, Sabtah, Raamah, and Sabtechah: Gen. 10. 7. and then thirtie yeeres to Raamah, ere hee begat Sheba and Dedan, both which were borne before Nimrod: and five yeeres to his five elder brothers, which make fixtie five, and then twice thirtie yeeres for two Generations more, as for Nimrod, Sheba and Dedan with others, to beget their sonnes; and that a third Generation might grow vp, which makes in all an hundred twenty five yeeres, there will then remaine sixe yeeres to haue bene spent in trauielling from the East, ere they arrived in Shinar in the yeere after the Flood 131. And so the followers of Nimrod might bee of sufficient multitude. But as for those which make him to haue arrived at Shinar in the yeere 101.: and the confusion to haue beene at Pelegs birth, these men doe all by miracle: they beget whole Nations without the helpe of time, and build Nimrods Towre in the Ayre; and not on those low and marish grounds (which require sound foundations) in the Plaines of Shinaar. For except that huge Towre were built in a day, there could bee no confusion in that yeere 101. or at Pelegs birth. And therefore it is farre more probable, that Nimrod vsurped Regall authority in the 131. yeere after

Glyc. in Gen. & de Turris exfir-matione. fol. 173.

after the Flood, (according to Berosus) and that the worke of Babel lasted forty yeeres (according to GLICAS) Hominibus in ea perficienda totis 40. annis incassum laborantibus. Men labouring in vaine 40. yeeres to finish it. By which account it falls out, that it was 170. yeeres after the Flood, ere a Colonie was sent into East India; which granted (the one being the maine body, and the other but a Troupe taken thence) it can hardly be beleueed, that Stasprobates could haue exceeded Semiramis in numbers: who being then Emperesse of all that part off the world, gathered the most of Nations into one bodie.

†. VI.

The fourth Argument from diuers considerations in the persons of Noah.

Fourthly, it is no way propable, that Noah, who knew the world before the flood, and had liued therein the long time of 600. yeeres, was all that space 130. yeeres after the flood, without any certaine habitation: No, it will fall out, and better agree with reason, that Nimrod was but the conductor of those people, by Noah destined and appointed to fill and inhabit that middle part of the earth and the Westerne world; (which traualles Noah put ouer to yong and able bodies) and that Noah himselfe then couered with many yeeres, planted himselfe in the same place which God had assigned him: which was where he first came downe out of the Arke from the waters: for it is written, that after Noah came downe out of the Arke hee planted a Vineyard, and became a Husbandman: whose businesse was to dresse and manure the earth; and not to range ouer so many parts of the world, as from Armenia into Arabia felix, where hee should (if the tradition be sound) haue left certaine Colonies: thence into Africa towards Triton; then into Spaine, where they say he settled other companies, and built Cities after the names of Noela and Noegla his sonnes wiues: from thence into Italie, where they say hee found his sonne Cham the Saturne of Egypt, who had corrupted the people and subiects of Gomer in his absence: with whom Noah (as they make the storie) had patience for three yeeres; but then finding no amendment, they say hee banished him out of Italie. These be but the fancies of Berosus Annianus, a plaine imitation of the Græcian fables. For let euery reasonable man conceiue, what it was to traualle farre in such a forrest as the World was, when after so great a rotting of the earth by the flood, the same lay waste and ouer-growne for 130. or 140. yeeres, and wherein there could hardly be found either part or passage through which men were able to creepe for woods, bushes and bryars that in those yeeres were growne vp.

And there are so many reasons, prouing that Noah neuer came into the valley of Shinamar, as we need not suspect his passage into Italie or Spaine: For Noah, who was Father of all those Nations, a man reuerenced both for his authority, knowledge, experience and pietie, would neuer haue permitted his children and issues to haue undertaken that vnbeleueing presumptuous worke of Babel. Rather by his presence and preuaient perswasions he would haue bound their hands from so vaine labours, and by the authority which hee received euen from God himselfe, hee would haue held them in that awfull subiection, as whatsoever they had vainely conceiued or feared, yet they durst not haue disobeyed the personall commandement of him, who in the beginning had a kinde of Regall authority ouer his children and people. Certainly, Noah knew right well, that the former destruction of mankind was by themselves purchased through crueltie and disobedience; and that to distrust God, and to raise vp building against his Almighty power, was as much as in them lay, a prouocation of God to lay on them the same, if not a more sharpe affliction. Wherefore, there is no probability, that euer he came so farre West as Babylonia; but rather, that hee sent those numbers which came into Shinamar (being the greatest troupe, because they had the greatest part of the world to plant) vnder Nimrod, or those vpon whom he vsurped. Nauclerus and Calestinus take the testimony of Methodius Bishop of Tyre for currant, that there were three Leaders of the people after their encrease (to wit) Nimrod, Suphene, and loctan: of which Nimrod commanded the issues of Cham, loctan of Sem, and Suphene of Iaphet. This opinion I cannot iudge of, although I wil not doubt, but that so great a worke as the worlds plantation, could not be effected without order and conduction.

Of the sonnes of Sem: loctan, Hauilah, and Ophir, are especially noted to haue dwelt in the East India. The rest of Sems issues had also the Regions of Persia and the other adioyning adjoyning to Indus, and held also a part of Chaldea for a time: for Abraham inhabited yr, till hee was thence called by God; and whether they were of the Sonnes of loctan, or of all the rest a certaine number (Cham and his issue only excepted) that Noah kept with himselfe, it cannot be knowen. Of which plantation I shall speake at large in the Chapter following.

Now another reason which mooues me to beleuee, that Noah stayed in the East far away from all those that came into Shinamar, is, that Moses doth not in any word make mention of Noah in all the storie of the Hebrewes, or among any of those Nations which contended with them. And Noah, being the Father of all mankind, and the chosen seruant of God, was too principall a person, to be either forgotten or neglected, had hee not (in respect of his age and wearisome experience of the world) withdrawne himselfe, and rested apart with his best beloued, giuing himselfe to the seruice and contemplation of God and heauenly things, after hee had directed his children to their destined portions. For he landed in a warme and fertile soile, where hee planted his Vineyard, and drest the earth; after which, and his thanksgiuing to God by sacrifice, he is not remembred in the Scriptures, because he was so farre away from those Nations of which Moses wrote: which were the Hebrewes chiefly, and their enemies and borderers.

†. VII.

Of the senselesse opinion of ANNIUS the Commentor vpon BEROSUS: who finds diuers places where the Arke rested; as the Caspian and Gordian hills which are three hundred miles asunder; and also some place of Scythia.

It remaineth now that we examine the Arguments & authorities of Frier Annius, who in his Commentaries vpon Berosus and others, laboureth maruailously to proue, that the Arke of Noah rested vpon the Armenian mountaines called Cassys; which mountaines separate Armenia from the vpper Media, and doe equally belong to both. And because all his Authours speake of the mountaines Gordiai, hee hath no other shift to vnit these opinions, but by vniing those farre-distant mountaines together. To effect which, he hath found no other inuention, then to charge those men with error, which haue carefully ouerseene, printed, and published Ptolimies Geographie, in which they are altogether disseuered. For that last edition of Mercators, sets these hills fife degrees (which makes three hundred English miles) asunder. And certainly, if we looke into those more ancient copies of Villanouanus and others, we shall finde nothing in them to helpe Annius withall: for in those the mountaines Cassij stand seven degrees to the East of the Gordiai, which make 420. miles. And for those Authours by whose authoritie Annius strengtheneth himselfe, Diodorus whom he so much folioweth, giueth this iudgment vpon them in the like dispute. Aberrarunt vero omnes, non negligentia sed regnorum situs ignorantia, tunc haec allcered (saith he) not through negligence, but through ignorance of the situation of Kingdomes. But for an induction, to proue that the Arke of Noah stood on the mountaines of Armenia, hee beginneth with the antiquity of the Scythians: and to proue the same hee citeth Marcus Porcius Cato, who auoweth that 250. yeeres before Ninus, the earth was overflowne with waters, & in Scythia Saga renatum mortale genus, and that in Scythia the flocke of mortall men was renewed. The same Authour also teacheth that the Vmbri before remembred (who were so called, because sined from Deucalions flood) were the Sonnes of the Galli, a Nation of the Scythians. Ex his venisse IANVM cum DYRIM & Gallis progenitoribus Vmborum, From these Scythians, he saith, that IANVS came with DYRIM and with the Galli the progenitors of the Vmbri; And againe, Equidem principatus originis semper Scythijs tribuitur. Certainly, the Prime antiquitie of off-spring is alway giuento to the Scythians. And herein truly I agree with Annius, that those Regions called Scythia and now Tartaria, and by some Writers Sarmatia, Asiatica, were among the first peopled: and they held the greatest part of Asia vnder tribute till Ninus time. Also Plinie called the Vmbri which long since inhabited Italie, Gens antiquissima, a most ancient Nation, who defended of these Scythians. Now that which Annius laboureth, is to proue that these ancient Scythians (meaning the Nephewes of Noah) did first inhabit that Region of the mountaines, on which the Arke rested; and confessing that this great ship was grounded in Armenia, he saith a nation of Scythians called Araxea, taking name of the mountaine Ararat, neere the Riuer of Araxes. And because his Author Cato helpeth him in part (to wit, That in Scythia mankind was restored after the great flood, 250. yeares before Ninus) and in part utterly destroyeth his conceit of Armenia, by adding the word Saga, as in Scythia Saga renatum mortale genus; In Scythia Saga mankind was restored, he thereas in the Prooemio of his Commentarie vpon Berosus, leaueth out the addition of Saga altogether in the repetition of Cato his words, and writes, homines in Scythia saluatos. For Scythia Saga or Saca, is vndoubtedly vnder the Mountaynes of Paropamisus, on which, or neare which it is most probable that the Arke first tooke ground; and from those East parts (according to Moses) came all those companies which created the Tower of Babel in Shinaar or Babylonia.

But now the best authoritie which Annius hath, is out of Diodorus: where hee hath 10 read, that the Scythians were originally Armenians, taking name à Scythia Rege eorum, from Scythia their King. But (in a word) wee may see his vanitie, or rather (indeede) his fallhood in citing this place. For Diodorus a most approoued and diligent Author beginneth in that place with these words: Fabulantur Scythae, The Scythians fable: and his Interpreter in the table of that worke giueth this title to that very Chapter. Scytharum origo & successus, fabula, The originall and successe of the Scythians, a fable. And (indeede) there needs no great disproofe hereof, since Ptolomie doth directly delineate Scythia Saga or Saca, and sets them in 130. degrees of longitude: and the Persians (saith Herodotus) call all the Scythians, Saca which Plinie confirmeth: for in respect that these Saca (saith Plinie) are the next Scythians to the Persians, therefore they giue all the rest that 20 name. Now that any nation in Armenia can neighbour the Persians, there is no man beleueeth. But this supposed Scythia Araxea in Armenia yeth in 78. degrees of longitude (that is) 42. degrees distant from the Saca; and the Countrie about Araxes Ptolomie calleth Colibene and Soducene without any mention of Scythia at all: and yet all those which are or were reputed Scythians either within Imatus or without, to the number of 100. seuerall Nations are by Ptolomie precisely set downe.

But to come to those later Authors, whereof some haue written, others haue seene a great part of those North-east Regions, and searched their antiquities with great diligence: First, Marius Niger boundeth Scythia within Imaus, in this manner: (for Scythia without these Mountaines is also beyond our purpose.) Scythia intra Imaum montem ea 30 est, quae proprio vocabulo Gassaria hoc tempore dicitur: ab Occasu Sarmatia Asiatica: ab Oriente Imao monte: à Septentrione terra incognita: à Meridia Saccis, Sogdianis, Margianis, usque ad Oxeanum in Hyrcanum mare exeuntis; & parte ipsius maris hinc usque ad Rha fluminis ostia terminatur: Scythia within the Mountain Imaus is that part of the World, which in their owne speech is at this time called Gassaria; and the same is bounde on the West side by Sarmatia Asiatica, (or of Asia) on the East by the Imaan Mountaines: on the North by unknowne Lands: on the South by the Sacca (which are the Saccæ) the Sogdian, and the Margiani, to the mouth of Oxus, falling into the Hyrcan Sea, and by a part of the same Sea as farre as the mouth of Rha.

Now if Niger sets all Sarmatia Asiatica, to the West of Scythia, then Sarmatia (que 40 magna sanè Regio est, & quae innumeras nationes complectitur) Which is a great Region, comprehending innumerable Nations (saith Niger) much of it being betwene Scythia and Armenia, doth sufficiently warrant vs, that Armenia can be no part of Scythia; and to make it more plaine, hee disleuereth Sarmatia it selfe from any part of Armenia, by the Regions of Colchis, Iberia, Albania, which he leaueth on the right hand of Sarmatia, and yet makes Sarmatia but the West bound of Scythia.

And for Paulus Venetus, he hath not a word of Armenia among the Tartarian or Scythian Nations; neyther doth his fellow Frier Iohn Plancartus (cited by Prudentius in his description of Scythia) make any mention of Armenia; neyther doth Haytonus, an Armenian borne, of the blood of those Kings (though afterward a Monk) euer acknowledge himselfe for a Tartarian, or of the Scythian Race descended: though he write that storie at large, gathered by Nicholaus Salcuni, and (by the commandement of Pope Clement the fifth) in the yeere 1307. published.

Neyther doth Mathias a Michon (a Canon of Cracouia in Polonia) a Sarmatian borne, and that traauiled a great part of Sarmatia Asiatica, finde Armenia any way within the compasse of Tartaria, Scythia, or Sarmatia; and yet no man (whose Trauiles are extant) hath obserued so much of those Regions as he hath done: prouing and disproving many things, heretofore subiect to dispute. And among others he burieth that ancient and received received opinion, That out of the Mountaines Riphei, and Hyperborei in Scythia, spring the Riuer of Tanais or Don, Volga or Edel; prouing by vnanswerable experience, that there are no such Mountaines in rerum natura; and (indeed) the Heads and Fountaines of those famous Riuer are now by the Trade of Musconia knowne to euery Merchant, and that they arise out of Lakes, low, wooddie, and marish grounds. The Riuer of Tanais or Don, ariseth to the South of the Citie Tulla, some twentie Englissh miles, out of a Lake called Iwanovesero, in the great Wood Okenitzkilies or Iepiphanolies. Volga, which Ptolomie calls Rha, and the Tartars call Edel, riseth out of a Lake called Fromow, in the great Wood Vodkonzki: from which Lake the two other famous Riuer flow of Borysthenes (now Neyper) and Dniuna or Diuidna. And this learned Polonian doth in this 10 sort bound the European Sarmatia. In Sarmatia of Europe are the Regions of Russians, Lithuanians, Muscouians, and those adioyning, bounded on the West by the Riuer of Vissa, the Name perchance mis-printed Vissa for Vistula, a Riuer which parts Germanie and Sarmatia: and for the East border he nameth Tanais or Don. Sarmatia Asiatica he cutteth from Europe by the same Riuer of Tanais, and the Caspian Sea, to withhold it from stretching farther East: this Asian Sarmatia being part of that Scythia which Ptolomie calleth Scythia intra Imaum montem: Scythia within the Mountain Imaus. And the same Mathias Michon further affirmeth, that the Scythians (which Frier Annius would make Armenians) came not into Sarmatia Asiatica it selfe about three hundred and a few odde 20 yeeres before his owne time: these be his words: Constat eam esse gentem nonam, & aduentitiam à partibus Orientis (mutatis sedibus) paulo plus abhinc trecentis annis Asia Sarmatiam ingressam: It is manifest (saith he, speaking of the Scythian Nation) that this is a late planted Nation, come from the coasts of the East: from whence they entred into Asia, and gas new seates a little more then 300. yeeres since: For (indeed) before that time the Gothes or Poulois inhabited Sarmatia, Asiatica. And this Mathias liued in the yeare 1511. and this his Discourse of Sarmatia was printed at Augusta in the yeare 1506. as Bucholzerus in his Chronologie witnesseth. Now these Scythians (saith he) came from the East, for in the East it was that the Arke of Noah rested; and the Scythæ Saca were those people which liued at the North foot of those Mountaines of Taurus or Ararat, where they encounter or begin to mixe 30 themselves with the great Imaus. And were there no other testimony then the generall description of the Earth now extant, and the witness of Ptolomie, it is plaine, that betwene all parts of Armenia and Scythia, there are not only those three Regions of Colchis, Iberia, and Albania, but the Caspian Sea: on the East shore of which Sea, but not one the West, or on that part which any way toucheth Armenia, there are (indeed) a Nation of Scythians (called Ariace) betwene Iaxartus and Iactus, but what are these Scythians to any Ariace, or Scythia Araxea, which Annius placeth in Armenia, more then the Scythians of Europe?

40 The fift Argument, The Vine must grow naturally neere the place where the Arke rested.

TO this if we adde the consideration of this part of the Text, That Noah planted a 50 Vineyard, we shall find that the fruit of the Vine or Rayfin did not grow naturally in that part of Armenia, where this resting of the Arke was supposed: for if the Vine was a stranger in Italie and France, and brought from other Countries thither, it is not probable that it grew naturally in Armenia, being a farre colder Country: For Tyrrhenus first brought Vines into France, and Saturnus into Latium: yea at such as Brennus and the Gauls inuaded Italie, there were few or no Vines in France. For (saith Plutarch in the life of Camilus) the Gauls remained betwene the Pyrenes and the Alpes, neere vnto the 50 Senones, where the continued a long time, vntill they drunke Wine, which was first brought them out of Italie; and after they tasted thereof they thought to inhabit that Country, which brought forth such pleasant fruit: so as it appeared, that the Plant of the Vine was not naturall in France, but from Italie brought thither; as by Saturne from else where into Italie.

Now it is manifest, that Noah traauiled not farre to seeke out the Vine. For the Plantation thereof is remembered, before there was any counsaile how to dispose of the World among his children: and the first thing he did, was, to till the ground, and to plant a Vineyard, after the Sacrifice and Thanksgiuing to God; and wheresoeuer the Arke rested, there there did the Vine grow naturally. From whence it doth no where appeare, that he tra-uailed farre: for the Scriptures teach vs, that he was a Husbandman, & not a Wanderer.

Answere to an obiection out of the words of the Text: The Lord scattered them from thence upon the face of the whole earth.

AND that all the children of Noah came together into Shinaar, it doth not appeare, saying that it may be inferred out of these words (from thence) because it is written:
So that the Lord scattered them from thence upon all the earth; which hath no other sense, but that the Lord scattered them (to wit) those that built this Towre: for those were from thence dispersed into all the Regions of the North and South, and to the Westward. And by these words of Sybilla (as they conuerted) it seemeth that all came not together into Shinaar; for they haue this limitation: Quidam eorum turrem aedificauerunt, altissimam, quasi per eam caelum essent ascensuri: Certaine of them built a most high Towre, as if: they meant thereby to haue scaled the Heauens,

Answere to the obiection of the name of Ararat, taken for Armenia: and the height of the Hills there.

BEFORE I conclude this part, it is necessarie to see and consider, what part of Scripture, and what reason may bee found out, to make it true or probable, that the Arke of Noah was forsaken by the waters on the Mountaines of Armenia. For the Text hath onely these words: The Arke rested on (or vpon) the Mountaines of Ararat, or Armenia, saith the marginal note of the Geneva, the Chaldean Paraphrast calls it Kardū; of which, the highest hath the name of Lubar, saith Epiphanius. Now this Ararat (which the Septuagint doe not conuert at all, but keepe the same word) is taken to bee a Mountaine of Armenia, because Armenia it selfe had anciently that name: so as first out of the name, and secondly out of the height (which they suppose exceeded all other) is the opinion taken, That the Arke first sate thereon.

But these suppositions haue no foundation: for neither is Ararat of Armenia alone, neither is any part, or any of those Mountaines of equall stature to many other Moun-taines of the World; and yet it doth not follow, that the Arke found the highest Moun-taine of all other to rest on: for the Plaines were also vncovered, before Noah came out of the Arke. Now, if there were any agreement among Writers of this Ararat, and that they did not differ altogether therein, wee might giue more credit to the conceit. For in the Bookes of the Sybils it is written, that the Mountaines of Ararat are in Phrygia, vpon which it was supposed that the Arke stayed after the Flood. And the better to particularize the place and seate of these Mountaines, and to proue them in Phrygia, and not Armenia, they are placed where the City of Calenes was afterward built. Likewise in the same description hee maketh mention of Marfyas, a Riuer which runneth through part of Phrygia, and afterward ioyneth it selfe with the Riuer Meander, which is farre from the Gordian Mountaines in Armenia. We may also find a great mistaking in Iosephus (though out of Berosus, who is in effect the Father of this opinion) that Iosephus sets Ararat betwene Armenia and Parthia, toward Adiabene, and affirmeth withall, that in the prouince of Caron by others Kairos and Arnos, so called by reason that the waters haue from thence no descent, nor issue out, the people vaunt that they had in those dayes reserved some pieces of Noahs Arke. But Parthia toucheth no where vpon Armenia, for Armenia bordereth Adiabene, a Prouince of Assyria: so that all Media and a part of Assyria is betwene Parthia and Armenia. Now whereas the discovery of the Mountaines Cordiae was first borrowed out of Berosus by Iosephus; yet the Text which Iosephus citeth out of Berosus, differs far from the wordes of that Berosus, which wandreth vp and downe in these dayes, set out by Anniius. For Berosus cited by Iosephus, hath these wordes: Fertur & nauigij huius pars in Armenia apud montem Cordiaeorum superesse, & quosdam bitumen inde abrasum secum reportare, quo vice amuleti loci huius homines uti solent: (which is) It is reported also that a part of this ship is yet remanning in Armenia vpon the Cordian Mountaines; and that diuers doe scrape from it the Bitumen or Pitch, and carrying it with them, they use it in stead of an amulet. But Anniius his Edition

Edition of the Fragment of Berosus vseth these wordes: *Nam eleuata ab aquis in Gordiamontis vertice quieuit, cuius adhuc dicitur aliqua pars esse, & homines ex illa Bitumen tollere quo maxime vniuntur ad expiationem: For the whole Arke being lifted up by the waters, rested on the top of the Gordian Mountaines, of which it is reported that some parts remaine, and that men doe carry thence of the Bitumen to purge by Sacrifice therewith: so as in these two Texts (besides the difference of wordes) the name is diuersly written. The ancient Berosus writes Cordiae with a (C.) and the Fragment Gordiae with a (G.) the one that the Bitumen is vsed for a preseruatiue against Poyson or Inchantment; the other in Sacrifice; And if it be said that they agree in the generall, yet it is reported by neither from any certaine knowledge, nor from any approued Anthour: for one of them vseth the word (fertur) the other (dicitur) the one, that so it is reported, the other, that so it is sayd; and both but by heare-say, and therefore of no authority nor credit. For common bruit is so infamous an Historian, as wise men neither report after it, nor giue credit to any thing they receiue from it.*

Furthermore, these Mountaines which Ptolomie calls Gordiae, are not those Moun-taines which himselfe giueth to Armenia, but he calleth the Mountaines of Armenia Moschici. These be his owne wordes: Montes Armeniae nominantur ij, qui Moschici appellantur, qui protenduntur vsq; ad superiacentem partem Ponti Cappadocum; & mons qui Paryades dicitur: The Mountaines of Armenia are they which are called Moschici, stretch along to the higher part of Pontus of the Cappadocians: also the Hill which is called Paryades; which Mountaines Plinie calleth Pariedri, and both which lye to the North of Gordiae or Baris, in 43. and 44. and a halfe; and the Gordian Mountaines in 39. and a halfe: from the Northermost of which did the Georgians take their names, who were first Gordians and then Georgians, who amidst all the strength of the greatest Infidels of Persia and Turkie, doe still remaine Christians. Concerning the other suppositions, that the Mountaines of Gordiae, otherwise Baris Kardū or Lubar, (which Ptolomie calleth Torgodiaion) are the highest of the World, the same is absolutely false.

†. XI.

Of Caucasus, and diuers farre higher hills then the Armenian.

FOR the best Cosmographers with other, that haue scene the Mountaines of Armenia find them farre inferior, and vnder-set to diuers other Mountaines euen in that part of the World, and else where: as the Mountaine Athos betwene Macedon and Thrace, which Ptolomie calls Olympus, now called Lucas, (saith Castaldus) is farre surmounting any Mountaine that euer hath beene scene in Armenia: for it casteth shade three hundred furlongs, which is seuen and thirtie miles and vpwards: of which Plutarch: Athos adumbrat latera Lemniae bouis: Athos shadoweth the Cow of Lemnos. Also the Mount of Olympus in Thessalie, is said to be of that height, as neither the Windes, Cloudes or Raine ouertop it. Again, the Mountaine of Antandrus in Mysia, not farre from Ida, whence the Riuer Scamandrus floweth, which runneth through Troy, is also of a farre more admiration then any in Armenia, and may be scene from Constantinople. There are also in Mauritania neere the Sea, the famous Mountaines of Atlas, of which HERO-DOTVS: Extat in hoc mari Mons cui nomen Atlas, ita sublimis esse dicitur, ut ad illius verticem oculi mortalium peruenire non possint: Vpon this Coast there is a Mountaine called Atlas, whose height is sayd to be such, as the eye of no mortall man can discern the top thereof.
And if we may beleue Aristotle, then are all these inferior to Caucasus, which he ma-keth the most notorious both for breath and height: *Caucasus Mons omnium maximus, qui aestiuum ad ortum sunt, acumine atq; latitudine, cuius iuga a Sole radiantur vsq; ad occiduum ab ortu: & iterum ab occasu; Caucasus (saith ARISTOTLE) is the greatest Moun-taine both for breadth and height of all those in the North-east, whose tops are lightened by the Sun-beames, vsq; ad conticinium (which is saith Macrobius) betwene the first crowing after mid-night and the breake of day: Others affirme, that the top of this Mountaine holds the Sunne-beames when it is darke in the Valley; but I cannot beleue eyther:
for the highest Mountaine of the World knowne is that of Tenerife in the Canaria: which although it hath nothing to the Westward of it for 1000. Leagues together but the Ocean Sea, yet doth it not enioy the Sunnes company at any such late hours. Besides these Mountaines which Aristotle calleth Caucasus, are those which separate Colchis from Iberia;*

Iberia; though (indeed) Caucasus doth diuide both Colchis, Iberia, and Albania from Sarmatia: for hee acknowledgeth that the Riuer of Phasis riseth in the same Mountayne, which himselfe calleth Caucasus, and that Phasis springeth from those Hills which funder Colchis from Iberia, falling afterward into Euxinus: which Riuer (it is manifest) yeeldeth it selfe to the Sea, two degrees to the North of Trapezus (now Trabesunda) howsoeuer Mercator bring it from Peryardes.

†. XII.

Of diuers incongruities if in this Storiewe should take Ararat for Armenia.

SO as it doth first appeare, that there is no certaintie what Mountaine Ararat was: for the Bookes of the Sybls set it in Phrygia, and Berosus in Armenia: and as for Berosus authoritie, those men haue great want of proofes that borrow from thence.

Secondly, that Baris was the highest Hill, and therefore most likely that the Arke grounded thereon, the assertion and supposition haue equall credit: for there are many Hills which exceed all those of Armenia; and if they did not, yet it doth not follow (as is before written) that the Arke should sit on the highest.

Thirdly, it cannot be proued that there is any such Hill in Armenia, or in rerum natura, as Baris: for Baris (sayth Hierome) signifieth high Towres: and so may all high Hills be called indifferently; and therefore we may better giue the name of Baris to the 20 Hills of Caucasus (out of which Indus riseth) then to any Hills of Armenia. For those of Caucasus in the East, are vndoubtedly the highest of Asia.

Fourthly, the Authours themselves doe not agree in what Region the Mountaines Gordias stand: for Ptolomie distinguisheth the Mountaines of Armenia from the Gordiean, Gordias stand: for Ptolomie distinguisheth the Mountaines of Armenia from the Gordiean, and calleth those of Armenia Moschici and Paryardes, as aforesaid. Now Paryardes is and seated neere the middle of Armenia, out of which on the West-side riseth Euphrates, and out of the East-side Araxis: and the Mountaines Moschici are those Hills which disioyne Colchis, Iberia, and Albania (now the Country of the Georgians) from Armenia.

†. XIII.

Of the contrary situation of Armenia to the place noted in the Text: and that it is no maruail that the same Ledge of Hills running from Armenia to India, should keepe the same name all along: and euen in India be called Ararat.

LASTly, we must blow vp this Mountaine Ararat it selfe, or else we must digge it downe, and carry it out of Armenia; or find it else where, and in a warmer Country, and (withall) set it East from Shinaar: or else we shall wound the Truth it selfe with the weapons of our owne vaine imaginations.

Therefore to make the mistaking open to euery eye, we must vnderstand, that Ararat (named by Moses) is not any one Hill, so called, no more then any one Hill among those Mountaines which diuide Italie from France is called the Alpes: or any one among those which part France from Spaine is the Pyrenian; but as these being continuations of many Hills keepe one name in diuers Countries: so all that long Ledge of Mountaines, which Plinie calleth by one name Taurus, and Ptolomie both Taurus, Niphates, Coatras, Coronus, Sariphi, vntill they encounter and crosse the Mountaines of the great Imaus, are of one generall name, and are called the Mountaines of Ararat or Armenia, because from thence or thereabout they seeme to arise. So all these Mountaines of Hircania, Armenia, Coraxia, Caspj Moschici, Amazonici, Heniochi, Scythici, (thus diuerly called by Plinie and others) Ptolomie calls by one name Caucasus, lying betwene the Seas Caspium and Euxinus: as all those Mountaines which cut asunder America, euen from the new Kingdome of Granado, to the streight of Magellan, are by one name called Andes. And as these Mountaines of Ararat runne East and West, so doe those maruailous Mountaines of Imaus stretch themselves North and South; and being of like extent well-neere, are called by the name of Imaus, euen as Plinie calleth these former hills Taurus, and Moses the hills of Ararat. The reason of severall names giuen by Ptolomie was, thereby the better to distinguish the great Regions and Kingdomes, which these great mountaines bound and disseuer; as Armenia, Mesopotamia, Assyria, Media, Susiana, Persia, Partbia, Caramania, Arta, Margiana, Bactria, Sogdiana, and Paropanisus: ha-

uing all these Kingdomes either on the North or South side of them. For all the mountaines of Asia (both the lesse and the greater) haue three generall names, (to wit) Taurus, Imaus, and Caucasus: and they receiue other titles, as they seuer and diuide particular places and regions. For these mountaines which funder Cilicia from the rest of Asia the lesse on the North side, are called Taurus; and those mountaines which part it from Comagena (a Prouince of Syria) are called Amanus: the mountaines called Taurus running East and West, as Imaus doth North and South. Though Taurus the Riuer of Euphrates forceth her passage, leauing the name of Amanus to the mountaines on her West banke; and on her East side the mountaines are sometimes knowne by the name

10 of Taurus, (as in Ptolomies three tables of Asia) and sometimes Niphates: (as in the fourth) retaining that vncertaine appellation so long as they bound Armenia from Mesopotamia: and after the Riuer of Tygris cutteth them asunder, they then take the name of Niphates altogether, vntill they separate Assyria and Media; but then they call themselves Coatras, though betwene the vpper and nether Media, they doe not appeare, but altogether discontinued. For at Mazada in Media they are not found, but runne through the Easterne Media by pieces: in the middle of which Region they call themselves Orontes, and towards the East part Coronus; out of the Southerne part whereof the Riuer of Bagradas riseth, which diuideth the ancient Persia from Caramania: and then continuing their course Eastward by the name of Coronus, they giue to the Parthians and 20 Hyrcanians their proper Countries. This done, they change themselves into the mountaines of Sariphi, out of which riseth the Riuer Margus, afterward yeelding her selfe to Oxus: (now Arta) and drawing now neere their wayes end, they first make themselves the South border of Bactria, and are then honoured with the Title of Paropanisus; and lastly of Caucasia, euen were the famous Riuer of Indus with his principall companions Hydaspis and Zaradrus spring forth, and take beginning. And here doe these Mountaines build themselves exceeding high, to equall the strong Hills called Imaus of Scythia, which encounter each other in 35. 36. and 37. degrees of Latitude, and in 140. of Longitude: of the which the West parts are now called Delanguer, and the rest Nagrascot; and these Mountaines in this place onely are properly called Caucasi (saith Ptolomie) 30 that is, betwene Paropanisus and Imaus: and improperly, betwene the two Seas of Caspium and Pontus.

Of the best Vine naturally growing on the South side of the Mountaines Caucasi and toward the East Indies: and of other excellencies of the soile

NOW in this part of the World it is, where the Mountaine and Riuer Ianus, and the highest Mountaines of that part of the world did Goropius Becanus conceiue that the Arke 40 of Noah grounded after the Flood: of all his coniectures the most probable, and by best reason approved. In his Indoscythia he hath many good Arguments, though mixt with other fantasticall opinions of this subiect. And as the same Becanus also noteth; that as in this part of the world are found the best Vines: so it is as true, that in the same Line, and in 34. 35. and 36. degrees of Septentrionall Latitude are the most delicate VVines of the World, namely, in Indea, Candia, and other parts of Greece: and likewise in this Region of Margiana, and vnder these Mountaines, Sirabo affirmeth, that the most excellent Vines of the World are found; the clusters of Grapes containing two Cubits of length: and it is the more probable, because this place agreeth in Climate with that part of Palestina, where the searchers of the land by Moses direction found bunches of equal bignes at Escob. 50 The fruitfulnessse of this place (to wit) on the South bottome of these Hills, Curtius witnesseth. For in Margiana neere the Mountaines of Meros did Alexander feast himselfe and his Armie ten dayes together, finding therein the most delicate VVine of all other.

name of Ararat. But as Plinie giueth to this ledge of high Hills, euen from Cilica to Paroponifus and Caucasus, the name of Taurus: and as the Hills of France and Germanie are called the Alpes: and all betweene France and Spaine the Pyrenes: and in America the continuation of Hills for 3000. miles together, the Andes: so was Ararat the generall name which Moses gaue them; the diuersitie of appellations no otherwise growing, then by their diuinding and bordering diuers Regions and diuers Countries. For in the like case doe we call the Sea, which entreth by Gibraltar, the Mediterran and inland Sea; and yet where it washeth the Coasts of Carthage, and ouer against it, it is called Tyrrhenum: betweene Italie and Greece, Ionium: from Venice to Durazzo, Adriaticum: betweene Athens and Asia, Egeum: betweene Sestus and Abydos, Hellepont: and afterward Pontus, Propontis, and Bosphorus. And as in these, so is the Ocean to the North-east part of Scotland called Deucalidonicum: and on this side, the Brittaine Sea: to the East, the Germane and Baltick, and then the Frozen.

For a final end of this question we must appeale to that Iudge which cannot erre, euen to the word of Truth, which in this place is to be taken and followed according to the plaine sense: seeing it can admit neither distinction, nor other construction then the words beare literally, because they are vsed to the very same plaine purpose of a description, and the making of a true and precise difference of places. Surely, where the sense is plaine (and being so vnderstood, it bringeth with it no subsequent inconuenience or contrarietie) we ought to be warie, how we fancie to our selues any new or strange exposition; and (withall) to resolue our selues, that euery word (as aforesaid) hath his weight in Gods Booke. And therefore wee must respect and reuerence the testimonies of the Scriptures throughout, in such sort as S. Augustine hath taught vs touching the Gospell of CHRIST IESVS (which is) Nequis aliter accipiat (quod narrantibus Discipulis Christi) in Euangelio legerit, quam si ipsam manum Dei, quam in proprio in corpore gestabat, conspexerit; That no man otherwise take or vnderstand that which he readeth in the Gospell (the Disciples of Christ hauing written it) then if he had scene the very hand of the Lord, which he bare in his owne body, setting it downe.

Gen. 11. v. 2.

The wordes then of Moses which end this dispute, are these: And as they went from the East, they found a Playne in the land of Shinaar, and there they obode: which prouoeth without controuersie, that Nimrod and all with him came from the East into Shinaar; and therefore the Arke of Noah rested and tooke land to the East-ward thereof. For wee must remember, that in all places wherefoeuer Moses maketh a difference of Countries, he alwayes precisely nameth toward what quarters of the world the same were seated: as where he teacheth the plantation of Ioſtan, he nameth Sephar, a Mount in the East: where he remembreth Cains departure from the presence of God, he addeth: And CAIN dwelt in the land of Nod towards the East-side of Eden: And when he describeth the Tents and Habitations of Abraham after hee departed from Secchem, hee vseth these wordes:

Gen. 12. v. 9.

Gen. 4. 16.

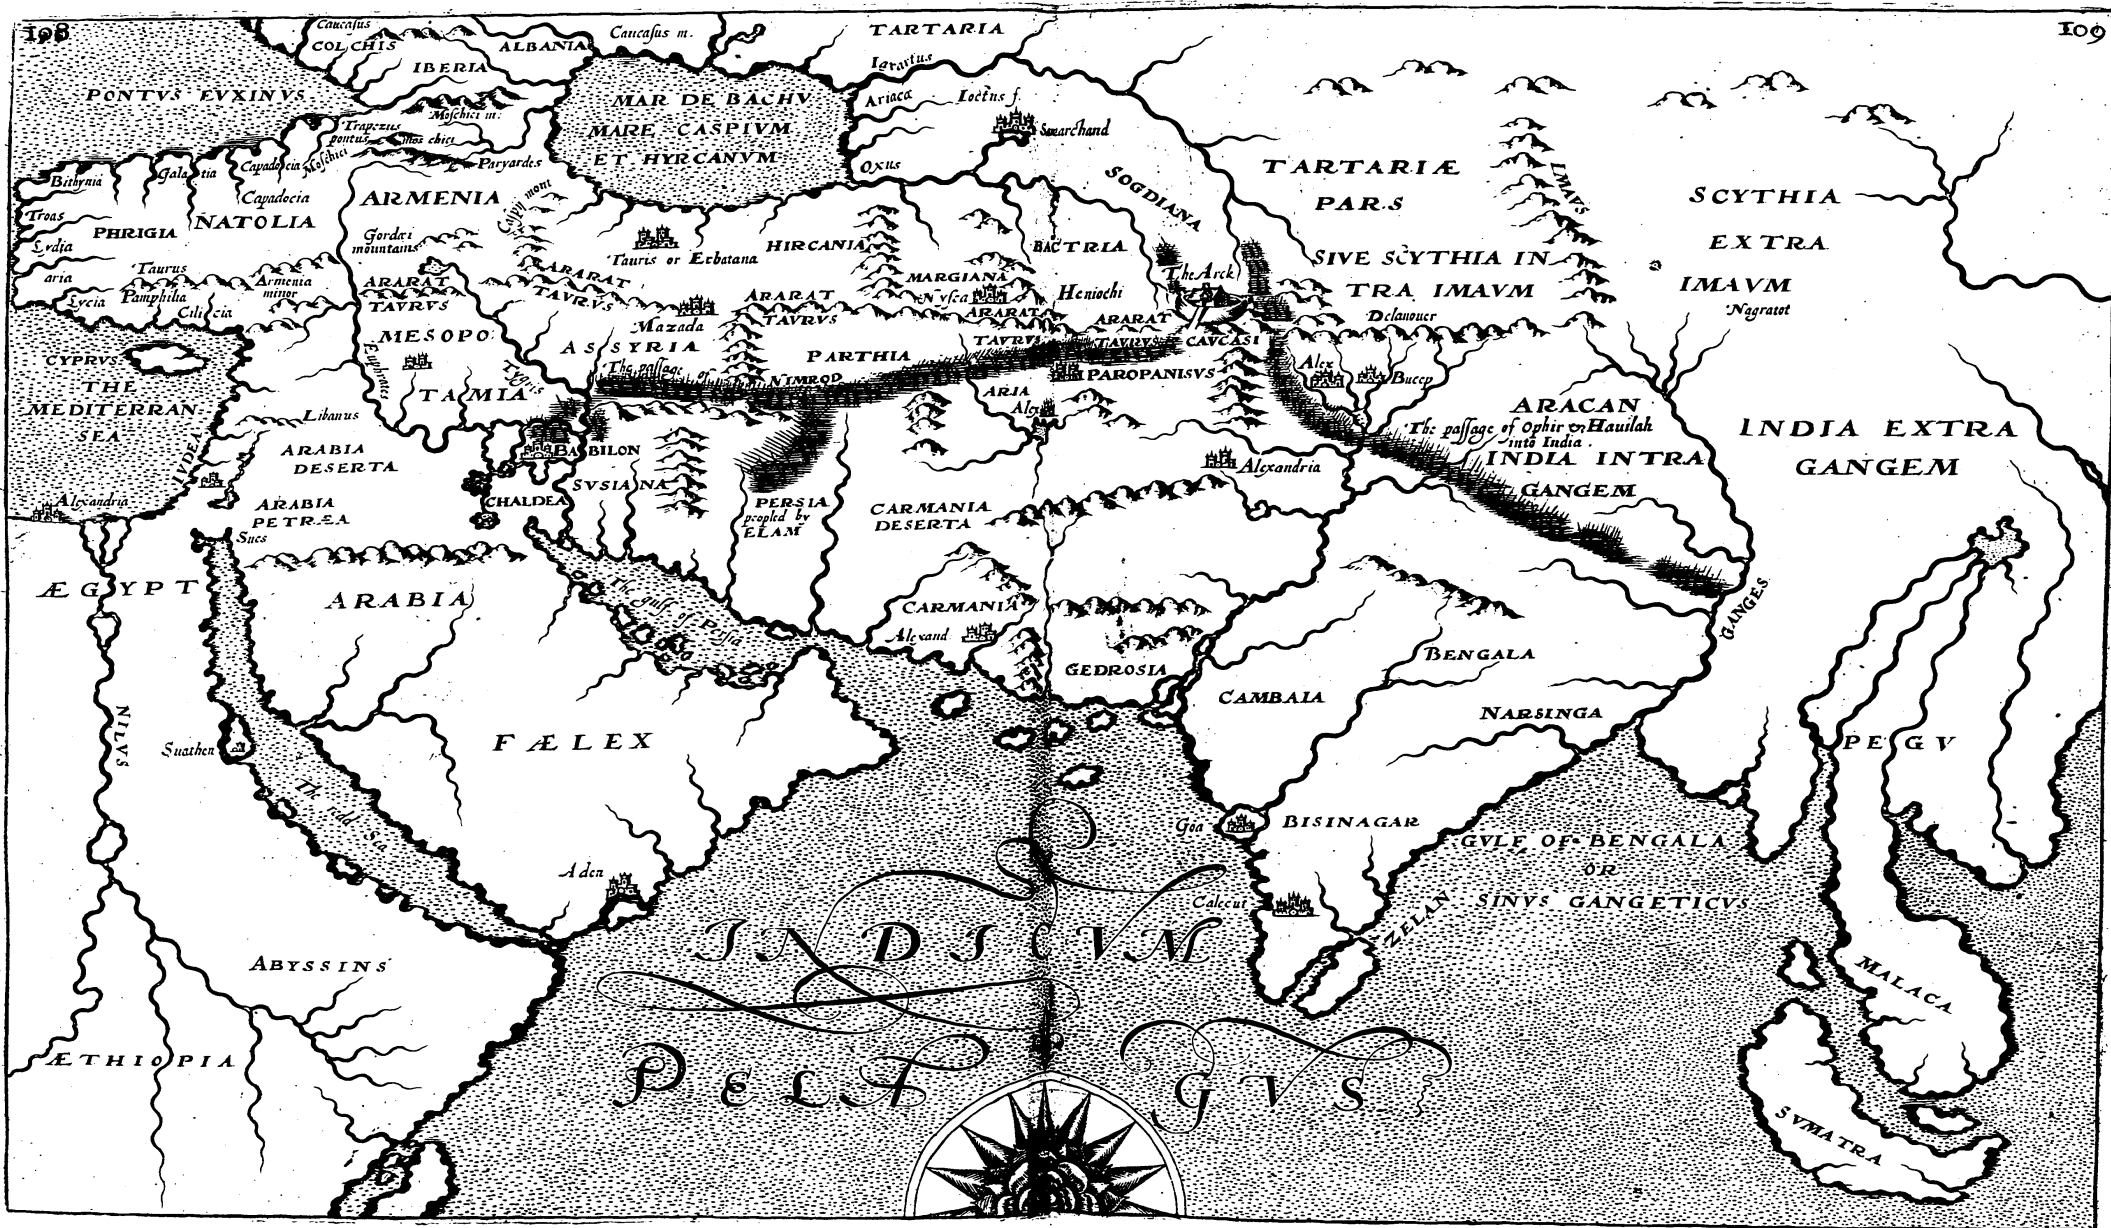

Gen. 12. v. 8.

Ezech. 38. 6.

Matth. 12. 42.

Matth. 2. v. 1.

Afterwards remoouing thence vnto a Mountaine Eastward from Bethel, he pitched his Tents: hauing Beibei on the West-side, and Hai on the East: and afterward in the ninth Verse of the same Chapter it is written: And ABRAHAM went forth journeying towards the South: also when Ezechiel prophesied of Gog and Magog, he sheweth that these Nations of Togorma were of the North quarters: and of the Queene of Saba it is writen, that she came from the South to visit SALOMON: And the Magi (or wisemen) came out of the East to offer presents vnto Christ. And that all Regions, and these trauailes were precisely set downe vpon the points of the Compasse and quarters of the world, it is most manifest: for Eden was due East from Iudea, Saba South from Hierusalem: the way from Bethel to Egypt directly South; and the Caleſyrians the Tubalines and Magogians inhabited the Regions directly North from Palestina, and so of the rest. But Armenia answereth not to this description of Shinaar by Moses. For to come out of Armenia, and to arrive in that Vally of Babylonia, is not a iourning from the East, nor so neere vnto the East as the North: for Armenia is to the West of the North it selfe; and we must not say of Moses (whose hands the holy Ghost directed) that he erred soto celo, and that he knew not East from West. For the body of Armenia standeth in fortie three degrees Septentrionall, and the North part thereof in forty fiue; and those Gordiean Mountaines, whereon it was supposed that the Arke rested, stand in fortie one. But Babylonia, and the Vally of Shinaar are situated in thirtie fiue, and for the Longitude (which maketh the difference betweene East and West) the Gordiean Mountaines stand in 75. degrees, and the the Valley of Shinaar in 79. and 80. And therefore Armenia lyeth from Shinaar Northwest, ninety five degrees from the East; and if Armenia had bene but North, yet it had differed from the East one whole quarter of the Compass. But Gregorie and Hierome warne vs, In scripturis ne minima differentia omitti debet: nam singuli sermones, syllabe, apices, & puncta in diuina Scriptura plena sunt sensibus; In the Scriptures the least difference may not be omitted: for every speech, syllable, note, or accent, and point in diuine Scriptures are replenished with their meanings. And therefore seeing Moses teacheth vs that the children of Noah came from the East, we may not beleue Writers (of little authority) who also speake by heare say and by report, ut fertur, & ut dicitur, as Berosus and Nicolaus Damascenus, determining herein without any examination of the Text, at all ad-venture. But this is infallible true, that Shinaar lyeth West from the place where the Arke of Noah rested after the flood; and therefore it first found ground in the East, from whence came the first knowledge of all things. The East parts were first ciuill, which had Noah himselfe for an Instructer: and directly East from Shinaar in the same degree of 35. are the greatest grapes and the best Wine. The great Armies also which ouer-topped in number those Millions of Semiramis, proue that those parts were first planted: And whereas the other opinion hath neither Scripture nor Reason sufficient: for myselfe I build on his wordes who in plaine termes hath told vs, that the Sonnes of Noah came out of the East into Shinaar, and there they abode. And therefore did the Arke rest on those Easterne Mountaines, called by one generall name Taurus, and by Moses the Mountaines of Ararat, and not on those Mountaines of the Northwest, as Berosus first fained, whom most part of the Writers haue followed therein. It was, I say in the plentifull warme East where Noah rested, where hee planted the Vine, where hee tilled the ground and liued thereon. Placuit vero Noacho agricultura studium, in qua tractanda ipse omnium peritissimus esse dicitur: ob eamq, rem sua ipsius lingua Ish-Adamath (hoc est) telluris uir appellatur celebratusq, est; The studie of Husbandrie pleased Noah (saith the excellent learned man Arias Montanus) in the knowledge and order of which it is said, that Noah excelled all men: and therefore was he called in his owne language a man exercised in the earth. Which also sheweth that he was no Wanderer: and that he troubled not himselfe with the contentions, beginning againe in the world, and among men, but stayed in his destined places, and in that part of the world, where hee was first deliuered out of prison of the Arke, wherinto God had committed him, to preserue him and mankind.

Of the first planting of Nations after the flood; and of the Sonnes of NOAH, SEM, HAM, and IAPHET, by whom the earth was re-peopled.

§. I.

Whether SHEM and HAM were elder then IAPHET.

IF these Sonnes of Noah, which was the eldest, there is a question made. S. Augustine esteemed Shem for the eldest, Ham for the second, and Iaphet for the yongest: and herein the oppinions of Writers are diuers. But this we finde euery wherein the Scriptures, and especially in Moses, that there was neuer any respect giuen to the eldest in yeeres, but in vertue, as by the examples of Enoch, Abraham, Iacob, and Dauid, is made manifest. In a few wordes this is the ground of the controuersie; The Latine translation, and so the Geneua, hath conuerted this Scripture of Genesis the 10. v. 21. in these wordes: Vnto SHEM also the Father of all the Sonnes of HEBER, and elder brother of IAPHET, were children borne. But Iunius agreeing with the Septuagint, placeth the same wordes in this manner: To SHEM also the Father of all the Sons of HEBER, and brother of IAPHET, the eldest Sonne were children borne: So the transposition of the word (elder) made this difference. For if the word (elder) had followed after Iaphet, as it is in the vulgar translation placed before it, then had it bene as plaine for Iaphet, as it is by these translations for Shem. Now (the matter being otherwise indifferent) seeing Gods blessings are not tyed to first and last in bloud, but to the eldest in pietie, yet the arguments are stronger for Iaphet then for Shem. And where the Scriptures are plainly vnderstood without any danger or inconuenience, it seemeth strange why any man of iudgement should make valuation of coniecturall arguments, or mens opinions. For it appeareth that Noah in the fixe hundredth yeere of his life, begate the first of his three Sonnes, Shem, Ham, and Iaphet: and in the fixe hundredth yeere (to wit) the hundredth yeere following, came the generall flood; two yeeres after which Shem begate Arphaxad, which was in the yeere 602. of Noahs life, and in the yeere of Shems life one hundred: so as Shem was but 100. yeeres old; and two yeeres after the flood: and Noah begat his first borne being 500. yeeres old; and therefore, were Shem the elder, he had then beene a hundred yeeres old at the flood, and in the fixe hundredth yeere of Noahs life, and not two yeeres after. Which seeing the Scriptures before remembred hath denied him, and that it is also written: Then Noah awoke from his wine, and knew what his younger sonne had done vnto him (to wit) Ham; of necessitie the first place doth belong to Iaphet. This younger sonne so conuerted by the vulgar and Genea, Iunius turnes it filius minimus; His youngest sonne; but S. Chrysostome takes it otherwise, and findes Cham to bee the middle or second brother, and Iaphet the yongest sonne of all: which Cham for his disobedience and the contempt of his Father (whose nakednesse he derided) was disinherited, and lost the preeminence of his birth, as Esaue and Reuben did. Pererius conceiue that Ham was called the yonger in respect of Shem the eldest, but auoweth withall, that the Hebrew hath not that precise difference of yonger and yongest, because it wanteth the comparatiue degree. It is true that Shem himselfe was alwaies named in the first place, yet whereas in the first Verse of the tenth Chapter of Genesis, Shem is accounted before Iaphet: in the second Verse Moses leaueth to begin with the issue by Shem, and reciteth the children of Iaphet first. So the first place was given to Shem for his election and benediction, and for this weightie respect, that the Hebrew Nation, Abraham, the Prophets, Dauid, and Christ our Saviour were descended of him. And therefore, whether we shall follow the Vulgar Pagninus, and the Genea, who agree in this conuersion, Shem Frater IAPHET maior; or with the Septuagint, Iunius, and Tremelius, Shem fratri IAPHET maioris; or with Pererius, Shem frater IAPHET ille magnus: inferring that Shem was the great and famous brother of Iaphet, let the Reader iudge. But for ought that I haue seene to the contrarie, it appeareth to me that Iaphet was the eldest. For where Pererius qualifieth the strength of the former Argument, That Shems age at the time of the flood did not agree with the elderhip (with a supposition that the Scriptures tooke no account of smaller numbers) I doe not finde in the Scriptures any such neglect at all: for it is written, that Shem was an hundred yeeres old, and begat Arphaxad two yeeres after the flood; and againe in the 12. Verse: So Shem lived after he begat Ebar, foure hundred and three yeeres, &c. so as the number of two yeeres, of three yeeres, of fixe yeeres, and afterward of two yeeres were alwayes precisely accounted.

p. II.

Of diuers things that all reason are to be presumed, touching the first planting of the World, as that all Histories must yeeld to Moses: that the world was not planted all at once, nor without great direction: and that knowne great Lords of the first ages were of the issue of Ham.

BUt let vs go vnto the Worlds plantation after the flood, which being rightly vnderstood, we shall finde that many Nations haue supposed or fayned themselves those Ancestors and Fathers, which neuer saw or approached the bounds of their Countries, and of whom they are by no way or branch descended. For it is plaine in the Scriptures how the Sonnes and issues of Noah were distributed, and what Regions were first planted by them, from whence by degrees the rest of the world was also peopled. And if any prophane Author may receiue allowance herein, the same must bee with this caution, That they take their beginning where the Scriptures end. For so farre as the storie of Nations is therein handled, we must know that both the truth and antiquitie of the bookes of God finde no companions equall, either in age or authoritie. All record, memorie, and testimonie of antiquitie whatsoever, which hath come to the knowledge of men, the same hath beene been borrowed thence, and therefore latter then it, as all carefull obseruers of time haue noted: among which thus writeth Eusebius in the Præme of his Chronologie: Moses is found more ancient then all those whom the Grecians make most ancient, as HOMER, HESIOD, and the Traianwarre; and farre before HERCVLES, MVSEVS, LIVVS, CHIRON, ORPHEVS, CASTOR, POLLVS, ÆSCVLAPVS, BACCHVS, MERCVRIVS, and APOLLO, and the rest of the gods of the Nations, their Ceremonies, or holy Rites, or Prophets: and before all the deeds of IVPITER, whom the Greekes haue seated in the top and highest Turres of their Diuinitie.

For of the three Iupiters remembred by Cicero, the ancientest was the sonne of Æther, whose three sonnes begotten on Proserpina, were borne at Athens, of which Cecrops was the first King: and in the end of Cecrops time did Moses bring the children of Israel out of Egypt: Eduxit Moses populum Dei ex Ægypto nouissimo tempore Cecropis Atheniensis Regis; Moses brought the children of Israel out of Egypt, in the last dayes of Cecrops, King of the Athenians, saith S. Augustine: and yet was not Cecrops the Founder of the Citie it selfe, but Tefusus long after him. But because the truth hereof is diuersly prooued, and by many learned Authors, I will not cut asunder the purpose in hand, by alleaging many authorities in a needlesse question, but leaue it to the proper place.

The Sonnes of IAPHET were,

Gomer, Magog, Madai, Iauan,
Tubal, Mesbach,
and Tiras.

The Sonnes of GOMER were,

Togorma.

The Sonnes of IAVAN were,

Elisha, Tarshis, Kittim, and Dodanim.

First, we are to consider, that the world after the Flood not planted by imagination, neither had the children of Noah wings to flie from Shinaar, to the vttermost border of Europe, Africa and Asia in haste, but that these children were directed by a wise Father, who knew those parts of the world before the Flood, to which he disposed his children after it, and sent them not as Discoverers, or at all-aduenture, but assigned and allotted to euery Sonne and their issues, their proper parts. And not to harken to fabulous Authors, who haue no other end then to flatter Princes (as Virgil did Augustus in the fiction of Æneas) or else to glorifie their owne Nations; Let vs build heerein vpon the Scriptures themselves, and after them vpon Reason and Nature. First therefore wee must call to minde and consider, what manner of face the earth euery-where had in the 130. yeere after the great inundation, and by comparing those fruitfullest Vallies, with our owne barren and cold ground, informe our selues thereby, what wonderfull Defarts, what impassable fastnesse of woods, reeds, bryars, and rotten grasse, what Lakes and standing Pooles, and what Marishes, Fens, and Bogs, all the face of the earth (excepting the Mountaines) was pestered withall. For if in this our Climate (where the dead and destroying Winter depressoeth all vegetatiue and growing Nature, for one halfe of the yeere in effect) yet in twenty or thirtie yeres, these our grounds would not all ouer-grow and be covered (according to the nature thereof) either with Woods, or with other offensive Thickets and Bushments: much more did all sorts of Plants, Reedes, and Trees, prosper in the most fruitfull Vallies, and in the Climate of a long & warme Summer, and hauing withall the start of 130. yeeres, to raise themselves without controlement.

This being considered, it will appeare, that all these people which came into Shinaar, and ouer whom Nimrod either by order or strength tooke the Dominion, did after the confusion of Languages, and at such time as they grew to be a mighty People, disperse themselves into the Regions adioyning to the said Vallie of Shinaar, which contained the best part of Mesopotamia, Babylonia, and Chaldea; and from the borders thereof in time they were propagated: some of them towards the South, others towards the West and North. And although there were allotted to Shem many Regions, both East and West from Shinaar, with the Dominion of Palestina, which the Canaanites first possesed; yet could he not enioy the lot of his inheritance on the suddaine, but by time and degrees. For wee finde, that Abraham the true successour of Shem, dwelt in Chaldea at Vr.; and from thence (called by God) hee rested at Charran in Mesopotamia: from whence after the death of Thare hee traualled to Sichem in Palestina: and yet there had passed betweene Shem and Abraham (reckoning neyther of themselves) seven Descents, before Abraham moued out of Chaldea; where, and in Babylonia, all those people by Nimrod commanded, inhabited for many yeares, and whence Nimrod went out into Affyria, and founded Niniue. Indeed the great Masters of Nations (as farre as wee can know) were, in that Age of the Issues of Ham; the blessing of God giuen by Noah to Shem and Iaphet taking lesse effect, vntill diuers yeares were consumed; and vntill the time arriued, which by the wisdom of God was appointed. For of Chus, Mizraim, and Canaan, came the People and Princes, which held the great Kingdomes of Babylonia, Syria, and Egypt, for many Descents together.

§. III.

Of the Iles of the Gentiles in IAPHETS portion: of BEROSVS his too speedie seating GOMER the sonne of IAPHET in Italie; and another of IAPHETS Sonnes TVBAL in Spaine: and of the Antiquitie of Longinque Navigation.

IO beginne therefore (where Moses beginneth) with the sonnes of Iapheth, among whom the Iles of the Gentiles were diuided: which diuision, as well to Iaphets sonnes as to therest which came into Shinaar, was (if the diuision were made at *Phaleg*s birth) in the year of the World 1757. or 1758. and (by that account) in the year after the Flood one hundred and one, of which question elsewhere.

The habitations proper to the sonnes of Iaphet were the Iles of the Gentiles, which include all Europe with all the Ilands adioyning; and compassing it about: Europe being also taken for an Iland, both in respect that the Sea Hellespont and Aegeum, Bosphorus and Euxinus cut is off from the great Continent of Asia, as also because Europe it selfe is (in effect) surrounded with water, sauing that it is fastned to Asia by the North, for it hath those Seas before named to the East, the Mediterran to the South and South-west, the Ocean to the West, and Brittish, Germane, and Baltick Sea, with that of Glaciale to the North North-east, and North-west. Besides, it hath about it all the Cyclades or Iles lying betweene Greece and the lesser Asia, and the Iles of Rhodes, Cyprus, Crete, or Candia, Sicilia, Corfica, Sardinia, Malta, the Iles of Brittanie and Zealand, with their young-ones adiacent.

This partition and portion of Iapheth, with the part which hee held in Asia, and the North, which was also very great, answereth to that blessing of God by Noah, Dilates Deus IAPHETH; Let God spread abroad (or increase the Posteritie of) IAPHETH, and let him dwell in the Tents of Shem. For though Iunius heere vseth the word (alliciat) and not dilates: and the Geneua persuadeat; yet the Septuagins haue dilates or amplificet; and such was the blessing giuen to our Fathers, which God promised to Abraham and his Seede for euer. And the dwelling in the Tents or Tabernacles of Shem was a blessing by God to the Posteritie of Iapheth: noting not onely an enlargement of Territories; but that thereby they should be made participant of Gods Church. But to come to Iaphets sonnes, of whom Gomer is the eldest. This Gomer (if wee may beleue Berosus and Annius, whose authoritie the greatest number of all our late Writers haue followed) did in the tenth year of Nimrods Reigne depart from Babylonia, and planted Italie: which also Functius confirmeth in these words Anno decimo NIMRODI, &c. In the tenth year of NIMRODS Reigne, GOMERVS GALLVS planted a Colonie in that Land afterward called Italie: and in the twelfth year of the same NIMRODS Reigne TVBAL seated himselfe in Aufuria in Spaine (now called Biscay) which was in the 140. and in the 142. yeares after the Flood, according to BEROSVS. But this opinion is very ridiculous. For before the confusion of Tongues the children of Noah did not separate themselves, at least so many of them as came with Nimrod into Shinaar. Let vs therefore consider with reason, what time the building such a Citie and Towre required, where there was no prepared matter, nor any readie meanes to performe such a worke as Nimrod had erected (and as Functius himselfe out of his Author Berosus witnesseth) ad altitudinem & magnitudinem montium; To the heighth and magnitude of the Mountaines. Sure that both this Citie and Towre was almost builded the Scriptures witnesse: But the Lord came downe to see the Citie and Towre, which the Sonnes of men builded. Leesv then but allot a time sufficient for the making of Bricks to such a Worke, of the greatest heighth (and therefore of circuit and foundation answerable) that euer was: For where the vniuersall Flood covered the highest Mountaines fiftene Cubits; Let vs build vs a Citie and a Towre (saith Nimrod) whose top may reach vnto the Heauen: meaning, that they would rayse their Worke about fiftene Cubits higher then the highest Mountaine, otherwise they could not assure themselves from the feare of a second inundation: a great part whereof was finished before it fell, and before they left the Worke. They also began this building vpon a ground, the most oppressed with Waters of all the World: as by the great ruine which these waters forcibly ouer-bearing and ouer-flowing, made in the time of the succeeding Emperours, is made manifest; approved also by the Prophet Hieremie, speaking of Babylon in these words: Thou hast dwelt vpon many waters. It cannot be doubted but that there needed a substantiall foundation: for so high a rayssed building on a marish ground: and to which, Glycus vpon Genesis giueth fortie yeares. For it seemeth, that the Towre was neere finished when God ouerthrew it: it being afterward written; So the Lord scattered them from thence vpon all the Earth, and they left to build the Citie. Out of which place it may be gathered (because the Towre is not then named) that they very neere had performed the Worke of their supposed defence, which was the Towre: and that afterward they went on with the Citie adioyning, wherein they inhabited: It is also to be noted: that vntill such time as this confusion seized them (whereupon the Towre was throwne downe) these Nations did not disperse themselves: for from thence the Lord scattered them vpon all the Earth, (that was) when they perceived not one anothers speech. Now to thinke that this Worke in the newness of the World (wanting all instruments and materials) could be performed in ten yeares; and that Tubal and Gomer in the same year could creepe through 3000. miles of Desert, with Women, Children, and Cartell: let those light Beleuers; that neyther tye themselves to the Scripture, nor to reason, approue it, for I doe not. And if the Arke of Noah was 100. yeares in building, or but neere such a time; (and then) when the World had stood 1556. yeares; it were more then foolishness and madness in selfe, to thinke that such a Worke as this could be performed in ten; when the World (from the Flood to the arrival at Babel, and beginning of this building there) had but 157. yeares; and whereof they had spent some part in traouailing from the East. Again, if all Asia set to their helping hands in the building of the Temple of Diana; and yet they consumed in that Worke 400. yeares (or be it but halfe that time) and in such an Age as when the World flourished in all sorts of Artificers; and with abundant plenty of materials and carriages: This Worke of the Towre of Babel could hardly (with all the former wants supposed) be erected in those few yeares remembred. And for conclusion, let all men of iudgement weigh with themselves how impossible it was for a Nation or Family of men, with their Wiues and Children, and Cartell, to trauaile 3000. miles through Woods, Bogs, and 40. Desarts, without any Guide or Conductor; and we shall find it rather a Worke of 100. yeares then of a 100. dayes. For in the West Indies of which the Spaniards haue the experience, in those places where they found neither Path nor Guide, they haue not entered the Countrey ten miles in ten yeares. And if *Nimrod*s people spent many yeares by the account before remembred in passing from the East India or the higher part thereof, which standeth in 115. Degrees of Longitude, vntill they came into Shinaar which lyeth in 79. Degrees (the distance betweene those places containing 36. Degrees, which make 720. Leagues, which is 2160. miles) and did all the way keepe the Mountaines and hard ground; then the difference betweene Babylon and Biscay is much more: for the bodie of Biscay lyeth in ten Degrees, and Babylon or Shinaar (as aforesaid) in 79. so the length of way from Shinaar to Aufuria or Biscay is 69. Degrees, which make 1380. Leagues, or of miles 4140. And therefore if Nimrod tooke diuers yeares to find Shinaar, which was but 2160. miles: or (supposing that the Opportunity rested in Armenia) little above 400. miles: there is no cause to the contrary, but to allow as many yeares to Gomer and Tubal to trauaile 3000. miles to Countreies lesse knowne vnto them by farre; then the Land of Shinaar was to Nimrod. For Paradise was knowne to Noah before the Flood: and so was the Region of Eden by Moses afterward remembred; but what hee vnderstood of most part of the World esse it is unknowne. And therefore did Annius ill aduise himselfe to plant Gomer in Italie, and Tubal in Spaine, in the tenth & twelfth of *Nimrod*s road. Reigne: Shall the Earth be brought forth in one day, or shall a Nation be borne at one? But it may be objected, That the Sonnes of Iapheth might come by Sea; and so save this great trouble through Desarts by Land. But we neuer reade of any Navigation in those dayes, nor long after. Surely he that knoweth what it is to imbarke so great a people as we many iustly suppose those Conductors carryed with them, will not easily beleue, that there were any Vessels in those dayes to transport Armies, and (withall) their Cartell, by whose Milke they lived and fed their Children: For Milke and Fruit were the banqueting Dishes of our Fore-Fathers. And in the eldest times, even the Kings and Fathers of Nations, valued themselves by the Heards and numbers of their Cartell: who had Flocks of Sheepe, and great Droues and Herds of their owne, and their own Sheep-herds, and Herdsmen. Now if Tubal had past by Sea from any part of Palestine, Syria, or Cilicia, he might have made good choice within the Streights, and not have ouergone Chapado, Palenna, and other Prouinces in that Tract: past the Streights of Gabriel, diddayned all Andalusia and Portugal, with all those goodly Ports and Countreys; and haue sought out the yron, woody, and barren Countrey of the World (called Biscay) by along and dangerous Navigation. But before the journey of the Argonauts there were scarce any Vessels that durst crosse the Seas in that part of the world: and yet that which Iason had (if the Tale be true) was but a Galley, and a poore one (God knowes), and perchance such as they vse this day in Ireland: which although it carryed but foure and fiftie Passengers, yet it was farre greater then any of the former times: Eratosthenes parmarum nauicularum usus. For in former times they used very small Vessels. I deny not but that the Tyrans gaue themselves of olde to farre-off Navigations, whence Tybalus ascribed the inuention of Ships vnto them.

And although it cannot be denyed, when Noah by Gods inspiration was instructed in so many particulars concerning the Arke, that then many things concerning Navigation were first reuealed; yet it appeares that there was much difference betwene the Arke of Noah, and such Ships as were for any long Navigation. Yea, ancient Stories shew, that it was long after these times, ere any durst presume vpon any long Voyages to Sea at least with multitudes of Women, and Children, and Cartell: as also common reason can tell vs, that euen now, when this Arte is come to her perfection, such Voyages are very trouble some and dangerous. So as it doth appeare, that there was not in that Age of Nimrod any Ship, or wile of Ships, fit for any long Navigation. For if Comer and Tubal had past themselves and their people by Sea; the exercise of Navigation would not haue bene dead for so many hundred yeares after. Leaving therefore the fabulous to their Fables, and all men else to their fancies, who haue cast Nations into Countreys far off; I know nothow, I will follow herein the Relation of Moses and the Prophets: to which Truth there is ioyned both Nature, Reason, Politie; and necessitie: and to the rest, neither probability, nor possibillitie.

§. III.

Of Gog and Magog, Tybal, and Meshech, seated first about Asia
the lesse, out of EZECHIEL, CAP. 38. 39.

Now although many Learned and Reuerend men haue formed (I know not whereby led) a Plantation of the World, which also hath bene and is received: yet I hope I may be excused, if I differ altogether from them in many particulars. Certainly, that great Learned man of this latter Age, Arius Montanus was also in some things much mistaken: and for Iosephus as hee hath many good things, and is a Guide to many errors withall, so was he in this Plantation of the World very grosse and fabulous, whereby both Eusebius, Hierosolymitanus, Epiphanius, and others, that haue taken his testimonies for current, haue bene by him farre mislead. But the better to conceiue what Regions of the World Comer the first sonne of Iaphet possesse, as also Tubal, it is needfull to begin with Magog: because the Scriptures take most knowledge of Gog and Magog, which two names haue troubled many Commentators, saith Matib, Bernardus, who hath laboured herein with great diligence, and whom (of all that euer I read) I find most iudicious in the examination of this Plantation. Hee takes authoritie from the Prophet Ezechiel chiefly, who in the 38. and 39. Chapter directeth vs, what Nations the Comerians, Tubalines, and Togormians were, together with the Magogians: of which Gog was Prince or Chief Conductor in their Attempts against Israel. For besides the portions of Europe, and the North-east parts of the greater Asia, which Isa pheus Illus possesse, all Asia the lesse was peopled by them. And that those of the Issue of Iaphet (whom Ezechiel speakes of) were seated hereabout; it may best appeare, if we consider the circumstances of the place, and the dependencie vpon the former Prophecie in the 37. Chapter. For in that 37. Chapter, Ezechiel prophesieth of the vniing of the two Kingdomes of Israel and Iuda, after their deliuerie from captiuitie.

By which Prophecie of Ezechiel, it appeareth, that God purposed to gather together his people, to giue life to dead bones, and to ruse them by one Prince. For to that purpose it is written; And DAVID my Seruant shall be King over them; and they shall haue one Sheeheard, (that is) they shall be vniued as they were in DAVID's time. Hereupon in the 38. Chapter Ezechiel prophesieth against those Nations, which should seeke to impeach this Vnion, and disturbe the people of Israel, whom God purposed to receiue to grace, and promised to restore. And so in the same Chapter are those Nations coupled together, which infested the Israelites after their returne, and sought to subiect them: all which were the Subiects or Allies of Gog, Prince of the Magogians, or Calefyrians, next bordering Palestina, or the holy Land, followed also by the rest of the Nations of Asia the lesse, which lay North from Iudaea. The words of Ezechiel are these: Some of man, c. 38. v. 2. sit thy face against GOG, and against the Land of MAGOG, the chief Princes of MESHECH (or MOSUCH and TUBAL: and afterward; Behold, I come, against the chief Prince of MESHECH and TUBAL: and in the sixth verse; GOMER and all his Bands, and the House of TOGORMA of the North quarters: Herein Ezechiel hauing first deliuered the Mesians from the Mount Adulas, unto the Coast of Pontus. This Region was afterward called Cappadocia, in which is the Towne Mazica, &c. this is the principall Country of Ma-

 600. And this doth Annus also auow, and yet forgets that Gog was Prince both of Mesech and Tubal: and therefore, that the one was a Nation of Spaniards, the other of Cappadocians, is very ridiculous; Spaine lying directly West, and not North from Iudaea. Ezechiel in the 27. Chapter, where he prophesieth of the destruction of Tyre, nameth Mesech and Tubal ioynedly. And for a finall prooffe, that these Nations were of a Northerne Neighbour Land (how farre soeuer stretched) Ezechiel in the 38. Chapter makes them all Horsemen. Thou, and much people with thee, all shall ride upon Horses, euen a great multitude and a mightie. Then if any man beleue that these troupes came out of Spaine ouer the Pyrenes, and first passed ouer a part of France, Italie, Hungarie, and Sarmatia, and imbarqued againe about the Hellespont, or else compassed all Pontus, Euxinus, to come into the lesser Asia, which is halfe the length or compasse of the then knowne World, he may be called a strong beleuer, but hee shall neuer be iustificied thereby. But on the contrarie it is knowne, that Seleucus was a Prouince neighbouring Palestina or Iu-dea, and that Hierapolis (or Magog) ioyned vnto it: whose Princes commanded all Syria, and Asia the lesse, (namely the Seleucidae) and held it, till Scipio Asiaticus ouerthrew Antiochus the Great: after which they yet posselt Syria till the time of Tigranes: and whether Meshech be in Cappadocia, or vnder Iberia, yet is it of the Tubalines, and one and the same Dominion.

Of Gomer the like may be said. First, he seated himselfe with Togorma, not farre from Magog and Tubal, in the borders of Syria and Cilicia. Afterward hee proceeded further into Asia the lesse; and in long tract of time his valiant Issue filled all Germanie, reled long in France and Brittain, and possessed the vtmost borders of the earth, accomplishing (as Melancton well notes) the signification of their parents name, which is Vmori-bordering. But when these borderers wanted further place, whereinto they might ex-nerate their swelling multitudes that were bounded in by the great Ocean, then did they retorne vpon the Nations occupying the Countries, through which they had formerly passed, oppressing first their Neighbours, afterwards the people more remote.
 Hereupon it was (as the worthy restorer of our Antiquities, M. William Camden hath noted) that they were called Cimbri, which in their olde Language doth signifie Robbers; necessitie inforcing them to spoyle their Neighbours, to whom in their originall they were as neere ioyned, as afterwards in the seates which they possessed. For that the Warlike Nations of Germany were in elder Ages accustomed to be beaten by the Gauls, the authoritie of Caesar affirming it is prooffe sufficient. But in times following they pursued richer Conquests, and more easie though further distant, by which (to omit their other enterprizes not here to be spoken of) they were drawne at length into Asia the lesse, and occupied those parts, which had formerly bene held by their Progenitours.
 I say not that they claymed those Lands as theirs by Descent; for likely it is, that they knew little of their owne Pedigree. Neyther can any man therefore deny, that they were of olde seated in Asia, because in late Ages they returned thither; vnlesse hee will thinke, that all those Nations which from farre parts haue inuaded and conquered the Land of Shinaar, may by that Argument bee proued not to haue issued from thence at the first.

Now concerning Samothres for his excellent wisdoms surnamed Dis, whom Annus makes the Brother of Gomer and Tubal (which Brother Moses neuer heard of, who spake his knowledge of Iaphets sonnes) they must finde him in some olde Poet: for Functius, a great Berossian, confesseth: Quis hic SAMOTHESES fuerit incertum est; Who this SAMO-THES was it is uncertaine; neyther is there any prooffe that he was that same Dis, whom Caesar sayth the Gauls suppose to bee their Ancester; yea, and Vignier confesseth with Functius: Mais on ne sçait qui il estoit; No man knowes who he was.

¶ V.

Against the fabulous BEROSVS his fiction, That the Italian IANVS was NOAH.

BVt before I goe on with Noah his Sonnes, I thinke it necessarie to disproue the fiction which Annus hath of Noah himselfe: an inuention (indeed) very ridiculous, though warranted (as hee hath wrested) by those Authours of whom him.

himselfe hath Commented: as the Fragment of Berofus, Fabius, Piclor, Cato, Lanius and others. For Annus seekes to perswade vs, that Noah (surnamed Ianus) was the same which founded Genoa, with other Cities in Italie, wherein hee liued 92. yeares. This to disproue, by Moses silence, is a sufficient argument to mee, if there were nothing else to disproue it. For if he vouchsafed to remember the building of Babel, Erech, Achad, Chalme and Nimue by Nimrod, Noah was a man of too great marke to be forgotten, with all the acts he did in 92. yeares. But it were a needlesse labour for me to disproue the authorities of that Berofus, on whom Annus groundeth, seeing so many learned men haue so demoustratiuely proued that Fragment to be counterfeit. Besides that, Tatianus the As-10 syrian in his Oration against the Greekes auoweth, that the ancient and true Berofus wrote onely three Bookes, dedicated to Antiochus the successor of Seleucus Nicanor: but An-nius hath deuised fise Bookes, wherewith he honoureth Berofus. And whereas Berofus handled only the estate of the Chaldeans and Assyrians Annus hath filled this Fragment with the businesse of all the World. And if we may beleue Eusebius better then An-nius, then all the Kings of the Latines (before Aeneas) consumed but 150. yeares: whereas no man hath doubted, but that from Noah to Aeneas ariuaall into Italie there past 1126.
 (after the least rate of the Hebrew account) and (after Codoman) 1291. For Ianus (who was the first of their Kings) liued at once with Ruth, who married Boaz, in the Worlds year, (as some reckon) 2717. after the Flood 1064. and Noah dyed 350. yeares after the 20 Flood: and so there past betwene Ianus of Italie and Noah surnamed Ianus 704. yeares.
 For Saturnus succeeded Ianus, Picus after Saturnus, Faunus after Picus, and Latinus followed Faunus: which Latinus liued at once with Tautanes the 27. King of Assyria; with Pelagus of Peloponnesus; with Demophoon of Athens; and Sampson Iudge of Israel. Now all these fise Kings of the Latines haue consumed but one hundred & fiftie yeares; and the last of them in the time of Sampson: then reckoning vpwards for one hundred and fiftie yeares, and it reacheth Ruth, with whom Ianus liued.

True it is, that the Greekes had their Ianus; but this was not Noah: so had they Ion the sonne of Xuthus, the sonne of Deucalion, from whom they draw the Iones, who were indeed the children of Iauan, the fourth sonne of Iapheth. For the vulgar Translation 30 (wherethe Hebrew word is Iauan) writes Greece, and the Septuagint, Hellas; which is the same. So had they Medus the sonne of Madae, whom they make the Parent of the Medes, though they were descended of a far more ancient Father (to wit) Madai: the third sonne of Iapheth.

Lastly, we see by a true experience, that the Britissh Language hath remayned among vs about 2000. yeares, and the English speech euer since the inuasion of the Angles, and the same continuance haue all Nations obserued among themselves though with some corruption and alteration. Therefore, it is strange if either Noah (by them called Ianus) had left in Italie his grand-child Gomer after him, or Tubal in Spaine, that no plainere-40 semblance of the Hebrew, Syrian, or Scythian (which no time could haue quite extinguished) should haue bene found in the Languages of those Countries. For which reasons we doubt not but these personall Plantations of Ianus, Gomer, Tubal, &c. in Italie, Spaine, or France, are merely fabulous. Let the Italians therefore content themselves with the Gracian Ianus, which commanded them and planted them, and who preceded the fall of Troy but 150. yeares (saith Eusebius) which was in the time of Latinus the fift King: which also Saint Augustine and Iustine confirme: and this agreeth with reason, time, and possibilitie. And if this be not sufficient to disproue this vanitie, I may out of themselves adde thus much: That whereas some of them make Vesta (others Camafena) the wife of this Ianus, who instituted the holy Fire of the Vestal Virgins in Rome (the La-50 times and Romans taking from Ianus all their Idolatrous and Heathenish Ceremonies) there is no man so impious, as to beleue that Noah himselfe (who is said by Moses to haue walked with God, to be a iust man, and whom God of all Mankind made choice of) could be either ignorant of the true and only God, or so wicked and vngratefull, to set vp or deuise any Heathen saluage, or Idolatrous adoration, or haue instituted any Ceremonie, contrarie to that which he knew best pleasing to God himselfe.

¶ VI.

§. VI.

That GOMER also and his sonne TOGAOMA of the Posteritie of IAPHETH were first scatted about Asia the lesse: and that from thence they spred Westward into Europe: and Northward into Sarmatia.

TO turne now to the sonnes of Noah, and the Worlds Plantation after the Flood: therein I obserue, that as both reason and necessitie taught them; so, when they multiplied in great numbers, and dispersed themselves into the next Countries bordering to their first habitations, and from thence sent forth Colonies elsewhere, it was in such a manner as that they might repayre to each other, and keepe intelligence by River: yet because the Land was Desart and ouer-prest with Woods, Reeds, Bogs, and rotten Marishes. As when Nimrod seated in Babylonia, Chus tooke the South part of Chaldaea, downe the River of Gehon, by which he might passe to & fro from Babylon to his own Plantation: those also, which were of the Race of Shem, inhabiting at Vr or Orchoa neere the Lakes of Chaldaea, might by the same Riuer get vp to Babylon, and receiue succour from thence. All which Tract of Land vpon Gehon Southward, Moses in the description of Paradise calleth the Land of Chush: because the Dominion and Empire was then in the hands of Nimrod a Chusite, by whom the children of Shem (which came in to that Valley and stayed not in the East) were for awhile oppressed, till God afterward by the seed of Abraham made them his owne Nation and victorious. Haulah, the brother of Nimrod, and sonne of Cush, tooke both bankes of Tigris, especially on the East side of the Riuer: by which Riuer his people might also passe to and fro to Babel.

The Imperiall seat of which Region of Haulah or Susian, was anciently called Chusian or Chusan, afterward Sufa. Cush himselfe tooke the Bankes of Gehon, and planted those Countries Westward, and Southwest-ward towards Arabia the Stony, and the Desart, where Ptolemie placeth the Citie of Chusidia, first Chusia.

Seba, and Sheba with the rest that planted Arabia felix, had Tigris to conuey them into the Persian gulfes, which watheth the bankes of Arabia felix on the East side: so as those sonnes of Cush might take Land downe the Riuer as they pleased. Also the Citie of Ninieue was by Nimrod founded on the said Riuer of Tigris; and from thence a Colony past to Charran, standing also vpon a nauigable branch of Euphrates. In like manner did Iapheths sonnes settle themselves together, and tooke their seates in Asia the lesse: from whence they might indifferently stretch themselves Northward, and Westward, into the next parts of Europe, called the Isles of the Gentiles. And it seemeth very agreeable to reason, that both Gomer, Magog, and Tubal, sate downe first of all in that part of Syria, to the North of Palestina and Phoenicia: and from thence Gomer or his children past on into Asia the lesse, as those of Magog and Tubal did; from whence the Tubalines spred themselves into Iberia: and the Magogians more Northerly into Sarmatia. The first Gomerians, and first Planters in Asia the lesse, held the Country of the Cymmerians (witnessed Herodotus) the same Region which was afterward by the Gallo-greekes called Galatia, to whom Saint Paul wrote his Epistle so intituled. This Nation of the Cymmerians (whom the inuincible Scythians afterwards dispersed, and forced from their first Plantations) gaue names to diuers places; as to the Mountaynes about Albania (called Cymmerini) and to the Citie of Cymmerus in Phrygia: also Bosphorus Cymmerius took appellation from this Nation, in the out-let whereof was also a Citie of that name, called Cymmerian: which Plinie saith (mistaking the place) had sometime the name of Cerberion; but Cerberion was a Towne in Campania, so called of the vnhealthfull waters, fauouring of Brimstone, which Augustus caused to be cleansed by letting in the water of the Lake Lucrinus.

The children of Tubal ranged as farre as Iberia, to whom the Moschici were Neighbours, which others write Meshech. The Prophet Ezechiel (coupling them together) calleth Gog the Prince of Meshech and Tubal. For these Moschi (which Ptolemie calleth Moschici) inhabit Syracena a Prouince of Armenia, directly South from the Mountaynes Paryardes: out of whose North part sprinketh the Riuer Phasis; from the East part Araxis; and from the West Euphrates: and of this Meshech are descended also the Moscouians (saith Melanchton) and it may bee, that in proceesse of time some of them inhabited those Regions also: For Meshech (saith Melanchton) signifieth extendens, enlarging or stretching forth.

forth. Togorma also at first did inhabit amongst his parents & kindred. The Togormians were also called Gibles, a people neighbouring the Sydonians in Gabala, a Teurarchie of Phoenicia, the same which Plinie calleth Gaben: from whence Salomon had his most excellent Malons, which hewed stones for the Temple of Hierusalem. Thence the Togormians stretched into the lesse Armenia, whose Kings were hence called Tigranes, and their Cities Tigranokartae: of which Cities Tigranes subdued by Lucullus the Roman, built one Hieropolymitanus hath planted the Togormians in Barbarie: forgetting the prophecie of Ezechiel against the Tyrians: They of the house of Togorma, brought to thy Fayres horses, and horse-men, and mules, which could not well bee driuen ouer the whole length of the Mediterranean Sea, but from the neighbour Countries by land. But Iosephus takes them for the patens of the Phrygians; which I doe not denie, but they might be in the ensuing ages: and so might the Tubalines be of the Spaniards; but it was from Iberia, and many hundred yeeres after the twelfth of Nimrods reigne. The Iewes conceiue that the Turkes came of those Togormians, because their Emperor is called Togar. The Chaldeans make them the Fathers of the Germanes. But Laonicus affirms, that the Turkes descended of the Crim Tartar, which borders Muscouia. But for these subderiuations it were infinit to examine them. Onely of the first and second plantation, and of the first Nations after the flood is the matter which I labour to discouer; and therein to open the ignorance of some, and the corruption of other fabulous Writers. And this we must Note, that those grand children of Noah which were of a more quiet, or (perchance) of lesse vnderstanding, and had not therefore the leading of Colonies sent out, their proper habitations could bee hardlie knowne: onely reason hath taught vs, that they dwelt among the rest, and were couered with the fame of others, who tooke on them the Conduction and Dominion ouer the rest.

From Madai the third sonne of Iapheth, were the Medes. The Grecians bring them (as before) from Medus the sonne of Medea.

§. VII.

Of Iauan the fourth son of Iapheth: and of Melch, of Aram, and Meshech of Iapheth.

OF Iauan the fourth sonne of Iapheth came the Iones, which were afterwards called the Greekes: and so the Latine and Greeke Interpreters for Iauan write Greece, as in Esay: Et mittam ex ijs qui saluati fuerint ad gentes, in mare, in Italian, in Graeciam; And I will send those that escape of them to Nations in the Sea, in Italie and in Greece. The Geneue here vseth the word (Turkish) for Tarsus, a Citie in Cilicia, though Tarsus in many places betaken for the Sea. The Tigurine and the Geneue vse the names Tubal and Iauan, and not Italie and Greece: keeping the same Hebrew words. Of the Iones were the Athenians, though themselves dreame that they were Aborigines, or men without Ancesters, and growing (as it were) out of the soile it selfe: who abounding in people sent Colonies into Asia the lesse, of whom came the Iones of those parts. Others deriue the Athenians from Ion the sonne of Xuthus, the son of Deucalion; but the antiquity of Iauan marres the fashion of that supposition, who so many yeres preceded Xuthus, Ion, or Deucalion. Pausanias tels vs that Xuthus stole out of Thessalie with all his Fathers treasure, and his Brothers portions, and arriuing at Athens, hee was graciously receiued by Erectheus, who gaue him his Daughter in marriage; of whom hee receiued two sonnes, Ion, and Achaeus, the supposed Ancesters of the Athenians: (For Attica was called Ionia, saith Plutarch in the life of Theseus) who, when he had ioyned Megara to Attica, erected a pillar in that Istmos or Strait, which fastneth Peloponnesus to the other part of Greece: writing on that part which looketh towards the East, these words: Haec non sunt Peloponnesus, ass Ionia; These Countries are not of Peloponnesus, but of Ionia: and on the other side which looked towards the South, and into Peloponnesus, this: These parts are Peloponnesus, and not Ionia.

Strabo out of Hecateus affirmeth, that the Iones came out of Asia into Greece, which is contrarie to the former opinion: That the Iones of Greece transporting certain companies into Asia the lesse, the name of Iones was thereby therein retained. And though Strabo knew no more thereof then hee learned of the Greekes themselves, yet I finde this coniecture of Hecateus reasonable enough. For though it were to him vnknowne, yet sure I am that Asia the lesse had people before Greece had any: and that Iauan did not flie from Babylonia into Greece, but tooke Asia the lesse in his passage; and from thence past over the neere way, leauing his owne name to some maritime Prouince on that side, as he did to that part of Greece so called. But yet Strabo himselfe beleueed, that Ionia took the name from Ion the son of Xanthus: for so much he had learned from themselves; which was also the opinion of Pausanias. True it is, that the Greekes in after-times cast themselves into that part of Asia the lesse, opposite vnto the, which they held for diuers yeres. And howsoeuer the Greekes vaunt themselves to be Fathers of Nations, and the most ancient; yet all approved Historians (not their owne) deride and disproue their pride, and vanitie therein. For this dispute of Antiquity (among prophane Writers) rested betwene the Scythians and the Egyptians, as Iustine out of Trogus, in the war between Ptolemy of Egypt, and Tanaïs of Scythia, witnesseth: which preceded farre the reigne of Ninus; and was long before the name of Greece was euer heard of. And it is also manifest, that in Cecrops time the Greekes were all saluages without law or religion, liuing like brute beasts in all respects: and Cecrops (saith Saint Augustine) liued together with Moses.

Lib. 18. de Civ. Dei, c. 10.

The sixth sonne of Iapheth was Meshech, whom the Septuagint call Mosoch: (a part of those Nations commanded by Gog the chiefe Prince of Meshech and Tubal.) But this we must remember, that betwene Meshech the sonne of Aram, and Meshech (or Mosoch) the sonne of Iapheth, there is little difference in name, and both by diuers Interpreters diuersly written. Montanus with the Vulgar writeth Meshech, the sonne of Aram, Mes; the Geneva, Masb, Iunius, Meshech. But it may be gathered out of the 120. Psalme, that either Meshech the sonne of Iapheth, was the parent of those people, or gaue name to that Prouince wherein David hid himselfe: or else (which may rather seeme) that it tooke name from Meshech the sonne of Aram. For David bewailing his exile (while he liued among a barbarous and irreligious People) vseth these words: Woe is me that I remaine in Meshech, and dwell in the Tents of Kedar: which Iunius conuerteth thus: Hei mihi quia peregrinor tam diu: habito tanquam Scenita Kedarani. The Septuagint giues it this sense: Woe is me because my habitation (or abode) is prolonged, who dwell with the inhabitants of Kedar; with which this of the Latine agreeth: Heu mihi, quia incolatus meus prolongatus est, habitauimus cum habitantibus Kedar: The Chaldean otherwise, and in these words: O memiserum, quia peregrinatus sum Asianis, habitauimus cum tabernaculis Arabum; O wretch, that I am, for I haue traualled among those of Asia: I haue dwelt in the Tabernacles of the Arabians. But howsoeuer or which soeuer conuersion be taken for the best, yet all make mention of Kedar: which is a Prouince of Arabia Petraea; and the Chaldean putteth Asia in stead of Meshech, but the Hebrew it self hath Meshech. And if it be to be taken for a Nation, (as it is most likely, because it answers to Kedar, the name of a Nation) seeing Meshech the sonne of Aram, 1. Chron. 17. is called Meshech, it is indifferent whether this Nation tooke name from Meshech or Mosch, both bordering Iudea, and like enough to be commanded by one Prince; for so Ezechiel makes Meshech and Tubal. But as for those that take Meshech out of the word Mosoch (giuen by the Septuagint) to be the Musconian: sure they presume much vpon the affinity of names, as aforesaid. And sure I am that David neuer trauelled so farre North; (for to him Musconia was vtterly vnknown) but about the border of Kedar (it may be) he was often in all the time of his persecution: the same being a Citie on the Mountaines of Sanir or Galaad. And yet Arias Montanus makes Mosoch the father of the Musconians: and herein also Melanchton runnes with the tide of common opinion, and sets Meshech in Musconia, though with some better aduice of iudgement; as, first seated in Cappadocia, and from thence traouelling Northward: expounding the places of the 120. Psalme, (Hei mihi quod exulo in Meshech) to signifie, Gentis eius feruorem in ignem esse; That the feritie of that Nation exceeded: which fiercenesse or brutalitie of the Musconians, David neuer proposed, or (perchance) neuer heard of. But the same feritie or crueltie which those Northern Musconians had, may aswell be ascribed to the Arabians and Kedarens. For this Countie tooke name of Kedar the second sonne of Ismael, of whom a people of equall fiercenesse to any of the world were begotten, both in those times and long after, euen to this day (if the Arabians, Ismaelites, and Saracens, may be accounted one people:) the same being foreshewed by the speech of the Angell to Hagar, Gen. 16. v. 12. And he shall be a wilde man: his hand shall be against euery man, and euery mans hand against him. Now Arabia the Desart (saith Plinie) confronteth the Arabians Cochlei on the East, and the Cedrei Southward, both which ioine together vpon the Nabathaei. So it appeareth (as before before) that Meshech, Tubal, Gomer, Togorma, and Magog, neighboured Canaan and Israel, and that Kedar also did ioine to Meshech: all which were Regions of Syria, or of Asia the lesse, commanded by the Successors of Selencus, enemies of the re-establishment of Israel and Juda. But (as I haue already said) it might well be, that long after the first plantation the issue of Meshech (or Mosoch) might passe into Cappadocia, and thence into Hircania, and giue names, both to Mazega in the one, and to the Mountaines Moschici in the other, and from thence might send people more Northerly into Musconia, and so all opinions saved. But all saluage Nations ouer-grown and vncultivated, doe (for the most part) shew a late plantation, euen as Ciuitie, Letters, and magnificent Building, witnesse antiquitie.

10 Tiras, the seventh sonne of Iapheth, which Montanus reckons among the sons of Gomer, was the Father of the Thracians, as all Authors (worthie the examination) affirme. Iosephus was the first that determined hereof: and because the Scriptures are altogether silent, what part of the world Tiras peopled, the coniectures are indifferent, and giue no ground at all of dispute. It followeth now to speake of the sonnes of Gomer, which were three,

Ascanes, Riphat, and Togorma.

§. VIII.

Of Ascanes and Riphat, the two elder Sonnes of Gomer.

Ascanes was the Father of those which the Greeks call Regini, (saith Iosephus) but he giues no reason why.

Eusebius makes Ascanes the Father of the Goths. The Iewes in their Thargum make him the roote of the Germane Nation, but their expositions are commonly very idle. Plinie findeth Ascania in Phrygia, neere the Riuer of Hylas and Cios: Melanchton being of the same opinion, that the Tuiscones were descended of the Ascanes, (for Tuiscones, saith he, is as much to say, as of the Ascanes, preposito articulo die Ascanes) and that the word signifieth a Religious Keeper of fire: it being an ancient superstition to pray at the fire of Sacrifices, as afterwards at the Tombes of Martyrs. Not farre from Phrygia was the Lake Ascania, knowne by that name in the Romanes time. And among the Kings which came to the succor of Troy, was Ascanius (Deo similis, saith Homer) like vnto God: because he was beautifull and strong: for in the same manner doth Virgil grace Aeneas, O humerosi, Deo similis, in facie et bodie like one of the Gods. Virgil also remembreth such a Riuer, together with the Hills Gargara: as, Illas ducit amor trans Gargara, transq. sonantem virg Georg. 1. 3 Ascanium, Appetite leads them both ouer the Mountaines Gargara, and the roaring Ascanius. But this Plinie maketh more plaine in the description of Phrygia. For he placeth the City of Brillion vpon the Riuer Ascanius, which is adioyning to Myfia, and is neere the border of the Troian Empire: and the Lake Ascanes he directvs to finde by the description of Prusia, founded by Hannibal at the foot of Olympus, which lieth far within the Countie of Bithynia: and then from Prusia to Nicea are accounted 25. miles, in which way this Lake lyeth, euen betwene Prusia and Nicea. And so Iunius (as I conceiue him) takes them of Ascanes, to be the inhabitants of Pontus, and Bithynia, and those North parts of Asia. Stephanus de Urbibus makes it a Citie of Troas, built by Ascanius the son of Aeneas: saying, that there was another of that name in Myfia. Of Ascania a Lake of Bithynia, Ptolonie witnesseth: and Strabo giueth Ascania both a Lake, a Riuer, and a Towne in Myfia, neere vnto Cio; which also agreeth with Plinie. For Plinie findeth Prusia (before spoken of) neere Cio, and calleth the Islands before Troy Ascanes.

Now, whether these places tooke name of Ascanes the son of Gomer, or of Ascanius the sonne of Aeneas, it might be questioned: sure it is, that Ascanius which brought succor to the Troians, could not take his name from Aeneas sonne, who was then cyther exceeding young, or rather vnborne: and it seemeth that the Countie whence those succours came, were not out of any part of Phrygia or Myfia; but farther off, and from the North parts of all Asia the lesse, which by Hieremie is called Ascanes, by the figure Synecdoche, as Iunius thinketh. Out of those testimonies therfore which deceiue not, we may confidently determine. For of the Prophet Hieremie wee shall learne of what Nation the Ascanes were, whose words are these: Set up a Standard in the Land, blow the Trumpet among the Nation against her, call vp the Kings of Ararat, Minni, and Ascanes. Jer. 51. 27. 28. against against her, &c. meaning against the Babylonians. Ararat was Armenia the greater, as most Interpreters consent, so called of the Mountaines of Ararat which runne through it: Minni the lesser Armenia: Armenia being compounded of Aram and Minni. For Minni was the ancient name: (sayth Iunius and others before him,) and Aram anciently taken for Syria, which contained all that Tract from Euphrates to the Sea-coasts of Phœnicia, and Palestina; and therefore Mesopotamia being in elder times but a Province of Syria, the Scriptures difference it in the storie of Iacob and Esau, and call it Aram-padan. Then if these two Nations were of the Armenians, and Askenaz ioynd with them (who altogether vnited vnder Cyrus and Darius, came to the spoyle of the Babylonian Empire) we shall erre much to call Askenaz Germanie or Almaine, for we heare of no swart Ruttiers at that siege. But the Askenaz were of those Nations which were either subiect or allied to the Medes: of which, if any of them came afterward into Phrygia, I know not: for the dispersion of Nations was in aftertimes without account. But for the opinion of Eusebius, who makes them to be Goths; or that of Iosephus, who calls them Rhegizai; or of the Iewes, who will haue them to be Almaines; when they confirme it either by Scriptures or Reason, I will thinke as they do.

Of Riphath the second sonne of Gomer there is mention in the first of Chronicles. Beroaldus and Pererius thinke that he wandered farre off from the rest of his Brothers, and therefore no memorie of his plantation. But I see nothing to the contrary, but that hee might seate himselfe with the rest of his Family: for there wanted no roome or soile in those dayes for all the sonnes and Grand-children of Noab. Therefore I take it to be well vnderstood, that the Riphei were of Riphath, which the Greekes afterwards (according to Iosephus) called the Paplagones: and Riphei (saith Melanchton) signifieth Giants. These people were very famous in the North parts, and in Sarmatia: the most of number and power among them, Sarmatarum gens maxima Heneti, The greatest number of the Sarmatians were the Heneti; who spake the ancient Polac: which being first called Riphei (for the loue of some of their Leaders or Kings) changed their names and became Heneti, (a custome exceeding common in those times) and dwelt first in Paplagonia, as Homer winneseth, and so doth Apollonius in his Argonauticks: Now, when these Riphei (afterward Heneti) sought new Regions, they came along the shores of Euxinus, and filled the North-part of Europe, containing Russia, Lithuania, and Polonia. From thence they crost thwart the Land, and peopled Illyria, desirous (saith Melanchton) of a warmer soile of fruit and Wine. These Heneti or Veneti, whom Melanchton taketh to be one people, filled all that Land betwene the Baltick and Adriaticke Sea; and to this day the name of the Gulfe Veneticus is found in Russia. This Nation, after they were possit of Lithuania and Polonia, disturbed the plantation of the Boij and Hermondurij. Therefore, it seemeth to me, that of Riphath, came the Riphei, afterward Heneti; and so thinketh Arias Montanus, first seated in Paplagonia, but in course of time Lords of Sarmatia, and those other parts before remembred, chiefly betwene the Riuer of Visula and Albis. The name (saith Melanchton) signifieth Wandering or Wanderers, or Nomades: a people which liued by White-meates and fruits, as (indeed) all Nations did in the first Ages.

Of the third sonne of Gomer, Togorma, I haue spoken already; now therefore of Iauans children, which were foure:

Elisa, Tharsis, Cethim, Dodanim.

§. IX.

Of the foure sonnes of Iauan: and of the double signification of Tharsis, either for a proper name, or for the Sea.

 F Elisa or Elipha, came the Aoles: and of this Elisa, all the Greekes were called Hellenes, saith Montanus. Melanchton makes Elisa the Father of the Aoles in Asia: others of Elis in Peloponnesus; or of both. And seeing the Greekes were descended in generall of Iauan, it is probable that the Aoles and the Elei, took name of Elisa, his eldest Sonne. Ezechiel in the 27. speaking of Tyre, nameth the Isles of Elisa. Hyacinthus & purpura de insulis Elisa facta sunt operimentum tuum: Blue Silke and Purple brought from the Isles of Elisa, was thy covering: The Chaldeans for Elisa write Italia: but the Vulgar, the Tigrine, the Genena, and Iunius, keepe the word Elisa: and so I thinke they might doe with reason. For there was not found any such Purple Dye in Italia in those dayes, nor since, that I can reade of: but those Isles of Elisa, were by a better coniecture the Isles of Greece, and the best Purple was found afterward at Tyre it selfe: and before that, among the Cyclades, and on the coast of Getulia.

Tharsis, the second Sonne of Iauan, inhabited Cilicia, of which Tharsis is the Metropolis. Montanus for Tharsis in Cilicia, vnderstands Carthage in Africa; but (reseruing the respect due to so learned a man) he was much mistaken in that coniecture. The Chaldean Paraphrast puts Carthage for Tharsis, but it hath no authority nor warrant of reason therein. So likewise, where it is written, that the Ships of Salomon went euery three yeeres to Tharsis, and brought thence Gold, Siluer, Elephants teeth, &c. the Chaldean Paraphrast translates Tharsis (Africa.) But Salomons Ships were prepared in the Red Sea at Esion Gaber, in the Bay of Elana, nere vnto Madian, where Ieshro (Moses Father in Law) inhabited; a Province of Arabia Petraea, Idumaea, or of the Chusites; and they sayled to the higher part of the East India. For it had become a strange Navigation to haue spent three yeeres in the passage betwene India and Carthage, or any other part of Africa, which might haue been sayled in sixe or ten daies. And if so great riches might haue bin found within the bounds of the Mediterran Sea, al the other neighbouring Princes would soon haue entertained that Trade also. But this enterprize of Salomon is in this sort written of in the first of Kings: Also King Salomon made a Nauie of Ships in Esion Gaber, which is beside Elath and the brinke of the Red Sea in the Land of Edom: and Hyram sent with the Nauie his seruants, that were Mariners, and had knowledge of the Sea, with the seruants of Salomon: and they came to Ophir, and set from thence 420. Talents of Gold, &c. But as the Nations about Pontus thought no Sea in the world like vnto their owne, and doubted whether there were any other Sea but that onely: (whereof it came, that Pontus was a word vsed for the Sea in generall) so, because the Israelites and the Phœnicians knew no other Sea then that of the Mediterran in the beginning; and that the people of Tharsis had the greatest Shippes, and were the first Nauigators in those parts with such Vessels, they were therefore called men of the Sea: and the word Tharsis vsed often for the Sea. And whereas it is said that the Shippes of Salomon went euery three yeeres to Tharsis, that phrase is not strange at all; for we vse it ordinarily wherefoeuer we navigate, (namely) so that the Kings Ships are gone to the Sea, or that they are set out euery yeere, or euery three yeere to the Sea, and therefore Tharsis was not therein named, either for Carthage, Africa, or India, but vsed for the Sea it selfe. But in this place Tharsis is truly taken for Tharsis, the chiefe Citie in Cilicia, founded by Tharsis the second sonne of Iauan, or by his Successors in memorie of their first parent. To this Citie arrived Alex. Macedon, before he gaue the first ouerthrow to Darius, and casting himselfe into the Riuer to bathe and washe his bodie, hee fell into an extreame Feuer, and great danger of death: and in this Citie of Tharsis was S. Paul borne. Now this agreeth with the reason and nature of a Plantation. For (Gomer and his other sonnes inhabiting Asia the lesse, and that part of Syria adioyning) Iauan, who was to passe ouer the Sea into Greece, took the edge of the same Coast, and first planted the Iones on that shore: gaue the Islands betwene Asia the lesse and Greece, to Elisa, and left Tharsis vpon the Sea-side in Cilicia; of whom that Citie tooke name.

The third sonne of Iauan was Cethim, of whom were the Romanes and Italians, saith Beroaldus, but I allow better of Melanchtons opinion, who makes Cethim the Father of the Macedonians. Cethim is a voice plurall (saith he) and signifieth percussors, though in that respect it may be meant by either. But it seemeth more probable, that the place of Esai. 23. (according to Melanchton) had relation to Alexander and the Macedonians: Hec calamitas ab Esai predicta est, qui capite vicesimo tertio inquit, venuros esse euersores Tyræ ex terra Cithim, This calamitie (saith Melanchton) was foreshewed by Esai the Prophet, who in the three and twentieth Chapter pronounced, that the Destroyers of Tyre were to come out of Cithim. And although the children of Israel esteemed all men Islanders, which came to them by Sea, and separate from that Continent; (and so also Cithim might be taken for Italie, saith Beroaldus) yet wee must take the first performance of the former Prophecie, which tooke effect by the destruction of the Tyrans by Alexander, who after 7. Moneths siege, cutted that proud City, and cut in pieces seauen thousand principall Citizens; strangled two thousand, and changed the freedome of 13. thousand others into bondage and slauey. Now, that Macedon was taken for Cethim, it doth appeare plainelie in the first of the Machabees, in these words: After that Alexander the Macedonian the sonne of Philip, went forth of the Land of Cethim, and slew Darius King of the Persians, and Medes. Iosephus sets Cethim in the Isle of Cyprus, in which (saith hee) there remaineth the Citie Citium, the Countrey of Zeno the Philosopher (witnesseth Laertius) which Citie Pintus vpon Ezechiel affirmeth, that it stood in Saint Hieromes time. So it may bee that all the Islands in ancient times by the Hebrewes were called the Islands of Cethim: and in that sense might Cyprus be so called also; and yet because Tharbis was the very next Port to Cyprus, and directly ouer against it, it is also very probable, that Cethim dwelt by his brother Tharbis: and finding that Island too streight for his people after they were increased, & that the rest of the Coasts, both on Asia side and Greece, were inhabited by his Father and Brothers, he sent Colomus ouer the Aegean Sea, and inhabited Macedonia.

Dodanim the fourth sonne of Iauan, and the youngest Brother (by the most opinions) <sup>10</sup> late downe at Rhodes, as neere Cethim, Tharbis, and Elisa, as he could. For Dodanim and Rhodanim are vsed indifferently by many Translators: the Hebrew (D) and the Hebrew (R) are so like, as the one may easily be taken for the other, as all Hebricians affirm. There is also found in Epirus the Citie of Dodona, in the Prouince of Molossia. And as Cethim, when he wanted soile in Cyprus: so Dodanim (seated in a far lesse Island) did of necessity send his people farther off; and keeping alongst the Coast, and finding Peloponnesus in the possession of Elisa, he passed a little further on the Westward, and planted in Epirus. And though the Citie of Dodona, was not then built, or (perchance) not so ancient as Dodanim himselfe, yet his Posteritie might giue it that name in the memorie of their first parent, as it hapned all the World ouer. For names were giuen to Cities, Mountaines, <sup>20</sup> Riuers, and Prouinces, after the names of Noahs children, and grand-children; not in all places by themselves, but by their successors many yeeres after: euery of their Families being desirous to retain among them by those memories, out of what branch themselves weretaken, and grafted elsewhere. And because great Kingdomes were often by new Conquerers newly named, and the greatest Cities often fired and demolished: therefore those that hoped better to perpetuate their memories, gaue their owne names, or the names of their Ancestors, to Mountaines and Riuers, as to things (after their iudgements) freeest from any alteration.

Thus then did Iauan settle himselfe and his children, in the edge and frontier of Asia the lesse, towards the Sea-shore: and afterward in Greece, and the Islands, and neighbor <sup>30</sup> Prouinces thereof, as Iapheth their Father had done in the body of the lesser Asia, together with Iauans brethren, Gomer, Magog, Madai, Tubal, Mesech, and the rest round about him. And in like sort did Chus (the sonne of Cham) people Babylonia, Chaldea, and the borders thereof towards the West and South-west: and the fennes of Chus (all but Nimrod, who held Babylonia it selfe) trauelled Southward in Arabia felix, and South-westward into Arabia petrea: the rest of his children holding the Regions adioyning to Nimrod. Mizraim the brother of Chus in like manner tooke the way of Egypt: and his brother Canaan the Region of Palestina adioyning. The Sonnes of Canaan had their portions in Canaan, of whom all those Nations came, which were afterward the Enemies <sup>40</sup> both to the Hebrews, and to those of the sons of Shem, which spread themselves towards the West, and the borders of the Mediterran Sea: of which I shall speake hereafter. But first of the sonnes of Cham or Ham, which were foure:

Chus, Mizraim, Phut, and Canaan.

§. X.

That the seat of Chus the eldest son of Ham, was in Arabia, not in Ethiopia: and of strange Fables, and ill Translations of Scripture, grounded on the mistaking of this point.

†. I.

Of Iosephus his Tale of an Ethiopesse wife of Moses, grounded on the mistaking of the seat of Chus.

Hat Ham was the Father of the Egyptians, it is made manifest in many Scriptures, as in the 105. Psalm verse 51. Then Israel came to Egypt, and Jacob was a stranger in the land of Ham: and in the 78. Psalm, Hee slew all the first-borne in Egypt, even the beginning of their strength, in the Tabernacles of Ham. There is also also found a great Citie in Thebaida, called Cheramis: (as it were the Citie of Ham) of which name Herodotus also discouers an Island in the same Region. But because Chus is <sup>Herod. in Euterpe.</sup> the elder sonne of Ham, it agreeth with order to speake first of him. Now though I haue already in the description of Paradise handled this question, and (I hope) proued that Chus could not be Ethiopia: yet seeing it commeth now to his turne to speake for himselfe, I will adde some farther proofe to the former. For the manifestation hereof, sets many things straight, which had otherwise very crooked constructions, and senseless interpretations. Surely, howsoeuer the Septuagint and Iosephus haue herein failed, that Chus could not be Ethiopia, but Arabia: (to wit) both that Arabia called Petrea, <sup>10</sup> and a part of Arabia the Happie and the Desart: which Regions Chus and the Chusites presently planted, after they left Babylonia to Nimrod, wherein they first late downe altogether. And there is nothing which so well cleereth this Controuerfie, as the true interpretation of the place, Num. 12. v. 1. where Moses his Wife is called a Chusite; together with some places which speake of Nabuchodonosors Conquests. For whereas Iosephus and the Septuagint in the place, Num. 12. v. 1. as also elsewhere, vnderstand Chus for Ethiopia, we must giue credit to Moses himselfe herein; and then it will appeare that Iosephus was grossly mistaken, or vainely led by his owne inuention. For Iosephus presuming that Chus was Ethiopia, and therefore that the Wife of Moses (which in Scripture, Num. 12. vers. 1. is called a woman of Cush) was a woman of the land of Ethiopia, <sup>20</sup> that Tharbis the Daughter of the King of Ethiopia, fell in loue with the person and fame of Moses, while he besieged Saba her Fathers Citie; and to the end, to obtaine Moses for her Husband, she practised to betray both her Parents, Countrey, and friends, with the Citie itselfe, and to deliuer it into Moses hands. The Tale (if it be worth the reciting) lyeth thus in Iosephus. After he had described the strength of the Ethiopian Citie Meioe, which he saith at length Cambyse called so from the name of his Sister, (the old name being Saba) he goeth on in these words: Hic cum Moses desideraret exercitum otiosum gerere <sup>Aniq. l. 2. c. 5.</sup> ferre, huius non audente manus conferere, tale quiddam accidit. Erat Ethiopum Regi filia, nomine Tharbis, &c. which Tale hath this sense in English: when Moses was grieved that his Armie lay idle, because the Enemy besieged, durst not sallie and come to handy strokes, there <sup>30</sup> happened this accident in the meane while. The Ethiopian King had a Daughter called Tharbis, who at some assaults giuen, beheld the person of Moses, and withall admired his valour. And knowing that Moses had not onely upheld and restored the falling estate of the Egyptians, but had also brought the conquering Ethiopians to the very brinke of subuersion: these things working in her thoughts, together with her owne affection, which daily increased, shee made meanes to send vnto him by one of her trustiest seruants to offer her selfe vnto him, and become his wife, which Moses on this condition entertained, that she should first deliuer the Citie into his possession; whereunto shee condescending, and Moses hauing taken oath to performe this contract, both the one and the other were instantly performed.

†. II.

A dispute against the Tale of Iosephus.

This Tale (whereof Moses hath not a word) hath Iosephus fashioned, and therein also viterly mistaken himselfe, in naming a Citie of Arabia for a Citie of Ethiopia: as he names Ethiopia it selfe to haue bene the Countrey of Moses his Wife, when (indeede) it was Arabia. For Saba is not in Ethiopia, but in Arabia, as both Strabo and all other Geographers, ancient and moderne teach vs, saying that the Sabeans are Arabians and not Ethiopians; except Iosephus can perswade vs, that the Queene of Saba which came from the South to heare the wisdom of Salomon, were a Negro, or Blacke Moore. And <sup>50</sup> though Damianus à Goes speake of certaine Letters to the King of Portugall from Prestre John, of the Abissines: wherein that Ethiopian King would perswade the Portugals that he was descended of the Queene of Saba, and of Salomon; yet it doth no where appeare in the Scriptures, that Salomon had any Sonne by that great Princeesse: which had it been true, it is likely that when Sisbac King of Egypt inuaded Roboam, and sackt Hierusalem, his Brother (the Sonne of Saba and Salomon) who ioyned vpon Egypt, would both haue impeached that enterprize, as also giuen aide and succour to Roboam against Ieroboam, who drew from him ten of the twelue Tribes to his owne obedience. Neither is it any thing against our opinion of Moses his Wife, to haue bene an Arabian, that the Scriptures teach vs, that Moses married the daughter of Iethro Priest of Midian or Madian: which standing on the North Coast of the Red Sea, ouer against the body of Egypt, and neere Esfion Gaber, where Salomon prouided his Fleet for India, in the Region of Edom, may well be reckoned as a part of Arabia, as the Red Sea is called Sinus Arabicus. For Edumaea ioyneth to the Tribe of Iuda by the North, to Arabia Petraea by the East, to the Mediterran by the West, and to the Red Sea by the South-east. And if wee marke the way which Moses tooke when he left Egypt, and conducted Israel thence, it will appeare that he was no stranger in Arabia: in the border whereof, and in Arabia it selfe, he had formerly liued fortie yeeres; where it seemeth, that besides his carefull bringing vp in Egypt, he was instructed by Iethro in the Egyptians learning. For Iosephus confesseth, and Saint Stephen confirmeth, that he was learned in all the wisdome of the Egyptians. But on the other side this Text makes much against Iosephus, where it is written in Exodus the second, Therefore Moses fled from Pharaon, and dwelt in the Land of Madian or Midian, and not in Ethiopia. And in the third Chapter it is as plaine as words can expresse, in what Region Madian was, where it is written, when Moses kept the sheepe of Iethro his Father in Law, Priest of Madian, and draue the Flocke to the Desert, and came to the Mountaine of God in Horeb. Now that Mount Horeb is not in Ethiopia, euery Infant knoweth. And if we may beleue Moses himselfe, then was not the Wife of Moses purchased in that manner which Iosephus reporteth (which was for betraying her Countrey and Friends) neither had shee the name of Tharbis, but of Sippora, or Zippora: neither was shee a Negro, but a Madianitish. And as God worketh the greatest things by the simplest meanes: so tooke it pleased him from a Shepherd to call Moses, and after him Dauid, and by them to deliuer his people first and last. For Moses sitting by a Well (as disconsolate and a stranger) defended the daughters of Reguel from the other shepherds, and drew them Water to water their sheepe: vpon which occasion (by God ordained) he was entertained by Iethro, whose Daughter he married: and not for any betraying of Townes or Countries.

From hence also came Iethro to Moses at Rephidim, not farre from Idumaea, and finding the insupportable gouernement of such a multitude, he aduised him to distribute this weightie charge, and to make Gouernours and Iudges of euery Tribe and Familie. And if Iethro had bene an Ethiopian, it had bene a farre progresse for him to haue passed through all Egypt with the Wife and Children of Moses, and to haue found Moses in the border of Idumaea: the Egyptians hating Moses and all that fauoured him. But the passing of Moses through Arabia Petraea (which ioyneth to Madian) proueth that Moses was well acquainted in those parts, in which the second time he wandred fortie yeeres, and did by these late traualles of his, seek to instruct the children of Israel in the knowledge of one true God, before he brought them to the Land of plenty and rest. For he found them nourished vp with the milke of Idolatry, and obstinate in the Religion of the Heathen, and finding that those stiffe plants could not be bowed or declined, either by perswasion or by miracle, he ware them out in the Deserts, as God directed, and grafted their branches anew, that from those hee might receiue fruit, agreeable to his owne desire, and Gods Commandements.

Lastly, this opinion of Iosephus is condemned by Augustinus Chrysostomus, where also he reprehendeth Apollinaris, who auowed that Moses had married both Tharbis and Sephora: His owne words haue this beginning: Mentitur etiam Apollinaris duas uxores habuisse Moses, &c. Apollinaris also saith, in affirming that Moses had two wives: and who doth not perceiue these things fained by them? for it is manifest that the wife of Moses was Zephora, Daughter to the Priest or President of Madian: and that Madian cannot be taken for Ethiopia beyond Egypt; being the same that ioyneth to Arabia: so farre Chrysostomus.

†. III.

Chus ill expounded for Ethiopia. Ezech. 29. 10.

Now as Chus is by the Septuagint conuerted Ethiopia, and the wife of Moses therefore called Ethiopsa: so in the conquest of Nabuchodonosor is Ethiopia written for Arabia. For by the words of Ezechiel, it is manifest that Nabuchodonosor was neuer in Ethiopia, Behold (saith Ezechiel, speaking of the person of this great Assyrian) I come upon thee and upon thy Rivers, and I will make the Land of Egypt utterly waste and desolate; from the Towre of Seuench, even to the borders of the blacke Moors: which last words should haue bene thus conuerted: From the Towre of Seuench to the borders of the Chusites or Arabians: betweene which two is situated all Egypt. For to say, from the borders of Seuench to the Ethiopians, hath no sense at all. Seuench it selfe being the border of Egypt, confronting and ioyning to Ethiopia, or the Land of the blacke Moors. So as if Nabuchodonosor's conquest had bene but betweene Seuench and the border of Ethiopia, it were as much to say, and did expresse no other victory then the conquest of all that Land and Countrey, lying betweene Middlesex and Buckingham, where both the Countreies ioyn together; or all the North parts of England, betweene Barwick and Scotland: for this hath the same sense with the former, if any man sought to expresse by these two bounds, the Conquest of England: Barwick being the North border of England, as Seuench or Syene is the South bound of Egypt, seated in Thebaida which toucheth Ethiopia. But by the words of Ezechiel it appeareth, that Nabuchodonosor neuer entred into any part of Ethiopia, although the Septuagint, the Vulgar, the Geneua, and all other (in effect) haue written Ethiopia for Chus.

†. IIII.

Another place of Ezechiel, cap. 30. vers. 9. in the like manner mistaken.

And as the former, so is this place of Ezechiel mistaken, by being in this sort conuerted: Indie illi egredientur nuncij a facie mea in trieribus ad conterendam Ethiopie confidentiam: Which place is thus turned in English by the Geneuans: In that day shall there Messengers goe forth from me in ships to make the carelesse Moors afraid. Now the Latine for (ships) hath the Greeke word Trieres for Triremes which are Gallies of three banks, and not ships. But that in this place the Translation should haue bene (as in the former) amended by vsing the word Chus or Arabia for Ethiopia or the blacke Moors, euery man may see which meanelly vnderstandeth the Geographie of the World, knowing, that to passe out of Egypt into Ethiopia there neede no Gallies nor ships, no more then to passe out of Northampton into Leicestershire: Ethiopia being the conterminat Region with Egypt, and not diuided so much as by a Riuer. Therefore in this place of Ezechiel it was meant, that from Egypt, Nabuchodonosor should send Gallies alongst the coast of the Red Sea, by which an Armie might be transported into Arabia the Happy and the Stonie (sparing the long wearisome march ouer all Egypt, and the Desert of Pharan) which Armie might thereby surprise them vnawares in their securitie and confidence. For when Nabuchodonosor was at Seuench within a mile of Ethiopia, he needed neither Galley nor Ship to passe into it: being all one large and firme Land with Egypt, and no otherwise parted from it, then one In-land shire is parted from another; and if hee had a fancie to haue rowed vp the Riuer but for pleasure, he could not haue done it: for the fall of Nilus (tumbling ouer high and steepe Mountaines) called Catadupa Nilus, were at hand.

Lastly, as I haue already obserued, the sonnes of euery father feared themselves as neere together as possibly they could, Gomer and his sonnes in Asia the lesse; Iauan and his sons in Greece, and the Ilands adioyning; Shem in Persia and Eastward. So the Sons and Grandchildren of Chus from the Riuer of Gehon (their Fathers first seat) inhabited vpon the same, or vpon some other contiguous vnto it, as Nimrod and Hauilah on the one side, and Saba, Sheba, and Sutecha (with the rest) did on the other side. And to conclude in a word, the Hebrews had neuer any acquaintance or fellowship, any war, treatie of peace, or other intelligence with the Ethiopian blacke Moors, as is already remembred in the Chapter of Paradise.

†. V.

A place, Esay 18. v. 1. in like manner corrupted, by taking Chus for Ethiopia.

And as in these places before remembred, so in diuers other is the word Ethiopia put for Arabia or Chus, which puts the storie (where it is so vnderstood) quite out of square, one Kingdome thereby being taken for another. For what sense hath this part of of Scripture, Eſay 18. Ve terra Cymbalorum alarum quæ est trans flumina Æthiopie, or according to the Septuagint in these words: Ve terra nauium alarum quæ est trans fluvios Æthiopie? woe so the land shaddowing with wings, which is beyond the Rivers of Æthiopia, sending Embassadors by sea, even the vessels of reeds upon the waters. Ve terra umbrosa ora; woe to the Land of the shadowed coast, saith Iunius. The former Translators vnderstand it in this sense; That the waters are shadowed with the sailes, which are significatiuely called the wings of the ships, the other, that the Coast of the Sea was shadowed by the height of the Land.

But to the purpose: That this Land here spoken of by the Prophet Eſay, is Egypt, no Interpreter hath doubted. For they were the Egyptians that sent this message to the Israelites which Eſay repeateth, and by the former translation euery man may see the transposition of Kingdomes: for hereby Egypt is transported vnto the other side of Æthiopia, and Æthiopia set next vnto Iudæa, when it is the Land of Chus and Arabia indeede that lyeth betwene Iudæa and Egypt, and not Æthiopia, which is seated vnder the Equinoctiall line. And of this Beroaldus asketh a materiall question, (to wit) what Region that should be, of which the Prophet speaketh, and placeth it beyond the Rivers of Æthiopia: Nam de ignota agi regione dici nequit; For it cannot be said that he treateth of an unknowne Region. Now if Æthiopia it selfe be vnder the Equinoctiall line, with whom the Iewes had neuer any acquaintance, why should any man dreame that they had knowledge of Nations far beyond it againe, and beyond the Rivers of Æthiopia? except we shall impiously thinke that the Prophet spake he knew not what, or vied an impertinent discourse of those nations, which were not discovered in 2000. yeres after, inhabiting as farre South as the Cape of good Hope, commonly knowne by the name of Bona esperanza.

†. VI.

That vpon the like mistaking, both Tethaca in the storie of Senacherib, and Zera in the storie of Ala are vnadvisedly made Æthiopians.

And by this translation is the storie of Senacherib vtterly mistaken in the cause of his retreat. For Senacherib was first repulled at Pelusium, at the very entrance of Egypt from Iudæa: when hauing certaine knowledge that Thirrhakeh, (which all the Interpreters call King of Æthiopia) was on the way to set on him, he began to withdraw himselfe: and fearing to leaue his Armie in two parts, hee sent threatening Messengers to Ezechias King of Iuda, perswading him to submit himselfe: the Tenor whereof is set down in the second of Kings in these words: Huic any of the gods of the Nations deliuered his Land out of the hands of the King of Assur: where is the god of Hamath? &c. By which proud Embassage, if he had obtained entrance into Hierusalem, he then meant to haue vnted that great Armie before Hierusalem, commanded by Rabsakeh, with the other which lay before Pelusium, a great Citie vpon the branch of Nilus next Arabia. For Senacherib had already mastered the most part of all those Cities in Iudæa and Beniamin with a third Armie, (which himselfe commanded) being then at the siege of Lebna. But vpon the rumor of that Arabian Armie led by their King Thirrhakeh (whom Iosephus calls Tharsices) Rabsakeh hasted from the siege of Hierusalem, and found Senacherib departed from Lachis and set downe before Lebna, which was afterwards called Eleuthropolis, as some haue supposed. But while he had ill successe at Pelusium and feared Thirrhakeh, God himselfe whom hee least feared, strook his Army before Hierusalem by the Angel of his power, so as 158000. were found dead in the place, as in the life of Ezechias is hereafter more largely written. And that this Armie of Tirrhakeh was from Arabia, Iosephus himselfe makes it plaine. For he confesseth in the tenth Booke the first Chapter of the Iewes Antiquities, that it was come to Senacherib's knowledge, that the Armie which was a fooe (both to releue the Egyptians and the Iewes) marched towards him by the way of the Desert: Now the Desert which lay indifferent betwene Hierusalem and Pelusium, was that of Pharan or Sur, which also toucheth on the three Arabias, to wit, the Stonie, of which it is a part: the Desert, and the Happy; and by no other way indeede could the Arabians come on to succour either Pelusium or Hierusalem. But that there is any Desert betwene Pelusium and the South part of Egypt, hath neuer yet bene heard of, or described by any Cosmographer or Historian. So then this Scripture of the second of Kings, Verse the ninth, hath the same mistaking as the rest. For here the word (Chus) is also translated Æthiopia; and in this sense haue all the Interpreters, (but Iunius) expressed the beginning of the ninth Verse:

He heard also men say of Thirrhakeh King of Æthiopia &c. whereas it should haue bene thus conuerted with Iunius: Audiens autem de Thirrhakeh Rege Chusbi; Hee heard also of Thirrhakeh King of the Chusites. For they were the Chusites and Arabians, whole Houses and Cities were next the fire, and vpon whom the very smoake of Iuda flaming was blowne, being their neereft Neighbours: and so were not the Æthiopian black-Moore vnder the Equinoctiall, whom neither war nor peace (which discovereth all Regions) euer found out, saith Plinie. For this King was no more King of Æthiopia then Zera was, who invaded Assa King of Iuda, with an Armie of a Million, and three thousand Chariots. Indeed, how such an Armie & those Chariots should passe through all Egypt, (the Kings of Egypt being mightie Kings) let all men that know how these Regions are seated, and how rare distant, iudge. For Princes doe not easily permit Armies of a Million to run through them; neither was there euer such strength of Black-Moore heard of in that part of the World, or elsewhere. Neither are these Æthiopians such traualers or Conquerors; and yet is this King Zera also called King of Æthiopia. But the word Chus being first conuerted for Æthiopia, the rest of the Interpreters (not looking into the seats of Kingdomes, or the possibilities of attempts, or inuasions) followed one another in the former mistakings.

†. VII.

A farther exposition of the place, Eſay 18. 1.

Concerning these words in that eighteenth Chapter of Eſay, Nauium alarum; Winged ships, (so the Septuagint turne it) or Cymbalorum alarum (according to the Latine) sailes whistling in the windes, or terra umbrosa ora (after Iunius) the Land of a shadowed coast, or the Land shadowing with wings, is our English Genius hath it. The two first interpretations of the Septuagint and S. Hierome haue one sense in effect. For the sailes are commonly called the wings of a ship; and we vse to say ordinarily when our ships saile slowly, that they want wings: (that is) when her sailes are either worne or too narrow; and we also vse the same phrase of the winde whistling in the sailes. And it may be that the Egyptians employed so many of those small ships, as their sailes were said to giue a shadow ouer the Red Sea. But to make both interpretations good, Pintus (vpon Eſay) affirmeth, that the word (Sabat) doth signifie both to shadow and to gingle (which is) to make a kinde of Cymbal sound: so as the meaning of this place (saith Pintus) is this: Woe to thee, O Egypt, which dost promise to others safeguard, vnder the shadow of thy wings, which (indeed) see meth to agree with the argument of the eighteenth Chapter of Eſay: and this phrase is often elsewhere vsed, as in the sixteenth Psalme: Sub umbra alarum tuarum protegeme; Defend me vnder the shadow of thy wings. The Boates of reede (spoken of are of two kinds; either of basket-willow couered with hides (as anciently in Brittain) or a Tree made hollow in the bottome, and built vpon both sides with Canes. Of the one sort I haue seene in Ireland, of the other in the Indies.

§. XI.

Of the plantation and antiquities of Egypt.

†. I.

That Mizraim the chiefe planter of Egypt, and the rest of the sonnes of Ham, were seated in order, one by another.

The second sonne of Ham was Mizraim, (who according to the place of a second brother) was sent somewhat farther off to inhabite. For Chus first posselt Chaldea on the West side of Gehon chiefly: and from thence, as he increased in people, so he entered Arabia, and by time came to the border of the Red Sea, and to the South-east side of Iudæa. Mizraim his brother (with Phut) past ouer into Africa. Mizraim held Egypt: and Phut (as a third brother) was thrust farther off into Mauritania. Canaan tooke the Sea-coast, and held the side of Palestina: and these foure brothers posselt all that Tract of Land, from Gehon in Chaldea, as farre to the West as the Mediterrane Sea: comprehending all Arabia Deserta, and Petra, all Canaan which embraceth Galilea, Samaria, and and Judas; with the two Egyptis, whereof the nether is bounded by Memphis on the South, and by the Mediterrane Sea on the North: and Thebaida (called the vpper Egypt) stretcheth it selfe toward the South as far as Syene, the border of the *Ethiopian*s or black-Moors. All the rest of the coast of Africa Westward, Phut peopled; which brothers had not any other Nation or Family that dwelt betweene them. And in the same manner did all their sons againe, and all the sons of the rest of *Noah*s children, sort themselves.

†. II.

Of the time about which the name of Egypt began to be knowne: and of the Egyptians Lunarie yeeres, which made their antiquities seeme more fabulous.

THIS flourishing Kingdome posselt by Mizraim, changed her ancient name, and became Egypt, at such time as Egyptus (otherwise Rameses, as some thinke) the sonne of Belus, chased thence his elder brother Danaus, shifting him into that part of Greece now called Morea, by whom the Argives were made Danaus, abandoning their proper names: which happened 877. yeeres after the flood, in the time of Iosua, as S. Augustine coniectureth out of Eusebius. But in Homers Odysses it appeareth that the Egyptians were so called at the time of the Troian Warre. And before this, Egypt was knowne by diuers other names, as Oceana, Aria, Osiriana, &c. And Manethon (whom Iosephus citeth in his first booke against Apion) numb'reth all the Kings of Egypt after Moses departure, who consumed 393. yeeres. By which other men coniecture, that the Egyptians tooke on them that name 330. yeeres after Iosua, and about 1000. yeeres after the flood. But where Iosephus in the same booke taketh Israel to be those Hycos, which he also calleth Pastores or Shepherds, which are said to haue reigned in Egypt 511. yeeres: whom also he calleth his Ancestors, (meaning the Ancestors of the Jewes) in this I am sure he was grossly deceiued, or that he vainly boasted: for the Israelites had no such Dominion as Manethon sayeth: nor abode in Egypt so long a time by many yeeres.

Of the Egyptian Antiquities there are many fancies in Trogus, Herodotus, Plato, Diod. Siculus, Mela, and others. For they affirme (saith Pomp. Mela) that there had reigned in Egypt 330. Kings before Amasis, who was contemporarie with Cyrus; and that they had memory and story of 13000. yeeres; and that the Stars had four times changed their course, and the Sunne twice set in the East. These Riddles are also rife among the Atreians and Arcadians, who dare affirme, that they are more ancient then Iupiter and the Moone, whereof Ouid:

Ante Iouem genitum terras habuisse feruntur Arcades: & Luna gens prior illa fuit.

The Arcadians the earth inhabited
Ere yet the Moone did shine, or Ioue was bred.

But for those 13000. yeeres it may well be true: seeing it is certaine that the Egyptians reckon their yeeres by Moneths, which makes after that account not about 1000. or 1100. yeeres, whether we take their Moneths or Lunarie yeeres to haue bene of the first kinde of 27. dayes and eight houres; or otherwise 29. dayes and twelue houres; or after any other of those fiue diuersities of their Lunarie yeeres.

†. III.

Of certaine vaine assertions of the Antiquitie of the Egyptians.

Gerardus Mercator in his Chronologie, reasoneth for the Egyptians Antiquitie in this manner: That the sixteenth Dynastie (where Eusebius begins to reckon the Egyptians times) had beginning with the generall flood: and that therefore the first of the other fifteene reached the Creation, or soone after it. To which coniecture of Mercator, Pererius maketh this answer. That therein Mercator was first deceiued, because he taketh it for granted, that the beginning of the sixteenth Dynastie was at once with the generall flood: which Eusebius maketh 292. yeeres after, and in the time of Abraham. Secondly, Mercator maketh the beginning of the shepherds Dynastie (being in number 17.) in the time of their first King, Saltis, to haue bene in the yeere of the Word 1846. which

Eusebius findeth in the Worlds age 2140. For the 16. Dynastie was begun but in the 292. yeeres after the flood, as they account, and continued 190. yeeres. Thirdly, whereas Mercator maketh euery Dynastie to endure 115. yeeres, Eusebius reckoneth many of them at lesse then 100. yeeres: for the 28. had but fixe yeeres; the 29. but 20. and the 30. but 18. yeeres.

Now Annius in his Supplement of Manethon affirmeth, That all these 15. Dynasties lasted but 162. yeeres: and that the first of the 15. began but in the 131. yeere after the flood: so as where Mercator makes all the 15. to precede the flood, and the 16. to haue bene then in being at the time of the flood, Annius makes them all after it. But the contrarietie of fallhood cannot be hidden, though disguised. For Annius had forgotten his former Opinion and Assertion, that it was in the 131. yeere that Nimrod with the sonnes of Noah came into the Valley of Shinaar: so he forgets the time which was consumed in the building of Babel: and that before the confusion of Speech there was no dispersion, nor farre-off plantation at all. And though he hastily conueyed Gomer into Italy, and Tubal into Spain, in the tenth yeere of Nimrods reigne: (which was ten yeeres after his arrival into Babylonia) yet herein he is more vnadvised. For he makes Egypt posselt, and a government established in the very first yeere of the arrival of Nimrod into Shinaar, before all partition, or any expedition farre off or neere in question: for from thence (that is, from Babel) did the Lord scatter them upon all the earth.

†. IIII.

Against Pererius: that it is not vnlkely, but that Egypt was peopled within 200. yeeres after the Creation; at least, that both it; and the most parts of the World were peopled before the Flood.

BUT whereas Pererius seeketh to ouerthrow this Antiquitie of the Egyptians touching their Dynasties, (which Eusebius doth not altogether destroy, but lessen) I doe not find any great strength in this opinion of Pererius; (to wit) that it was either vnlkely or impossible that Egypt should be peopled within 100. or 200. yeeres after Adam, in the first Age. And whereas he supposeth that it was not inhabited at all before the generall Flood, I doe verily beleue the contrary: and that not onely of Egypt, but the better part of all the World was then peopled: Pererius his words are these: Quomodo enim primos mundi ducentes, vel etiam centum annos Adami proles adeo multiplicari potuit, ut ad Aegyptum usq; habitandum & complendum propagata sit, &c. For how could the children of Adam be so multiplied in the first two hundred, or in the first hundred yeeres of the world, and so propagated as to inhabit and fill Egypt: for allowing this (saith Pererius) we must also confesse, that there were then both the Assyrians, and other Nations.

Now seeing that the Scriptures are silent herein, and that it is no point of our sauing beleefe, it is lawfull for euery man to be guided in this and the like questions by the best reason, circumstance, and likelihood; and herein, as in the rest, I protest that I doe not goinlay any mans opinion out of any crossing or cauilling humour: for I thinke it the part of euery Christian, rather to reconcile differences, where there is possibilitie of vni-on, then out of froward subtletie, and preiudicate resolute dresse, to maintaine factions needlesse, and dangerous contentions.

First therefore, to this opinion, that Egypt was not planted so soone after Adam, no, nor at all before the Flood, I say that there is no reason why wee should giue a lesse increase to the sonnes of Adam, then to the sonnes of Noah. For their length of life, which exceeded those which came after the Flood double; & (after a few yeeres) treble, is an infallible prooffe of their strength and abilitie, to beget many Children: and at that time they obserued no degrees of kindred, nor consanguinitie. And that there was a speedie increase of people, and in great numbers, it may in some sort appeare by this, that Cain, who (being fearefull that the death of Abel would haue bene reuenged on him) withdrew himselfe from the rest, which were afterward begotten, and dwelt in the Land of Nod, and there, by the helpe of his owne issues built a Citie, (called Enoch) after the name of his first borne. Now if it be gathered that Nimrod came into the Valley of Shinaar with so many multitudes, as sufficed to build the Citie and Towre of Babel: and that to this increase there was giuen but 130. yeeres by Berosus, and after the account of the Scriptures (reckoning, as it is commonly vnderstood, by the birth of Arphaxad,

M

Selahi,

Selah, Heber, and Phalegh) but one hundred and one yeere: I see no cause to doubt, but that in the infancie of the first age, when the bodies of men were most perfect, euen within 130. yeeres, the same (if not a greater) number might be increased; and so within 70. yeeres after (that is, by such time as the World had stood 200. yeeres) aswell Assyria, Syria, and Aegypt might be posselt before the Flood, as they were within the same or lesse time after it. Neither doth it agree with the circumstance or true Storie of the Babylonian and Assyrian Empire, that all those people, which were increased in the first hundred or 130. yeeres after the Flood, came into Shinaar and Babylonia. For that euer Noah himselfe came out of the East, as there is no Scripture or Authoritie to proue it, so all probable coniecture and reason it selfe denies it. Againe, those multitudes and powerfull numbers, which Semiramis (but the third from Nimrod) found in India, considered with her owne Armie of three Millions, (and the left nor all her Kingdomes emptye) doe well proue, that if the World had such plentie of people in so few yeeres after the Flood, it might also be as plentifully filled in like time before it. For after their owne account Ninus gouerned Babylonia and Assyria but 292. yeeres after the Flood of Noah. And these Troupes of Semiramis were gathered out of all those Easterne Kingdomes, from Media to the Mediterran Sea; when there had now past from the Flood to the time of this her inuasion, somewhat lesse or more then 360. yeeres: for much more time the true Chronologie cannot allow; though I confesse, that in respect of the strange greatnesse of Semiramis Armie, and the incredible multitudes gathered, this is as short a time as can well be giuen. And if but one halfe be true of that which is said, That her Armie consisted of 1300000. Footmen, and 500000. Horsemen, it must needs be, that long before Semiramis Reigne, the greatest part of Asia (whence her huge Armie was gathered) was full of people: yea Arabia it selfe (much part whereof is barren) must long before this time of Semiramis haue bene plentifully peopled; when Ninus hauing a determination to make himselfe Master of all Nations, entred (notwithstanding) in League with the King thereof: whom therefore he either feared, or sought his assistance. And if Arabia were then so well replenished, I see no cause but Aegypt might also be peopled. Now if we may belecue Trogus Pompeius (Epitomis'd by Iustine) Aegypt was a most flourishing and magnificent Nation before Ninus was borne. For theie be his owne words, speaking of Ninus. Fuere quidem temporibus antiquioribus Vexoris Rex Aegypti, &c. But there were in times more ancient Vexoris King of Aegypt, and Tanais King of the Scythians: of which the one inuaded Pontus, the other Aegypt. And how full of people all that part of the World was, the Conquests of Ninus witness, who subdued with no small force the Armenians, the Medes, and afterwards the Bactrians; yea, all that whole body of Asia on this side India. For Diodorus out of Ctesias numb'reth the Armies wherewith Ninus inuaded Zoroaster, at 1700000. Footmen, and 200000. Horsemen: and the Stories generally shew, that though Zoroaster Armie was farre short of this, yet it was greater then any that those parts of the World euer since beheld. But to what end should I seeke for foreigne authoritie? for no man doubteth but that Aegypt was posselt by Mizraim, the sonne of Ham; and that it was an established Kingdome, filled with many Cities in Abrahams time, the Scriptures tell vs. And sure to prepare and cultiue a desolate and ouergrowne ground, to beautifie it with many Cities, Lawes, and Policies, cannot be esteemed a labour of a few dayes: and therefore it must be inhabited in a lesse time then 200. yeeres after the Flood; and in the same time (if not in a shorter) before the Flood. For if so many Millions of men were found within 300. yeeres after the generall Flood; so as not onely Babylon, and Assyria, Bactria, Armenia, Media, Arabia, Aegypt, Palestina, yea the farre-off Lybia on the one side, and India on the other, and Scythia (inferiour to neither) were all filled: into what small corners could then all those Nations be comprest, which 1656. yeeres brought forth before the Flood? euen necessitie, which cannot be rectified, cast the abundance of mens bodies into all parts of the knowne World; especially, where Death forbore the Father, and made no place for the Sonne, till he had beheld liuing Nations of his owne body.

† V.

Of some other reasons against the opinion of Pererius.

FOR what a strange increase did the long liues of the first Age make: when they continued 800. or 900. yeeres? Surely, we haue reason to doubt, that the World could not containe them, rather then that they were not spred ouer the World. For let vs now reckon the date of our liues in this Age of the World: wherein if one exceede 50. yeeres, ten for one are cut off in that passage, and yet we finde no want of people; nay, we know the multitude such, as if by warres or pestilence they were not sometimes taken off by many thousands, the earth with all the industry of man could not giue them food. What strange heapes then of foules had the first Ages, who enioyed 800. or 900. yeeres, as aforesaid? These numbers, I say, cannot be counted nor conceiued. For it would come to the same reckoning in effect, as if all those which haue bene borne in Brittaine since 3. or 4. hundred yeeres before the Norman Conquest (sauiug such as by accident or by violence were cut off) were now aliue; and if to these there were added as many as by Polygamie might haue bene increased. For (to omit, that the Giants and mighty ones of the first Age obserued no law of Matrimony) it is to be thought that those Louers of the world and of pleasure, when they knew the long and liberall time which Nature had giuen them, would not willingly or hastily present themselves to any danger which they could flye from or eschew. For what humane argument hath better perswasion to make men carelesse of life, and fearelesse of death, then the little time which keeps them afluend, and that short time also accompanied with so many paines and diseases, which this enuious old Age of the World mingleth together, and soweth with the seeds of Mankinde?

Now if that Berosus or Annius may be alleadged for sufficient Authours, whom Pererius himselfe in this question citeth, then is it by them affirmed, and by Iosephus confirmed, that the Citie of Enoch was seated neere Lybanus in Syria: and if other parts of Syria were peopled in Cains time, I see no cause why Palestina (which is also a Province of Syria) and Aegypt (which neighboureth it) could be left desolate both all the life time of Cain, and all those times betwene his death and the Flood, which were by estimation 700. or 800. yeeres. And sure though this Fragment of Berosus with Annius his Comment be very ridiculous in many places (the ancient Copies being corrupted or lost) yet all things in Berosus are not to be reiected. Therefore Saint Hierome for such Authours giues a good rule: Bona eorum eligamus, vitemus contraria; Let vs choose what is good in them, and reiect the rest. And certainly in the very beginning of the first Booke, Berosus agreeth (in effect) with Moses, touching the generall Flood: and in that first part Berosus affirmeth, that those mighty men and Gyants which inhabited Enoch, commanded ouer all Nations, and subiected the vniuersall World: and though that phrase (of all the World) be often vsed in the Scriptures for a part thereof; as in the second of the Acts, That there were dwelling at Iherusalem Iemes: men that feared God of euery Nation vnder Heauen: yet by words which follow in Berosus, it is plaine that his words and sense were the same: for he addeth from the Sunnes rising to the Sunnes setting, which cannot be taken for any small part thereof. Againe, we may safely coniecture, that Noah did not part and proportion the World among his sonnes at aduerture, or left them as Discoverers, but directed them to those Regions which he formerly knew had bene inhabited. And it cannot be denied that the earth was more passable and easie to traualle ouer before the Flood, then after it. For Pererius himselfe confesseth, that Atlica (by reason of mud and slime which the water left vpon the Earth) was vninhabited 200. yeeres after Ogyges Flood; whereby we may gather that there was no great pleasure in passing into farre Countries, after the generall Deluge, when the earth lay (as it were) incopled for 100. or 130. yeeres together. And therefore was the face thereof in all coniecture more beautifull, and lesse cumbersome to walke ouer, in the first Age, then after the generall ouerflowing.

†. VI.

Of the words of Moses, Gen. 10. v. ultimo, wherein Pererius grounded his opinion.

LASTLY, whereas Pererius draws this Argument out of the last Verse of the tenth of Genesis, And out of these were the Nations divided after the flood: Quo significatur talem divisionem non fuisse ante diluvium, By which it appeareth (saith Pererius) that there was no such division before the Flood; which he also seeketh to confirme out of the eleventh of Genesis, because the diuision of tongues was cause of the disperſion of the people. This consequence, quo significatur, &c. seemeth to me very weake: the Text it selfe rather teacheth the contrary: for out of these (saith Moses) were the Nations divided in the earth after the Flood; inferring, that before the Flood the Nations were diuided out of others, though after the Flood out of these only. But whatsoeuer sense may be gathered from this place, yet it can no way be drawne to the times before the Flood, or to any Plantation or diuision in that Age: for if there were none else among whom the earth could be diuided after the Flood, but Noahs Sonnes, wherein doth that necessary diuision controule the planting of the World before it? And whereas it is alleaged that the confusion of speech was the cause of this disperſion; it is true, that it was so for that present; but if Babel had neuer bene built, nor any confusion of Languages at all, yet increase of people and time would haue enforced a farther off and generall Plantation: as Berofus sayes well, that when Mankind were exceedingly multiplied, Ad comparandas nouas sedes necessitas compellebat, They were driuen by necessitie to seeke new Habitations. For we finde (as it is before said) that within 300. yeeres after the Flood, there were gathered together into two Armies, such multitudes as the Valley about Babylon could not haue sustained those numbers with their increase for any long time: all Asia the greater and the lesser; all Scythia, Arabia, Palestina, and Egypt, with Greece, and the Islands thereof; Mauritania and Lybia being also at that time fully peopled. And if wee beleue Berofus, then not only those parts of the World, but (within 140. yeeres after the Flood) Spain, Italie and France were also planted: much more then may we thinke, that within 1656. yeeres before the Flood, in the time of the chiefe strength of Mankind, they were replenished with people. And certainly seeing all the World was overflowne, there were people in all the World which offended.

†. VII.

A conclusion, resolving of that which is most likely, touching the Egyptian Antiquities: with somewhat of Phut (another Sonne of Ham) which peopled Lybia.

THEREFORE, for the Antiquitie of the Egyptians, as I doe not agree with Mercator, nor iudge with the Vulgar, which giue too much credit to the Egyptians Antiquities: so I doe not thinke the report of their Antiquities so fabulous, as either Pererius or other men conceiue it. But I rather incline to this, That Egypt being peopled before the Flood, and 200. or 300. yeeres, more or lesse after Adam, there might remaine vnto the Sonnes of Mizraim some Monuments in Pillers or Altars (of stone or mettall) of their former Kings or Gouvernours: which the Egyptians hauing added to the list and Roll of their Kings after the Flood, in succeeding time (out of the vanitie of glory or by some corruption in their Priests) something beyond the truth might be inserted. And that the memory of Antiquitie was in such sort preserued, Berofus affirmeth it of the Chaldaans, and so doth Epigenes. For they both write that the vse of Letters and the Art of Astro-nomie was knowne to the Babylonians 3634. yeeres before Alexanders Conquest: and this report Arminius findeth to agree and reach to the time of Enoch, who was borne 934. yeeres before the Flood, and wrote of the Worlds destruction, both by Water and Fire; as also of Christs comming in iudgement, as Saint Iude hath witnessed. But leaving these Antiquities to other mens iudgements, and every man to his owne reason, I will conclude this Plantation of Egypt. It is agreed by all, that it was peopled by Mizraim, and that it tooke the name of Egypt from Egyptus the sonne of Belus, as aforesaid. Being diuided into two Regions, that part from Memphis or Nicopolis to the Mediterranean Sea, was called the inferiour Egypt; surnamed also Delta: because the several branches of Nilus breaking asunder from one body of the Riuer, gaue it the forme of the Greeke letter Delta, which is the forme of a Triangle. That branch, which ran toward the North-east and embraced the Sea, next vnto the Desarts of Sur and Pharan, had on it the Citie of Pelusium, where Senacherib was repulſed: The other branch, which yeelded it selfe to the Salt-water towards the North-east, is beautified by that famous Citie of Alexandria: The vpper part of Egypt is bounded betwene Memphis and Syene neere Ethiopia, and had the name of Thebaida, of that ancient Citie of Thebes, which (according to Homer) was adorned with 100. Gates: and therefore called Ciuitas centum portarum; and by the Greeks Diopolis; in the Scriptures No-hamon, which signifieth multitudes of Inhabitants, exceeding beliefe. Iosephus calls Egypt Mersin of Mizraim: and Herodotus affirmes that it had once the name of Thebaia.

10 Phut the third sonne of Ham tooke the next portion of Land to his brother Mizraim, and inhabited Lybia: whose people were anciently called Phutici (saith Iosephus) and Plinie mentioneth the Riuer Fut in Mauritania: which Riuer from the Mountain Atlas (known to the Inhabitants by the name of Dyris) he maketh to be distant the space of two hundred miles. It also appeareth in the thirtieth Chapter of Ezechiel, that Phut, Chus and Lud were contermini and Associates with the Egyptians.

§. XII.

Of the eleuen sonnes of Canaan, the fourth sonne of Ham.

†. I.

Of the bounds of the Land of Canaan: with the names of his eleuen sonnes.

CANAN (the fourth sonne of Ham) posselt all that Region called by the Romanes Palestina; in the Scriptures Galilaea, Samaria, and Iudaea; in the later times known by the name of the Holy Land and Iurie: the limits whereof are precisely set downe by Moses, Genesis the tenth, Then the border of the Canaanites was from Zidon as thou goest to Gerar vntill Azzah, and as thou goest vnto Sodome and Gomorha, and Admah, and Zeboim, euen vnto Laſha. Now howsoeuer these words of the Hebrew Text (as thou goest) be conuerted, Moses meaning was that Gerar was the South bound of Canaan and Zidon the North; Sodome and Gomorha the East, and the other Cities named stood on the Frontiers thereof. For Gerar standeth in a right Line from Gaza in the way of Egypt, the vttermost Territorie of Canaan Southward: and this was properly the Land of Canaan.

Now the sonnes of Canaan which posselt this Countrie, and inhabited some part of the borders thereof, were in number eleuen:

1. Zidon.
2. Heth or Chethus.
3. Iebusi or Iebusaeus.
4. Emori or Emoreus, or Amoreus.
5. Gergesiu or Gergesius.
6. Henu or Chiueus.
7. Arki or Harkus.
8. Seni or Sinaus.
9. Araadi or Araadus.
10. Zemari or Samareus, or Tzemareus.
11. Hamathi or Hamathus, or Chamathus.

Of which the most renowned were the Hethites, Gergesites, Amorites, Henuites, Iebusites, and Perizzites: which Perizzites were descended of Zamari or Samareus, or from some of his.

†. II.

Of the portions of Zidon and Heth.

Zidon the first borne of Canaan, built the famous Citie of Zidon in Phamicia, which afterward fell in partition to the Tribe of Aſſer: for Aſſer, Zabulon, and Neptali had a great part of the ancient Phamicia distributed among them; but the Aſſerites could neuer obtaine Zidon it selfe.

The second sonne of Canaan was Heth or Cethus: of whom came the Hethites, or Hittites, one of thole seven principall Nations (Commanders of Canaan) appointed by God to be rooted out; namely, the Gergesites, the Amorites, the Canaanites, the Perizzites, and the Iebusites. The Hittites inhabited about Bersabe, and towards Hebron neere the Torrent Befor, and about Gerar, which Moses maketh the vtermoſt limit of Canaan, hauing the Defart of Pharan to the South: for about Bersabe (otherwise Pateus iuramenti) foure miles from Gaza dwelt Heth and his Posterity, as far to the Northeaſt as Hebron, and Mamre; and of Ephraim the Hittite did Abraham buy the field of Sarabs buriall. Of which Nation Rebecca bewailed her ſelfe to Iſaac, ſaying, That ſhe was weary of her life for the Daughters of Heth. The Giants Anakim were of theſe Hittites, a ſtrong and fierce Nation, whole entertainment by the Kings of Iſrael againſt them the Syrians greatly feared: as in the fourth of the Kings; Iſrael hath hired againſt vs the Kings of the Hittites.

†. III.
Of the Iebusites and Amorites.

Iebusaus, the third ſonne of Canaan, of whom came the Iebusites, and whoſe principall ſeat was Iebus, (afterward Hieruſalem) were alſo a valiant and ſtubborne Nation, and held their Citie and the Countrey neere it, till ſuch time as Dauid by Gods aſſiſtance recovered both: yet were not the Iebusites extinguished, but were Tributaries to Salomon.

Amoreus was the fourth ſonne of Canaan, of whom the Amorites took name, who inhabited that Land to the Eaſt of Jordan below the Sea of Galilee, hauing Arnon and the Mountaines of Galaad on the Eaſt, and Jordan on the Weſt: of whom Og (King of Baſan) and Sihon (ouerthrowne by Moses) were Princes.

The Amorites had alſo many other habitations diſperſed within the bounds of Canaan: as behinde Libanus in the edge of Caleſyria, or Syria Libanica. They had alſo their being in the Mountaines of Iuda, and in Idumaea neere the Metropolis thereof, called Duma. And hereof it came that all the Canaanites were ſometime called Amorites: as in Genetiſis the fifteenth: For the wickedneſſe of the Amorites is not yet full. And that this was alſo a powerfull Nation, wee finde in the Prophet Amos: Tet destroyed I the Amorite before them, whoſe beighth was like the beighth of a Cedar, and he was ſtrong as the Oake.

†. IIII.
Of the Gergesites, Henites, and Harkites.

The fiſt ſonne of Canaan was Gergeſeus or Gergeſion, (otherwise Girgaſi) who inhabited on the Eaſt ſide of the Lake of Tiberias, or the Sea of Galilee, where Ptolomie ſets the Citie Geraſa, which Iosephus calls Geſera in the Territorie of Decapolis. Here it was that Chriſt diſpoſſeſt the poſſeſſed with Diuels; and the Gergesites deſired him to depart their Coaſts: becauſe their Swine filled with the euill ſpirits, drowned themſelues in the Sea of Galilee. Gergeſeus alſo built Berytus (ſometime Geru) afterward Felix Iulia, three miles from the Riuer Adonis in Phenicia: in which the Romans held a Garriſon: and to which Auguſtus gaue many large priuiledges.

Heueus the ſixth ſonne, and Father of the Henites, inhabited vnder Libanus neere Emath. Theſe Henites, howſoeuer the Caphthorim expelled a good part of them (as in Deuteronomie the ſecond is remembered) yet many of them remained all the warre of Iofua, and afterward to the time of Salomon. For God was not pleaſed vterly to roote out theſe Nations, but they were ſometimes made Tributaries to the Iſraelites, and at other times ſerued (in their falling away from the true worſhip of God) to afflict them: for as it is written, Judges the third: They remained to proue Iſrael by them, whether they would obey the Commandements of God.

The ſeuenth ſonne was Araceus or Harki, who betweene the foote of Libanus and the Mediterran Sea, (ouer againſt Tripolis) built the Citie of Archus, Arce, or Arca, afterwards Arachin.

† V.

†. V.
Of Sini and Arada.

Shew the eight ſon, Hieropolymitanus ſets at Caparſa, which Ptolomie findes in Iudaea, nor farre from Iebus; to the South thereof, ſaith Taninus. But it is more probable, that Sineus founded Sin, which S. Hierome calls Sini; Ptolomie, Sinſira: Mela and Plinie, Sinmyrus; Brochard, Syton, (called Synobbe) neere Arca. Peterius thinks that Sineus inhabited the Defarts of Sinai, or thereabout; but heereof there is no other certaintie then the report of Brochard, who took view of all theſe places, affirming, that Sineus built Synobbe, as Zidon built Zidon. There is alſo another Nation of Cini (written with the letter C, otherwiſe Kenez) who deſcended of Hobab the ſon of Raguel the Madianite, who aſſiſted the Iſraelites in their conduction through the Wildernes of Pharan. But theſe Cinei were admitted among the Iſraelites, and had a portion of Land with the Nephthalims, beſide their habitations with the Amalekites: againſt theſe Cinei, Balaam prophecied, that they ſhould be deſtroyed by the Aſſyrians.

The ninth ſonne was Aradeus or Aradeus, who in the Ile of Aradeus built the Citie Arados: oppoſite againſt which Iland on the Maine of Phenicia, they founded another Citie of that name, which for oppoſition was afterwards called Antaradus. To this Citie came S. Peter (ſaith Clement) & in this Ile preached the Goſpell, and founded a Church in honour of our Lady: but wee finde no ſuch worke of his in the Acts of the Apoſtles. Both theſe two were very famous, and places of ſkilfull Sea-men: whom Ezechiel remembreth in his prophecies againſt the Tyrians: The inhabitants of Zidon and Arad were thy Mariners.

†. VI.
Of Zemari.

OF Samareus, or Zemari, the tenth ſonne, there are diuers opinions. Some think that he inhabited in Caleſyria at Edeſſa, and founded Samaraim, which in Iofua is placed in the Tribe of Beniamin. There is alſo Samarajim (of the ſame Orthographie) vpon the Mountaines of Ephraim (ſaith Beroaldus) mentioned in the ſecond of Chronicles c. 13. v. 4. which the Latine conuerteth amiſſe (ſaith he) by Semerom. The Hieropolymitan Paraphraſt makes Samareus (of whom were the Perizzites) the parent of the Emiſſani, which Plinie calls the Hemiſſeni, in Caleſyria; and it may be that it was their firſt habitation, and that they afterwards inhabited thoſe other places before remembered. But that they founded Samarra, both the Hebrew Orthographie, and this place in the firſt of Kings (ſpeaking of Omri) diſproueth: And he bought the Mountayne Samaria or Shemerom of one Shemer, for two talents of ſiluer, and built in the Mountayne: and called the name of the Citie which hee built, after the name of Shemer, Lord of the Mountaine, Samaria. But of all theſe places I ſhall ſpeake more at large in the conqueſt of the holy Land, by the children of Iſrael. Of whomſoeuer the Samaritanes were deſcended, ſure I am, that they were euer a perſidious Nation, and baſe: for as long as the ſtate of the Iewes ſtood vp, they alwaies called themſelues Iewes: when it ſuffered or ſanke, they then vterly denied to be of that Nation or Familie; for at ſuch time as they were returned from their firſt captiuitie, they became a mixt Nation; partly of the Colonies of the Aſſyrians; and partly of the naturalls.

†. VII.
Of Hamathi.

The laſt of Canaans ſonnes was Hamatheus, or (according to the Hebrew) Hamathi, of Hamath: ſaith Beroaldus, of which (the aſpiration taken away) the ſame is pronounced Emath, whereof Hamatheus was preſent. Iosephus and Saint Hierome conſound Emath with Antioch, not that Antioch with ſtandeth on the Riuer Orontes, on the frontier of Comagena: betweene the Mountayne Cafſius and the Province of Pieria, and Silencis, of which Saint Peter was Biſhop, and in which Saint Luke and Ignatius were borne: but Antioch, ſurnamed Epiphania, as Beroaldus ſuppoſeth, which ſtandeth betweene Apamea

Apamea and Emesa in Castoris: Yet, indeed, Emath cannot be taken for either: for both that Antioch vpon Orontes, and that which neighboureth Emesa, are farther off seated than Canaan, than euer any of those Nations straggled. And whereas S. Hierome setteth Emath, which he confoundeth with Epiphania, in the Tribe of Nephthali; it is manifest, that Epiphania, which standeth to the North of Emesa, hath all the Prouince of Laodicea, betwene it and any part of the Land diuided. And if Libanus it selfe were not shared among the Tribes, then could not Epiphania belong vnto them: for both the Prouinces Laodicea and Libanica, are betwene Epiphania and any part of the holy Land: and therefore Emath so taken could not be a part of Nephthali, as in the thirteenth of Iosua is directly proued. For Iosua counting the lands that remained vnpossessed, reckoneth all Mount Libanus towards the Sunne-rising, from Baalgad vnder mount Herman, vntill we come to Hamath. And this reason (among others) is vsed, that Emath was not in Nephtholim, or any way belonging to the children of Israel: because Dauid accepted the presents of Tobhu King of Emath, and (therewithall) conditions of peace: which hee would not haue done, if that Territorie had euer belonged to the children of Israel, but would haue recovered it without composition, and by strong hand, as he did theret. But this Argument (as I take it) hath no great waight. For if the promise which God made, be considered, as it is written in Deuteronomie, then might Emath bee comprehended, though seated altogether without the bounds of the Land promised, according to the description of Moses and Iosua: for Emath is indeede situate on the other side of the Mountaine of Herman, which ioyneth to Libanus: and is otherwise called Iturea. But whereas Hamath is named in Iosua the 19. v. 35. and written in the Latine conuersion Emath, therein (saith Beroaldus) was S. Hierome mistaken. Emath or Iturea is that ouer the Mountaines, and the Citie in Nephtholim should be written Hamath: and so the Septuagint (vnderstanding the difference) write it Ammath and not Emath, the same which indeede belonged to the Nephthalims, seated on the South side of Libanus, to the East of Affedim: which Citie S. Hierome writes Emath; Iosephus, Hamath; others, Emathin, or Amatheos, and the people Cap. 18. v. 19. Amathein; of which (as I take it) Rabsakeb vanteth in the second of Kings: where is the god of Hamath?

†. I.

That most of the sonnes of Chush were seated in Arabia the Happy: and of the Sabaeans that robbed Iob: and of the Queene that came to Salomon.

Seba or Saba was the eldest sonne of Chush, the eldest sonne of Ham, to make a difference betwene Him and his Nephew Sheba, the son of his brother Raama, or Regma (or Ragma after Montanus): his name is written with a single (S) Samech, and Sheba the sonne of Regma with an (S) asperate, which is the Hebrew Schin. Seba the eldest sonne of Chush, Regma his brother, and Sheba the sonne of Regma posselt both the shores of Arabia Felix. Saba tooke that part toward the Red Sea, as nearest his Father Chush, and the Land of the Chusites: Regma and Sheba the East coast of the same Arabia, which looketh into the Gulfe of Persia; of which Plinie: Sabai Arabum populi propter thura clarissimi ad vtrag, maria porrecti gentibus habitant; The Sabaeans people of Arabia, famous for their Frankincense, extending their Nations, dwell along both the Seas, (to witte) the Persian, and the Arabian, or Red Sea. This Countrie was after wards called Arabia, a populi mixtionem, saith Postellus. To this agreeth Ptolomie, who setteth the Citie of Saba towards the Arabian or Red Sea, and the City Rhegama towards the Persian, with whom also we may leaue Sabta: for so much Montanus gathereth out of Ptolomie, because because he remembreth a Nation called Sabai neere the Persian Sea; and Massabatha which descended of them. But Montanus hath sent Regma, or (as he calls him) Rhama into Carmania, for which I see no reason. Iosephus, who onely attended his owne fancies, hath banished Saba or Seba to the border of Ethiopia. But Beroaldus thinkes it strange, that the Sabai, which stole away Iobs Cattle, should runne through all Egypt, and all Arabia Petraea, and finde out Iob in Tracomitis, betwene Palestina and Celestria 1200. miles off. Now, as this coniecture was more then ridiculous, so do I thinke, that neither the Sabai on the Red Sea, nor those toward the Persian Sea, could by any meanes execute the stealth vpon Iob, which soeuer Beroaldus shall take for necest. But these were the Sabai of Arabia the Defart, where Guilandinus Melchior affirmeth out of his owne experience, that the Citie Saba is seated: the same which Ptolomie calls Sane, now Semiscasac: and from this Saba in Arabia the Defart, came those Magi or Wise men which worshipped Christ, saith Melchior, whose words are these: The Magicians neither out of Mesopotamia (as Chrysostome, Hierome, and Ambrose supposed) nor out of Arabia the Happy, as many wise men doe beleene, but out of Saba in Arabia the Defart: which Citie when my selfe was there, was (as I iudged it) called Semiscasac. And to approue this opinion of Guilandinus, it appeareth that these Sabai were neighbours to Iob, and lay fit to inuade and rob him. For both the other Nations (as well those on the Persian Sea, as those on the Red Sea) are so disioyned with large Defarts, as there is no possibilitie for strangers to passe them, especially with any numbers of Cattell, both in respect of the Mountaines, of the sands, and of the extreame want of water in those parts: Vbi nec homines, nec bestie videntur, nec aues, imò nec arbores, nec germen aliquod, sed non nisi montes saxosi, altissimi, asper-rimi; Where there are found neither men, nor beasts, no not so much as birds, or trees, nor any pasture or grasse, but onely (sharp, and high stonie, and craggie mountaines. Beroaldus and Pererius conceiue, that the Queene of Saba which came to visit Salomon, was of the Sabai on the East side of Arabia Felix; but the contrarie seemeth more probable, and that she was Queene of Saba towards the Red Sea: for Salomon at that time commanding all that part of Arabia Petraea, twixt Idumaea and the Red Sea, as farre downe as Midian or Madian, and Ezion Gaber: and this Queene of Saba which inhabited the West part of Arabia Felix, being his neighbour, might without any farre trauaile enter his Territories, free from all danger of surprize by any other Prince or Nation.

But to auoid tediousnesse, it is manifest that Seba or Saba, Sabta, Raama, or Regma, with his Sonnes Sheba and Dedan, and Sabteca, were all the possessors of Arabia the Happy, and the Defart: onely Hauilah and Nimrod dwelt together on the East side Chush, who held Arabia Petraea. Now for Sabta, there is found of his name the Citie of Sabbatha or Sabota in the same Arabia: of which both Plinie and Ptolomie; who withall nameth Sabotale, within the walls whereof there were sometimes found sixtie Temples. Ezekiel ioyneth the Father and the Sonne together, The Merchants of Sheba and Raama were thy Merchants. And that they were the Easterne Arabians their merchandise witnesseth, formerly repeated in the Chapter of Paradise. For Iosephus his fancies, that Saba was the parent of the Ethiopians about Meroe, and Sabta of the Ethiopians Asiabari, they be not wor-thie any farther answer then hath already beene giuen: especially seeing these Citties preferring the memorie of the names of Saba, and of Sabta in Arabia were yet remaining in Ptolomies time, though in some letters changed. As also in the coasts adioyning, the names of other of the brethren of the familie of Chush, with little alterations are preferred. In Arabia the Defart is found the Citie Saba or Sane, (now Semiscasac) with the Citie of Rhegama for Rhegma; and the Nation by Ptolomie himselfe called Raaben of Raamah. In Arabia the happy is found the Citie of Rhegama, and Rabana; which also keepeth the found of Rhegma, the Citie of Saptha or Saprah, not farre from the East-coast of Arabia: as also the Metropolis and chiefe Citie in the body of the South part of Arabia, called without difference or alteration Sabbatha; and to the West of Sabbatha towards the Red Sea the great Citie of Saba; and the Nation adioyning, Sabai: and to the South thereof againe toward the streight entrance of the Red Sea, the Region of Sabe. To all these his Brothers and Nephewes which were seated on the East side of Arabia, Hauilah by the passage of Tigris was a neighbour, to whom hee might passe by Boate euen vnto Rhegma the Citie of Raama, or Rhegma, set neere the Riuer of Lar towards the mouth of the Persian Sea, which stood in Ptolomies time.

t. II.

Josephus his opinion of Dedan, one of the issues of Chus, to have been seated in the west Athiopia, disproved out of Ezech: and Hieremie.

And whereas Iosephus (whom in this S. Hierome followeth, as not curious heerein) sent Dedan the sonne of Raamah into West Aethiopia, it is strange that Ezekiel should couple Sheba, Raamah and Dedan together; Dedan in the 15. Verse, and Sheba, and Raamah in the 22. Verses, to be the Merchants of Tyre, if Dedan had dwelt in West Aethiopia, which is distant from Raamah and Sheba (the habitation of his father and brother) about foure thousand miles. Besides which, the merchandise that the Dedanites brought to Tyre doth not make them naked Blacke-moores. For they of Dedan (saith Ezekiel) were thy Merchants in precious clothes for thy Chariots; and these Westerne Aethiopians neuer saw cloth, till the Portugalls seeking those Coasts, traded with them: the merchandise of the Countrie being Hides, Elephants teeth, some Gold and Amber, Ciuet Cats, and Rice, but nothing at all of any manufacture: and all these they exchanged for linnen, or yron chiefly.

But in those dayes the West part of Africa within the body of the land was knowne onely by imagination : and, being vnder the burnt Zone, was held vninhabitable. And therefore that the Negros of the West Ethiopia, which inhabite about Serra Lioma, or Niger, could either passe by Sea or Land to Tyre, in the bottome of the Mediterran Sea, were a strange, or rather a foolish fancie. Now to put it out of dispute that Dedan also, dwelt by the rest of the children of Chus, which seates they held by that name in the time of Hieremie the Prophet, let vs heare Hieremie his owne words : Fy, yee Inhabitants of Dedan, for I haue brought the destruction of Esaw vpon him. Hereby it appeareth that Dedan was a Neighbour to the Idumeans : and Idumea is a Prouince of Arabia Petrea : and Dedan which dwelt on the North part of Arabia Felix, ioyned in that part to Petrea, the seat of his Grand-father Chus ; which neighbourhood and fellowship of Dedan and the Idumeans, is also confirmed by Ezechiel : I will stretch out my hand vpon Edom, and destroy Man and Beast out of it, and I will make it desolate from Teman : and they of Dedan shall fall by the sword.

Ezech cap. 15:

§. XIII.

Of the issue of Mizraim : and of the place of Hieremie, Chap. 9. Vers. 7.

After Chus it followeth to speake of Mizraim sonnes, whose names (saith S. Augustine) were plurall, to signifie the Nations, which came of them. Ludim, the elder sonne of Mizraim, was the father of the Lybians in Africa: and the rest of his brothers disperfed themselves into all the Regions adioyning. Among the sons of Shem there is also Lud; but hee is differenced from Lud the sonne of Mizraim by the singular number: the sonne of Shem being written Lud, the sonne of Mizraim, Ludim: and yet these Names and Nations are often confounded, notwithstanding the apparent difference both of Names and Nations. For that Ludim the sonne of Mizraim was the parent of the Lybians in Africa, and that he was seated not farre from Mizraim his father, appeareth by the Prophet Hieremie, who ioyneth them in his sort together: Come ye Horses, and rage ye Chariots, and let the valiant men come forth, the Black-moors, and the Lybians which beare the shield: for those Nations assisted the Egyptians being of one parent descended. And in Ezechiel, Phut & Lud are ioyned together. Ethiopia (or Chus) saith Ezechiel, c. 30. v. 3. And Phut and Lud, and all the common people, and the men of the Land that are in league shall fall with them by the sword: which is as much to say, as the sons of Chus, (which were the Chusites) the sonnes of Mizraim, (which were the Egyptians) and the Lybians (descended of his sonne Lud) with other the inhabitants of Egypt and Africa shall fall together. Hierosolymitanus findes also in Africa a Nation of the Lybians. And I beleue it: because Hieremie ioyneth the Lybians, and Lydians together in the place before remembred. But Lybia in Africa is by the Hebrewes called Ludim (saith Arias Montanus) though 2. Chron. 12. 3. they seeme to be called Lubim or Lubai, a name somewhat nearer the word Lybics, and by which it may seeme that the truer writing

The termination im in the Hebrew, is commonly a signe of the plurall number, as aim of the dust.

Сдп. 46.7.2.

writing is, not Libyes, but Lybies. Neither is it heere to be omitted, that Pintus (vpon the thirtieth of Ezechiel) vnderstandeth that which is spoken in the third Verse of Lud, not to be meant of the Lybians at all: for he will haue this threatening to be meant against the people of Lyda, a Citie (saith he) between Egypt and Palestina, which opinion I could not mislike if the Citie of Lyda were so feared. But Lyda (which should be written Lydda with a double D, and is the same Citie which was afterward Dosopolis, in which S. Peter cured Aeneas of the palsey) standeth neere the Torrent Gaas, not farre from toppe the Port of Hierusalem. Yet is it not impossible but that this Citie might haue Lud for the Founder. For there are many Cities of one name founded in all the Regions of the 10 World, and farre asunder; as after the names of Alexander, Seleucus, and Antiochus, manie Cities called Alexandria, Seleucia, and Antiochia, so of diuers others. S. Hierome maketh Lehalum to be the Father of Libya, who was the third sonne of Mixram: and so doth Posseilus; and either opinion may be true.

The rest of Mizraim's sonnes have no proper Countries given them in the Scriptures, saving Cassubim and Caphthorim, of whom came the Philistims, whom the Scriptures call Peleeet.

These Cassubini inhabited Cassotis, a Region lying in the entrance of Aegypt from Palestina, in which the Lake Sirbonis, and the Mountain Cassius are found: not farre from whence Pompey was buried.

20 Caphorim feated neere Caslubim in that Traſt of Egypt called Sethrotis, not farre from relafium. Strabo calls it Sethrotis; Stephanus and Plinie, Sethroit, of the Citie Sethron: which Orelius takes to be the fame which Ptolemie calls Hercules parua. Of the Caslubim and Caphorim came the Philisims, which are called by the Septuagint Allophyls (which is) Alienigena, Strangers, or of a frange kindred. Theſe Philisims inhabited the South part of the holy Land towards Egypt, of whom Paleſtina took name. For the Hebrews (ſaith Iſidore) doe not uſe the letter (P) but in ſtead of it (ph.) Their principall Cities were Gaza, Aſcalon, Azotus, Geth, and Accaron: and the people of them called Gazei, Aſcalonite, Azoti, Gethai, and Accaronite: Iſidore affirms, that Aſcalon was firſt called Philisim: and of that Citie the Countie adioyning. But where Iſidore had it, I know not.

30 The first knowne King of the Philistims was that Abimelech, who had a liking to Abraham wife; with whom Abraham made a couenant and league. This Abimelech dwelt indeed at this time in Gerar; but it is written that hee was also King of the Philistims, in these words: wherefore Isaac went to Abimelech King of the Philistims unto Gerar. Now in regard that this or some ancienter Abimelech gouerned the commonwealth greatly to his glorie, the rest of his successors called themselues by the same name. The Philistims commanded that Trade of land vpon the Mediterran Sea to the Northward, from the Castle of Pilgrims (otherwise Cesarea Palestine, or Siraton Towre) which was the South-border of Phenicia, to Gaza, or to the Riuer of Egypt. The Anakims or strong Gyants were of these Philistims; and Goliath was of Geth one of the five Cities aboue named. They had sometimes five Kings, saith Lyranus. They mastered the Israelites at seuerall times aboue 150. yeeres, and kept them Tributaries, till they were weakened by Sampson and Samuel, but in the end this yoke was taken off by Dauid, and laid on themselues.

It is objected, that because these Cities and the Countries adioyning, were held by the sonnes of Mizzraim, therefore did the Israellites dispossesse the sonnes of Mizzraim; and not of Canaan, by forcing those places.

To this faith Peregris, that although the Palestines or Philistims held it in the time of Iosua, yet at the time of the promise it was possesst by the Canaanites; as in the second of Deuteronomie. The Heutes dwelt in the Villages vnto Gaza. And what maruaile, if (the Canaanites being the greater part) the denomination were from them? For that the Philistims were of Caphor, and so of Mizraim and not of Canaan, besides Moses, the Prophet Hieremie witnesseth: The Lord will destroy the philistims: the remnant of the issue of Caphor: and in like manner in the ninth of Amos, the Philistims are said to be the reliques of Caphorim; Hane not I brought vp Israel out of the land of Egypt, and the Philistims from Caphor and Aram from Kir? so I reade this place with diuers of the learned. For where as the Vulgar hath, & Palestinos de Cappadocia, & Syros de Cyrene, this conuersion Beroaldus condemneth; where Caphor is taken for Cappadocia, and Cyrene for Kir. For Cyrene is a Citie directly West from Egypt, betwene Ptolemais or Barce and Apollonia: but Kir in Asia vnder the Assyrians: Iunius hath it Kir, and not Cyrene: and so hath the Geneua.

But

Of which see in the second Book, Chap. 7
§. 3. †. 5.

Cap. 16. v. 2.

But Pererius calls Caphsorum Cappadocia, according to the Vulgar translation, to which he is bound: and yet it is not altogether improbable if he meane Cappadocia in Palaestina, and not that Cappadocia by the Sea Pontus in the North of Asia the lesse. For whether they inhabited Sethreites, or Cappadocia of Palaestina, it is not certainly knowne: And sure in this manner he may expound Cappadocia to be ambiguous, as well as he doth Cyrene: taking it here not for Cyrene in Africa, but for a place in Media. For it is written in the second of Kings, that Teglasphalasser King of the Assyrians carried away the Inhabitants of Damascus into Kir: and so Iosephus seemes to vnderstand this Kir, for Cyrene in Media, calling this Cyrene, Media superior: for it was the manner and policie of the Assyrians to transplant the people conquered by them, as they did the Samaritans or Israelites, and other Nations. And heereof it came that Kir was called Syro-Media: because the Syrians by the Assyrians were therein captured.

§. XV.
Of the issue of Sem.

†. I.
Of Elim, Assur, Arphaxad, and Lud.

It remaineth lastly to speake of the Sonnes of Sem, who are these:

1. Alam, or Elam,
2. Assur,
3. Arphaxad,
4. Lud, and
5. Aram.

He posteritie of Sem, Moses recounteth after the rest: because from them hee proceedeth in order with the Genealogie and Storie of the Hebrewes: (For of Sem was Abraham descended.)

Of these five sonnes the Scriptures remember the length of the life of Arphaxad only, and only the children of him & Aram, the rest are barely spoken of by rehearfall of their names, sauing that it may be gathered, that Assur (who was supposed to found Niniveh) was also said to be the Father of the Assyrians, whose issues, and the issues of Cham, instantly contended for the Empire of the East: which sometimes the Assyrians, sometimes the Babylonians obtained, according to the vertue of their Princes. This is the common opinion, which also teacheth vs, that all the East parts of the World were peopled by Assur, Elam, and Lud (sauiug India) which I beleuee Noah himselfe first inhabited: and to whom Ophir and Hauilah the sonnes of Isafan afterward repayed. Hij filij Sem ab Euphrate fluuiio partem Asia vsq; ad Oceanum Indicum tennuerunt; These sons of Sem (saith S. Hierome) held all those Regions from Euphrates to the Indian Ocean.

Of Elam came the Elamites, remembered Acts 2. vers. 9. and the Princes of Persia; which name then beganto bee out of vse and lost, when the Persians became Masters of Babylonia: the East Monarchie being established in them. Some prophane Writers distinguish Elam from Persia, and make the Elamites a people apart. But Susa (which the Scriptures call Susan) in Elam was the Kings seat of Persia (witness Daniel: ) And I saw (saith he) in a vision, and when I saw it, I was in the Palace of Susan, which is in the Province of Elam. This Citie is embraced by the River Euleus (according to Ptolomie) in Daniel; so

3. Dan §. 2.

Assur (as most Historians beleue) the second sonne of Sem, was Father of the Assyrians, who disdayning the pride of Nimrod, parted from Babel, and built Niniveh, of equall beautie and magnitude with Babylon, or exceeding it. But we shall in due place disprove that opinion. Every mans hand hath beene in this Storie, and therefore I shall not need herein to speake much: for the Assyrians so often invaded and spoyled the Israelites, destroyed their Cities, and led them Captiues, as both in Diuine and Humane letters there is large and often mention of this Nation.

But howsoeuer Herodotus and D. Siculus extend this Empire, and honor this Nation with

with ample Dominion; yet was not the state of the Assyrians of any such power, after such time as Sardanapalus lost the Empire. For Senacherib who was one of the powerfullest Princes among them, had yet the Mountaine Taurus for the vtmost of his Dominion toward the North-east, and Syria bounded him toward the West, notwithstanding these vaunts of Senacherib in Elay the 37. Haue the gods of the Nations deliuered them whom my Fathers haue destroyed? as Gozan, and Haran, and Reseph, and the children of Eden which were at Telassar. where is the King of Hamath, and the King of Arphad, and the King of the Citie Sepharuaim, Hena and Iuah? All these were indeede but pettie Kings of Cities, and small Countreies, as Haran in Mesopotamia: Reseph in Palmyrena: Hamath or Emath in Ituraa, vnder Libanus: the Ile of Eden: Sepher, and others of this sort. Yea; Nabuchodonosor, who was most powerfull, before the conquest of Egypt had but Chaldea, Mesopotamia, and Syria, with Palaestina and Phoenicia parts thereof. But in this question of Assur, I will speake my opinion freely when I come to Nimrod, whose plantation I haue omitted among the rest of the Chusites, because he established the first Empire: from whom the most memorable storie of the World taketh beginning.

Of Arphaxad came the Chaldaeans, saith Saint Hierome, and Iosephus, but it must bee those Chaldaeans about Vr: for the sonnes of Cham posselt the rest. It is true that he was the Father of the Hebrewes: for Arphaxad begat Shela; and Shela, Heber; of whom hereafter.

And that Lud, the fourth Sonne of Sem, gaue name to the Lydians in Asia the lesse, is the common opinion, taken from Iosephus and S. Hierome; but I see not by what reason he was moued to straggle thither from his friends.

†. II.
Of Aram, and his Sonnes.

Aram the fifth and last Sonne of Sem was the parent of the Syrians: of which Damascus was head. Their name was changed from Aram or Aramites by Syrus (saith Eusebius Ejay 7. v. 2. out of Iosephus) which Syrus liued before Moses was borne; the same which others call the sonne of Apollo. Mesopotamia also being but a Province of Syria, had the name of Aram Nabarajm, which is as much to say, as Syria duorum flumium, Syria compassed with two Riuer: (to wit) Tigris and Euphrates. The Scriptures call it Mesopotamia, Syria, and Padan Aram: and the Greekes Mesopotamia simply.

Arise and get thee to Padan Aram (saith Isaac to Jacob) to the house of Bethuel thy mother's father, and thence take thee a wife. Strabo also remembereth it by the ancient name of Aram or Aramea, as these his owne words conuerted witness: Quos nos Syros vocamus, ipsi Syri Arauenios & Arameos vocant; Those which we call Syrians (saith he) themselves call Aramenians and Arameans.

Against this opinion, that Aram the sonne of Sem was the Father and Denominator of the Syrians in generall; (and not onely of those in Syria Inter-amnis, which is Mesopotamia) some reade, Genes 22. 21. Kemuel, the Father of the Syrians: where other out of the originall read Kemuel, the sonne of Aram. Neither is it any inconuenience for vs to vnderstand the word (Aram) heere, not for the Nation, but for the name of some one of note; the rather, because in the Historie of Abraham and Isaac (which was in time long before Kemuel's Posteritie could be famous) we finde Mesopotamia called Aram; and that with an addition: sometimes with Nabarajm, and sometimes of Padan, to distinguish it from another Aram, which (as it seemes) then also was called Aram. For whereas Iunius thinkes in his note vpon Gen 25. 26. that Padan Aram ought to be restrained to some part of Mesopotamia, (to wit) to that part which Ptolomie calls Ancobaritis (so called from the Riuer Chaboras, which diuiding it runneth into Euphrates) the promiscuous vse of Padan Aram, and Aram Nabarajm (which latter appellation questionlesse comprehends the whole Mesopotamia) may seeme to refute this opinion: especially seeing the signification of this appellation agreeth with the whole Region. For it signifieth as much as the yoke of Syria, which name agrees with this Region: because the two Riuer, (as it were) yoked together goe along it. The Reliques of the name Padan appeare in the name of two Cities in Ptolomie, called Aphadana: (as Iunius hath well noted) the one vpon Chaboras, the other vpon Euphrates.

The Sonnes of Aram were,

{ Vz or Hus,
Hul,
Gether, and
Mefch or Mes.

Vz or Hus inhabited about Damascus, and built that Citie, saith Iosephus and S. Hierome. But Tostatus mistaking this opinion, both in them and in Lzra, who also followeth Iosephus, affirmeth that Abrahams Steward Eliezer was the Founder thereof; though it were likely that Hus the eldest sonne of Aram dwelt neere vnto his father, who inhabited the bodie of Syria. For Hus was a Region of the same, adioyning to Arabia the Desart, and to Batanea or Traconitis: whereof the Prophet Hieremie: Reioyce and be glad O Daughter 10 of Edom that dwellest in the Land of Hus. Hus therefore is seated beyond Jordan, in the East Region of Traconitis, adioyning to Basan, hauing Batanea Gaulonitis, and the Mountaine Seir to the East, Edrai to the South, Damascus North, and Jordan West: hauing in it many Cities and people, as may also be gathered out of Hieremie: And all sorts of people: and all the Kings of the Land of Hus. In this Region dwelt Iob, descended of Hus, the sonne of Nabor, the brother of Abraham (saith S. Hierome) and married Dina the Daughter of Jacob, saith Philo.

Hul the second sonne of Aram, S. Hierome makes the Father of the Armenians: and Gether the third sonne, parent to the Acaranians or Carians: which opinion, (because I finde not where to set him) I do not disproue, though I see no reason why Gether should 20 leaue the fellowship of his owne brethren, and dwell among Strangers in Asia the lesse. Iunius giues Hul (whom he writes Chul) the Desart of Palmyrena, as farre as Euphrates, where Ptolomy setteth the Citie of Cholle.

Gether (saith Iosephus) founded the Bactrians: but Iosephus gaue all Noahs children fathers, to carrie them farre away in all haste. For mine owne opinion I alwaies keepe the rule of Neighbourhood, and thinke with Iunius: (to wit) That Gether seated himselfe neere his brothers, in the bodie of Syria, and in the Prouince of Cassiotis, and Selencis, where Ptolomy placeth Gindarus, and the Nation by Plinie called Gindareni.

Iunius also giueth to Mes or Mefch the North part of Syria, betweene Cilicia and Mesopotamia, neere the Mountaine Mafius. The certaintie of those Plantations can no other- 30 wise be knowne then by this probabilitie, that Aram the father (of whom that great Region tooke name) planted his sonnes in the same Land about him: for hee wanted no scope of Territorie for himselfe and them; neyther then when the World was newlie planted, nor in many hundred yeres after: and therefore there is no reason to cast them in the Desart parts of the World, so farre asunder. And as necessitie and policie held them together for a while: so Ambition (which began together with Angels and Men) inhabiting the hearts of their children, set them asunder. For although these sonnes of Aram, and the sons of the rest of Noahs children, kept themselves within the bounds of some one large Kingdome; yet therein euery one also fought a Prouince apart, and to themselves; giuing to the Cities therein built their owne names, thereby to leaue their 40 memorie to their Posteritie: the vse of Letters being then rare, and knowne to few.

In this sort did the pride of the Spaniards in America cast them into so many Prouinces: euery one emulating and disdainig the greauest of other, as they are thereby to this day subiect to inuasion, expulsion, and destruction: so as (Nona Hispania and Peru excepted, because those Countries are vnaccessible to Strangers) an easie force will cast them out of all the rest.

Chap. 8. §. 7. Mes the fourth sonne is made the parent of the Maonians: of whom something hath bene spoken already. Arphaxad the third sonne of Shem, begat Shelah, and Heber. Heber had two sonnes, Phaleg and Lothan: and in Phalegs time was the Earth diuided.

†. III.

Of the diuision of the Earth in the time of Phaleg, one of the sonnes of Heber, of the issue of Shem.

THE many people which at the diuision (at Phalegs birth) were then liuing, and the through Plantation of all the East part of the World (at his death) hath made a doubt, whether the Earth were diuided at eyther. The Hebrewes (saith Pererius out of Sedar Holam, one of their Chronicles) affirme that this partition happened at the death of Phaleg: and Phaleg was borne in the yeere after the Flood 101. and liued in all 239. yeeres, which numbers added makes 340. And therefore was it so many yeeres after the Flood, ere the children of Noah seuered themselves. But to this opinion of the Hebrewes, and the doubt they make how in so few yeres as 101. (the time of Phalegs birth) so many people could be increased, Pererius giues this answer, that if 70. persons of the Familie of Jacob increased to 600000. fighting men in 215. yeeres, (besides women, children, and impotent persons) how much more is it likely, that so soone after the Flood the children of Noah might in a shorter time bring forth many multitudes, hauing received the blessing of God, increase and multiply, and fill the earth? What strength this answer hath, let others iudge: for the children of Israel were 70. and had 215. yeres time: and the sonnes of Noah were but three, and had but 101. yeres of time, to the birth of Phaleg.

Others conceiue that Phaleg took that name after the diuision, in memorie thereof: as Iosephus and Saint Augustine, who reason in this manner. If the diuision were at Phalegs death (which hapned in the yeere, which is commonly held to be the 48. of Abraham, but was by more likely computation 12. yeeres before his birth) then was the diuision 38. yeres after Ninus, who gouerned 52. yeres: in the 43. yeere of whose reigne Abraham was borne. But when Ninus began to rule the Assyrians, 80. yeres before this 20 diuision (as this diuision is placed by the Hebrewes, Hierome and Chrysostome) then was the earth so peopled in all the East and Northerne parts, as greater numbers haue not bene found at any time since. For Ninus associating to himselfe Arius King of Arabia a people who at that time (saith Diod. Siculus) plurimum opibus atq; armis prestant, exceeded both in riches and bodies of men, subdued many Cities in Armenia; received Barzani into grace; then inuaded Media, and crucified Pharnus the King thereof, with his Wife and seuen Children; vanquished all those Regions betweene Nilus and Tanais, the Egyptians, Phenicians, the Kingdoms of Syria, and all the Nations of Persia, to the Hyrcanian Sea. For the numbers which followed Ninus (already remembered out of Ctesias) against Zoroaster and others: and Zoroaster on the other side, who made resistance with 30 400000. proue it sufficiently, that if the diuision had not happened before the death of Phaleg, there had needed no diuision at that time at all. For some of them were so ill satisfied with their partitions, as they fought to be masters of all, and greater Armies were there neuer gathered then by Ninus and Semiramis: wherefore in this opinion there is little appearance of the truth.

But for that conceit that if the diuision had bene made at the birth of Phaleg, there were not then sufficient numbers borne to fill the earth: It was neuer meant that the earth could be filled euery where at the verie instant, but by times and degrees. And surely whatsoever mens opinions haue bene heerein, yet it is certaine, that the diuision of tongues and of men must goe neere together with the ceasing of the 40 worke at Babel: and that the enterprize of Babel was left off instantly vpon the confusion of Languages, where followed the execution of the diuision; and so neyther at the birth nor death of Phaleg: for Phaleg was borne in the yeere 101. after the Flood, which was the yeere that Nimrod came into Shinaar, or tenn yeeres after hee arrived, saith Berosus.

Now if it be objected that Phaleg (the Etymologie of whose name signifieth diuision) must haue liued without a name, except the name had bene giuen him at the time of this confusion and partition: to this objection it may be answered, That the change of names vpon diuers accidents is not rare in the Scriptures: for Jacob was called Israel after he had wrestled with the Angell; Abraham was first Abram; and Edom Esaus; and that 50 Phaleg being a principall man in this diuision had his first name vpon this accident changed, it is most probable.

And lastly, whereas the Hebrewes, Saint Hierome and Chrysostome account Heber for a great Prophet, if that by giuing his sonne the name of Phaleg, hee fore-told the diuision which followed: to this I say, I doe not finde that Heber deserved any such honour, if hee had: thereupon so called his sonne: for diuision and dispersion followeth increase of people of necessitie; and this Prophecie (if any such had bene) might also haue reference to the diuision, which afterwards fell amongst the Hebrewes themselves.

But if we giue a reasonable time to the building of the Towre and Citie of Babel, in which time many people (by reason and by demonstratiue prooffe) might be increased: and that vpon the fall thereof the confusion and diuision followed (whereupon Phelag tooke name) then in this opinion there is nothing either curious or monstrous.

†. IIII.

Of the sonnes of Ioctan, the other sonne of Heber.

The sonnes of Ioctan were

1. Elmodad.
2. Saleph, or Salep, or Sheleph.
3. Asamath, or Chatzar.
4. Iare, or Jaraah, or Ierath.
5. Hadoram.
6. Vzal, or Vzal.
7. Dicklach, or Diela.
8. Obal, or Ebal, or Hobal.
9. Abimacl.
10. Sheba or Seba.
11. Ophir, or Opir.
12. Hauilah, or Chanila, and
13. Iobab.

All those sonnes of Ioctan (according to Saint Hierome) dwelled in the East parts of the world, or India, euen from the Riuer Cophe or Choas, which is one of the branches or heads of Indus.

But the certaine places of those thirteen Sonnes cannot be gathered out of the Scriptures, the words of Moses being generall: And their dwelling was from Mesha as thou goest vnto Separ a Mount in the East. Of all these thirteene Sonnes, there were only three memorable, (to wit) Sheba, Ophir, and Hauilah. Concerning whose names, to auoid confusion, it is to be obserued, that among the sonnes of Chus, two of them had also the names of Sheba and Hauilah. Abraham had also a third Saba or Sheba, his grand-child by his wife Kesura. But Seba the sonne of Chus, and Sheba the sonne of Rhegma his Nephew, we haue left in Arabia Felix: and Hauilah the son of Chus vpon Tigris. Saba the grand-child of Abraham was (as some haue thought) the Father of the Sabaans in Persia: of which Nations Dionysius de Orbis situ, maketh mention. Primum Sabæi; post hos sunt Passagarde; prope verò hos sunt Tasci. The first are Sabaans: after these be Passagarde; and neere these the Tasci. And whereas it is written: But vnto the Sonnes of the Concubines which Abraham had, Abraham gaue gifts, and sent them away from Isaac his sonne (while he yet liued) Eastward to the East-Countrey: heereupon it is supposed, that this Saba the sonne of Abraham wandered into Persia: for Persia was accounted the farthestmost East-Countrey in respect of Iudea; which also Ouid setteth vnder the Sun rising. Yet seeing the rest of Abrahams sonnes seated themselves on the borders of Iudea, I rather chooseto leaue Saba the sonne of Abraham in Arabia the Desert, where Ptolomie setteth a Citie of that name.

But Saba the sonne of Ioctan, the son of Heber, (as I conceiue) inhabited India it selfe. For Dionysius After in his Periegesis, (or description of the World) which hee wrote in Greeke Verse, among the Regions of India findeth a Nation called the Sabæi. Taxilis hos inter medios habitas, Sabæus: In the middest of these dwell the Sabæi, and the Taxili, sayth this Dionysius.

†. V.

Of Ophir one of Ioctans sonnes, and of that voyage of Salomon.

Ophir also was an Inhabitant of the East India, and (as Saint Hierome vnderstands it) in one of the Ilands plentifull with gold, which are now knowne by the name of Molucca. Iosephus vnderstands Ophir to be one of those great head-lands in India, which by a generall name are called Chersonesi, or Peninsula: of which there are two very notorious; Calicut, and Malacom. Pererius takes it rightly for an Iland, as Saint Hierome doth, but but he sets it at the head-land of Malacca. But Ophir is found among the Moluccas farther East.

Arius Montanus out of the second of Chronicles, the third Chapter and sixth Verse, gathers that Ophir was Peru in America, looking into the West Ocean, commonly called Mare del Sur, or the South Sea; by others Mare pacificum. The words in the second of the Chronicles at these: And hee overlaid the house with precious stones for beautie; and the gold was gold of Parauaim. Iunius takes this gold to bee the gold of Hauilah, remembered by Moses in the description of Paradise: And the gold of that Land is good: finding a Towne in Characene a Prouince of Sufiana called Barbatia; so called (as he thinks) by corruption for Parauaim: from whence those Kings subiects by Dauid, brought this gold, with which they presented him; and which Dauid preferred for the enriching of the Temple.

But this fancie of Peru hath deceiued many men, before Montanus, and Plessis, who also tooke Ophir for Peru. And that this question may be a subiect of no further dispute; it is very true that there is no Region in the World of that name: sure I am that at least America hath none, no nor any Citie, Village, or Mountaine so called. But when Francis Pizarro first discouered those Lands to the South of Panama, arriuing in that Region which Atabaliba commanded (a Prince of magnificence, Riches and Dominion inferiour to none) some of the Spaniards vtterly ignorant of that language, demanding by signes (as they could) the name of the Countrey, and pointing with their hand arthwart a Riuer, or Torrent, or Brooke that ranne by, the Indians answered Peru, which was either the name of that Brooke, or of water in generall. The Spaniards thereupon conceiuing that the people had rightly vnderstood them, set it downe in the Diurnall of their enterprife; and so in the first description made, and sent ouer to Charles the Emperor, all that West part of America to the South of Panama had the name of Peru, which hath continued euer since as diuers Spaniards in the Indies assured me; which also Acosia the Iesuite in his naturall and morall Historie of the Indies confirmeth. And whereas Montanus also findeth, that a part of the Indies (called Iucatan) tooke that name of Ioctan, who as hee supposeth navigated from the vtmost East of India to America: it is most true, that Iucatan is nothing else in the language of that Countrey, but [what is that] or [What say you?]. For when the Spaniards ask'd the name of that place (no man conceiuing their meaning) one of the Saluages answered Iucatan (which is) what aske you, or What say you? The like hapned touching Paria, a mountaynous Countrey on the South side of Trinidad & Margarita: for when the Spaniards inquiring (as all men doe) the names of those new Regions which they discouered, pointed to the Hills a farr off, one of the people answered, Paria, which is as much to say, as high Hills or Mountaynes. For at Paria begins that maruailous ledge of Mountaines, which from thence are continued to the Straie of Magellan: from eight degrees of North latitude to the 52. of South, and so hath that Countrey euer since retained the name of Paria.

The same hapned among the English, which I sent vnder Sir Richard Greeneuile to inhabit Virginia. For when some of my people asked the name of that Countrey, one of the Saluages answered, Wingandacon, which is as much to say, as, You wear good clothes, or gay clothes. The same hapned to the Spaniards in asking the name of the Iland Trinidad: for a Spaniard demanding the name of that selfe place which the Sea incompassed, they answered, Caeri, which signifieth an Iland. And in this manner haue many places newlie discouered bene intituled, of which Peru is one. And therefore wee must leaue Ophir among the Moluccas, whereabout such an Iland is credibly affirmed to be.

Now although there may be found gold in Arabia it selfe (towards Persia) in Haudab, now Sufiana, and all alongst that East Indian shore, yet the greatest plentie is taken vp at the Philippines, certayne Ilands planted by the Spaniards: from the East India. And by the length of the passage which Salomons ships made from the Red Sea (which was three yeeres in going and comming) it seemeth they went to the vtmost East, as the Moluccas or Philippines. Indeede these that now goe from Portugal, or from hence, finish that nauigation in two yeeres, and sometimes lesse: and Salomons ships went not about a tenth part of this our course from hence. But wee must consider, that they euermore kept the coast, and crept by the shores, which made the way exceeding long. For before the vse of the Compass was knowne, it was impossible to navigate arthwart the Ocean; and therefore Salomons ships could not finde Peru in America. Neither was it needfull for the Spaniards themselves (had it not beene for the plentie of gold in the East India Ilands, farre about the mines of any one place of America) to saile euery yeere from the West part of America thither, and there to haue strongly planted, and inhabited the richest of those Ilands: wherein they haue built a Citie called Manilia. Salomon therefore needed not to haue gone farther off then Ophir in the East, to haue sped worse: neither could he nauigate from the East to the West in those dayes, whereas hee had no coast to haue guided him.

Tostatus also gathereth a fantastickall opinion out of Rabanus, who makes Ophir to be a Countrey, whole Mountaines of gold are kept by Griffins: which Mountaynes Solinus affirmeth to bee in Scythia Asiatica, in these wordes: Nam cum auro & gemmis affluunt; Griphes tenent uniuersa, alites ferocissima, Arimaspi cum his dimicant, &c. For whereas these Countries abound in gold, and rich stone, the Griffins defend the one and the other: a kinde of Fowle the fiercest of all other, with which Griffins a Nation of people called Arimaspi make warre. These Arimaspi are said to haue beene men with one eye onely, like vnto the Cyclopes of Sicilia: of which Cyclopes, Herodotus and Aristeus make mention: and so doth Lucan in his third Booke: and Valerius Flaccus: & D. Siculus in the story of Alexander Macedon. But (for mine owne opinion) I beleue none of them. And for these Arimaspi, I take it that this name signifying One-eyed, was first giuen them by reason that they vsed to weare a vizzard of defence, with one sight in the middle to serue both eyes; and not that they had by nature any such defect. But Solinus borroweth these things out of Plinie, who speaks of such a Nation in the extreame North, at a place called Gislotron, or the Caue of the Northeast winde. For the rest, as all fables were commonly grounded vpon some true stories or other things done: so might these tales of the Griffins receiue this Morall: That if those men which fight against so many dangerous passages for gold, or other riches of this World, had their perfect senses, and were not deprived of halfe their eye-sight (at least of the eye of right reason and vnderstanding) they would content themselves with a quiet and moderate estate; and not subiect themselves to famine, corrupt aire, violent heate, and cold, and to all sorts of miserable diseases. And though this fable be fained in this place, yet if such a tale were told of some other places of the World, where wilde Beasts or Serpents defend Mountaines of gold, it might be auowed. For there are in many places of the world, especially in America, many high and impassable Mountains which are very rich & full of gold; inhabited onely with Tygres, Lyons, and other rauenous and cruell beasts: vnto which if any man ascend (except his strength bee very great) he shall be sure to finde the same warre, which the Arimaspi make against the Griffins: not that the one or other had any sense of the gold, or seeked to defend that metall, but being disquieted, or made afraid of themselves or their yong-ones, they grow intraged and aduenturous. In like sort it may be said that the Alegartos, (which the Egyptians call the Crocodyles) defend those Pearles which lye in the Lakes of the Inland: for many times the poore Indians are eaten vp by them, when they diue for the pearle. And though the Alegartos know not the pearle, yet they finde fauour in the fish and bloud of the Indians, whom they deuoure.

¶ VI.

Of Hanilah the sonne of Ioctan, who also passed into the East Indies: and of Mesha and Sephar named in the bordering of the Families of Ioctan: with a Conclusion of this discourse touching the plantation of the world.

OF Hanilah the sonne of Ioctan, there is nothing else to be said, but that the generall opinion is, that he also inhabited in the East India in the Continent, from which Ophir passeth into the Ilands adioyning. And whereas Ganges is said to water Hanilah, it is meant by Hanilah in the East India, which tooke name of Hanilah the sonne of Ioctan: but Hanilah, which Rishon compasseth, was so called of Hanilah, the sonne of Chus, as is formerly proved by this place of Scripture: Saul smote the Amalekites from Hanilah, as thou commest to Shur, which is before Egypt. But that Saul euer made Warre in the East India, no man hath suspected. For an end we may conclude, that of the thirteene sonnes of Ioctan, these three, Saba, Hanilah, & Ophir; though at the first seated by their brethren about the hill Mafius or Mesha, Gen. 10. 30. (to wit) betweene Cilicia and Mesopotamia; yet at length either themselves or their issues remooued into the East India, leauing the other

other Families of Ioctan, to fill the Countries of their first plantation, which the Scripture defines to haue beene from Mesha vnto Sephar. And although S. Hierome take Mesha to be a Region of the East India, and Sephar a Mountaine of the same (which Mountaine, Montanus would haue to be the Andes in America) those fancies are farre beyond my vnderstanding. For the word (East) in the Scriptures, where it hath reference to Iudea, is neuer farther extended then into Persia. But Mesha is that part of the Mountaine of Mafius in the North of Mesopotamia, out of which the Riuer Chaboras springeth which runneth by Charra: and in the same Region we also finde for Sephar (remembered by Moses, Sipphara by Ptolomie, standing to the East of the Mountaine Mafius; from whence Ioctan hauing many sonnes, some of them might passe into India, hearing of the beautie and riches thereof. But this was in proceesse of time.

The other fashion of planting I vnderstand not, being grounded but vpon mens imaginations, contrary to reason and possibilitie. And that this Mountaine in the East was no farther off then in those Regions before remembered, it appeareth by many places of the Scripture where the same phrase is vsed: as in Numbers 22. Balaac the King of Moab hath brought me from Aram, out of the Mountaine of the East; which was from the East part of Mesopotamia. For Balaac brought Balaam out of Mesopotamia, (witnesseth this place of Deuteronomie: ) Because they hyred Balaam the sonne of Beor, of Pethor in Aram Nabarajim, to curse thee: for Aram Nabarajim was Syria fluuiorum, which is Mesopotamia, as aforesaid.

This plantation of the World after the flood doth best agree (as to me it seemes) with all the places of Scripture compared together. And these be the reports of Reason and probable coniecture; the Guides which I haue followed herein and which I haue chosen to goe after, making no valuation of the opinions of men, conducted by their owne fancies, be they ancient or moderne. Neither haue I any end herein, priuate, or publike, other then the discouery of truth. For as the partialitie of man to himselfe hath disguised all things: so the fastious and hireling Historians of all Ages (especially of these latter times) haue by their many Volumes of vntrue reports left Honor without a Monument, and Vertue without Memorie: and (in stead thereof) haue erected Statues and Trophies to those, whom the darrest forgetfulness ought to haue buried; and covered ouer for euermore. And although the length and dissoluing Nature of Time, hath worne out or changed the Names and memory of the Worlds first planters after the flood (I meane the greatest number and most part of them) yet all the foot steps of Antiquitie (as appears by that which hath beene spoken) are not quite worne out nor ouer-grown: for Babylon hath to this day the sound of Babel; Phœnicia hath Zidon, to which Citie the eldest Sonne of Canaan gaue name; so hath Cilicia Tharsis; and the Armenians, Medes, Hiberians, Cappadocians, Phrygians, the Syrians, Idumeans, Libyans, Moors, and other Nations, haue preferred from the death of forgetfulness some signes of their first Foanders and true Parents.

CHAP. IX.

Of the beginning and establishing of Government.

§. I.

Of the proceeding from the first Government vnder the eldest of Families to Regall, and from regall absolute, to Regall tempered with Lawes.

I followeth now to entreate how the World began to receiue Rule and Government, which (while it had scarcitie of People) vnderwent no other Dominion then Paternitie and Eldership. For the Fathers of Nations were then as Kings; and the eldest of Families as Princes. Hereof it came, that the word (Elder) was alwayes vsed both for the Magistrate, and for those of Age and Grauitie: the same bearing one signification almost in all languages. For in the eleuenth of Numbers God commanded Moses to gather together 70. of the Elders of the people, and Gouvernour ouer them : the Hebrew bearing the same sense, which the Latine word Senes or Seniores doth. So it is written in Susanna, Then the Assembly beleued them as those that were the Elders and Iudges of the People. And so in the words of those false Iudges and witnesses to Daniel, Shew it vnto vs, seeing God hath giuen thee the office of an Elder. Demo- sthenes vseth the same word for the Magistrate among the Gracians. Cicero in Cato giueth two other reasons for this appellation : Apud Lacedamonios qui amplissimum Magistratum gerunt, et sunt, sic etiam appellantur Senes ; Among the Lacedamonians the chiefe Magistrates, as they were, so are they called Eldermen : and againe, Ratio & prudentia nisi essent in senibus, non summum Concilium Maiores nostri appellassent Senatum ; If reason and aduise- ment were not in old men, our Ancesters had neuer called the highest Councell by the name of a Senate.

Gouer-

But though these reasons may well be giuen, yet wee doubt not but in this name of (Elders) for Gouernors or Counsaillers of State, there is a signe that the first Gouernors were the Fathers of Families; and vnder them the eldest Sonnes. And from thence did the French, Italian, and Spaniard take the word (Signor) and out of it (Seignourie) for Lordship and Dominion : signifying (according to Loyseau) puissance in proprietic, or proper power. The kinds of this Seignourie, Seneca makes two : the one, Potestas aut imperium ; Power or command : the other, Proprietas aut dominium ; Proprietie or Mastership : the correlative of the one is the subiect, of the other the slaue. Ad Casarem (saith he) potestas omnium pertinet, ad singulos proprietas ; Cesar hath power ouer all ; and euery man proprietic in his owne : and againe, Cesar omnia imperio possidet, singuli dominio ; Cesar holdeth all in his power, and euery man possesseth his owne. But as men and vice began abundantly to increase : so obedience, (the fruit of naturall reuerence, which but from excellent seede seldome ripeneth) being exceedingly ouer-shadowed with pride, and ill examples, utterly withered and fell away. And the soft weapons of paternall perswasions (after mankind began to neglect and forget the originall and first giuer of life) became in all ouer-weake, either to resist the first inclination of euill, or after (when it became habitual) to constraîne it. So that now, when the hearts of men were onely guided and steered by their owne fancies, and tost to and fro on the tempestuous Seas of the world, while wisdom was seuered from power, and strength from charitie : Necessitie (which bindeth euery nature but the immortal) made both the Wise & Foolish vnderstand at once, that the estate of reasonable men would become far more miserable then that of beasts, and that a generall flood of confusion would a second time ouer-flow them, did they not by a generall obedience to order and dominion preuent it. For the mightie, who trusted in their owne strengths, found others againe (by interchange of times) more mighty then themselves : the feeble fell vnder the forcible ; and the equall from equall receiued equall harmes. In so much that licentious disorder (which seemed to promise a libertie vpon the first acquaintance) proued vpon a better tryall, no lesse perilous then an vnindurable bondage.

These Arguments by Necessitie propounded, and by Reason maintained and confirmed, perswaded all Nations which the Heauens couer, to subiect themselves to a Master, and to Magistracie in some degree. Vnder which Gouernment, as the change (which brought with it lesse euill, then the former mischiefes) was generally pleasing : so time (making all men wise that obserue it) found some imperfection and corrosiue in this cure. And therefore the same Necessitie which inuented, and the same Reason which approed soueraigne power, bethought it selfe of certaine equall rules, in which Dominion (in the beginning boundlesse) might also discerne her owne limits. For before the inuention of Lawes, priuate affections in supreme Rulers made their owne fancies both their Treasurers and Hangmen : measuring by this yard, and waighing in this ballance both good and euill.

For as wisdom in Eldership preceded the rule of Kings ; so the will of Kings forewent the inuentions of Lawes. Populus nullis legibus tenebatur : arbitria principum pro legibus erant ; The people were not gouerned by any other lawes then the wils of Princes : Hereof it followed, that when Kings left to be good, neither did those mens vertues value them which were not fancied by their Kings, nor those mens vices deforme them that were. Amor interdum nimis videt ; interdum nihil videt ; Love sees one while too much, another while farke nothing. Hence it came to passe, that after a few yeeres (for direction and restraint of Royall power) Lawes were established : and that gouernment which had this mixture of equalitie (holding in an even ballance supreme power and common right) acquired the title of Regall: the other (which had it not) was knowne for Tyrannicall: the one God established in favour of his people: the other he permitted for their affliction.

In the infancie of this Regall authoritie, Princes as they were chosen for their vertues onely, so did they measure their powers by a great deale of moderation. And therefore (saith Fabius Piccor) Principes, quia iustierant, & religionibus dediti, iure habiti Dij & dicti; De aureo seculo part. 1. Princes because they were iust and religious, were rightly accounted and called gods.

And though (speaking humanely) the beginning of Empire may be ascribed to Reason and Necessitie; yet it was God himselfe that first kindled this light in the mindes of men, whereby they saw that they could not live and be preserved without a Ruler and Conducter: God himselfe by his eternall providence hauing ordained Kings; and the law of Nature Leaders, and Rulers ouer others. For the very Bees haue their Prince, the Deere their Leaders; and Cranes (by order imposed) watch for their owne safetie. The most High beareth rule ouer the Kingdomes of Men; and appointeth ouer it whomsoever hee Deut. 32. 1. pleaseth. By me (saith Wisedome, spoken by the Sonne of God) Kings reigne, By me Princes Prov. 8. 15. rule, and it is God (saith Daniel) that setteth up Kings, and taketh away Kings: and that this Dan. 2. 21. power is giuen from God, Christ himselfe witnesseth, speaking to Pilate; Thou couldest haue Iohn 19. 11. no power at all against me except it were giuen thee from above.

It was therefore by a threefold Iustice that the world hath bene gouerned from the beginning, (to wit) by a Iustice naturall: by which the Parents and Elders of Families gouerned their Children, and Nephewes, and Families, in which gouernment the Obedience was called naturall Pietie: Againe, by a Iustice diuine, drawne from the Lawes and Ordinances of God: and the Obedience hereunto was called Conscience: And lastly, by a Iustice ciuill, begotten by both the former: and the Obedience to this we call Dutie. That by these three those of the eldest times were commanded: and that the rule in generall was Paternall, it is most euident: for Adam being Lord ouer his owne Children, instructed them in the seruice of God his Creator; as we read, Cain and Abel brought Oblations before God, as they had bene taught by their Parent, the Father of mankind.

§. II.

Of the three commendable sorts of Government with their opposites: and of the degrees of humane Societie.

What other Policie was exercised, or State founded after such time as mankind was greatly multiplied before the flood, it cannot be certainly knowne, though it seeme by probable coniecture, that the same was not without Kings in that first age: it being possible that many Princes of the Egyptians (remembred among their antiquities) were before the generall flood: and very likely, that the cruell Oppressions in that Age proceeded from some tyrannic in Government, or from some rougher forme of Rule, then the Paternall.

Berosus ascribeth the rule of the World in those dayes to the Gyants of Libanus, who maltred (saith he) all Nations from the Sun-rising to the Sun-set. But in the second Age of the World, and after such time as the rule of Eldership failed, three severall sorts of Government were in severall times established among men, according to the diuers natures of Places and People.

The first, the most ancient, most generall, and most approued, was the Government of one, ruling by iust Lawes, called Monarchie: to which Tyrannie is opposed, being also a sole and absolute Rule, exercised according to the will of the Commander, without respect or obseruation of the Lawes of God, or Men. For a lawfull Prince or Magistrate (saith Aristotle) is the Keeper of Right and Equitie: and of this condition ought euery Magistrate to be, according to the rule of Gods word: Judges and Officers shalt thou make thee Deut. 16. 18. in thy Cities: And these shall iudge the people with righteous iudgement.

The second Government is of diuers principall Persons established by order, and ruling by Lawes, called Aristocracie, or Optimum potestas, to which Oligarchia (or the particular faction and vsurpation of a few great ones) is opposed: as the Decemviri, or Triumviri, and the like.

The third is a State popular, (or Government of the people) called Democratia, to which is opposed Ochlocratia, or the turbulent vniust ruling of the confused multitude, seditionously swaying the State: contrary to their owne Lawes and Ordinances. These three kinds of Government are briefly exprest by Tholosanus; vnus, paucorum, & multorum, Of one, of few, of many.

Now as touching the beginning and order of policie since the second increase of Man kinde, the same grew in this sort: First of all, euery Father, or eldest of the Family, gaue Lawes to his owne issues, and to the people from him and them increased. These as they were multiplied into many Houholds (man by nature louing societie) ioyned their Cortages together in one common Field or Village, which the Latins call Vicus, of the Greeke vicus, which signifieth a House, or of the word (Via) because it hath diuers waies and paths leading to it. And as the first House grew into a Village, so the Village into that which is called Pagus, (being a societie of diuers Villages) so called of the Greeke pagos, which signifieth a Fountaine: because many people (hauing their habitations not far asunder) dranke of one Spring or Streame of water. To this word the English Hundreds, or (as some think) Shires answereth not vnfitly.

But as men and impietie began to gather strength, and as emulation and pride between the Raccs of the one and the other daily increased: so both to defend themselves from outrage, and to prserue such goods as they had gathered, they began to ioyne and set together diuers of their Villages, inuironing them first with bankes and ditches, and afterwards with wals: which being so compassed were then called Oppida; either ab opponendo se hostibus, Because wals were opposed against Enemies, or ab opibus, because thither they gathered their riches for saste and defence: as also they were called Vrbes, ab orbe, because when they were to build a Citie, they made a Circle with a Plough (saith Varro) therewith measuring and compassing the ground which they went to inclose or fortifie. And although Vrbs and Ciuitas be often confounded, yet the difference was anciently in this, that Vrbs signified no other then the very wals and buildings, and Ciuitas was taken for the Citizens inhabiting therein: so called of Civis, and that, ab eo quod multitudo coitit, of comming together. But all inhabitants within these wals are not properly Citizens, but onely such as are called Free-men: who bearing proportionably the charge of the Citie, may by turnes become Officers and Magistrats thereof: the rest goe vnder the name of Subiects, though Citizens by the same generall name of Subiects are also knowne. For euery Citizen is also a Subiect, but not euery Subiect a Citizen: perhaps also some Citizen (as the chiefe Magistrate, if he be to be termed one of the Citizens) is no subiect, but of this we neede not stand to inquire. The word (Magistrate) is taken a Magistro, from a Master, and the word (Master) from the Aduerbe Magis (as also Magisteria, Precepts of Art) or else from the Greeke word (Magistos) and so the Greekes call them Magistans, whom the Latines call Magnates, or Magistratus.

The office and dutie of euery Magistrate Aristotle hath written in few words. A Magistrate or Prince (saith he) is the keeper of right and equitie; but the same is best taught by Saint Paul, who expresth both the cause efficient, and finally (that is) by whom Magistrats and Princes are ordained, together with their duties and offices. A Magistrate is the Minister of God for thy wealth; but if thou doe euill, feare: for he beareth not the sword for nought. For he is the Minister of God, to take vengeance on him that doth euill. Hee also teacheth in the same place; That euery soule ought to be subiect to the higher powers, because they are by God ordained; and that whosoeuer resisteth that power, resisteth God, the giuer and fountaine thereof: and shall not onely be therefore subiect to the iudgement and condemnation of Man, but of God: For ye must be subiect (saith he) not because of wrath onely, but also for conscience sake.

The examples are not to be numbred of Gods punishments vpon those that haue resisted Authoritie, by God ordained and established. Neither ought any subiect therefore to resist the power of Kings, because they may be taxed with iniustice or crueltie: for it pleaseth God sometimes to punish his people by a tyrannous hand: and the Commandment of obedience is without distinction. The Prophets and Christ himselfe subiected themselves to the power of Magistracie. Christ commanded that all due to Caesar should be giuen vnto him: and he payed Tribute for himselfe and Peter. Hieremie commanded the Fidelines (euery those that were Captiues vnder Heathen Kings) to pray for them, and for the peace of Babylon. So Abraham prayed for Abimelech; and Iacob blessed the King of of Egypt: And it is acceptable in the sight of our Saviour (saith Paul) that ye make Supplications and Prayers for Kings, and for all that are in authoritie: and if for such Kings as were Idolatrous, much more for Christian Kings and Magistrats. And so much did Saint Chrysostome in his Homily to the people preferre Monarchicall Government, as he rather commended the rule of Kings (though Tyrants) then that they should be wanting: Prestat Regem tyrannum habere, quam nullum; Better a tyrannous King, then no King: to which also Tacitus subcribeth: Prestat (saith Tacitus in the first of his Historie) sub malo principe esse quam nullo; It is better to haue a bad Prince then none at all. And be they good Kings (which is generally presupposed) then is there no libertie more safe, then to serue them: Neg. enim libertas tutior vlla est (saith Claudian) quam Domino seruire bono: No libertie (saith he) more safe for vs then to be seruants to the vertuous. And certainly howsoeuer it may be disputed, yet is it safer to liue vnder one Tyrant, then vnder 100000. Tyrants: vnder a wise man that is cruell, then vnder the foolish and barbarous crueltie of the multitude. For as Agefilas answered a Citizen of Sparta that desired an alteration of the Government, That kinde of rule which a man would disdain in his owne house, were very vnfit to gouerne great Regions by.

Lastly, as many Fathers erected many Cottages for their many children: and as (for the reason before remembred) many Houholds ioyned themselves together, and made Villages; many Villages made Cities: so when these Cities and Citizens ioyned together, and established Lawes by consent, associating themselves vnder one Gouernour, and Government, they so ioyned, were called a Commonwealth: the same being sometimes gouerned by Kings; sometimes by Magistrats; sometimes by the people themselves.

§. III.

Of the good Government of the first Kings.

Now this first Age after the Floud, and after such time as the people were increased, and the Families became strong and dispersed into seuerall parts of the World, was by ancient Historians called Golden: Ambition and Couetousnesse being as then but greene, and newly growne vp, the seeds and effects whereof were as yet but potentiall, and in the blowth and bud. For while the Law of Nature was the rule of mans life, they then sought for no larger Territorie then themselves could compassse and manure: they erected no other magnificent buildings, then sufficient to defend them from cold and tempest: they cared for no other delicacie of fare, or curiositie of dyet, then to maintaine life: nor for any other apparell then to couer them from the cold, the Raine and the Sunne.

And sure if we vnderstand by that Age (which was called Golden) the ancient simplicity of our Fore-fathers, this name may then truly be cast vpon those elder times: but if it be taken otherwise, then, whether the same may be attributed more to any one time then to another, (I meane to one limited time and none else) it may be doubted. For good and Golden Kings make good and Golden Ages: and all times haue brought forth of both sorts. And as the infancy of Empirie, (when Princes plaied their Prizes, and did then onely woo men to obedience) might be called the Golden Age: so may the beginning of all Princes times be truly called Golden. For be it that men affect honour, it is then best purchased; or if honour affect men, it is then that good deferuings haue commonly the least impediments: and if euer Liberality ouerflow her banks & bounds, the same is then best warranted both by policie and example. But Age and Time doe not onely harden and shrinke the openest and most Ioniall hearts, but the experience which it bringeth with it, layeth Princes torne estates before their eyes, and (withally) perswadeth them to compassionate themselves. And although there be no Kings vnder the Sunne whose meanes are answerable vnto other mens desires; yet such as value all things by their owne respects, doe no sooner finde their appetites vnanswered, but they complaine of alteration, and account the times iniurious and yron. And as this falleth out in the Reigne of euery King, so doth it in the life of euery man, if his dayes be many: for our younger yeeres are our Golden Age; which being eaten vp by time, wee praise those seasons which our youth accompanied: and (indeede) the grievous alterations in our selues, and the paines and diseases which neuer part from vs but at the graue, make make the times seeme so differing and displeasing : especially the qualitie of mans nature being also such, as it adoreth and extollet the passages of the former, and condemneeth the present state how iust fouer : Fit humana malignitas vitio, ut semper veteris laude, presentia in fastidio sint ; It comes to passe (saith Tacitus) by the vice of our malignitie, that we alwayes extoll the time past, and hold the present fastidious : For it is one of the errors of wayward Age : Quod sint laudatores temporis acti ; That they are praisers of fore-past times, forgetting this aduice of Salomon : Say not then, Why is it that the former dayes were better then these : for thou doest not inquire wisely of this thing : to which purpose Seneca ; Maiores nostri quæsti sunt, & nos querimur, posterique uentur, euerfos esse mores, regnare nequitiam, in deterius res hominum & in omne nefas labi : Our Ancesters haue complained, we doe complaine, our children will complaine, that good manners are gone, that wickednesse doth reigne, and all things grow worse and worse, and fall into all euill. These are the vsuall discourses of Age and misfortune. But hereof what can we adde to this of Arnobius ? Nona res quandoq; vetus fiet, & vetus temporibus, quibus capit nona fuit & repentina : what fouer is new, in time shall be made old : and the ancientest things when they tooke beginning were also new and sodaine. Wherefore not to stand in much admiration of these first times, which the discontentments of present times haue made Golden, this we may ser downe for certain, That as it was the vertue of the first Kings, which (after God) gaue them Crowns : so the loue of their people thereby purchased, held the same Crownes on their heads. And as God gaue the obedience of Subjects to Princes : so (relatiuely) he gaue the care, and iustice of Kings to the Subjects ; hauing respect, not only to the Kings themselves, but euen to the meanest of his Creatures : Nunquam particulari bono seruit omne bonum ; The infinite goodnesse of God doth not attend any one onely : for he that made the small and great, careth for all alike : and it is the care which Kings haue of all theirs, which makes them beloued of all theirs, and by a generall loue it is, that Princes hold a generall obedience : For Potestas humana radicatur in voluntatibus hominum : All humane power is rooted in the will or dispositions of men.

§. IIII.

Of the beginning of Nobilitie : and of the vaine vaunt thereof without vertue.

And with this Supreme Rule and Kingly authoritie began also other degrees and differences among Subjects. For Princes made election of others by the same Rule, by which themselves were chosen ; vnto whom they gaue place, trust, and power. From which employments and Offices sprung those Titles, and those degrees of Honour, which haue continued from Age to Age to these dayes. But this Nobilitie, or difference from the Vulgar, was not in the beginning giuen to the Succession of Bloud, but to Succession of Vertue, as hereafter may be proued. Though at length it was sufficient for those whose Parents were aduanced, to be knowne for the Sonnes of such Fathers : and so there needed then no endeavour of well-doing at all, or any contention for them to excell, vpon whom glory or worldly Nobilitie necessarily descended. Yet hereof had Nobilitie denomination in the beginning, That such as excelled others in vertue : were so called : Hinc dictus Nobilis, quasi virtute præ alijs notabilis. But after such time as the deserued Honour of the Father was giuen in reward to his Posteritie, Saint Hierome iudged of the Succession in this manner : Nihil aliud video in Nobilitate appetendum, nisi quod Nobiles quadam necessitate constringantur, ne ab antiquorum probitate degenerent ; I see no other thing to be affected in Nobilitie, then that Noblemen are by a kinde of necessitie bound, not to degenerate from the vertue of their Ancesters. For if Nobilitie be Virtus & antiqua diuitia ; Vertue and ancient riches, then to exceede in all those things which are extra hominem, as riches, power, glory, and the like, doe no otherwise define Nobilitie, then the word (animal) alone doth define a reasonable man. Or if honour (according to L. Vines) be a witnesse of vertue and well-doing : and Nobilitie (after Plutarch) the continuance of vertue in a Race or Linage : then are those in whom Vertue is extinguished, but like vnto painted and printed Papers, which ignorant men worship in stead of Christ, our Ladie, and other Saints : men, in whom there remaine but the dregs and vices of ancient Vertue : Flowers, and Herbes, which by change of soile and want of manuring are turned to Weedes. For what is found praise-worthy in those waters, which had their beginning out of pure Fountaines, if in all the rest of their course they run foule, filthy, and defiled : Ex terra fertile producitur aliquando Cicuta venenosa, & ex sterili præstiosum aurum ; Out of fruitfull ground ariseth sometimes poisoning Henbane : And out of barren soile precious Gold. For as all things consist of matter and forme, so doth Charron (in his Chapter of Nobilitie) call the Race and Linage but the matter of Nobilitie : the forme (which giues life and perfect being) he maketh to be Vertue, and Qualitie ; profitable to the Common-weale. For he is truly and entirely Noble, who maketh a singular profession of pablike Vertue, getting his Prince and Countrie, and being defended of Parents and Ancesters that haue done the like. And although that Nobilitie, which the same Authour calleth personall (the same which our selues acquire by our Vertue and well-deseruings) cannot be ballanced with that which is both naturall by Descent, and also personall ; yet if Vertue be wanting to the naturall, then is the personall and aquired Nobilitie by many degrees to be preferred : For (saith Charron) this Honour (to wit) by Descent, may light vpon such a one, as in his owne nature is a true Villaine. There is also a third Nobilitie which hee calleth Nobilitie in Parchment, bought with Siluer or fauour : and these be indeede but Honours of affection, which Kings with the change of their fancies with they knew well how to wipe off againe. But surely, if we had as much sense of our degenerating in worthinesse, as we haue of vanitie in deriuing our selues of such and such Parents ; we should rather know such Nobilitie (without Vertue) to be shame and dishonour, then Noblesse, and glory to vaunt thereof. What calamitie is wanting (saith Bernard) to him that is borne in sinne, of a Polshare body and barren minde : for (according to the same Father : ) Dele facum fugacis honoris huius, & male coronate nitorem glorie, &c. Wipe away the painting of this fleeting honour, and the glittering of the ill-crowned glory, that then thou maist consider thy selfe nakedly : for thou camest naked out of thy Mothers wombe. Camest thou thence with thy Myre, or glistering with Iewels, or garnished with Silkes, or adorned with Feathers, or stufed with Gold ? If thou scatter and blow away all these by thy consideration as certaine morning cloudes, which doe or will soone passe ouer, thou shalt meet with a naked, and poore, and wretched and miserable man, and blushing because he is naked, and weeping because he is borne, and repining, because he is borne to labour, and not to honour.

For, as touching the matter of all men, there is no difference betweene it and dust : which if thou doest not beleue (saith S. Chrysostome) looke into the Sepulchres & Monuments of thy Ancesters, and they shall easily perswade thee by their owne example, that thou art dust and dirt : so that if man seeme more Noble and beautifull then dust, this proceedeth not from the diuersitie of his Nature, but from the cunning of his Creatour.

For true Nobilitie standeth in the Trade
Of vertuous life ; not in the fleshy Line :
For bloud is brute, but Gentrie is Diuine.

And how fouer the custome of the World haue made it good, that Honors be cast by birth vpon vnworthy Issues : yet Salomon (as wise as any King) reprehendeth the same in his Fellow-Princes : There is an euill (saith he) that I haue seene vnder the Sun, as an error that proceedeth from the face of him that ruleth. Folly is set in great excellencie.

CHAP. X.

Of Nimrod, Belus, and Ninus : and of memorable things about those times.

§. I.

That Nimrod was the first after the Flood that reigned like Soueraigne Lord : and that his beginning seemeth to haue bene of iust authoritie.

He first of all that reigned as Soueraigne Lord after the Flood was Nimrod, the Sonne of Chush, distinguished by Moses from the rest (according to Saint Augustine) in one of these two respects : either for his eminencie, and because hee was the first of fame, and that tooke on him to command others : or else in that hee was begotten by by Chus, after his other children were also become Fathers; and of a later time then some of his Grand-children and Nephewes. Howsoever, seeing Moses in expresse words calleth Nimrod the Sonne of Chus, other mens coniectures to the contrary ought to haue no respect.

This Empire of Nimrod, both the Fathers and many later Writers call tyrannicall: the same beginning in Babel, (which is) confusion. But it seemeth to mee that Me-lanchton conceiued not amisse hereof: the same exposition being also made by the Authour of that worke called Onomasticum Theologicum, who affirms that Nimrod was therefore called Amarus Dominator, A bitter or seuerer Gouvernour, because his forme of rule seemed at first farre more terrible then Paternall authority. And therefore is hee in this respect also called a mightie Hunter: because he tooke and destroyed both Beasts and Theeues. But Saint Augustine vnderstandit otherwise, and conuerts the word (ante) by (contra) affirming therein, that Nimrod was a mightie Hunter against God: Sic ergo intelligendus est Gigas ille, Venator contra Dominum; So is that Giant to be vnderstood, a Hunter against the Lord.

But howsoever this word (a mightie Hunter) be vnderstood; yet it rather appeareth, that as Nimrod had the command of all those which came from the East into Shinaar: so, this charge was rather giuen him, then by him vsurped. For it no where is found, that Noah himselfe, or any of the Sonnes of his owne body came with this troupe into Babylon: no mention at all being made of Noah (the yeres of his life excepted) in the succeeding Story of the Hebrews; nor that Sem was in this disobedient Troupe, or among the builders of Babel.

The same is also confirmed by diuers ancient Historians, that Nimrod, Suphne, and Is-tan were the Captaines and Leaders of all those which came from the East. And though Sem came not himselfe so farre West as Shinaar (his lot being cast on the East parts) yet from his Sonnes Nephew Heber, the name and Nation of the Hebrewes (according to the generall opinion) tooke beginning, who inhabited the Southermost parts of Chaldea about the Citie of Ur; from whence Abraham was by God called into Charran, and thence into Canaan.

And because those of the Race of Sem which came into Chaldea, were no partners in the vnbeleuing worke of the Towre: therefore (as many of the Fathers coniecture)<sup>39</sup> did they reaine the first and most ancient language, which the Fathers of the first Age had left to Noah; and Noah to Sem and his Issues: In familia Heber remansit hac lingua; In the Family of Heber this Language remained (saith Saint Augustine out of Epiphanius;) and this Language Abraham vied; yea, it was anciently and before the Flood the generall speech: and therefore first called (saith Celestinus) lingua humana: the humane tongue.

We know that Goropius Becanus following Theodoret, Rabbi Moses, Aegyptius Vergara, and others, is of another opinion; but howsoever we determine of this point, we may with good probability resolue, that none of the godly seed of Sem were the chiefe Leaders of this presumptuous multitude. And seeing it is not likely but that some one was by order appointed for this charge, we may imagine that Nimrod rather had it by iust authority, then by violence of vsurpation.

§. II.

That Nimrod, Belus, and Ninus, were three distinct persons.

But Enzo, and out of him Nauclerus with others, make many Nimrods. Ensebius confounds him with Belus, and so doth Saint Hicrome vpon Ose; and these words of S. Augustine seeme to make him of the same opinion: Ibi autem Ninus regnabat post mortem patris sui Beli, qui primus illic regnauerat 65. annos; There did Ninus reigne after the death of his Father Belus, who first gouerned in Babylon sixtie five yeeres. But it could not be vnknowne to Saint Augustine, that Nimrod was the establisher of that Empire: Moses being plaine and direct therein. For the beginning of Nimrod's Kingdome (saith he) was Babel, Erec, Accad, and Chalne, in the Land of Shinaar: wherefore Nimrod was the first King of Babel. And certainly it best agreeth with reason, that Ninus was the third, and not one with Nimrod, as Mercator (led by Clement) supposed: for in Ninus time the World was maruailously replenished. And if S. Augustine had vndoubtedly taken Belus for Nimrod, he would haue giuen him the name which the Scriptures giue him, rather then haue borrowed any thing out of prophane Authors. And for those words of S. Augustine (qui primus illic regnauerat: who was the first that reigned there) supposed to be meant by Belus: those words doe not disproue that Nimrod was the Founder of the Babylonian Empire. For although Iulius Caesar ouerthrew the liberty of the Roman Commonwealth, making himselfe perpetuall Dictator, yet Augustus was the first established Emperor: and the first that reigned absolutely by soueraigne authority over the Romans, as an Emperor.

The like may be said of Nimrod, that he first brake the rule of Eldership and Paternitie, laying the foundation of soueraigne Rule; as Cesar did; and yet Belus was the first, who peaceably, and with a generall allowance exercised such a power. Pererius is of opinion, that Belus and Nimrod were the same, because many things are said of them both agreeing in time: for it was about 200. yeeres after the flood (as they account) that Belus reigned: but such agreement of times proues it not. For so Edward the third, and his grand-child Richard the second, were Kings both in one yeere: the one dyed; the other in the same yeere was crowned King.

And yet the opinion (that Nimrod and Belus were one) is far more probable then that of Mercator, who makes Ninus and Nimrod to be the same. For it is plaine that the beginning of Nimrod's Kingdome was Babel, and the Townes adioynning: but the first and most famous worke of Ninus was the Citie of Ninine.

Now whereas D. Siculus affirmeth, that Ninus ouercame and suppresseth the Babylonians, the same rather proueth the contrarie; then that Ninus and Nimrod were one person. For Ninus established the seat of his Empire at Ninine in Assyria, whence the Babylonians might (perchance) in disdain the reof fall from his obedience, whom hee recovered againe by strong hand; which was easie: Babylon being not walled till Semiramis time.

— Dicitur aliam.
Coctilibus muris cinxisse Semiramis Urbem.

Semiramis with wals of bricke the Citie did inclose.

Further, where it is alleaged, that as the Scriptures call Nimrod mightie: so Iustine hath the same of Ninus, which is one of Mercator's arguments; It may be answered, that such an addition might haue beene giuen to many other Kings aswell. For if wee may beleue Iustine, then were Vexoris King of Egypt, and Tanis of Scythia mighty Kings before Ninus was borne. And if we may compare the words of Moses (touching Nimrod) with the vndertakings of Ninus, there will be found great difference betwene them.

For whereas Mercator conceiueth, that it was too early for any that liued about the time of the confusion of languages, to haue inuaded & mastered those Cities so farre removed from Babel, namely, Erec, Accad, and Chalne: which worke he therefore ascribeth to Ninus, as a man of the greatest vndertaking; and consequently would haue Nimrod to haue been long after the time, in which we suppose he flourished; & both those names of Nimrod and Ninus to belong to one person, to wit, to Ninus: to these things to make some answer. First, I doe not finde that supposition true, That euer Nimrod inuaded any of these Cities; but that he founded them and built them from the ground, being the first after the flood, that conducted the children of Noah into those parts: and therefore had nothing built or erected to his hands.

Besides, whereas these Cities in many mens opinions are found to stand far away from Babylon, I finde no reason to bring me to that beliefe. The Citie of Accad which the Septuagint calls Archad, and Epiphanius, Arphal, Lunus takes to be Nisibis in Mesopotamia: for the Region thereabout the Cosmographers (saith he) call Arrabene for Accadene. Others vndervnderstand Nisibis and Ninive to be one Citie: so doe Strabo and Stephanus confound it with Charran, but all mistaken. For Nisibis, Accad, & Charran are distinct places. Though I cannot deny Accadene to be a Region of Mesopotamia, the same which Arias Montanus out of S. Hierome calls Achad; and so doe the Hebrewes also call Nisibis, which seemeth to be the cause of this mistaking. As for the Citie of Erech, which the Septuagint call Orech; S. Augustine, Oreg, and Paginus, Erec; this place Iunius vnderstands for Aracca in Sustians; but there is also a Citie in Comagenae called Arace: and indeede likelihood of name is no certaine prooffe, without the assistance of other circumstances.

Lib. 23.

Concerning the third Citie (called Chalneh) some take it for Calinis: of which Am. Marcellinus, Saint Hierome takes it for Selencia; Hierosolymitanus for Ctesiphon: others doe thinke it to be the Agraniypon Euphrates, destroyed and razed by the Persians. But let Moses be the Moderator and Iudge of this dispute, who teacheth vs directly, that these Citie are not seated in so diuers and distant Regions; for these be his words: And the beginning of his Kingdome (speaking of Nimrod) was Babel, Erech, Accad, and Chalneh in the Land of Shinaar: (as in this Valley of Shinaar, or Babylonia, or Chaldea (being all one) we must find them. And therefore I could (rather of the two) thinke with Viterbensis, that these foure made but one Babylon, then that they were Citie farre removed, and in severall Prouinces: did not the Prophet Amos precisely distinguish Chalneh from Babylon. Goe you (saith Amos) to Chalneh, and from thence goe you to Hamath, and then to Gath of the Philistines. The Geneua translation fauouring the former opinion, to sit these Citie out of Shinaar, hath a marginall note expressing that Shinaar was here named: not that all these Citie were therein seated, but to distinguish Babylon of Chaldea, from Babylon in Egypt: but I finde little substance in that conceit. For sure I am, that in the beginning of Nimrod's Empire there was no such Babylon, nor any Citie at all to be found in Egypt: Babylon of Egypt being all one with the great Citie of Cairo, which was build long after, not farre from the place where stood Memphis the ancient Citie, but not so ancient as Babylon vpon Euphrates. Now that Chalneh is situate in the Valley of Shinaar, it hath bene formerly proued in the Chapter of Paradise. So as for any argument that may be brought to the contrarie, from the remote situation of these three Citie from Babylon, wee may continue in our opinion, That Nimrod, Belus, and Ninus, were distinct and succeffue Kings.

§. III.

That Nimrod, not Assur, built Ninive: and that it is probable out of Esay 23. 13. that Assur built Vr for the Chaldees.

Now as of Nimrod: so are the opinions of Writers different touching Assur, and touching the beginning of that great state of Babylon and Assyria: a controuersie which is wearisomely disputed without any direct prooffe, conclusion, or certainty. But to me (of whom, where the Scriptures are silent, the voyce of Reason hath the best hearing) the interpretation of Iunius is most agreeable; who besides all necessary consequence doth not disioyne the sense of the Scriptures therein, nor confute the vnderstanding thereof. For in this sort hee conuerteth the Hebrew Text: Erāt enim principium regni eius Babel, & Erech, & Accad, & Chalneh, in terra Shinaaris; & terra hac processit in Assyriam ubi edificauit Ninuen; (which is) For the beginning of his Kingdome was Babel, and Erech, and Accad, and Chalneh, in the land of Shinaar: and hee went forth of this land into Assyria, and built Ninive. So as Iunius takes Assur in this place, not for any person, but for the Region of Assyria: the land being so called in Moses' time, and before it. For certainly, the other construction, (where the word Assur is taken for Assur the sonne of Sem) doth not answer the order which Moses obserueth through all the Bookes of Genesis, but is quite contrary vnto it. For in the beginning of the tenth Chapter hee setteth downe the sonnes of Noah, in these words: Now these are the Generations of the Sonnes of Noah: Sem, Ham, and Iapheth: vnto whom sonnes were borne after the flood: then it followeth immediately: The sonnes of Iapheth were Gomer, &c. so as Iapheth is last named among Noah's sonnes, be hee eldest or youngest: because hee was first to be spoken of: with whom (hauing last named him) hee proceedes and sees downe his issue, and then the issue of his sonnes: first, the issue of Gomer, Iapheth's eldest sonne; and then speaks of Taman and his sonnes: for of the rest rest of that Familie he is silent. Anon after he numbrell the sonnes of Ham, of which Chus was the eldest: and then the sons of Chus and Mizraim; and afterward of Canaan; leauing Shem for the last, because he would not disioyne the Storie of the Hebrewes. But after he beginneth with Sem, he continueth from thence by Arphaxad, Shela, and Heber, vnto Abraham, and so to Jacob, and the Fathers of that Nation. But to haue brought in one of the sonnes of Shem in the middle of the generations of Ham, had bene against order; neither would Moses haue past ouer so slightly the erection of the Assyrian Empire, in one of the sonnes of Shem, if he had had any such meaning: it being the storie of Shem's sonnes which he most attended. For he nameth Nimrod apart, after the rest of the sonnes of Chus; because he founded the Babylonian and Assyrian Empire: and in the eleuenth Chapter he returnes to speake of the building of Babel in particular, hauing formerly named it in the tenth Chapter, with those other Citie which Nimrod founded in Shinaar. And as he did in the tenth Chapter, so also in the eleuenth hee maketh no report of Shem, till such time as he had finished so much of Nimrod as he meant to touch: and then he beginneth with the issue of Shem, which he continueth to Abraham and Israhel. And of Iunius opinion touching Assur, was Caluin: to which I conceiue that P. Commestor, in his historia Scholastica, gaue an entrance, who after hee had deliuered this place in some other sense, he vseth these words: *Vel intelligendum non est de Assur filio Sem, &c. sed Assur (id est) Regnum Assyriorum inde egressum est, quod tempore Sarug proauit Abraham factum est; (which is) Or else it is not to be vnderstood of Assur the sonne of Sem, &c. but Assur (that is, the Kingdome of the Assyrians) came from thence (videlicet, from Babylon) or was made out of it: which happened in the time of Sarug the great grand-father of Abraham. After which he reconcileth the differences in this sort: If you take the ancient, Belus (meaning Nimrod) to be the first Erecter of the Assyrian Empire, or the first Founder thereof, it is true, Quantum ad initium; Respecting the beginning; but others conceiue that it had beginning from Ninus, which is also true, Quantum ad regni ampliacionem; Regarding the enlargement of the Empire. To this I may adde the opinion of Epiphanius, confirmed by Cedrenus, who takes Assur to be the sonne of Nimrod: and so doth Methodius, and Viterbensis, Saint Hierome, and Cyrillus, and now lastly Tornius; *Torni. l. Annal. Fac. in Gen. 10.

who saith he tooke vpon him that name of Assur after he had beaten the Assyrians, as Scipio did of Africanus, after his conquest in Africa: and that Assur was a common name to the Kings of Assyria, as it appeareth by many Scriptures; as Psalm 81. Esay 10. Osee &c. but to helpe the matter, he makes Nimrod of the race of Shem; and the sonne of Irati. But Rabanus Maurus, who was Arch-bishop of Meitz in the yeere of Christ 834. an ancient and learned Writer, vnderstands this place with Commestor, or Commestor with him, agreeing in substance with that translation of Iunius: to which words of Moses he giueth this sense: De hac terra Assyriorum pullulauit imperium, qui ex nomine Nini, B. filij, Ninum condiderunt, urbem magnam, &c. Out of this land grew the Empire of the Assyrians, who built Ninus the great Citie, so named of Ninus the sonne of Belus. On the contrarie Caluin objecteth this place of Esay: Behold the land of 23. 13. the Chaldeans, this was no people, Assur founded it by the inhabitants of the wilderness; then which there is no one place in the Scriptures, that hath a greater diuersitie in the translation and vnderstanding; inso much as Michael de Palatio vpon Esay (though in all else very diligent) passeth it ouer. But Caluin seemeth hereby to inferre, that because Assur founded the state of the Chaldeans, therefore also Assur rather then Nimrod established the Assyrian Empire, and built Ninive: contrary to the former translation of Iunius, and to his owne opinion. Now out of the Vulgar (called Hieromes translation) it may be gathered that Assur both founded and ruined this Estate or Citie of the Chaldeans, by Esay remembred: vnto which Citie, People, or State, he plainly telleth the Tyrans that they cannot trust, or hope for reliefe thence: Or rather it may be taken, that the Prophet maketh this Citie of Chaldea, and that Estate, an example vnto those Phenicians, whom in this place he fore-telleth of their ruine: which Citie of Chaldea being of strength, and carefully defended, was (notwithstanding) by the Assyrians utterly wasted and destroyed: whereby he giueth them knowledge, and foretelleth them, that their owne Citie of Tyre (invincible, as themselves thought) should also soone after be ouer-turned by the same Assyrians: as (indeede) it was by Nabuchodonosor. And these be the words after Hierome: Eccc terra Chaldeorum, talis populus non fuit, Assur fundauit eam, in captiuitatem traduxerunt robustos eius, suffoderunt domos eius, posuerunt eam in ruinam, (which is) Behold

Behold the Land of the Chaldeans, such a people there were not (or, this was no people, after the Geneua) Assur (or the Assyrians) founded it, they carried away their strong men captiue, they undermined their houses, and ruined their Citie. The Septuagint expresse it but in a part of another Verse, in these words: *Et in terra Chaldaorum, & hac desolata est ab Assyrijs, quoniam maris eius corruit, making the sense perfect by the preceding Verse, which all together may be thus vnderstood: If thou goe ouer to Chittim (which is Macedon or Greece) yet thou shalt haue no rest (speaking to the Tyrians) neither in the Land of the Chaldeans, for this is made desolate by the Assyrians, because their walls fell together to the ground. Pagninus and Vatablus conuert it thus: Ecce terra Chaldæm, iste populus non erat illic olim; nam Assur fundauit eam nauibus, erexerunt arces illius; contriverunt ades eius, posuit eam in ruinam: which may be thus Englished: Behold the Land of the Chaldeans, this people was not once therein inhabiting: for Assur built it a harbour for ships, they erected the Towers thereof, and againe brake downe the houses thereof, and ruinated it. Iunius in the place of ships lets the word (pro Barbarijs) that is, for the Barbarians: and the Geneua, by the Barbarians. But this is vndoubted that the Prophet Esay (as may be gathered by all the sense of the Chapter) did therein assure the Tyrians of their future destruction, which (accordingly) fell on them: wherein (for the more terrour) he maketh choice to note the calamities of those Places, Cities, and Regions, by whose Trade the state and greatnesse of the Tyrians was maintained; as by the Cilicians from Tharsis; from the Macedonians, and other Gracians vnder the name of Cissim; also by the Egyptians, the Chaldeans, and the rest. For Tyre was then the Mart Towne of the World most renowned. And (as it appears in our discourse of Paradise) not the least part of her chiefe merchandize came in by the Citie Vr or Vrchoa in Chaldea, where the body or chiefe streame of Euphrates (euen that streame which runneth through Babylon and Otris, which now falleth into Tigris) had his passage into the Persian Gulfe: though now it be stopped vp. For (as we haue heretofore noted) the Arabians (that descended from Sheba and Raamah) dwelling on the east bankes of the Persian Gulfe, trading with the Tyrians (as those of Eden, Charran, and Chalne did) transported their merchandise by the mouth of Tigris, that is, from Teredon, and of Euphrates, that is, from Vr or Vrchoa: and then by Babylon, and thence by Riuer and ouer Land they conveyed it into Syria, and so to Tyre: as they doe this day to Aleppo. So then Vr of the Chaldees was a Port Towne, and one of those Cities which had intelligence, Trade, and Exchange with the Tyrians: for it stood by the great Lakes of Chaldea, through which that part of Euphrates ran, which passage is now stopp'd vp. Eius cursus vetustas aboleuit (saith Niger.) And Plinie: Locus ubi Euphratis ostium fuit, flumen salsum; Time hath worne away the channell of Euphrates: and the place where the mouth thereof was, is a Bay of salt water. These things being thus, certainly (not without good probabilitie) we may expound the Citie of the Chaldees, whose calamities Esay here noteth for terror of the Tyrians, to be the Citie anciently called Vr; and (by Hecateus) Camerina; by Ptolomie, Vrchoa: and by the Greekes, Chaldaopolis, The Citie of Chaldea: which the sonnes of Shem, vntill Abrahams time, inhabited. And whereas in all the Tranlations it is said, that Assur both founded it and ruined it: it may be vnderstood, that Assur the Founder was the sonne of Shem; and Assur the destroyers were the Assyrians, by whom those that inhabited Vr of Chaldea, were at length oppressed and brought to ruine: which thing God foreseeing, commanded Abraham thence to Charran, and so into Canaan. And if the Hebrew word by Vatablus and Pagninus conuerted (by ships) doe beare that sense, the same may be the better approued; because it was a Port Towne: and the Riuer so farre vp as this Citie of Vr was in ancient time nauigable, as both by Plinie and Niger appeareth. And if the word (for the Barbarians) or (by the Barbarians) be also in the Hebrew Text, it is no lesse manifest, that the most barbarous Arabians of the Desert were and are the confronting, and next people of all other vnto it. For Chaldea is now called Arachaldar, which signifieth desert Lands, because it ioyneth to that part of Arabia so called: and Cicero (calling those Arabians by the name of Ituraans) addeth, that they are of all other people the most saluage; calling them, *Homines omnium maxime barbaros.

So as this place of Esay, which breedeth some doubt in Caluin, proueth in nothing the contrarie opinion, nor in any part weakeneth the former translation of Iunius, nor the interpretation of Comestier and Rabanus. For though other men haue not conceiued (for any thing that I haue read) that Assur is in this place diuersly taken (as for the sonne of Sem, when he is spoken of as a Builder of Vr; and when as a Destroyer thereof, then for the Assyrian Nation) yet certainly the euidence of the truth, and agreement of circumstances seeme to enforce it. And so this Founding of the Citie of the Chaldees by Assur (into which the most of the posteritie of Sem that came into Shinaar, and were separate for the Idolatrie of the Chusites and Nimrodians, retired themselves) hath nothing in it to proue that the same Assur built Nimue, or that the same Assur was all one with Ninus; except we will make Assur, who was the sonne of Shem, both an Idolater, and the sonne of Belus. For (out of doubt) Ninus was the first notorious Sacrificer to Idols; and the first that set vp a Statue or Image to be honored as god. Now if Assur must be of that Race, and not of the Familie of Sem, as he must be if he founded Nimue, then all those which seeke to giue him the honor thereof, doe him by a thousand parts more iniurie, by taking from him his true Parent and Religion.

Besides, if this supposed Assur whom they make the Founder of Nimue (and so the sonne of Belus) were any other, and not the same with Ninus; then what became of him? Certainly he was very vnworthy and obscure, and not like to be the Founder of such an Empire and such a Citie, if no man haue vouchsafed to leaue to posteritie his expulsion thence, and how he lost that Empire againe or quitted it to Ninus: whose acts and conquests are so largely written, and (according to my apprehension) farre differing from truth. It will therefore be found best agreeing to Scripture and to Reason, and best agreeing with the storie of that age written by prophane Authors, that Nimrod founded Babel, Erech, and Accad, and Chalne, the first workes and beginnings of his Empire, according to Moses; and that these workes being finished within the Valley of Shinaar, he looked farther abroad, and set in hand the worke of Ninus, lying neere vnto the same streame that Babel and Chalne did: which worke his grand-child Nimus afterward amplified and finished, as Semiramis (this Ninus his wife) did Babylon. Hence it came to passe, that as Semiramis was counted the Foundresse of the Citie which she onely finished: so also Ninus of Nimue: Quam quidem Babylonem posuit instaurare; She might repaire or renew Babylon, saith S. Augustine. For so did Nabuchodonosor vaunt himselfe to bee the Founder of Babylon also, because he built vp againe some part of the wall, ouer-borne by the furie of the Riuer: which worke of his stood till Alexanders time, wherupon hee wanted thus: Is not this great Babel which I haue built?

Dan. 4. 27.

§. III.

Of the Acts of Nimrod and Belus, as farre as now they are knowne.

BVt to returne to the Storie, it is plaine in Moses, that Nimrod (whom Philo interpreteth transfugium; and Iulius Africanus surnamed Saurne) was the establisher of the Babylonian Monarchie, of whom there is no other thing written, then that his Empire in the beginning consisted of those 4. Cities before remembred, Babel, Erech, Accad, and Chalne: and that from hence he propagated his Empire into Assyria, & in Assyria built foure more Cities (to wit) Nimue, Rehoboth, Celah, and Resen. And seeing that hee spent much time in building Babel it selfe and those adioyning, and that his traualles were many ere he came into Shinaar: that worke of Babel (such as it was) with the other three Cities, and the large foundation of Nimue, and the other Cities of Assyria which he builded (considered with the want of materials, and with other impediments) were of greater difficultie then any thing performed by his Successors in many yeeres after: to whose vndertakings time had giuen so great an increase of people; and the examples and patternes of his beginning so great an aduancement and encouragement: in whose time (saith Glycas) all these Nations were called Meropes, a sermonis linguarum terrarū diuissio; one; By reason that the earth and the speech were then diuided.

Belus, or Bel, or Iupiter Belus, succeeded Nimrod, after hee had reigned 114. yeeres; of whose acts and vndertakings there is little written. For it is thought that he spent much of his time in dis-burdening the low Lands of Babylon, and drying and making firme ground of all those great Fennes and ouer-flowne Marishes which adioyned vnto it. For any of his Warres or conquests there is no report, other then of his begun enterprise against Sabatius King of Armenia, and those parts of Scythia which Berosus calls Scythia Sages, whose sonne and successor Barzanes became subiect and Tributarie to Darius, that followed the warre to effect, which was by his Father Belus begunne.

§. V.

That we are not to maruaile how so many Kingdomes could be erected about these times: and of Vexoris of Egypt, and Tanais of Scythia.

Hat so many Kingdomes were erected in all those Easterne parts of the World so soone after Nimrod, (as by the storie of Nimus is made manifest) the causes were threefold, (namely) Opportunitie, Example, and Necessitie. For Opportunitie being a Princeesse liberrall and powerfull, bestoweth on her first Entertayners many times more benefits, then either Fortune can, or Wisedome ought; by whose presence alone the vnderstanding mindes of men receiue all those helps and supplies, which they eyther want or wish for: so as every Leader of a troupe (after the diuision of tongues and dispersion of People) finding these faire offers made vnto them, held the power which they posselt, and gouerned by discretion all those people, whom they conducted to their destined places. For it cannot be conceiued, that when the Earth was first diuided, mankinde straggled abroad like beasts in a Defart; but that by agreement they disposed themselves, & vnder-tooke to inhabite all the knowne parts of the world, and by distinct Families and Nations: otherwise, those remote Regions from Babylon and Shinaar, which had Kings, and were peopled in Nimus time, would not haue bene posselt in many hundreds of yeres after, as then they were; neyther did those that were sent, and trauelled far off (order being the true parent of prosperous successe) vnder take so difficult enterprizes without a Conductor or Commander. Secondly, the Example of Nimrod with whom it succeeded well, strengthened every humor that aspired. Thirdlie, Necessitie resolued all men by the arguments of common miseries, that without a Commander and Magistrate, neither could those that were laborious, and of honest dispositions, enjoy the haruest of their owne Trauailes: nor those which were of little strength, secure themselves against forcible violence: nor those which fought after any proportion of greatnesse, eyther possesse the same in quiet, or rule and order their owne Ministers and Attendants.

That these causes had wrought these effects, the vnder takings and Conquests of Nimus (the son of Belus) made it apparent: for he found euery where Kings and Monarchies, so what way soeuer his Ambition led him in the Warres.

But Nimrod (his Grand-father) had no companion King, to vs knowne, when he first tooke on him Souerignie and sole commandement of all those the children of Noah, which came from the East into Babylonia: though in his life time others also rayled themselves to the same estate; of which hereafter. Belus (his sonne and Successor) found Sabatius King of Armenia and Scythia, sufficiently powerfull to resist his attempts: which Sabatius I take to be the same, which Iustine calls Tanais; and should coniecture, that Mizraim had bene his Vexoris, were it not that I vehemently suspect some error, (as Iustine placeth him) in the time of that Vexoris, who by many circumstances seemes to me rightly accounted by the Iudicious and Learned Reineccius all one with the great Sesostris, that liued certaine Ages after Nimus. This Belus, the second King of Babylon, reigned 65 yeres, according to the common account.

§. VI.

Of the name of Belus, and other names affixe vnto it.

Hence this second King and Successour of Nimrod had the name of Bel, or Belus, question hath bene made: for it seemeth rather a name imposed, or (of addition) giuen by Nimus, then assumed by Belus himselfe.

Cyrillus against Iulian calls the Father of Nimus Arbelus, affirming that he was the first of all men that caused himselfe to bee called a god: which were it so, then might the name of Belus be thence deriued. But Bel, as many Learned Writers haue obserued, signifieth the Sunne in the Chaldean Tongue; and therefore did Nimus and Semiramis giue that name to their Father, that he might be honoured as the Sunne, which the Babylonians worshipped as a god. And as this Title was assumed in after-times by diuers others of the Chaldean Princes, and Babylonian Satraps: so was it vied (in imitation) by the chiefe of the Carthaginians and other Nations, as some Historians haue conceiued.

To

To this Bel, or Belus, pertaine (as in affinitye) those voyces of Baal, Baalim, Belphegor, Belphegor, Belphebus, and Belpheban. Those that are learned in the Hebrew and Chaldean conuert the word Baal by the Latine, Princeps militie, Chiefe in the Warres; though Daniel was so called (saith Suidas) Ob hominem explanationis arcanarum rerum, in honour of his expounding secrets. Saint Hierome makes Bel, Beel, and Baal, to haue the same signification; and sayth, that the Idoll of Babylon was so called, which Ninus in memorie of his father set vp to be worshipped: to which that he might adde the more honour and reuerence, he made it a Sanctuarie and refuge for all offenders. Hence (saith Lyrarimus) came Idolatrie, and the first vse of Images into the World. Isidore doth interpret Bel by Vetus, old or ancient; adding, that as among the Assyrians it is taken for Sassarne and the Sunne; so in the Punicke or Carthaginian Language it signifieth God. Glycas makes it an Assyrian name properly; and Iosephus a Tyrian. He also affirmeth that the Idoll which the Moabites worshipped (by them erected on the Mountaine Phegor, or Peor, and called Baal) is the same which the Latines call Priapus, the god of Gardens; which also was the opinion of S. Hierome. But that the word Bel, or Beel, was as much to say as God, appeareth by the word Beelzebub, the Idoll of Accaron. For Bel, or Beel, foundeth (God) and Schub (Flies or Hornets: ) by which name (notwithstanding) the Ierus expresseth the Prince of Devils. But the Prophet Ose teacheth vs the proper signification of this word from the voice of God himselfe; And as that day (saith the Lord) thou shalt call me Ilhi, and shalt call me no more Baalim: for I will take away the name of Baalim out of their mouths. For although the name of Baal, or Babah, be iustly to be vsed towards God; yet it respecteth that the same was giuen to Idols, God both hated it and forbade it. And the vse of the word Bel among the Chaldeans for the Sunne, was not because it properly signifieth the Sun, but because the Sunne there was worshipped as a God: as also the Fire was, tanquam Solis particula. As for the words compounded (before remembered) Belphegor, and Belpheban, Belphegor is expounded out of Faciens, Dominus speculatus in se, the Lord of the Watch-Tower, or of the Guard: the other word noteth the Idoll, and the place where in it was worshipped. It is also written Belpheor, or Baalpeor, and Peor (they say) is as much as Deuadant; and therefore the word ioyned expresseth a naked Image. Some there are that call this Belus the sonne of Saturne: for it was vsed among the Ancients to name the Father Saturne, the Sonne Iupiter, and the Grand-child Hercules. Saturni descendunt familiarum Nobilium, Regum qui verbera considerunt, seminare: primogeniti eorum Ioues & Iunones, Hercules vero nepotes eorum feruntur. The ancientest of Noble Families and Kings which founded Cities, are called Saturni; ab eis, first borne Iupiters and Iunoes, their valiant Nephewes Hercules. But this Belus (saith L. Iustinus) was famous by reason of his warlike sonne Nimus, who caused his Father to be worshipped as a God by the name of Iupiter Babylonius; whom the Egyptians (transported by the Dreames of their Antiquitie) make one of theirs. For Neptune (say they) vpon Ligia the Daughter of Epaphus begat this Iupiter Belus, who was Father to Egyptus. They adde, that this Belus carrying a Colony to the Riuer of Euphrates, there built a Citie, in which he ordained Priests after the Egyptian manner. But were there any Belus the Sonne of Epaphus and Ligia, or of Neptune and Ligia, or (with Eusebius) of Telegonus, who after the death of Apis married Ligia: (Cicero then reigning in Athens) the same was not this Babylonian Belus of whom wee speake, but rather some other Belus, of whom the Egyptians so much vaunted.

§. VII.

Of the worshipping of Images begun from Belus in Babel.

For the Babylonian Belus, hee was the most ancient Belus; and the Inuentour of Astronomie, if Plinie say true: from whence the Egyptians might borrow both the name and the Doctrine. Some part of the Temple, in which his Statue or Image was honoured as a God; this same Author affirmeth that it did remaine in his time.

Of the Sepulcher of Belus, Strabo writeth thus: Over the Riuer (saith he) there are Gardens, where they say the ruines of Belus his Tombes, which Hercules brake up, are yet remaining. It was a square Pyramid made of Bricke, a few long high, and on every side a few long in breadth. It appeares by Cyril against Iulian, that hee obtained diuine worship yet liuing.

living: for so he writes of him (calling him Arbelus.) Arbelus, vir superbus & arrogans, primus hominum dicitur à subditis Deitatis nomen accepisse: perseverant igitur Assyri, & finitima illi gentes sacrificantes ei. Arbelus, a man very proud and arrogant, is accounted to be the first of all men that was ever honoured by their subjects with title of Deities (or with the name of God.) The Assyrians therefore, and the bordering Nations have persecuted, sacrificing to him. *Euen Arius also, whom Suidas calls Thuras, who succeeded next after Ninyas, was made an Idoll-god among them, if we credit Suidas.*

After Ninus (that is, after Ninyas) Thuras reigned (saith Suidas) whom they called after the name of the Planet Mars; a man of sharpe and fierce disposition, who bidding battaile to Caucasus of the stocke of Iapheth slue him. The Assyrians worshipped him for their God, and called him Baal (that is) Mars; thus saith Suidas. Neither is it unlikely but that many among Idolatrous nations were Deified in their life-times, or soone after: though I denie not but that the most of their Images and Statues were first erected without diuine worship, onely in memorie of the glorious acts of Benefactors, as Glycas rightly conceiue; and so afterward the Deuill crept into those wooden and brazen carcases, when Posteritie had lost the memorie of their first inuention. Hereof Isidore speaketh in this manner: Quos autem Pagani Deos asserant homines fuerunt, & pro vniuersi iussu, vita meritis vel magnificentia, colit apud suos post mortem ceperunt: sed (Demoniis persuadentibus) quos ille pro sua memoria honorauerunt, minores Deos existimauerunt: ad ista vero magis excolenda acceperunt Poetarum figmenta; They were men (saith he) whom the Pagans ascribed to be gods: and euery one for his merits or magnificence began after his death to bee honoured of his owne. But at length (the Devils perswading) they accounted them lesser gods, whose memories they honoured: and the Fictions of the Poets made the opinions (concerning the honour of the dead) much more superstitious.

And that the worshipping of Images was brought in by the Pagans, and Heathen Nations, it is not Isidore alone that witnesseth, but Gregorie: Gentilis (saith he) inuentrix & Ambr. in 2.º. caput est imaginum; Gentilisme is the inuentresse and ground of Images: and Ambrose; Gentiles lignum adorant, tanquam imaginem Dei; The Gentiles adore wood as it were the Image of God. Eusebius also affirmeth as much, and calleth the worshipping of Images a custome borrowed of the Heathen. The like hath Saint Augustine against Adimantius. *Et ueretur (saith Lactantius) ne religio uana sit, si nihil uideant quod adorent; They feare their Religion would be vaine, should they not see that which they worship.*

And (out of doubt) the Schoolemen shifft this fearefull custome very strangely. For seeing the very workmanship is forbidden, how can the heart of a wise Christian satisfie itselfe with the distinction of Doubla and Hyperdoubla, which can imply nothing but some difference of worshipping of those Images after they are made? And it is of all things the most strange, why religious and learned men should straine their wits to defend the vse of those things, which the Scriptures haue not onely no where warranted, but expressly in many places forbidden, and cursed the Practisers thereof. Yet this doctrine of the Deuill was so strongly and subtilly rooted, as neither the expresse Commandement of God himselfe, Thou shalt not make any grauen image, nor all the threatnings of Moses and the Prophets after him could remoue, weed it, or by feare, or by perswasions lead the hearts of men from it. For where shall we find words of greater weight, or of plainer instruction then these? Take therefore good heed to your selues (for ye saw no Image in the day that the Lord spake vnto you in Horeb out of the midst of the fire) that ye corrupt not your selues, and make you a grauen Image or representation of any Figure, whether it be the likeness of Male or Female.

And besides the expresse Commandement, Thou shalt make thee no grauen Image, and the prohibition in many Scriptures, so it is written in the Booke of Wisdom, That the inuention of Idols was at the beginning of whoredome: and the finding of them the corruption of life: for they were not from the beginning, neither shall they continue for euer.

And whereas the Schoolemen affirme, that the Prophets spake against the Worshipping of the Heathen Idols, it is manifest that Moses spake of Images of the living God, and not of Baal and the rest of that nature, *For you saw no Image (saith Moses) that day that the Lord spake vnto you in Horeb.* Surely it was excellently said of Basil; Noli aliquam in illo formam imaginari, ne circumscribas eum mente tua: Doe not imagine any forme to be in God, lest thou limit or circumscribe him in thy minde too. Now, if the great Basil thought it a presumption vnlawfull to represent a pattern of the infinite God to our own thoughts thoughts and mindes, how farre doe those men presume that put him vnder the greazie Penill of a Painter, or the rustie Axe or other Instrument of a Carpenter or Caruer?

For as this dishonour to the infinite and incomprehensible God beganne in Babel: so did the Deuill transport and spread this inuention into all the Regions adioyning, and into Egypt and Greece.

The Romans for a while resisted the creation of these Idols and Images, refusing to set them in their Temples for 170. yeeres, observing the Law of Numa: who thought it impietie to resemble things most beautifull, by things most base. But Tarquinius Priscus afterwards preuailing, and following the vanitie of the Gracians. (a Nation of all others vnder the Sunne most deluded by Satan) set vp the Images of their gods, which (as S. Augustine witnesseth) that Learned Varro both bewailed, and vterly condemned: and which Seneca thus derideth; *Simulachra deorum venerantur, illis supplicanti, genu posito illa adorant, & cum hac suspiciant, fabros qui illa fecere contemnunt; The Images of the gods are worshipped, those they pray vnto with bended knees, those they adore, and while they so greatly admire them, they contemne the Handi-craftsmen that made them: which also Sedulius the Poet in this sort scoffed at:*

*Heu miseri qui uana colunt, qui corde sinistro
Religioſa sibi culpunt simulachra, suumque
Factorem fugiunt, & quæ fecere uerentur.
Quis furor est? quæ tanta animos dementia ludit?
Vi uolucrem, turpemque bouem, cornu uirgæ,
Semi-hominemque, canem supplex homo pronus adoret.*

Ah wretched they that worship vanities,
And consecrate dumbe Idols in their heart,
Who their owne Maker (God on high) despise,
And feare the worke of their owne hands and art.
What furie? what great madnesse doth beguile
Mens mindes? that man should vgly shapes adore,
Of Birds, or Buls, or Dragons, or the vile
Halfe-dogge-halfe-man on knees for aide implore.

And though this deuice was barbarous, and first, and many yeeres practised by Heathen Nations only, till the Iewes were corrupted in Egypt, yet it is not Seneca alone that laugheth to scorne the ignorant Rudipitie of his Nation: but Iustin Martyr remembreth how the Sibyls inuighed against Images: and Hospinian, how Sophocles taught, that it was pernicious to the foules of men to erect and adore those Babels. Strabo and Herodotus witness, that the Persians did not erect or set vp any Statue of their Gods. Lycurgus neuer taught it the Lacedæmonians, but thought it impietie to represent immortall natures by mortall Figures. Eusebius also witnesseth in his first Booke de preparatione Evangelica, that it was forbidden by a Law in Serica, or among the Brachmans in India, that Images should be worshipped. The same doe Tacitus and Crinus report of the ancient Germans. Many other Authors might bee remembered that witness the disdaine which the Heathen themselves had of this childish Idolatrie: of which Hospinian hath written at large in his Tract, de origine imaginum. And it was truly sayd, Omnia mala exempla bonis inijs orta sunt, All ill examples haue sprung from good beginnings. The Heathen at first made these Statues and Images, but in memorie of such remarkable men, as had deserved best of their Countries and Common wealths: *Effigies hominum (saith Plinie) non solebant exprimi, nisi aliqua illustris causa perpetuitatem merentium: Men were not wont to make Pictures, but of men which merited for some notable cause to bee perpetually remembered.* And though of the more ancient Papists, some haue borrowed of the Gentiles (as appears in Lactantius) that defence for Images: That Simulachra are prolelementa litterarum, ut per ea discerent homines Deum inuisibile cognoscere: Images (say they, & so before the Heathen said) are in stead of Letters, whereby men might learn to know the inuisible God: in which vnderstanding perhaps they no otherwise esteemed them then pictures indeed, yet as that of Baal or Beller vp in memory of Belus the Babylonian, became afterward the most reuerenced Idoll of the World, by which so many Nations (and they which were appropriate to God himselfe) were misled and cast away: so those very stocks & stones, and and painted Canuaes (called the pictures of Christ, our Ladie, and others) were by thousands of ignorant people, not onely adored; but esteemed to haue life, motion, and vnderstanding. On these stocks we call (saith the Booke of Wisdomes) when we passe through the raging waues, on these stocks more rotten then the Ship that carrieth vs.

This Heathen inuention of Images became so fruitfull in after-times, breeding an infinite multitude of gods; that they were forced to distinguish them into degrees and orders; as Dij Consentes, seu maiorum gentium; selecti; Patrij, insigniores, dij medij: Countselling gods; or gods of the mightiest Nobilitie, select gods, Patrium, gods of marke, and common gods (which the Romanes called Medioximi) dij infimi, and terrestriall Heroes, and multitudes of other gods: of which Saint Augustine hath made large mention in his Booke de Cinitate Dei. But (saith Lactantius) among all those miserable foules and rotten bodies, worshipped by men more like to their Idols, did Epimenides Cretensis (by what good Angell mooned I know not) erect in the Athenian Fields, Altars to the vnkowne God, which stood with the same title and dedication euen to the times of S. Paul: who made them first know to whom these Altars belonged, and opened their eyes which were capable of grace, that they might discern the difference betwixt that light which lighteneth euery man, and the obscure and stinking mist wherein the Deuill had so many yeeres led and misled them. And it sufficed, not that the multitude of these gods was so great in generall, or that euery Nation had some one which tooke particular and singular care of them, as Iupiter in Crete, Isis in Egypt, in Athens Minerva, in Samos Inno, in Paphos Venus, and so of all other parts; but euery Citie, and almost euery Family had a god a-part. For as it is written in the second of Kings: the men of Babel, made Succoth Benoth, and the men of Cuth made Nergal, and the men of Hamath made Asima, and the Auins made Nibhaz and Tarrak, and the Sepheruims burnt their children in the fire to Aramelech. All which how plainly hath the Prophet Esay derided? Men cut downe Trees, rinde them, burne a part of them, make readie their meate, and warme themselves by the fire thereof, and of the residue he maketh a god; an Idoll, and prayeth vnto it: but God hath shew their eyes from sight, and their heart from vnderstanding. It is therefore safest for a Christian to believe the Commandements of God so direct against Idolatrie, to beleue the Prophets, and to beleue S. Paul: who speaketh thus plainly and feelingly, My beloved, flye from Idolatrie, I speake as vnto them which haue vnderstanding, iudge ye what I say.

§. VIII.

Of the warres of Ninus: and lastly of his Warre against Zoroaster.

Vnto this Belus succeeded Ninus, the first that commanded the exercise of Idolatrie, the first that iniuriously invaded his Neighbor Princes; and the first that without shame or feare committed adulterie in publike. But as of Belus there is no certaine memorie (as touching particulars:) so of this Ninus (whose Storie is gathered out of Prophane Authors) I finde nothing so warrantable, but that the same may be disputed, and in the greatest part doubted. For although that piece of Beofus set out and commented vpon by Amnius, hath many good things in it, and giueth great light (as Chrysostom noteth) to the vnderstanding of Diodorus Siculus, Dion, Halicarnassens, and others: yet Lodouicus Vives, B. Rhenanus, and others after them haue layed open the imperfection and defects of the Fragment; proouing directly that it cannot be the same Beofus which liued in Alexanders time, cited by Athenens and Iosephus: and whose Statue the Athenians erected, saith Plinie. Yet it is from him chiefly, that many haue gathered the succession of the Babylonian & Assyrian Princes; euen from Nimrod to the eighteenth King Ascatades, and to the times of Iosua. For of Metaethenes an Historian, of the Race of the Persian Priests, there are found but certaine Papers, or some few lines of the Chaldean and Assyrian Monarchies: but he afterwards in the collection of the Persian Kings is not without his errors.

Ctesias of Cnidus (a Citie adioyning to Halicarnassus) who liued together with Cyrus the yonger, and with Alexander Mnemon, gathered his Historie out of the Persian Records, and reacheth as farre vppwards as Ninus and Semiramis: and though in the Storie of Cyrus the yonger, Xenophon approoueth him in some things; and Athenens, Pausanias and Teritilian cite him; yet so base and apparent are his flatteries of the times and Princes with whom he liued, and so incredible are the numbers which he finds in the Armies of Ninus, and especially of Semiramis; as whatsoeuer his reports were, times haue consumed his workes, sauing some very few excerptions lately published.

And therefore in things vncertaine, seeing a long discourse cannot be pleasing to men of iudgement, I will passe ouer the acts of this third Assyrian, in as few words as I can expresse them. S. Augustine affirms that Ninus mastered all Asia, India excepted. Others say that he wanne it all, saue India, Bactria, and Arabia. For he made Aricus of Arabia the companion of his Conquests, with whom he entred into a straight league of amitie, because he commanded many people, and was his Kinsman, and a Chusite, and the neerest Prince confronting Babylonia. His first enterprize was vpon Syria, which he might easily subdue, both because hee inuaded it on the sodaine, and because it lay next him: and also because the Arabians and their King Aricus (which bordered Syria) assisted him in the Conquest thereof.

The King of Armenia, Barzanes, he forced to acknowledge him, and to aide him in his Warre against Zoroaster: for from Armenia he bent himselfe that way toward the East; but that euer he commanded the lesser Asia, I doe not beleue, for none of his Successors had any possession therein.

His third Warre was against Pharnus, King of the Medes, whome it is sayd that he ouerthrew, and cruelly murdered with his seuen Children, though others affirme that so they all died in one battaile against him. Whether he inuaded Zoroaster before the building or amplifying of Ninive, or after, it is vncertaine. It is said that he made two expeditions into Bactria: and that finding little or ill successe in the first, hee returned, and set the worke of Ninive forward: and then a second time entred Bactria with 1700000. Foot, and 200000. Horse, and 10000. fixe hundred Chariots: being encountered by Zoroaster with foure hundred thousand. But Ninus preuayling, and Zoroaster being slaine, hee entred farther into the Countrie, and besieged the chiefe Citie thereof, called Bactra or Bactrion (saith Stephanus: ) which by a passage found, and an assault giuen by Semiramis (the wife of Menon) hee entred and posselt. Vpon this occasion Ninus both admiring her iudgement and valour, together with her person and externall beautie, fancied her so strongly, as (neglecting all Princely respects) hee tooke her from her husband, whose eyes he threatened to thrust out if hee refused to consent. Hee therefore yeelding to the passion of loue in Ninus, and to the passion of sorrow in himselfe, by the strong perswasions of shame and dishonour, cast himselfe head-long into the water, and died.

CHAP. XI.

Of ZOROASTER, supposed to haue bene the chiefe Author of Magick Arts: and of the diuers kinds of Magicke.

§. I.

That Zoroaster was not Cham, nor the first Inuenter of Astrologie, or of Magicke: and that there were diuers great Magicians of this name.

Zoroaster King of the Bactrians, Vincenius supposeth to be Cham the sonne of Noah: A fancie of little probabilitie. For Cham was the Paternall Ancestor of Ninus, the Father of Chus, the Grand-father of Nimrod, whose sonne was Belus, the Father of Ninus. It may be that Vincenius had heard of that booke which was called Scriptura Cham, deuised by some wicked Knaue, & so intituled: of which Sextus Senensis hath made the due mention.

It is reported by Cassianus, that Serenus Abbas gaue the inuention of Magicke to Cham the sonne of Noah: so did Cornelius in his Scholasticall Historie: which Art (saith he) with the 7. liberall Sciences he writ in 14. Pillers: seuen of which were made of brasse, to resist the defacing by the waters of the Floud; and 7. of bricke against the iniurie of fire. There was also another deuised discourse, which went vnder the title of Prophetia Cham. Cassianus out of Serenus hath somewhat like unto this of Comestor. These be Cassianus words: Cham (filius Noah) qui superstitionibus istis & sacrilegiis fuit arripit infectus, sciens, nullum se posse super his memoriam librum in Arcam prorsus inferre, in qua erat cum patre iusto, &c. Cham (the sonne of Noah) who was infected with these superstitions, and sacrilegious Arts, knowing that he could not bring any booke or memoriall of that nature into the Arke, wherein he was to remayne with his godly Father, caused the Precepts and Rules thereof to be graven in metall and hard Stone.

S. Augustine noteth that Zoroaster was said to have laught at his birth, when all other children weeped; which prefiged the great knowledge which afterward he attained unto: being taken for the Inuenter of naturall Magicke and other Arts; for the Corrupter, <sup>10</sup> saith Plinie and Iustine. But I doe not thinke that Zoroaster inuented the doctrine of the Horoscopes or Natiuities: or first found out the nature of herbs, stones, and minerals, or their Sympatheticall or Antipatheticall workings; of which, I know not what King of Chaldea is also made the Inuenter. I rather thinke that these knowledges were far more ancient, and left by Noah to his sonnes. For Abraham who had not any acquaintance with Zoroaster, (as Iosephus reporteth) was no lesse learned herein then any other in that age, if hee exceeded not all men then liuing: differing from the wisdome of aftertimes in this, that hee knew and acknowledged the true cause, and giuer of life and vertue to Nature and all Naturall things; whereas others (forgetting Gods infinite, dispersed, and vniuersall power) admired the instruments, and did attribute proper strength to the things themselves, (from which the effects were sensible) which belonged to that wisdome, Which being one, and remaining in it selfe, can doe all things, and reneweth all.

Now whether this Zoroaster (ouer-throwne by Ninus) were the same which was so excellent a Naturalist, it is doubted. For Zoroaster the Magician, Clefas calls Oxyartes, whom Plinie findes of a later time. And if Zoroaster were taken away by a Spirit (being in the midst of his Disciples) as some Authors report, then Zoroaster, slaine by Ninus, was not the Magician: which is also the opinion of Scaliger.

Againe, Iosephus and Cedrenus affirme, that Seth first found out the Planets, or wandering Starrs, and other Motions of the Heauens: for if this Art had beene inuented by <sup>30</sup> Zoroaster, hee could not haue attained to any such excellencie therein, in his owne lifetime; but being a man (as it seemeth) of singular iudgement, he might adde somewhat to this kinde of knowledge, and leaue it by writing to posteritie.

But of this Zoroaster there is much dispute: and no lesse iangling about the word and arte of Magicke. Arnobius remembreth foure, to whom the name of Zoroaster, or Zoroastres was giuen: which by Hermodorus & Dionysius seemeth to be but a cognomen, or name of arte, and was as much to say, as astrorum cultor. The first, Arnobius calleth the Bactrian, which may be the same that Ninus ouerthrew: the second, a Chaldean, and the Astronomer of Ninus: the third was Zoroaster Pamphylus, who liued in the time of Cyrus and his familiar: the fourth, Zoroaster Armenius, the Nephew of Hostianes, which followed <sup>40</sup> Xerxes into Greece: between whom and Cyrus there past threescore and eightene yeres. Suidas remembreth a fift, called Persemedus sapiens: and Plato speaketh of Zoroaster the sonne of Oromasdes; which Picus Mirandula confirmeth.

Now of what Nation the first and chiefe Zoroaster was, it is doubted. Plinie and Laertius make him a Persian. Gemisthius or Pletho, Ficinus and Stenochius, make him a Chaldean. But by those bookes of one Zoroaster, found by Picus Mirandula, it appeareth plainly, that the Author of them was a Chaldean by Nation, though the word (Chaldean) was as often giuen to the learned Priests peculiarly, as for any distinguishing of Nations. Porphyrus makes the Chaldeans and Magi diuers; Picus the same. But that this Zoroaster was a Chaldean both by Nation and Profession, it appeareth by his Bookes, which (saith Picus) were written in the Chaldean tongue; and the Comment in the same language. Now that the Magi & they were not differing, it may be iudged by the name of those bookes of Zoroaster, which in an Epistle of Mirandula to Ficinus, hee saith, to be intituled, Patris Ezre Zoroastri, & Melchior magorum oracula.

§. II.

Of the name of Magia: and that it was anciently farre diuers from Coniuring and Witchcraft.

Now for Magicke it selfe; which Arte (saith Mirandula) pauci intelligunt, multis reprehendant; Few vnderstand, and many reprehend; Et sicut Canes ignotos semper allatrant; As Dogs barke at those they know not: so they condemne and hate the things they vnderstand not: I thinke it not amisse (leauing Ninus for a while) to speake somewhat thereof.

It is true that many men abhorre the very name and word (Magos) because of Simon Magus: who being indeed, not Magus, but Goēs, (that is) familiar with euill spirits, vsurped that title. For Magick, Coniuring, and Wicherie, are farre differing Arts, whereof Plinie being ignorant scotteth thereat. For Nero (saith Plinie) who had the most excellent Magicians of the East sent him by Tyridates King of Armenia, who held that Kingdome by his grace, found the arte after long studie and labour altogether ridiculous.

Magus is a Persian word primitiue, whereby is exprest such a one as is altogether conuersant in things diuine. And (as Plato affirmeth) the Arte of Magick is the Arte of worshipping God. To which effect Apolonius in his Epistles expounding the word (magia) saith, that the Persians called their gods magis: whence hee addeth that Magus is either a Persian or a Magian (that is) that Magus is a name sometime of him that is a God by nature; sometimes of him that is in the seruice of God: in which latter sense it is taken, Math. 2. v. 1. And this is the first and highest kinde: which Piccolomini calleth diuine Magick: and these did the Latines newly intitle Sapientes or Wise men: For, the feare and worship of God is the beginning of knowledge. These Wise men the Greekes call Philosophers: the Indians, Brachmans: which name they somewhat needly retaine to this day, calling their Priests Bramines: among the Egyptians they were termed Priests, with the Hebrewes they were called Cabalists, Prophets, Scribes, and Pharisees: amongst the Babylonians they were differenced by the name of Chaldeans: and among the Persians, Magicians: of whom Arnobius (speaking of Hostianes, one of the ancient Magicians) vicieth these words: Et verum Deum merita maiestatis prosecutur, & Angelos ministros Dei, sed verius uenerationi nouit assistere. Idem de uicinis proit terrenos, uagos, humanitatis inimicos; Sothenes (for so M. Felix calleth him, not Hostianes) ascribeth the due maiestie to the true God, and acknowledged that his Angels are ministers and messengers which attend the worship of the true God. He also hath deliuered that there are Devils earthly and wandering, and enemies to mankind.

His Maiestie also in his first Booke of Demonologie c. 3. acknowledged, that in the Persian tongue the word (Magus) imports as much as a contemplator of diuine and heauenlie sciences; but vniuersally so called, because the Chaldeans were ignorant of the true diuinitie. And it is also right which His Maiestie auoweth, that vnder the name of Magick all other vnlawfull Arts are comprehended, and yet doth His Maiestie distinguish it from Necromancie, Witchcraft, and the rest: of all which he hath written largely and most learnedly. For the Magick, which His Maiestie condemneth, is of that kinde whereof the Devils are partie. Daniel in his second chapter nameth foure kindes of those Wise men: Ariels, Magi, Malefici, and Chaldei. Ariels the olde Latine translation calleth Sophists; Vatubus and Paginus, Genethliacos, or Physicos, or Philosophers, or (according to the note of Vatubus) Naturalists; Nempē sunt Magi apud Barbaros, quod Philosophi apud Græcos (scilicet) diuinarum humanarumq; rerum scientiam profitentes; For the Magi are the same with the Barbarians, as the Philosophers are with the Græcians (that is) men that professe the knowledge of things both diuine and humane. The Greeke and the English call them Inchanters, Iunius, Magicians, Cassianus, Coniecturers: in the Syrian they are all foure by one name called Sapientes Babylonis, The Wise men of Babel.

The second sort Vatubus, Paginus, Iunius, and our English, call Astrologers, Hierome and the Septuagint, Magicians. The third kinde are Malefici, or Venefici, in Hierome, Paginus, and the Septuagint, Witches, or Poisoners; in Iunius, Prestitatores, or Sorcerers, as in English. That Witches are also rightly so called Venefici, or Poisoners; and that indeede there is a kinde of Malefici, which without any Arte of Magick or Necromancie vse the helpe of the Deuill to doe mischief, His Maieslie confirmeth in the first Chapter of his second Booke: speaking also in the fifth Chapter of their practice, to mixe the powder of dead bodies with other things by the Deuill prepared; and at other times to make pictures of Waxe, or Clay, or otherwise (as it were Sacramentaliter) to effect those things, which the Deuill by other meanes bringeth to passe.

The fourth, all Translators call Chaldaans: who took vpon them to foretell all things to come, as well naturall as humane, and their euent: and this they vaunted to perform by the influences of the Starres by them obserued, and vnderstood.

Such were, and to this day partly (if not altogether) are the corruptions, which haue made odious the very name of Magick, hauing chiefly sought (as is the manner of all impostures) to counterfet the highest and most noblest part of it, yet so as they haue also to crept into the inferior degrees.

A second kinde of Magick was that part of Astrologie, which had respect to sowing and planting, and all kindes of agriculture and husbandrie: which was a knowledge of the motions and influences of the Starres into those lower Elements.

Philo Iudæus goeth farther, affirming, that by this part of Magick or Astrologie, together with the motions of the Starres and other heavenly bodies, Abraham found out the knowledge of the true God, while he liued in Chaldea: Qui contemplatione creaturarum cognouit Creatorem, (saith Io. Damascen) Who knew the Creator by the contemplation of the creature. Iosephus reporteth of Abraham, that hee instructed the Egyptians in Arithmetike and Astronomie, who before Abrahams comming vnto them knew none of these sciences.<sup>20</sup>

And so doth Archangelus de Burgo, in defence of Mirandula against Garfias: Alexander & Eupolemon dicunt, quod Abraham sanctitate & sapientia omnium præstantissimus Chaldaeos primum, deinde Phenices, deumum Agyptios sacer dotes Astrologiam & diuina docuerit; Alexander (saith he, meaning Alexander Polyhistor) and Eupolemon affirmat, that Abraham the holiest and wisest of men, did first teach the Chaldaans, then the Phenicians; lastly, the Egyptian Priests, Astrologie and diuine knowledge.

The third kinde of Magick containeth the whole Philosophie of nature; nor the drawings of the Aristotelians, but that which bringeth to light the inmost vertues, and brabth them out of Natures hidden hosome to humane vye, Virutes in centro centri latentes; Vertues hidden in the center of the center, according to the Chymists. Of this sort<sup>20</sup> were Albertus, Arnoldus de villa noua, Raymond, Bacon, and many others: and before these in elder times, and who better vnderstood the power of Nature, and how to apply things that worke to things that suffer, were Zoroaster before spoken of: Apollonius Tyaneus remembered by S. Hieronimo to Paulinus; in some mens opinion Numa Pompilius among the Romans; among the Indians, Thestian; among the Egyptians, Hermes; among the Babylonians, Budda; the Thracians had Zamolxis; the Hyperboreans (as is supposed) Abbaris; and the Italians, Petrus Aponensis. The Magick which these men profess is thus defined: Magia est connexio à viro sapiente agentium per naturam cum patientibus sibi congruentibus respondentibus, ut inde opera prodeant non sine eorum admiratione qui causam ignorant; Magick is the connexion of naturall agents and patients; answerable each to other, wrought by a wise man to the bringing forth of such effects; as are wonderfull to those that know not their causes. In all these three kindes which other men diuide into foure, it seemeth that Zoroaster was exceedingly learned: especially in the first and highest. For in his Oracles he confesseth God to be the Creator of the Vniuersall: he beleueth of the Trinitie, which he could not inuestigate by any naturall knowledge: he speaketh of Angels, and of Paradise: approoueth the immortalitie of the soule: reacheth Truth, Faith, Hope, and Loue, discoursing of the Abstinence and Charitie of the Magi: which Oracles of his, Pfellus, Fictius, Patritius, and others haue gathered and translated.

Of this Zoroaster, Eusebius in the Theologie of the Phenicians, vising Zoroasters owne wordes: Hac ad verbum scribit (saith Eusebius) Deus primus incorruptibilis, sempiternus, ingenitus, expers partium, sibipsum similis; bonorum omnium origo, inuener non expellens, optimus, prudentissimus, pater iuris, sine doctrina instituta per doctus natura perfectus, sapiens, sacre nature vicus inuentor, &c. Thus writeth Zoroaster word for word. So the first incorruptible, everlasting, vntogotten, without parts, most like himselfe, the guide of all good, expecting no reward, the best, the wisest, the father of right, hauing learn'd iustice without teaching, perfect wise by nature, the onely inuenter thereof.

Sextus Senensis speaking of the wise dome of the Chaldaans, doth distinguish those wise men into five orders, (to wit) Chascedim, or Chaldaans: Asaphim, or Magicians: Chartumim; (which he translates Arioli, or Sophists) Mechaphhim, or Malefici, or Venefici, Witches, or Posseners; and Gazarim Augures, or Aruspices, or Diiners.

Chascedim were those which had the name of Chaldaans, which were Astronomers: Hij calorum motus diligentissime spectarunt; These did most diligently contemplate the motions of the heauens: whom Philo in the life of Abraham describeth.

Asaphim were in the old Latine translation called Philosophers: of the Septuagint and of Hierome, Magicians: Qui de omnium tam diuinarum quam humanarum rerum causis Philosophati sunt; who discoursed of the causes of all things, as well diuine as humane: of whom Origen makes Balaam (the sonne of Beor) to be the first: but Laertius ascribeth the inuention of this arte to Zoroaster the Persian.

Chartumim, or Inchanters, the Disciples (saith Saint Augustine, Plinie, and Iustine) of another Zoroaster: who corrupted the admirable wisdom of the Magi, which hee receiued from his Ancesters.

Mechaphim, or Venefici, or Witches, are those of which we haue spoken already out of His Maiesties booke of Demonologia.

Gazarim, or Aruspices (after Saint Hierome) which diuine from the entrails of beasts laise for sacrifices: or by Gazarim others vnderstand Augures, who diuine by the flying, singing, or feeding of birds.

By this distinction wee may perceiue the difference betweene those wise men which the Kings of Babylon entertained; and that the name and profession of the Magi among the ancient Persians was most honest. For as Peucer truly obserueth, Præterant religioni Persica, ut in populo Dei Leuite, studijq; vera Philosophia dediti erant: nec quisquam Rex Persarum poterat esse, qui non antea Magorum disciplinam scientiamq; percepisset; The Magi (saith he) were the chiefe Ministers of the Persian Religion, as the Leuites among Gods people, and they were given to the studies of true Philosophie: neither could any be King of the Persians, who had not first bene exercised in the mysteries and knowledge of the Magi. Sixtus Senensis in the defence of Origen against Polychronius and Theophilus, hath two kindes of Magick, his owne wordes are these: Et ne quem moueat præmissa Polychronij & Theophili testi-

rable things by the mutuall application of naturall vertues, agent and suffering reciprocally.

This partition Hierome doth embrace in the first of his Commentaries vpon Daniel: where considering of the difference which Daniel makes betweene these foure kindes of wise Men formerly remembered, hee vseth this distinction: Quos nos harios; ceteri incantatores interpretati sunt, videntur mihi esse qui verbis rem peragunt; Magi, qui de singulis philosophantur; malefici, qui sanguine videntur & victimis, & sape contingunt corpora mortuorum: porro in Chaldeis Genethliacos significari puto, quos vulgo Mathematicos vocant. Consuetudo autem communis Magos pro maleficis accipit, qui aliter habentur apud gentem suam, eo quod sint Philosophi Chaldaeorum: & ad artis huius scientiam Reges quoq; & Principes eiusdem gentis omnia faciunt; unde & in nativitate Domini Saluatoris ipsi primum ortum eius intellexerunt, & venientes sanctam Bethlehem ad-

according to the knowledge of this Art: whence at the nativite of the Lord our Saviour they first of all vnderstood his birth, and comming vnto holy Bethlehem did worship the Child: the Starre from above shewing him vnto them. By this therefore it appeareth that there is great difference betweene the doctrine of a Magician, and the abuse of the word. For though some Writers affirme, that Magus hodie dicitur, qui ex sedere facto vitur diabolis opera ad rem quamcumq; That he is called a Magician now-a-days, who hauing entred league with the Diuell, vseth his helpe to any matter: yet (as our Sauour said of Diuorce) it was not so from the beginning. For the Art of Magicke is of the wisdom of Nature, other Arts which vndergoe that title, were inuented by the falshood, subtilty, & enuy of the Deuill. In the latter there is no other doctrine, then the vse of certaine ceremonies, Per malā fidem. By an euill faith: in the former no other ill, then the inuestigation of those vertues and hidden properties which God hath giuen to his creatures, and how fittie to apply things that worke, to things that suffer. And though by the Iewes those excellent Magicians, Philosophers, & Diuines, which came to worship our Sauour Christ, were termed Mechaschephim, or Mecaphim; yet had they no other reason then common custome therein. Consuetudo autem communis Magos pro maleficiis accipit; Common custome (saith S. Hierome) vnderstandeth witches vnder the name of Magicians: And antiquitie (saith Peter Martyr) by the word (Magi) vnderstood good and wise men. Quid igitur expauit Magi nomen formidolose, nomen Evangelio gratiosum, quod non maleficum & veneficum, sed sapientem sonat & Sacerdotem? O thou fearefull one (saith Ficinus) why doubtst thou to vse the name of Magus, a name gracious in the Gospel, which doth not signifie a witch or Coniurer, but a wise man and a Priest? For what brought this slander to that studie & profession, but onely idle ignorance: the parent of causelesse admiration? Causa fuit mirificentia quorundam operum, quae re vera opera naturalia sunt: verumtamen quia procuratio demonum naturas ipsas vel coniungentium, vel commiscuentium, vel aliter ad operandum expeditum facta sunt, opera demonum credebantur ab ignorantibus haec. De operibus huiusmodi est Magia naturalis, quam Necromantiam multi improprē vocant: The marvellousse of (some) workes, which (indeed) are naturall, hath bene the cause of this slander: but because these workes haue bene done by procurement of Devils, ioyning the natures together or mingling them, or howsoeuer fitting the natures to their working, they were thought the workes of the Devils by the ignorant. Among these workes is naturall Magicke, which men call very improperly Necromancie.

Mirandula in his Apologie goeth further: For by vnderstanding (saith hee) the uttermost actiuitie of naturall agents we are assisted to know the Diuinitie of Christ: for otherwise (to vse his owne words) ignoratis terminis potentia & virtutis rerum naturalium sit nos dubitare illa eadem opera, quae fecit Christus, posse fieri per media naturalia. The termes or limits of naturall power and vertue not vnderstood, wee must needs doubt whether those verie workes which Christ did, may not be done by naturall meanes: after which hee goeth on in this sort: Ideo non haereticè, non superstitiosè dixi, sed verisimilè & Catholice per talem Magiam adiuvare nos in cognoscenda diuinitate Christi: Therefore I said not heretically, not superstitiously, but most truly and Catholically, that by such Magicke wee are furthered in knowing the Diuinitie of Christ. And seeing the Iewes and others the enemies of Christian Religion, doe impudently and impiously obiect, that those Miracles which Christ wrought were not aboue Nature, but by the exquisite knowledgethereof performed: Mirandula a man for his yeeres fuller of knowledge then any that this latter Age hath brought forth, might with good reason auow, that the vttermost of Nature's workes being knowne, the workes which Christ did, and which (as himselfe witnesseth) no man could doe, doe manifestly testifie of themselves, that they were performed by that hand which held Nature herein but as a Pencil, and by a power infinitely supreme and diuine; and thereby those that were faithlesse, were either conuerted or put to silence.

§. III.

That the good knowledge in the ancient Magicke is not to be condemned: though the Deuill here, as in other kindes hath sought to obtrude euill things, vnder the name and colour of good things.

Being therefore it is confessed by all of vnderstanding, that a Magician (according to the Persian word) is no other then, Diuinorum cultor & interpret: A studious obseruer & expounder of diuine things: and the Art of it selfe (I meane the Art of naturall Magicke) no other, Quam naturalis Philosophia absoluta consummatio: Then the absolute perfection of naturall Philosophie: Certainly then it proceeds from ignorance, and no way sorteth with wise and learned men, promiscuè and without difference & distinction, to confound lawfull & praise-worthy knowledge with that impious, and (to vse S. Paul's words) with those beggerly rudiments, which the Diuell hath shuffled in, and by them bewitcheth and befooleth gracelesse men. For if we condemne naturall Magicke, or the wisdom of Nature, because the Diuell (who knoweth more then any man) doth also teach Witches and Poysoners the harmefull parts of Herbes, Drugges, Minerals, and Excrements: then may we by the same rule condemne the Physician, and the Art of healing. For the Diuell also in the Oracles of Amphiarus, Amphilochus, Troponius, and the like, taught men in Dreames what Herbes and Drugges were proper for such and such diseases. Now no man of iudgement is ignorant, that the Diuell from the beginning hath sought to thrust himselfe into the same employement among the Ministers and Seruants of God, changing him selfe for that purpose into an Angell of Light. Hee hath led men to Idolatry as a Doctrine of Religion; he hath thrust in his Prophets among those of the true God; hee hath corrupted the Art of Astrologie, by giuing a diuine power to the Starres, teaching men to esteeme them as gods, and not as instruments. And (as Bunting Bunt, in Chro. obserueth) it is true, that iudiciall Astrologie is corrupted with many superstitions: but the abuse of the thing takes not away the Art; considering that heauenly bodies (as euery generall experience sheweth) haue and exercise their operation vpon the inferiour. For the Sunne, and the Starre of Mars doe drie; the Moone doth moisten, and gouerne the Tides of the Sea. Again, the Planets, as they haue seuerall and proper names, so haue they seuerall and proper vertues: the Starres doe also differ in beautie and in magnitude; and to all the Starres hath God giuen also their proper names, which (had they not influences and vertues different) needed not: He counteth the number of the Starres, and calleth them by their names. But into the good and profitable knowledge of the celestiall influences, the Diuell ceaseth not to shuffle in his Superstitions: and so to the knowledge of the secret vertues of Nature hath he fastened his doctrine of Characters, Numbers, and Incantations; and taught men to beleeeue in the strength of Words and Letters: (which without Faith in God are but Inke or common breath) thereby either to equall his owne with the All-powerfull Word of God, or to diminish the glory of Gods creating Word, by whom are all things.

Moreouer, he was neuer ignorant, that both the wise and the simple obserue when the Sea-birds forsake the shores and flye into the Land, that commonly some great storme followeth; that the high flying of the Kite and the Swallow betoken faire weather; that the crying of Crows and bathing of Ducks foreshew raine: for they feele the Ayre moistened in their Quills. And it is written in Hieremie the Prophet, Euen the Storke in the ayre knoweth her appointed times, and the Turtle, and the Crane, and the Swallow. Hereupon, this enemy of Mankind, working vpon these as vpon the rest of Gods creatures; long time abused the Heathen by teaching them to obserue the flying of Fowles, and thereby to iudge of good or ill successe in the Warre: and (withall) to looke into their entrailles for the same, as if God had written the secrets of vnsearchable providence in the Liuers and bowels of birds and beasts. Again, because it pleased God sometimes by Dreames, not onely to warne and teach his Prophets and Apostles, but Heathen Princes also; as Abimelech to restore Sara to Abraham; because hee admonished Ioseph, and by Dreame informed Jacob, Laban, Pharao, Salomon, Paul, Ananias, the Magi of the East, and others. For as it is remembered in Iob: In Dreames and Visions of the night when sleepe falleth vpon Iob 33. 17. men, &c. then God openeth the eares, that he might cause man to returne from his enterprize: therefore, I say, doth the Diuell also practise his Diuinations by Dreames, or (after Parisensis) diuinitatis imitationes, his mocke-diuitie. This in the end grew so common, as Aristides compiled an Ephemerides of his owne Dreames: Mithridates of those of his Concubines. Yea the Romans finding the inconuenience hereof, because all dreames (without distinction of causes) were drawne to Diuination, forbade the same by a Law, as by the words of prohibition (aut narrandis somnijs occultam aliquam artem diuinandi) it may appeare. Likewise by the Law of God in Deuteronomie, cap. 13. seducing Dreamers were ordered to be slaine. Yet it is to be contented, not that Marcus Antonius was told a remedy in his Dreame for two grieuous diseases that opprest him; nor that of Alexander Macedon for the cure of Ptolemies poisoned wound; nor that which Saint Augustine reporteth of a Millanise, whose sonne (the Father dead) being demanded a debt already paid, was told by his Father in a dreame where the Acquittance lay to discharge it: nor that that of Astages of his Daughter, and many others of like nature. Of the reason of all which, so far as the cause is not in our felues, this place denieth dispute.

§. IIII.

That Daniels mistaking Nabuchodonosors condemning of the Magicians, doth not iustifie all their practices.

But it may be objected, that if such Diuinations as the Heathens commonly vied were to be condemned in them, who tooke on them very many and strange Revelations; how came it to passe that Daniel both condemned the hasty sentence of Nabuchodonosor against the Magicians of Chaldaea, and in a fort forbad it? especially considering that such kind of people God himselfe commanded to be slaine. To this, diuers answers may be giuen. First, it seemeth that Daniel had respect to thoe Chaldeans, because they acknowledged that the Dreame of the King, which himselfe had forgotten, could not be knowne to any man by any Art either Naturall or Diabolicall: For there is none other (said the Chaldeans) that can declare it before the King, except the Gods, whose dwelling is not with flesh: and herein they confessed the power of the Euer-living God.

Secondly, it may be coniectured (and that with good reason) that among so many learned men, some of them did not exercise themselves in any euill or vnlawfull Arts, but were merely Magicians and Naturalists: and therefore when the King commanded to kill all, Daniel perswaded the contrary, and called it a hasty iudgement, which proceeded with furie without examination. And that some of those mens studies and professions were lawfull, it may be gathered by Daniels instruction: for himselfe had bene taught by them, and was called chiefe of the Inchanters: of which some were termed Soothsayers, others Astrologians, others Chaldeans, others Magi or Wise-men: and therefore of distinct professions.

Thirdly, Daniel mistaked and forbad the execution of that iudgement, because it was vnjust. For howsoeuer those men might deserue punishment for the practice of vnlawfull Arts (though not vnlawfull according to the Law of that State) yet herein they were altogether guiltlesse. For it exceeded humane power to pierce the Kings thought, which the Diuell himselfe could not know. So then in Daniels dislike, and hindering of the execution of sentence of death pronounced against the Magicians, there is no absolute iustifying of their practice and profession.

§. V.

The abuse of things which may be found in all kinds, is not to condemne the right use of them.

Notwithstanding this mixture euery where of good with euill, of fall-hood with truth, of corruption with cleanness and purity: The good, The truth, The purity in euery kind may well be embraced: As in the ancient worshipping of God by Sacrifice, there was no man knowing God among the Elders, that therefore forbore to offer Sacrifice to the God of all power, because the Diuell in the Image of Baal, Astaroth, Chemosh, Iupiter, Apollo, and the like was so adored.

Neither did the abuse of Astrologie terrifie Abraham (if we may beleue the most ancient and religious Historians) from observing the motions and natures of heavenly bodies; neither can it dehort wife and learned men in these dayes from attributing those virtues, influences, and inclinations to the Starres and other lights of Heaven, which God hath giuen to those his glorious creatures.

The Sympatheticall and Antipatheticall working of Herbes, Plants, Stones, Minerals, with their other utmost virtues, sometimes taught by the Diuell, and applyed by his Ministers to harmefull and vncharitable ends, can neuer terrifie the honest and learned Physician or Magician from the vsing of them to the helpe and comfort of Mankind: neither can the illusions, whereby the Diuell betrayeth such men as are fallen from God, make other men reiect the obseruations of Dreames; so farre as with a good Faith and a Religious caution they may make vse of them.

Lastly, the prohibition to marke flying of Fowles (as signes of good or euill success) hath no reference at all to the crying of Crows against Raine, or to any obseruation not superstitious, and whereof a reason or cause may be giuen. For if wee confound Arts with the abuse of them, we shall not onely condemne all honest Trades and interchange among men (for there are that deceiue in all professions) but we shall in a short time buy in forgetfulness all excellent knowledge and all learning, or obscure and couer it over with a most scornfull and beggerly ignorance: and (as Plinius teacheth) we should shew our felues ingratus erga eos, qui labore curaque lucem nobis aperuerunt in hunc lucem: For thankfull we should shew our felues towards those, who with paines and care haue discovered vnto vs light in this light.

Indeed not onely these naturall knowledges are condemned by those that are ignorant, but the Mathematicks also and Professors thereof: though those that are excellently learned iudge of it in this sort: In speculo Mathematico verum illud quod in omni scibili quatuor sur, elacet; non modo remota similitudine, sed fulgida quadam propinquitate: In the Glasse of the Mathematicks that Truth doth shine, which is sought in euery kinde of knowledge; not in an obscure image, but in a neere and manifest representation.

§. VI.

Of the diuers kinds of vncleanfull Magicke.

It is true that there are many Arts, if wee may so call them, which are couered with the name of Magicke: and esteemed abusively to be as branches of that Tree, on whose root they neuer grew. The first of these hath the name of Necromancie or Goetia: and of this againe there are diuers kinds. The one is an Invocation at the Graues of the dead, to whom the Diuell himselfe giues answer in stead of those that seeme to appeare. For certaine it is, that the immortall soules of men doe not inhabit the dust and dead bodies, but they giue motion and vnderstanding to the liuing: death being nothing else but a separation of the body and soule: and therefore the soule is not to be found in the Graues.

A second practice of those men, who pay Tribute or are in league with Satan, is that of coniuring or of rayling vp Diuels, of whom they hope to learne what they list. These men are so distracted, as they beleue that by terrible words they make the Diuell to tremble; that being once impaled in a Circle (a Circle which cannot keepe out a Moue) they therein (as they suppose) inforce themselves against that great Monster. Doubtless, they forget that the Diuell is not terrified from doing ill and all that is contrary to God and goodnesse, no, not by the fearefull Word of the Almighty: and that he feared not to offer to sit in Gods seat, that he made no scruple to tempt our Sauour Christ, whom himselfe called the Sonne of God. So, forgetting these proud parts of his, an vnworthy wretch will yet refuse himselfe, that he can draw the Diuell out of Hell, and terrifie him with a Phrase: whereas in very truth, the obedience which Diuels seeme to vse, is but thereby to possesse themselves of the bodies and soules of those which raise them vp: as Hu Maestrie in his Booke aforesaid hath excellently taught: That the Diuels obedience is onely secundum quid, scilicet ex pacto, respectu, et non ex amore. I cannot tell what they can doe vpon those simple and ignorant Diuels, which inhabit iamblicus imagination; but sure I am the rest are apt enough to come vncalled, and alwaies attending the cogitations of their seruants and vassals, doe no way neede any such inforcement.

Or it may be that these Coniurers deale altogether with Cardanus mortall Diuels, following the opinion of Rabbi Auernathan and of Porphyrius, who taught that these kinde of Diuels liued not about a thousand yeeres: which Plutarch in his Treatise, de Oraculorum defectu confirmeth, making example of the great god Pan. For were it true, that these Diuels were in awe of wicked men, or could be compelled by them, then would they alwaies feare those words and threats, by which at other times they are willingly mastered. But the Familiar of Simon Magus when hee had lifted him vp in the Ayre, cast him headlong out of his clawes, when he was fure he should perishe with the fall. If this perhap were done by S. Peters Prayers (of which S. Peter nowhere vaunteth) yet the same prank at other times vpon his owne accord the Diuell played with Theodorus: who transported (as Simon Magus was supposed to haue bene) had the same mortall fall that he had. The like success had Andreas, a principall pillar of the Manichian Heresie, as Sozomenus in his Ecclesiasticall Historie witnesseth: and for a manifest proofe hereof we see it euery every day, that the Diuell leaues all Witches and Sorcerers at the Gallows, for whom at other times he maketh himselfe a Pegasus, to conueigh them in haste to places farre distant; or at least makes them so thinke: For to those that received not the truth (saith Saint Paul) God shall send them strong illusions. Of these their supposed transpositions (yet agreeing with their confessions) this Maestrie in the second Booke and the fourth Chapter of the Demonologie, hath confirmed by vnanswerable reasons, that they are, acereely illusive. Another sort there are who take on them to include Spirits in Glasses and Crystals; of whom Cusanus: Falsi sunt incantatores, qui in ungue & vitro voluit spiritum includere: quia Spiritus non clauditur corpore; They are foolish Inchanters which will shut up their spirits within their nailes or in Glasse: for a Spirit cannot be inclosed by a body.

There is also another Art besides the afore-mentioned, which they call Theurgia, or White Magicke; a pretended conference with good Spirits or Angels, whom by Sacrifice and Inuocation they draw out of Heauen, and communicate withall. But the administering Spirits of God, as they require not any kind of adoration due vnto their Creator: so feeling they are most free Spirits; there is no man so absurd to thinke (except the Diuell haue corrupted his vnderstanding) that they can be constrained or commanded out of Heauen by threats. Wherefore let the professors thereof couer themselves how they please by a professed puritie of life, by the ministerie of Infants, by fasting and abstinence in generall; yet all those that tamper with immateriall substances and abstracted figures, either by Sacrifice, Vow, or enforcement, are men of euill faith and in the power of Satan: For good Spirits or Angels cannot be constrained; and the rest are Diuels which willingly obey.

Other sorts there are of wicked Diuinations: as by fire called Pyromantia: by water, called Hydromantia: by the ayre, called Mantechnia, and the like.

The last (and indeed) the worst of all other is Falcination or Witchcraft: the Practisers whereof are no lesse enuious and cruell, reuengefull and bloody, then the Diuell himselfe. And these accursed creatures haue fold their soules to the Diuell, worke two wayes, either by the Diuell immediately, or by the art of peysoning. The difference betwene Necromancers and witches, this Maestrie hath excellently taught in a word: that the one (in a sort) command; the other obey the Diuell.

There is another kind of petic Witchery (if it be not altogether deceit) which they call charming of Beasts and Birds, of which Pythagoras was accused, because an Eagle lighted on his shoulder in the Olympian fields. But if the same exceeded the Art of Falconrie, yet was it no more to be admired then Mahomet's Dove, which he had vsed to feed with Wheate out of his eare: which Dove, when it was hungrie, lighted on Mahomet's shoulder, and thrust his Bill therein to find his breake-fast. Mahomet perswading the rude and simple Arabians; that it was the Holy Ghost that gaue him aduice. And certainly if Banks had lined in elder times, hee would haue shamed all the Inchanters of the World: for who soeuer was most famous among them, could neuer master or instruct any Beast as he did his Horse.

For the drawing of Serpents out of their Dens, or killing of them in the holes by Inchantments (which the Marsians a people of Italie practised: Colubros disrumpit Marsia cantis: Inchanting Marsia makes the snakes to burst.) That is hath beene vsed it appears, Psalm 58. 6. though I doubt not, but that many Impostures may be in this kinde; and euen by naturall causes it may be done. For there are many Fumes that will either draw them out or destroy them: as womens haire burnt, and the like. So many things may be layed in the entrance of their holes that will allure them: and therein I finde no other Magicke or Inchantment, then to draw out a Mouſe with a peece of rotted Cheefe.

S. VII.

Of diuers wayes by which the Diuell seemeth to worke his wonders.

BUT Vero the end that we may not dore with the Maestries, who maketh two powers of gods: that we doe not giue to the Diuell any other dominion then hee hath (not to speake of his abilitie, when he is the Master of Gods vengeance, as when Egypt, according to Dauid, was destroyed by euill Angels) he otherwise worketh but three wayes. The first is by mouing the cogitations and affections of men: The second second by the exquisite knowledge of Nature: and the third by deceit, illusion, and false semblance. And that they cannot worke what they would, G. Parisiensis giueth three causes: the first, a naturall impotency: the second, their owne reason dissiuading them from daring ouermuch, or indeede (and that which is the onely certaine cause) the great mercy of the Creator, Temens eos ligandos (saith the same Author) velut immanissimas beluas. Saint Augustine was of opinion that the Frogs which Pharoas Sorcerers produced were not naturall, but that the Diuell (by betraying of their senses that looked on) made them appeare to be such. For as Vairus obserueth, those Frogs of the Inchanters were not found corrupted as those of Moses were; which might argue that they were not creatures indeede. Hereof saith Saint Augustine: Neque sane Demones naturas creant: sed quae a Deo creata sunt commutant, ut videantur esse quod non sunt: The Diuels create not any natures, but so change those that are created by God, as they seeme to be that which they be not: of which in the 83. question he giueth the reason. Demon quibusdam nebulis implet omnes mentis intelligentia, per quas aperire lumen rationis radius mentis solet, (that is) The Diuell fills with certaine clouds all passages of the vnderstanding, by which the beame of the minde is wont to open the light of reason.

And as Tertullian in his Booke de anima rightly conceiueth, if the Diuell can possesse himselfe of the eyes of our mindes, and blinde them, it is not hard for him to dazell those of the body. For (out of doubt) by the same way that God passeth out, the Diuell entrench in, beginning with the fantasie, by which he doth more easily betray the other faculties of the soule: for the fantasie is most apt to be abused by vaine apprehensions.

Aquinas on the contrary held that those Frogs were not imaginative, but such indeed as they seemed: not made Magicæ artis ludibrio, which indeed agreeth not with the Art, but (according to Thomas) Per aptam & idoneam agentium & patientium applicationem: By an apt and fit applying of agents and patients. And this I take to be more probable. For Moses could not be deceived by that sleight of false semblance; and Saint Augustine in another case like vnto this (to wit) of the turning of Diomedes his Companions into Birds, per actiua cum passiuis, inclineth rather to this opinion: though I am not perswaded that 3<sup>d</sup> Saint Augustine beleued that of Diomedes. And this opinion of Thomas, G. Parisiensis a man very learned also confirmeth. For speaking of naturall Magicke he vseth these words: De huiusmodi autem operibus est subita generatio ranarum, & pedicularum, & vermium, aliorumque animalium quorundam: in quibus omnibus sola natura operatur, verumtamen additis adiutorijs, quae ipsa semina natura confortant & acciunt, ita ut opus generationis tantum accelerent, ut eis qui hoc nesciunt non opus natura videatur (que tardius talia efficere consuevit) sed potentia Demonum, &c. to which he addeth: Qui autem in his docti sunt talia non mirantur, sed solum Creatorem in his glorifiant: In such workes (saith he) the sodaine generation of Frogs, and Lice, and Wormes, and some other creatures is: in all which Nature alone worketh, but by means strengthening the Seeds of Nature, and quickning them; in such wise that they so hasten the worke of generation, that it seemeth to the ignorant not to be the worke of Nature, which usually worketh more leisurely, but they thinke it is done by the powers of Diuels. But they who are learned in these Arts maruaile not at such working, but glorifie the Creator. Now by these two wayes the Diuels doe most frequently worke, (to wit) by knowing the vertemost of nature; and by illusion: for there is no incomprehensible or vnsearchable power, but of God onely.

For shall we say, he causeth sometimes thunders, lightnings, and tempests; and can infect the ayre, as well as moue it or compress it; who knows not that these things are also naturall? Or may it be objected that he fore-telleth things before they happen, which exceedeth nature, and is no illusion. It is true, that hee sometimes doth it: but how? In elder ages he stole his knowledge out of the predictions of the Prophets: and he foretold the death of Saul, at such time as he was in his owne possession and power to dispose of. And he that hath liued from the infancie of the world to this day, and obserued the success of euery counsaile: he that by reason of his swift motions can informe himselfe of all places, and preparations: he that is of counsaile with all those that studie and practise subuersion and destruction: hee that is Prince of the ayre, and can thence betwixt iudge, then those that inhabit the earth: if hee should not sometimes, yea if hee should not very oftentimes gueſſe rightly of things to come (where God pleaseeth not to giue impediment) it were very strange. For we see that wife and learned men doe oftentimes oftentimes by comparing like causes conceiue rightly of like effects, before they happen: and yet where the Diuell doubteth and would willingly keepe his credit, hee euermore answereth by Riddles, as

Croesus Halym penetrans magnam subuertit opum vim,

If Croesus ouer Halys goe,
Great Kingdomes he shall ouerthrow.

Which answere may be taken either way: either for the ouerthrow of his owne Kingdome, or of his Enemies. And thus far we grant the Diuell may proceed in predictions, which (otherwise) belong to God onely; as it is in Esay: Shew the things that are to come hereafter, that ye may know that ye are Gods; shew us at all times and certainly what is to come. Solius enim diuina intelligentia ac sapientia est, occulta nosse & reuelare; It is onely proper to Gods vnderstanding and wisdom, to know and reueale hidden things.

Qui, Parisiensis legib. c. 24.

§. VIII.

That none was euer raised from the dead by the power of the Diuell: and that it was not the true Samuel which appeared to Saul.

TO conclude, it may be objected that the Diuell hath raised from the dead: and that others by his power haue done the like, as in the example giuen of Samuel raised by the Witch of Endor: which were it true, then might it indeed be affirmed, that some of the Diuels acts exceeded all the powers of nature, false semblance, and other illusions. Iustine Martyr was sometime of the opinion, that it was Samuel indeed, and so was Ambrose, Lyra, and Burgensis; from which authorities those men borrow strength which so beleue. But Martyr changed his opinion; and so did S. Augustine, who at first seemed to be indifferent: For in his questions vpon the Old and New Testament, he accounteth it detestable to thinke that it was Samuel which appeared: and these be his words elsewhere to the same effect: In requie sunt anime piorum a corpore separatæ, impiorum autem pænas luunt, donec istarum ad vitam æternam, illarum verò ad æternam mortem que secunda dicitur corpora reuincant; The soules of the godly separated from their bodies are at rest, but those of the wicked suffer punishment, till the bodies of the iust rise to eternall life, and of the wicked to an eternall and secon<sup>d</sup> death.

Iust. Martyr in collat. cum Tryphone in resp. ad Ortho. quest. 52. Ambros. in Luc. l. 1. c. 1. Lyra in Reg. 1. Aug. ad Simplic. l. 2. q. 3. De Ciuit. Dei, l. 2. c. 8.

Aug. de Ver. Apos. 18. Iust. Mart. ad Orthod. q. 75. Hilari. Prol. 2. in fine. Tert. de anima. in fin. Athanas. q. 13. Chrys. hom. 12. in Euang. Mat.

26. q. 5. Episcopi.

And (besides S. Augustine) Iustine Martyr, Hilarius, Tertullian, Athanasius, Chrysostome, and others, beleueed firmly, and taught it: that the soules of men being once separate from their bodies, did not wander on the earth at all: Credere debemus (saith Cyriil: quum a corporibus sanctorum anime abierint, tanquam in manus charissimi patris bonitatis diuine commendari; we must beleue when the soules of holy men are departed from their bodies, that they be commended to the diuine Goodnesse, as into the hands of a most deare Father. If then they be in Heauen, the power of the Diuell cannot stretch so high: if in Hell, Ab inferno nulla est redemptio; From hell there is no redemption. For there are but two habitations after death: Pnum (saith Augustine) in igne æterno; alterum in regno æterno; The one in eternall fire; the other in Gods eternall Kingdome. And though it be written in Iere Pontificio, that many there are who beleue that the dead haue againe appeared to the liuing; yet the Glosse vpon the same Text findes it ridiculous: Credunt, & male, quia sunt Phantasmatum (saith the Glosse) They beleue, and they beleue amisse, because they be but Phantasmes, or Apparitions. For whereas any such voice hath bene heard, saying, I am the Soule of such a one: Elocutio à fraude atq; deceptione diabolica est; That speech is framed by the fraud and deception of the Diuell, saith Chrysostome. Likewise of the same, saith Tertullian: Ab sit ut animam cuiuslibet sancti, nedum Prophetæ, a demonio credamus extrahi; God forbid that we should thinke that the soule of any holy man, much lesse of a Prophet should be drawne up againe by a Diuell.

It is true that the Scriptures call that apparition Samuel; so doe they the wooden images Cherubims: and false brazen gods are gods, and the like. And whereas thefe of the contrary opinion build vpon that place of the 26. of Ecclesiasticus (a booke not numbered among the Canonicall Scriptures, as S. Augustine himselfe in his Treatise, it it be his, De cura promouendis agenda, confesseth) yet Siracides following the literal sense and phrase of the Scriptures, proueth nothing at all: For though the Diuell would willingly per-swade, that the soules (yea euen of iust men) were in his power, yet so farre is it from the promises of the Scriptures, and from Gods iust and mercifull nature, and so contrarie to all diuine reason, as Saint Augustine (or whosoever wrote that booke before cited) might rightly terme it a detestable opinion so to thinke. For if God had so absolutely forsaken Saul, that he refused to answere him either by dreames, by Vrim, or by his Prophets: it were foolish to conceiue, that he would permit the Diuell, or a wicked Witch, to raise a Prophet from the dead in Sauls respect: it being also contrary to his owne diuine Law to aske counsaile of the dead; as in Deuteronomie 18. and elicwhere. Therefore it was the Diuell, and not the soule of a dead body, that gaue answere and aduice.

But because Helias and Helizems had raised some from the dead by the power of God; those Diuels which S. Augustine calleth ludificatores animantium sibi subiectorum; Mockers of their owne vassalls, casting before their eyes a semblance of humane bodies, and framing sounds to their eares like the voyces of men, doe also perswade their gracelesse and accursed attendants: that themselves both possesse, and haue power ouer the soules of men. E-ludit Diaboles aciem tum spectantium, tum etiam cogitantium, saith L. Viues; The Diuell beguileth the sense both of the beholders, and of those that so imagine. These then are the bounds of the Diuels power, whom if we will not feare, we must feare to sinne. For when he is not the instrument of Gods vengeance, he can touch no man that makes not himselfe his voluntarie vassall: Potest ad malum inuitare, non potest trahere, saith S. Augustine, he can allure, but he cannot inforce to euill. Such as thinke otherwise, may goe into the number remembered by Lucretius:

*Nam veluti pueri trepidant, atq; omnia cæcis
In tenebris metuant: sic nos in luce timemus.*

We feare by light, as children in the darke.

CHAP. XII.

Of the memorable buildings of Ninus, and of his Wife Semiramis: and of other of her Acts.

§. I.

Of the magnificent building of Ninive by Ninus: and of Babylon by Semiramis.

TO come backe to Ninus the amplifier and finisher of Ninive: whether he performed it before or after the ouerthrow of Zoroaster, it is vncertaine. As for the Citie it selfe, it is agreed by all prophane Writers, and confirmed by the Scriptures, that it exceeded all other in circuit, and answerable magnificence. For it had in compasse 440. stadia, or furlongs; the wals whereof were an hundred foot vpright, and had such a bredth as three Chariots might passe on the Rampire in front: these wals were garnished with 1500. Towres which gaue exceeding beautie to the rest, and strength no lesse admirable for the nature of those times.

But this Citie (built in the Plaines of Assyria, and on the banks of Tigris, and in the Region of Eden) was founded long before Ninus time; and (as ancient Historians report, and more lately Nauclerus had the name of Campfor, at such time as Ninus amplified the same, and gaue it a wall, and called it after his owne name.

For these workes of Babylon and Ninive begun by Nimrod in Chaldea, and in Assyria, Ninus and Semiramis made perfect. Ninus finished Ninive, Semiramis Babylon: wherein she sought to exceede her husband by farre. Indeed in the first Age when Princes were moderate, they neither thought how to inuade others, nor feared to be inuaded: labouring to build Townes and Villages for the vse of themselves and their people, without either Wals or Towres; and how they might discharge the earth of Woods, Bryars, Bushments, and Waters, to make it more habitable and fertile. But Semiramis liuing in

in that Age, when Ambition was in strong youth: and purposing to follow the conquest which her husband had vnder-taken, gaue that beautie and strength to Babylon which it had.

§. II.

Of the end of Ninus: and beginning of Semiramis reigne.

His she did after the death of her husband Ninus: who after he had mastered Bactria, and subiected vnto his Empire all those Regions betwene it and the Mediterran Sea and Hellepont (Asia the lesse excepted) and finished the worke of Ninus, he left the World in the yeere thereof 2019. after he had reigned 52. yeeres. Plutarch reporteth that Semiramis desired her husband Ninus, that he would grant vnto her the absolute soueraigne power for one day. Diod. Siculus out of Athenians, and others, speakes of five dayes. In which time (moued either with desire of rule, or licentious liberty, or with the memory of her husband Menon, who perished for her) she caused Ninus her husband to be slaine. But this seemeth rather a scandall cast on her by the Greeks, then that it had any truth.

Howsoeuer Ninus came to his end, Semiramis tooke on her after his death the sole rule of the Assyrian Empire: of which, Ninus was said to be the first Monarch, because hee changed his seat from Babylonia in Chaldea to Ninine in Assyria. Iustin reports, that Semiramis (the better to inuelt her selfe, and in her beginning without murmure or offence to take on her so greata charge) presented her selfe to the people in the person of her sonne Ninus or Zameis, who bare her externall forme and proportion without any sensible difference.

This report I take also to be fained, for which many arguments might be made. But as she ruled long, so she performed all those memorable acts which are written of her by the name of Semiramis, and subscribed that letter which she sent to the King of India (her last challenge and vnder-taken conquest) by her owne name. And were it true that her sonne Ninus had such a stature at his Fathers death, as that Semiramis (who was very personable) could be taken for him; yet it is very vnlike that she could haue held the Empire from him 42. yeeres after by any such subtiltie: (for so long she reigned after the death of her husband:) but it may be true that Ninus or Zameis (being wholly giuen to his pleasures, as it is written of him) was well pleased with his Mothers prosperous gouernment and vnder-takings.

§. III.

Of Semiramis parentage and education, and Metamorphosis of her Mother.

Some Writers (of which Plutarch is one) make this famous woman to haue been of base parentage, calling her after the name of her Countie, a Syrian. Berosus calls her after the name of her Citie wherein she was borne, Semiramis Ascalonitis; of Ascalon, the ancient Citie and Metropolis of the Philistims. Others report her to be the daughter of Derceta, a Curtizan of Ascalon, exceeding beautifull. Others say that this Derceta or Dercetis, the Mother of Semiramis, was sometimes a Recluse, and had professed a holy and a religious life, to whom there was a Temple dedicated, seated on the banke of a Lake adioyning to Ascalon; and afterward falling in loue with a goodly yong man, she was by him made with childe, which (for feare of extreame punishment) she conuayed away, and caused the same to be hidden among the high reedes which grew on the bankes of the Lake: in which (while the childe was left to the mercy of wilde beasts) the same was fed by certaine birds, which vsed to feede vpon or neere those waters. But I take this tale to be like that of Lupa the Harlot that fostered Romulus. For some one or other adioyning to this Lake, had the charge and fosteridge of this childe, who being perchance but some base and obscure creature, the mother might thereby hope the better to couer her dishonor and breach of vow; notwithstanding which she was cast from the top of her Temple into the Lake adioyning, and (as the Poets haue fained) changed by Venus into a Fish, all but her face, which still held the same beautie & humane shape. It is thought that from this Derceta the inuention of that Idoll of the Philistims (called Dagon) was taken: for it is true, that Dagon had a mans face, and a fishes body: into into whose Temple when the Arke of God was brought, the Idoll fell twice to the ground: and at the second fall there remained onely the Trunke of Dagon, the head being broken off: For so S. Hierome hath conuerted that place. Kasabius, Pagninus, and Lutinus, write it by Dagon onely, which signifieth a fish, and so it onely appeared: the head thereof by the second fall being sundred from the body.

For my selfe I rather thinke, that this Dagon of the Philistims was an Idoll representing Triton, one of those imaginarie Sea-gods vnder Neptune. For this Citie being maritime (as all those of the Philistims were, and so were the best of Phanicia) vsed all their deuotion to Neptune, and the rest of the pettie gods which attended him.

§. IIII.

Of her Expedition into India, and death after discomfiture: with a note of the improbabilitie of her vices.

But for her Pedigree, I leaue it to the Assyrian Heralds: and for her vicious life, I ascribe the report thereof to the enuious and lying Grecians. For delicacie and ease doe more often accompany licentiousnesse in men and women, then labour and hazzard doe. And if the one halfe be true which is reported of this Lady, then there neuer liued any Prince or Princess more worthy of fame then Semiramis was, both for the workes she did at Babylon and elswhere, and for the warres she made with glorious success: all but her last enterprize of India: from whence both Strabo and Arianus report that she neuer returned: and that of all her most powerfull Armie there suruiued but onely twentie persons: the rest being either drowned in the Riuer of Indus, dead of the famine, or slaine by the sword of Staurobates. But as the multitude which went out are more then reason hath numbred: so were those that returned lesse then could haue escaped of such an Armie, as consisted of foure millions and vpwards. For these numbers which she leuiued by her Lieutenant Dercetius (saith Suidas) did consist of Foot-men three millions; of Horse-men one million; of Charriots armed with hookes on each side, one hundred thousand; of those which fought vpon Camels as many; of Camels for burden two hundred thousand; of raw Hides for all vses three hundred thousand; of Gallies with brazen heads three thousand, by which she might transport ouer Indus at once three hundred thousand Souldiers: which Gallies were furnished with Syrians, Phenicians, Cilicians, and men of Cyprus. These incredible and impossible numbers, which no one place of the earth was able to nourish (had euery man and beast fed vpon grasse) are taken from the authority of Ctesias whom Diodorus followeth. But as the one may be taxed with many friuolous reports: so Diodorus himselfe hath nothing of certaintie, but from Xerxes expedition into Greece and afterwards: whose Armie (though the same was farre inferior to that of Semiramis) yet had it weight enough to ouerlode the beliefe of any reasonable man. For all Authors consent, that Xerxes transported into Greece an Armie of 1700000. and gathered together (therein to passe the Hellepont) three thousand Gallies, as Herodotus out of the seuerall Prouinces whence those Gallies were taken hath collected the number.

But of what multitude soeuer the Armie of Semiramis consisted: the same being broken and ouerthrowne by Staurobates vpon the bankes of Indus, canitum cananitis extremum: she sang her last song; and (as Antiquitie hath fained) was changed by the gods into a Dove (the bird of Venus), whence it came that the Babylonians gaue a Dove in their ensignes.

§. V.

Of the Temple of Belus built by Semiramis: and of the Pyramids of Egypt.

Among all her other memorable and more then magnificent workes (besides the wall of the Citie of Babylon) was the Temple of Bel, erected in the middle of this Citie, inuironed with a wall carryed fouresquare of great height and beautie, hauing on each square certaine Brazen Gates curiously engraued. In the Core of the square shee raised a Towre of a furlong high, which is halfe a quarter of a mile; and vpon it againe (taking a Basis of a lesse circuit) shee set a second Towre; and so eight in all, one about another: vpon the top whereof the Chaldaans Priests Priests made the obseruation of the starres, because this Towre ouer-topped the ordinary cloudes:

By beholding the ruines of this Towre haue many Trauellers bene deceiued; who suppose that they haue seene a part of Nimrod's Towre, when it was but the foundation of this Temple of Bel: (except this of Bel were founded on that of Nimrod.) There were burnt in this Temple one hundred thousand talents of frankincense euery yeere (saith Herodotus.) This Temple did Nabuchodonosor adorne with the spoiles of Hierusalem; and of the Temple of Salomon: all which vessels and ornaments Cyrus redeliuered. This Temple Xerxes euened with the soile; which Alexander is said to haue repaired by the persuasions of the Chaldeans. I denie not that it might haue bene in his desire to so to doe; but he enioyed but a few yeere after Babylon taken, and therefore could not performe any such worke. The Egyptians (saith Proclus) inhabiting a low and leuell ground, and giuen to the same superstition of the Starres that the Chaldeans were, erected in imitation, and for the same seruice and vse, the Pyramides by Memphis, which were conspicuous vndig, nauigantibus, saith Plinie. Of these Pyramides, Bellonius a carefull obseruer of rarities (who being in Egypt, mounted by steps to the top of the highest) made this report: Le meilleur archer qui seroit à sa sommite, & tirant une fleche en l'air, & peue pourroit l'envoyer hors de sa base qu'elle ne se tombast sur les degrez; The

THE FIRST PART OF THE HISTORIE OF THE VVORLD:

INTREATING OF THE TIMES FROM the birth of ABRAHAM to the destruction of the Temple of Salomon.

THE SECOND BOOKE

CHAP. I.

Of the time of the birth of Abraham: and of the vse of this question, for the ordering of the Storie of the Assyrian Empire.

§. I.

Of some of the successors of Semiramis: with a brieft transition to the question, about the time of the birth of Abraham.

After the death of Semiramis, Ninias or Zameis, succeeded her in the Empire, on whom Berosus Anniacus bestowes the conquest of Bactria, and the ouerthrow of Zoroaster; contrary to Diodorus, Iustine, Orosius, and all other approued writers. For Ninias being esteemed no man of warre at all, but altogether feminine, and subiect to ease and delicacie, there is no probabilitie in that opinion. Now because there was nothing performed by this Ninias of any moment, other then that out of iealousie hee euery yeere changed his Prouinciall Gouernors, and built Colledges for the Chaldean Priests, his Astronomers: nor by Arius his successor, whom Suidas calleth Thuras; but that hee reduced againe the Bactrians and Caspians, reuolted (as it seemeth) in Ninias his time: nor of Aralius, the successor of Arius; but that he added sumptuosity, inuented iewels of gold and stone, and some engins for the warre: I will for this present passe them ouer, and a while follow Abraham, whose wayes are warrantable, (till we meet these Assyrians againe in this story) by whom and by whose issues we shall best giue date to the Kings of Babylon: Abraham liuing at once with Ninias, Ninias, Semiramis, Arius, Aralius, and Xerxes or Balamus. For otherwise if we seeke to proue things certaine by the vncertaine, and iudge of those times, which the Scriptures set vs downe without error, by the reignes of the Assyrian Princes: we shall but patch vp the story at aduenture, and leaue it in the same confusion, in which to this day it hath remained. For where the Scriptures doe not helpe vs, Mirum non est in rebus antiquis Historiam non constare, No maruaile if then in things very ancient, History want assurance.

Plut. in Theseo

The better therefore to finde out, in what age of the World, and how long these Assyrian Kings reigned, as also for other good causes we must first assure the time of Abrahams birth, and in what yeere the same hapned after the flood. Now since all agree, that the fortieth three yeere of Ninus was the birth yeere of Abraham; by prouing directly out of the Scriptures, in what yeere after the flood the birth of Abraham hapned, we shall thereby set all the rest in square and order. But of this time there is much iangling betweene those Chronologers, which follow the Hebrew account, and others: the most part making 292. or 293. yeeres; others 352. yeeres betweene Abrahams birth and the flood: a matter often disputed, but neuer concluded.

Archilochus de temporibus (as we finde him in Annius) makes but 250. yeeres from the flood to Ninus: then seeing that Abraham was borne in the fortieth three yeere of Ninus, according to Eusebius and S. Augustine, it followeth by the addition of those two numbers, that the yeere of Abrahams birth was in the yeere after the flood 293. or as the most part of all Chronologers gather, the yeere 292.

Now, since I doe here enter into that neuer-resolved question, and Labyrinth of times, it behoueth me to giue reason for my owne opinion: and with so much the greater care and circumspection, because I walke aside, and in a way apart from the multitude; yet not alone, & without companions, though the fewer in number: with whom I rather choof to endure the wounds of those darts, which Enuie casteth at novelty, than to goe on safely and sleepily in the easie waies of ancient mistakings: seeing to be learned in many errors: or to be ignorant in all things, hath little diversity.

§. II.

Ap[ro]pos[ite] of all of reasons or arguments, that are brought to proue Abraham was borne in the yeere 292. after the Flood, and not in the yeere 352.

THose which seeketo proue this account of 292. yeeres, betweene the generall flood and Abrahams birth, ground themselves, first on these words of the Scriptures: So Terah liued 70. yeeres, and begot Abraham, Nahor, and Haran: secondly vpon the opinion of Iosephus, S. Augustine, Beda, Isidore, & many of the ancient Hebrews before them: authorities (while they are slightly lookt ouer) seeming of great weight.

From the place of Scripture last remembered, the later Chronologers gather these arguments. First out of the words as they lye, that Terah at 70. yeeres begot Abraham, Nahor and Haran: and that Abraham being the first named, Abraham being the worthiest, Abraham being the sonne of the promise, ought in this respect to be accounted the eldest sonne of Terah, and so necessarily borne in the seuentieth yeere of his life. Secondly, it was of Abraham that Moses had respect, in whom the Church of God was continued, who was heire of the blessing; and not of Nahor and Haran: for the scope of this Chapter was to set downe the Genealogy of Christ, from Adam to Abraham, without all regard of Nahor, and Haran.

It is thirdly obiected, that if Abraham were not the eldest sonne, then there can be no certainty of his age, and so are all tuture times made doubtfull. For it cannot then be proued, that Abraham was borne more assuredly in the 130. yeere of Terah his age, then in the 131. or 132. &c. Moses hauing no where set downe precisely that Abraham went 40 into Canaan that very yeere, in which his Father died.

Fourthly, it is thought improbable, that Terah begot Abraham at 130. yeeres: seeing Abraham himselfe thought it a wonder to be made a Father at 100. yeeres.

§. III.

The answer to one of the obiections proposed, shewing that Abraham made but one iourney out of Mesopotamia into Canaan: and it, after his Fathers death.

TO answer all which obiections, it is very easie, the way being prepared thereto by diuers learned Diuines long since, and to which I will adde somewhat of mine owne, according to the small talent which God hath giuen me. Now forasmuch as the state of the question cannot well be scanned, vnlesse the time of Abrahams iourney into Canaan be first considered of; before I descend vnto the particular examination of these arguments, I will make bold with order and method so farre, as to search into a strange tradition concerning his trauailes, that serueth as a ground for this opinion, and a bulwarke against all that can be said to the contrary.

But it is conceiued that Abraham made two iournies into Canaan: the latter after his Fathers Fathers death, the former presently vpon his calling, which he performed without delay, not staying for his fathers death at Haran: a coniecture, drawn from a place in the Epistle to the Hebrewes, where it is written, By faith Abraham (when hee was called) obeyed God, so hee went out, not knowing whether he went. This supposition (if it be granted) serues very well to vphold the opinion, that can ill stand without it. Let vs therefore see whether we may giue credit to the supposition it selfe.

Surely, that Abraham first departed Charran or Haran after the death of Terah his Father, the same is proued, without the admission of any distinction, by these words of S. Stephen: And after his Father was dead, God brought him into this Land, where ye now dwell, that was, out of Haran into Canaan. Against which place so direct, & plaine, what force hath any mans fancie or supposition, perswading, that Abraham made two iournies into Canaan; one before Terah's death, & another after: no such thing being found in Scriptures, nor any circumstance, probability, or reason to induce it: For if any man out of this place before alledgead can picke any argument, prouing, or affording any strong presumption, that Abraham past into Canaan, and then returned vnto Haran, from whence he departed a second time: then I thinke it reason, that hee be beleeued in the rest. But that he performed the commandment of God after his Fathers death, leaving Ur and Haran for Canaan, it is as true as the Scriptures themselves are true. For 20 after his Father was dead, (saith Martyr Stephen) God brought him into this Land. And, as Beza noteth, if Abraham made a double iourney into Canaan, then must it be inferred, that Moses omitted the one, and Stephen afterwards remembered the other: and whence had Stephen, saith Beza, the knowledge of Abrahams comming into Canaan, but out of Moses? For if Stephen had spoken any thing of those times, differing from Moses, he had offered the Jewes his aduersaries too great an occasion both of scandalizing himselfe, and the Gospell of Christ. Indeed we shall finde small reason to make vs thinke that Abraham passed and repassed those wayes, more often than he was enforced so to doe, if we consider, that he had no other guide or comforter in this long and wearisome iourney, than the strength of his faith in Gods promise: in which if any thing would haue brought 30 him to despaire, he had more cause then cuer man had to fall into it. For he came into a Region of strong and stubborne nations: a Nation of valiant and resolute Idolaters. He was besieged with famine at his first arrual, and driuen to flie into Egypt for reliefe. His wife was olde, and hee had no sonne to inherit the promise. And when God had giuen him Isaac, he commanded him to offer him vp to himselfe for sacrifice: all which discomforts he patiently and constantly vnderwent.

Secondly, let vs consider the wayes themselves, which Abraham had to passe ouer, the length whereof was 300. English miles: and through Countries of which he had no manner of experience. He was to transport himselfe ouer the great riuer of Euphrates, to trauell through the dangerous and barren Desarts of Palmyrena, and to climbe ouer the 40 great and high mountaines of Libanus, Hermion or Gilead: and whether these were easie walks for Abraham to march twice ouer, containing, as aforesaid, 300. miles in length, let euery reasonable man iudge. For if he trauelled it twice; then was his iourney in all 1800. miles from Ur to Haran: and from Haran twice into Canaan. But were there no other argument to disproue this fancie, the manner of Abrahams departing from Haran hath more prooffe, that hee had not animum reuertendi, not any thought of looking backward, than any mans bare coniecture, be hee of what antiquity or authority soeuer. For thus it is written of him, Then Abraham tooke Sara his wife, and Lot his brothers son, and all their substance that they possessed, and the soules that they had gotten in Haran: and they departed to go to the land of Canaan. So to the land of Canaan they came. Now if Abraham brought 50 all with him that was deare vnto him; his wife, and kinsmen, and his, and their goods: it is not probable that he meant to walke it backe againe for his pleasure, in so warme, dangerous, and barren a Country as that was: or if he could haue beene thereto moued, it is more likely that he would haue then returned, when he was yet vntried, and prest with extreme famine at his first arrual. For had his Father beene then aliue, he might haue hoped from him to receiue more assured comfort and reliefe, then among the Egyptians, to whom he was a meer stranger both in Religion and Nation.

What the cause might bee of Abrahams returne to Haran, as I will not enquire of them; that without warrant from the Scriptures haue sent him backe thither, about the

the time of his fathers death: so they perhaps, if they were vrged; could say little else, than that without such a second voyage their opinion were not maintainable. One thing in good reason they should do well to make plaine, if it be not ouer-troublesome. They say that Abraham was in Haran at his Fathers death, or some time after, being then by their account 135. yeeres olde, or a little more. How then did it happen, that hee left quite vndone the businesse, which as we reade, was within foure or fve yeeres after that time his greatest, or (as may seeme) his onely care? Did not hee binde with a verie solemn oath his principall seruant, in whom he reposed most confidence, to trauaile into those parts, and seeke out a Wife for Isaac, his sonne? and doth it not appeare by all circumstances, that neither hee nor his seruant were so well acquainted in Mesopotamia,<sup>10</sup> that they could particularly designe any one woman, as a fit match for Isaac? Surely if Abraham had bene there in person so latelie, as within foure or fve yeeres before, hee would not haue forgotten a matter of such importance; but would haue trusted his own iudgement, in choosng a woman, fit for her piety, vertue, and other desirable qualities, to be linked in marriage with his onely sonne, who was then fve and thirtie yeeres old; before which age most of the Patriarches after the flood had begotten children: rather than haue left all at randome to the consideration of a seruant, that neither knew any, nor was knowne of any in that Country. But let it be supposed (if it may be beleued) that either Abraham forgot his businesse when he was there, or that somewhat hapned which no man can deuise. What might be the reason, that Abrahams man, in doing his Masters errand, was faine to lay open the whole story of his matters prosperitie, telling it as<sup>20</sup> newes, that Sarah had borne to him a sonne in her old age? If Abraham himselfe, a more certaine Author, had so latelie bene among them, would not all this haue bene an idle tale? It were needlesse to stand long vpon a thing so euident. Whether it were lawfull for Abraham to haue returned backe to Haran, would perhaps be a question hardlie answerable: considering how auerse hee was from permitting his sonne to be carried thither, euen though a wife of his owne kindred could not haue bene obtained without his personall presence. Jacob indeed was sent thither by his parents, to take a Wife of his owne linage; nor without Gods especiall approbation, by whose blessing he prospered in that iourney: yet he liued there as a seruant; suffered many iniuries; and finally was driven to conuey himselfe away from thence by flight. For although it bee not a sentence written, yet out of all written examples it may be obserued, that God alloweth not in his seruants any desire of returning to the place, from whence he hath taken, and transplanted them. That brife saying, Remember Lots Wife, contains much matter. Let vs but consider Mesopotamia from whence Abraham was taken, and Egypt, out of which the whole nation of the Israelites was deliuered: we shall finde, that no blessing issued from either of them, to the posteritie of the Hebrewes. When Ezechias was visited with an honourable Embassie from Babel, it seemed that he conceiued great pleasure in his minde, and thought it a piece of his prosperitie; but the prophetic which thereupon hee heard by Esai, made him to know, that the counsaile of God was not agreeable to such thoughts: which more plainly appeared in a following generation, when by the waters of Babylon they sate downe and wept. Concerning Egypt we reade, that Sesac and Neco Kings of Egypt brought calamitie vpon Israel: also that their confidence in the Egyptians succours was the cause of their destruction. Where they were forbidden to returne into Egypt I doe not remember, nor can readily finde; but it is found in the Deuteronomy, that God had said, They should no more returne thay way; which is giuen, as the reason, why their King might not cause the people to returne to Egypt, for the multiplying of his Horses. Whether the Lord had laied any such iniunction vpon Abraham of not returning to Mesopotamia, I cannot say; many things doe argue it probably: that he neuer returned, all circumstances do (to my vnderstanding) both strongly and necessarily conclude.

But because this double passage of Abraham is but an imagination: and that imaginations of men are rather valuable among children, than that they can perswade those of iudgement or vnderstanding: I take it sufficient, that S. Stephen hath directly taught vs, that Abraham left Haran, his Father being dead. And for the rest, when they shew any one Scripture to prooue it, I will beleue as they doe. For all the trauailes of Abraham are precisely set downe in the Scriptures: as first from Ur or Camerina in Chaldea to Haran or Charran: and then from Haran (after his Fathers death) to Sichem; from Sichem he he removed to a mountaine betweene Bethel and Haie: thence into Egypt; from Egypt he returned thither againe, where Lot and he parted, because their flocks and herds of Cattle were more, then could be fed in that part: from thence the second time hee removed to Mamre, neere Hebron: and thence hauing pursued Amraphel, and rescued Lot, hee after inhabited at Gerar, in the border of Idumea; vnder Abimelec: and after nere vnto it at Berfabe, at which time hee was ready to offer vp his sonne Isaac on the mountaine Moriah. But this fiction of his retrait to Haran or Charran, appeareth not in anie one storie, either diuine or humane. Now if it may be supposed, that Abraham had made any former iourney into Canaan, as Leuita his Cabala hath fained, it should in reason bee therewithall beleued, that hee would in those his first trauailes haue provided himselfe of some certaine seate, or place of abiding: and not haue come a second time, with his wife, kinsmen, familie, goods and Cattle, not knowing whereon to rest himselfe. But Abraham when he came from Charran, past through the North part of Canaan,<sup>10</sup> thence to Sichem, and the Plaine of Moriah: where finding no place to inhabite, hee departed thence to Bethel and Haie: and so from Nation to Nation, to discover and finde out some fit habitation: from whence againe, as it is written in Genesis the eleuenth, Hee went forth, going and iourning towards the South: and alwaies vnstayed. By occasion of which wandering to and fro, some say, the Egyptians gaue him and his the name of Hebraei.

Further, to prooue that hee had not formerly bene in the Countrey, wee may note,<sup>20</sup> that ere hee came vnto Bethel and Haie, and at his first entrance into Canaan, God appeared vnto him, saying, Vnto thy seede will I gve this Land, shewing it him as vnto a stranger therein, and as a Land to him vnknowne. For Abraham without anie other provident care for himselfe, beleued in the Word of the liuing God: neither sending before, nor comming first to discover it; but being arriued, hee receiued a second promise from God, that he would giue those Countries vnto him and his seede to inhabite and inherite.

Lastly, what should moue any man to thinke, that Moses would haue omitted anie such double iourney of Abrahams, seeing hee setteth downe all his passages else-where; long and short: as when hee moued from Sichem, and seated betweene Haie and Bethel:<sup>30</sup> the distance being but 20. miles: and when hee moued thence to the valley of Mamre; being but 24. miles: and when he left Mamre, and sate downe at Gerar, being lesse then fixe miles; No, Moses past ouer all the times of the first age with the greater breuitie, to hasten him to the story of Abraham: shutting vp all betweene the Creation & the Flood in fixe chapters; which age lasted 1656. yeeres: but he bestoweth on the story of Abraham fourteene chapters, beginning with his birth in the eleuenth, and ending with his death in the fve and twentieth; and this time endured but 175. yeeres. It hath therefore no face of truth, that Moses forgot or neglected any thing concerning Abrahams trauels; or other actions: or that he would set downe those small remooues of fve miles, and omit those of three hundred. For such a iourney in going and comming would haue mis-<sup>40</sup>trifed some varietie of matter, or accident, worthie the inserting and adding to Abrahams storie.

§. IIII.

The answer to another of the obiections proposed, shewing that it was not unlikely, that Terah should beget Abraham in his hundred and thirty yeere.

NOW touching the obiection, where it is said, that it was very vnlikely that Terah should beget Abraham in his 130. yeere, seeing Abraham himselfe thought it a wonder to haue a sonne at an hundred: this is hardly worth the answering.<sup>50</sup> This wonder is indeed mis-cast, and mistaken: Abraham hauing respect onely to Sarah his wife, when he spake of their many yeeres. For when the Angell said vnto Abraham in his Tent doore at Mamre, Loe, Sarah thy wife shall haue a sonne, it followeth in the next verse, Now Abraham and Sarah were olde and stricken in age, and it ceased to bee with Sarah after the manner of women: therefore Sarah laughed, &c.

So then, in that it is said, it ceased to bee with Sarah after the manner of women, it appeareth that the wonder was wrought on her, and not on Abraham. For Abraham by his second wife Returah had many sonnes after Sarah's death, as Zimron, Ischban, Midan, Midian, Shbak, and Shuah: and the eldest of these was borne 37. yeeres after Isaac: and the yongest yongest 40. yeeres after. What strangenesse then, that Terah being 130. yeeres olde should beget Abraham, will they say, may be gathered from this supposed despaire of Abraham at one hundred yeeres? For Sarah died in the yeere of the world 2145. and Isaac was born in the yeere 2109: and Abraham did not marry Keturah till Sarah was buried. So if we deduct the number of 2109. out of 2145. there remaineth 36. And therefore if Abraham begat 5. sons 36. yeeres after this supposed wonder, & when Abraham was 137. yeeres old: it is not strange that his Father Terah should beget Abraham at 130. And if Booz, Obed, and Iesse, who liued so many yeeres and ages after Abraham, begat sonnes at 100. yeeres, or neere it, it cannot be maruailed at, that Terah begat Abraham at 130; and Abraham others at the same age and seuen yeeres after.

§. V.

The answer to two more of the objections: shewing that wee may haue certaintie of Abrahams age from the Scripture, though we make not Abraham the eldest Sonne: and that there was great cause, why in the story of Abraham his two brethren should be respected.

IT followeth now to speake something to the obiection, which brings Abrahams age altogether in doubt, except we allow him to be the eldest sonne of Terah, and borne when Terah was 70. yeeres old. For Abrahams age being made vncertaine, all succeeding times are thereby without any perfect rule or knowledge.

But this proposition, That we cannot be certaine of Abrahams age, vnlesse we make him the eldest sonne, is false. For it is plaine in the Scriptures, that when Terah was 205. which was the yeere of his death, then was Abraham 75. And if you aske, how I can iudge of times, either preceding or succeeding, by knowing that Abraham departed Haran at that age: I answer, that Saint Stephen hath told vs, that Abrahams departure followed the death of his Father Terah: and Terah died at 205; so as the 75. yeere of Abraham was the 205. yeere of Terah: which knowne, there can be no error in the account of times succeeding. Now to come to the obiection, where it is said, That Moses had no respect vnto Nachor and Haran, because they were out of the Church, but to Abraham onely, with whom God established the Couenant, and of whom Christ descended according to the flesh, &c. I answer, that Moses for many great and necessary causes had respect of Nachor and Haran. For the succession of Gods Church is not witnessed by Abraham alone, but by the issues of Nachor and Haran, were they Idolaters or otherwise. For Nachor was the Father of Bethuel, & Bethuel of Rebecca, the mother of Isaac: and Haran was the parent of Lot, Sarah, and Milcah: and Sarah was mother to Isaac, and grandmother to Jacob: Milcah also the wife of Nachor, and mother of Bethuel, was Jacobs great grand-mother: and the age of Sarah the daughter of Haran is especially noted, in that it pleased God to giue her a son at 90. yeeres, and when by nature she could not haue conceiued. And therefore, though it were not in regard of themselves, yet because both Nachor and Abraham married the daughters of their brother Haran; and because Isaac married Rebecca the grand-childe of Nachor; and Jacob, Lea, and Rachel, the daughters of Laban, the grand-childe also of Nachor: It was not superfluous in Moses to giue light of these mens times and ages. And though sometime they worshipped strange gods, as it is Ios. 24. 2. yet I see no cause to thinke, that they still continued Idolaters. For they beleueed and obeyed the calling of Abraham, leauing their naturall Countrey, and Citie of Ur in Chaldea, as Abraham did, and remoued thence all, except Haran, who died before his Father Terah, ere they left Chaldea; but Lot, his sonne, followed Abraham into Canaan; and Sarah, the sister of Lot, Abraham married. Nachor also, who remained at Charran, gaue his sonnes daughters to Isaac, and Jacob, his owne kinsmen: he himselfe hauing also married in his owne familie; not thinking it pleasing vnto God to mixe themselves with strangers and Idolaters. And that these men at length beleueed in the God of Abraham, it can no way be doubted. For when Laban had seene the seruant of Abraham standing at the Well beside Charran, he inuited him to his Fathers house in this manner: Come in, thou blessed of Iehouah, &c. And when this seruant of Abrahams demanded an answer as touching Rebecca, then answered Laban and Bethuel, and said: This thing is proceeded of Iehouah: meaning that it was the wil of the true God it should be so; wherein he acknowledged Gods prouidence. Likewise in the following verse it is written; Take, see that she may be thy Masters sons wife, euen as Iehouah hath said. This their often vying

Gen. 24. v. 31.

Gen. 24. v. 50.

of the name of Iehouah, which is the proper Name of the true God, is a signe that they had the knowledge of him.

Now although it be the opinion of S. Chrysostome, and some latter writers, as Caictan, Oleaster, Musculus, Caluin, Mercer, and others, that Laban was an Idolater, because he retained certaine Idols, or household Gods, which Rachel stole from him; yet that he beleueed in the true God it cannot be denied. For he acknowledgeth the God of Abraham and of Nachor, and he called Abrahams seruant, blessed of IEHOVAH, as aforesaid. So as for my selfe I dare not auow, that these men were out of the Church, who, sure I am, were not out of the faith.

§. VI.

Thus the naming of Abraham first of the three brethren, Gen. 11. v. 26. doth not proue that he was the eldest: together with diuers reasons prouing that Abraham was not the eldest sonne of Terah.

IN the maine obiection which I answer last, because it seemeth of most strength, by which, those that strue to shorten the times, endeavour to proue that Abraham was the eldest sonne of Terah, and borne in the 70. yeere of Terahs life: grounding themselves first and chiefly on this place of the Scripture, And Terah liued 70. yeeres, and begat Abraham, Nachor, and Haran: To this I say, that although Abraham in this verse be first named, yet the same is no prooue at all that he was the eldest and first borne sonne of Terah. For it is no necessary consequence, that the first named in Scriptures was therefore eldest in bloud and birth, neither doth it appeare, that it pleased God to make especiall choice of the first sonnes in nature and time: for Seth was not the first borne of Adam; nor Isaac of Abraham; nor Jacob of Isaac; nor Juda and Ioseph of Jacob: nor Dauid the eldest of Iesse; nor Salomon of Dauid: as is formerly remembred. But it is written of Noah: Noah was 500. yeeres old, and Noah begat Shem, Ham, and Japhet: shewing that at the 500. yeere of his age hee began to beget the first of those three sonnes. For according to S. Augustine, speaking generally, Nec attendendus est in his ordo natiuitatis, sed significatio future dignitatis: in qua excelluit Abraham. The order of natiuitie is not heere to be respected, but the significatio of the future dignitie: in which Abraham was preferred. And therefore, as in the order of the sonnes of Noah: so is it here, where it is said, that Terah liued 70. yeeres, and begat Abraham, Nachor, and Haran: For it was late ere Terah began to beget sonnes, himselfe being begotten by his Father Nachor at 29. as other his Ancestors were at 30. The like also happened to Noah: for whereas Adam begat Seth at 130; Enosh Kenan at 90; Kenan Mahalaleel at 70; Mahalaleel Iered at 60: Noah was yet 500. yeeres old when he began to beget the first of his three sonnes, as aforesaid. And S. Augustine in the place before cited, rather inclineth to the opinion that Abraham was the yongest of Terahs sonnes, then otherwise: though for his excellencie he was worthily named first. His owne words are these: Fieri enim potuit ut posterior sit generatus Abraham: sed merito excellentie, qua in Scripturis valde commendatur, prior fuerit nominatus. It might be, saith he, that Abraham was begotten later: but was first named in regard of his excellencie, for which in Scripture he is much commended. So as the naming first or last proueth nothing who was first or last borne: either in those issues of Noah, or in these of Terah: Neither hath God any respect of the eldest in nature, as touching his election or spiritual blessing, for Moses nameth first the children of the promise, and the eldest and first in Gods fauour. Pietas ergo vel ipsa potius electio diuina, que committitur secum trahit pietatem, & Deum timorem, primas partes dat Semo in liberis Noah, & Abraham in liberis Thare. Pietas, saith he, or rather diuine election, which doth euermore draw with it or after it, pietie and the feare of God, gaue place and precedencie to Sem among the children of Noah, and to Abraham among those of Thare.

For the rest it is manifest, that Abraham entred Canaan in the 75. yere of his age. And it was in Canaan that Hagar bare him Ismael, when Abraham had liued 86. yeeres. It was at Gerar (the South border of Canaan) that Sarah bare Isaac, when Abraham had consumed an 100. yeeres. It was from the valley of Mamre in Canaan that Abraham rose out, when he rescued Lot and ouerthrew Amraphel: and he had then but the age of 83. yeeres: and it is as manifest that hee parted from Haran after his Father Terah was dead. But if

Terah

Gen. 14.

Terah begat Abraham at 70. yere old, then must Abraham haue bene 135. yeeres when he first set his foote in Canaan: seeing Terah must be dead ere he parted, and so 70. added to 135. made 205, the true age of Terah, which is contrary to all those places of Scripture before remembered. For he entred at 75: he rescued Lot at 83: he had Ismael at 86: he had Isaac at 100. proued by the former places.

Moreover, if Abraham were the eldest sonne of Terah, and borne in the 70. yeere of his age: then had Terah liued till Isaac had bene 35. yeeres olde, and Ismael, 49. both which must then haue bene borne in Mesopotamia, and therein fostered to that age: vnlesse we should either denie credit to S. Stephen, who saith that Abraham departed from Mesopotamia after his fathers death: or else belieue the interpretation of Daniel Angelocrator, who in his Chronologia antoptica, saith it was about his Fathers death: because the Greek word, μετα, may be transported by the Latine sub, as well as by post: which though elsewhere it may be, yet cannot it be so in this place. For it were most improperly spoken, to say that those things were done about Terahs death, which were 60. yeeres before. Wherefore supposing Abraham to haue bene borne in the seuenth yere of Terah, we must giue those times and places of birth to Abrahams children, which no authoritie will warrant; For Abraham had no children in Ur of Chaldaea, nor in Haran: nor in tenne yeeres after his arriual into Canaan. For the yeere of Terahs death, in which Abraham left Haran, was the yeere of the World 2083. and the yeere of Ismaels birth was the Worlds yeere 2094: which maketh 10. yeeres difference. And that Isaac was borne in Canaan, and was to be offered vpon the mountaine Moriah therein, 39. miles from Ber-sabe, where Abraham then inhabited: and that three Angels first of all appeared to Abraham in the valley of Mame, no man doubteth.

And therefore it cannot bee that any of Abrahams sonnes were borne in Mesopotamia; nor while Terah liued; nor in lesse then tenne yeeres after Terahs death: and then consequently was not Abraham the eldest sonne of Terah, nor borne in the 70. yeere of Terahs age.

Gen. 12.

Thirdly, whereas Abraham came into Canaan at 75: if Terah had begotten him at 70, then had Terah liued but 145. for 70. and 75. make 145. which must also haue been the full age of Terah: but Terah liued 205. yeeres: and therefore was not Abraham borne in the 70. yeere of Terah.

Fourthly, the ages of Lot and Sarah make it manifest, that Haran was the elder, if not the eldest brother of Abraham; for Sarah or Ischah wanted but tenne yeeres of Abrahams age: Isaac being borne when Abraham was 100. and Sarah 90. yeeres olde.

It followeth then, that if Abraham had bene the elder brother of Haran, Haran must haue begotten Sarah at nine yeeres olde: for granting that Haran was borne but one yeere after Abraham, and Sarah within ten yeeres as olde as Abraham, then of necessity must Haran beget her, when he had liued but nine yeeres; which were too ridiculous to imagine.

And that Ischah was Sarah, Rab. Solomon affirmeth; both names, saith he, bearing the same signification; and names of principalitie. Again, to what end was the word Ischah or Ischah inserted in this place, if Sarah were not meant thereby? For to speake of any thing superfluous it is not vsed in Gods Bookes: and if Ischah had not belonged to the storie, it had bene but an idle name to no purpose remembered.

Now if it had bene true (as those of the contrarie opinion affirme) that Moses had no respect of Nachor and Haran, who were notwithstanding the parents of Bethuel and Rebecca, the mother of Israel, and of Christ: what regard then had Moses of Ischah in this place, were shee not Sarah, but otherwise an idle name of whom there is nothing else first or last?

The age also of Lot disproueth the eldership of Abraham: for Lot was called an olde man when Abraham was but 83. yeeres: And if Lot were of a greater age than Abraham and Haran were Father to Lot, Sarah, and Milchah; Abraham marrying one of *Haran*s daughters, and Nachor the other, Sarah also being within ten yeeres as old as Abraham: it may appeare to euery reasonable man (not obstinate and preiudicate) that Haran was the eldest sonne of Terah, and not Abraham: who also died first and before his Father left Ur in Chaldaea. Also Lyra reasoneth against the opinion of Abrahams eldership, vpon the same place of Genesis: drawing argument from the age of Sarah, who was but 100. yeeres younger then Abraham himselfe. Lyra his words are these: Siigitur Haran fuit iunior ipso Abraham,

*Abraham, sequitur quod non habebat decem annos quando genuit Saram: imò nec octo: Et: and afterward, Et ideo melius videtur dicendum, quod Abraham fuit ultimo natus de tribus filiis Thare, tamen nominatur primò, propter eius dignitatem: Et quia ponendus erat caput stirpis Et generationis sequentis: Et quia primò facta est ei repromissio expressa de Christo, sicut supra dictum est de Sem, &c. If therefore (saith Lyra) Haran was younger then Abraham himselfe, it followeth that he was not ten yeeres old when he begat Sarah: And therefore it seemeth better to be said, that Abraham was the last borne of the three sonnes of Thare, neuertheless he is named first for his dignitie, both because hee was to be ordained head of the stocke and generation following, and because the promise of Christ was first made vnto him, as before it is said of Sem.*

§. VII.

A conclusion of this dispute, noting the Authors on both sides: with an admonition, that they which shorten the times, make all ancient stories the more improbable.

Therefore agreeeth with the Scriptures, with Nature, Time, and Reason, that Haran was the eldest sonne of Terah, and not Abraham: and that Abraham was borne in the 130. yeere of Terahs life, and not in the 70. yeere. For Abraham departing Charran after Terah died, according to S. Stephen, and that journey by Abraham performed when he was 75. yeeres old, these two numbers added make 205. yeeres, the full age of Terah: seeing that when Terah died, then Abraham entred Canaan. For my selfe, I haue no other end herein then to manifest the truth of the Worlds Story: I reuerence the iudgements of the Fathers: but I know they were mistaken in particulars. Saint Augustine was doubtfull, and could not determine this controuersie. For whatsoever is borrowed from him: out of his sixteenth Booke of Ciuitate Dei, cap. 15. the same may be answered out of himselfe in his five and twentieth question vpon Gen. But Saint Augustine herein followed Iosephus and Isidor: and Beda followed S. Augustine. And it was out of a foolish pride and vanitie, that the Hebrewes and Iosephus sought to make Abraham the first borne: as if God had had respect to the eldest in nature. So did Iosephus together with Nicholas Damascenus (thinking thereby to glorifie the Iewish Nation) make Abraham a king, entitling Sarah by the name of Queene Sarah: and said that Abraham was followed with 318. Captaines, of which euery one had an infinite multitude vnder him; trecentos & octodecem prefectos habuit: quorum singulis infinita multitudo precebat. And that Pharao inuading him with a great Armie, tooke from him his Wife Sarah: Such fables argue that Iosephus is not to be beleeued, but with discrete referuations.

This account of times, allowing no more than 292. yeeres from the Flood to Abraham, is vpheld by many of the Hebrews. But how should wee value the opinion of such Chronologers, as take Amraphel for Nimrod? Surely, if their iudgement in such matters were worthy to be regarded, it would haue appeared in setting downe the succession of the Persian Kings, vnder whom they liued, whose Historie was not so farre remote in time, as these antiquities, nor wanting the light of many good writers. Yet grossely haue they erred therein, and so familiar are their mistakings in all things of like nature, that we seldom finde their opinion rehearsed without the confutation treading on the heeles of it. They of the Romane religion are also generally on the same side: it being a thing vsuall among them, to maintaine whatsoever they haue bene formerly knowne to hold and beleue. Contrariwise, of the more ancient, Theodoret, and some following him: of later times Beroaldus, Codoman, Pencer, Caluin, Iunius, Beza, Broughton, Dod, Gibbons, and Moore, with diuers of the Protestants, hold Abraham to haue bene borne in the 130. yeere of his Father Terah. From these (as in a case not concerning any point in Religion) diuers of the same Religion, and those neuertheless good Authors, as Bucholcerus, Chiraeus, Functius and others, are very auerse heerein, especially Iosephus Scaliger with his Seibus Caluistius, proclaiming Beroaldus an Arch-heretike in Chronologie, and condemning this opinion of his as poysonous. Contrariwise, Augustinus Tornilius a Priest of the Congregation of Saint Paul, a iudicious, diligent, and free writer, whose Annales are newly set forth, very earnestly defends the opinion, which I haue already deliuered, not alledging Beroaldus, nor any Protestant writer, as beeing perhaps vnwilling to owe thanks to heretikes. For my selfe I doe neither mislike the contrary opinion, because commonly, those of the Romish Religion labour to uphold it. Nor fauour this larger account of times, because many notable men of the Protestant writers have approoued it, but for the truth it selfe. To strengthen which, after all these former reasons, and testimonies of Scripture, I will adde thus much more to the rest. First, it is apparent to all men of iudgement, that the best approoued Historians, Diuine and prophane, labour to inuestigate the truth of times, thereby to approue the stories, and forepast actions of the world: and not the truth of histories to approue the times by. Let vs then make iudgement to our selues, which of those two accounts giue the best reputation to the story of the Scriptures; teaching the Worlds new plantation, and the continuance of Gods Church: either that of Iosephus, & those which follow him, who makes but 292. yeeres, 10 or thereabouts, betweene the flood and birth of Abraham: or this other account, which makes 352. yeeres betweene the one and the other: the one taking Abraham to bee the first borne of Thare, in the 70. yeere of his life: the other a younger sonne of Thare, and borne when he had liued 130. yeeres. And if we looke ouer all, and doe not hastily satisfie our vnderstanding with the first things offered, and thereby being fatiared doe slothfully and drowily sit downe; we shall finde it more agreeable rather to allow the reckoning of the Septuagint, who, according to some editions, make it about 1072. yeeres betweene the Flood and Abraham's birth: then to take away any part of those 352. yeeres giuen. For if wee aduisedly consider the state and countenance of the world, such as it was in Abraham's time, yea before Abraham was borne, wee shall finde that it were very 20 ill done of vs by following opinion without the guide of reason, to pare the times over-deepely betweene Abraham and the Flood: because in cutting them too neere the quick, the reputation of the whole storie might perchance bleed thereby, were not the testimonie of the Scriptures supreme, so as no obiection can approach it: and that wee did not follow withall this precept of S. Augustine, That wherefoeuer any one place in the Scriptures may bee conceiued disagreeing to the whole, the same is by ignorance of interpretation mis-vnderstood. For in Abraham's time all the then knowne parts of the World were peopled: all Regions and Countries had their Kings. Aegypt had many magnificent Cities: and so had Palestina, and, and all the bordering Countries: yea, all that part of the World besides, as farre as India: and those not built with sticke, but of 30 hewne stones, and defended with walls and rampiers: which magnificence needed a parent of more antiquitie, then those other men haue supposed. And therefore, where the Scriptures are plainest, and best agreeing with reason and nature, to what end should we labour to beget doubts and scruples, or draw all things into wonders and maruailes? giuing also strength thereby to common canilliers, and to those mens apish braines, who only bend their wits to finde impossibilities, and monsters in the storie of the World and Mankinde.

§. VIII.

A computation of the times of the Assyrians, and others, grounded upon the times noted in the storie of Abraham.

An. mudi 2068
dil. 352. natus
Abraham, Enf.
Aug. de Ciuil.
Dei. l. 10. c. 12.

In this sort therefore for the reasons before alleadged, I conclude, that from the generall Flood, to the birth of Abraham, 352. yeeres were consumed: and taking the Assyrian History with vs, the same number of yeeres were spent from the Flood to the 43. yeere of Ninus: in which 43. yeere of Ninus Abraham was borne: which happened in the yeere of the world, 2009.

Now of this time of 352. yeeres, we must giue one part as well to the increase of those people which came into Shinar, as to those that stayed in the East, to wit, 30. yeeres to Chus, ere he begat Seba: of which, though the Scriptures are silent, yet because those of the same time had that age when they begat their first sonnes, wee may the more safely giue the like allowance to these. For Eber begat Peleg at 34. Peleg Regu at 30. Regu Serug at 32. Now after Seba, Chus begat Hauila, Sabta, Raama and Sabtecha: and Raama begat Sheba and Dedan, before Nimrod was borne, as it appeareth Gen. 10. which S. Augustine approoueth. Giuing then 30. yeeres more to Raama ere he begat Sheba, and five yeeres to the five elder brothers of Nimrod, it may be gathered that 65. yeeres were consumed ere Nimrod himselfe was borne: and that Raamah had that age before any of his sonnes were begotten, it may be gathered, by example and comparison: for Peleg the fourth from Noah, as Raamah was, begat Regu in the same yeere of his life.

Let vs then allow 60. yeeres more after the birth of Nimrod, for two other generations to be brought forth, or else we shall hardly finde people to build Babel: for sure wee are that it was done by hands, and not by miracle: because it displeased God. These two numbers of 65. and 60. make 125. The rest of the time of 131. (in which yeere they arrived in Shinar, whereof there are 6. yeeres remaining) we may giue them for their trauels from the East: because they were pestered with women, children and Cattell: and as some ancient writers haue conceiued, and Becanus of later times, they kept alwaies the 10 mountaine sides, for feare of a second Flood. Now, if we take this number of 131. out of 352. there remains 221. of which number Berosus bestoweth 65. on Belus, and 42. on Ninus before Abraham borne: both which S. Augustine approoueth: which two numbers taken againe out of 221. there remaineth 114. yeeres of the 352. from the Flood to Abraham's birth: which number of 114. necessitie bestoweth on Nimrod.

And if it be obiected that this time giuen to Nimrod, is ouer-long: sure if we compare the age of Nimrod with the rest of the same descent from Noah, it will rather appeare ouer-short. For Nimrod, by this accompt, liued in all but one hundred seueny nine yeeres: whereof he reigned one hundred and twelue: whereas Sale who was the sonne of Arphaxad the sonne of Sem, liued foure hundred three yeeres: and of the same age of the 20 World was Nimrod the sonne of Chus, the sonne of Cham.

Now after Abraham was borne, Ninus reigned 9. yeeres: which added to 43. make 52. Ninus dieth and leaueh Semiramis his Successor.

Semiramis gouerned the Empire of Babylonia and Assyria 42. yeeres, and died in the 52. yeere compleat of Abraham's life.

Ninias or Zameis succeeded Semiramis, and ruled 38. yeeres, in the second yeere of whose reigne Abraham left Mesopotamia.

When Abraham was 85. yeeres olde, hee rescued his nephew Lot, and ouerthrew by surprise Amraphel King of Shinar, or Babylonia. Ninias reigned 38. yeeres, and Abraham 30 came into Canaan but 23. yeeres after Semiramis died: which was the 75. yeere of his age: so that Amraphel may seeme to haue bene this Ninias, the sonne of Ninus, and Semiramis, whose 23. yeere as aforesaid, being the 75. yeere of Abraham, he and his fellow-kings might haue receiued this ouerthrow in the 85. yeere of Abraham, and the 33. yeere of his owne reigne: after which he reigned five yeeres: which make in all 38. But the truth is, that the reasons to the contrary, vrging that this Amraphel could not be Ninias, are not easily answered. Howbeit for the times of the Assyrian Kings, that they are to be ordered as we haue set them downe, according to the times noted by Moses, in the storie of Abraham, it is most certaine; vnlesse we will either derogate from the truth of Moses his computation, which were impietie: or account the whole Historie of Ninus and 40 Semiramis to bee but a fiction; which were to condemne all ancient Historians for fablers.

That Amraphel, one of the foure Kings whom Abraham ouerthrew: Gen. 14. may probably be thought to haue bene Ninias the sonne of Ninus.

And now touching this Amraphel, whom Moses makes King of Shinar or Babylonia, in the 85. yeere of Abraham's life, that is, in the 33. yeere of the reigne of Ninias Zameis the king of the Assyrians, the sonne of Ninus and Semiramis, it is hard to affirme what he was, and how he could be at this time King of Babylonia: Ninias Zameis then reigning there. To this doubt the answer which first offereth it selfe as most probable, is that which hath bene already noted, that this Ninias or Zameis, was no other then our Amraphel: who invaded Traconitis or Basan, and ouerthrew those five kings of Pentapolis, or the valley of Siddim. For the Scriptures tell vs, that Amraphel was King of Shinar, which is Babylonia: and the times before accounted make him to be the successour of Ninus and Semiramis: and it falleth out with the 85. yeere of Abraham's life: wherein he rescued Lot, slew Chedorlaomer, and ouerthrew the rest. True it is, that this Amraphel was not at this time the greatest Monarke: for Chedorlaomer commanded in chiefe, though Amraphel be first named by Moses in the first verse of the 14. Chapter of Genesis. For the Kings of the valley of Siddim, or of Pentapolis, or the five Cities, were the vassalls of Chedorlaomer, and not of Amraphel: as it is written, Twelve yeeres were they subiect to Chedorlaomer, but in the 13. yeere they rebelled, and in the 14. yeere came Chedorlaomer and the kings that were with him: and therefore was Chedorlaomer the principall in this enterprife, who was then King of Elam, which is Persia: Now Persia being seated ouer Tigris, and to the East of Amraphels Countrie; and the other two kings, which were companions with Amraphel, being seated to the West of Shinar or Babylonia: Amraphel, who held Babylonia it selfe, seemeth at this time to haue had no great scope or large dominion. For had Amraphel beene so great a Prince as prophane Historians make Ninus or Semiramis whom he succceeded, he should not haue needed the assistance of three other Kings for this expedition. But though Chedorlaomer were the first and greatest of those foure Kings, (as it is manifest that he was: For these little kings of Sodome, Gomora, &c. were his vassals, and not Amraphels,) yet this makes northe coniecture lesse probable, but that this Amraphel might be Ninus. For it may be, that the great and potent Empire of Assyria, had now (as we shall shew more plainly in that which followeth) receiued a downe right fall, at the time of this warre: though not long before it commanded all the Kingdomes betweene India and the Phenician Sea: to wit, in the times of Ninus and Semiramis.

§. X.

Of Arioch another of the foure Kings, and that Ellas, whereof hee is said to haue beene King, lies betweene Coelesyria and Arabia Petraea.

NOW the two other kings ioyned with Amraphel and Chedorlaomer, were Arioch and Tidal; the one king of Ellas, the other of the Nations. For Ellas, Aquila and Hierome write Pontus: so Tostatus thinketh that it should be Hellepont: which opinion Pererius fauoureth. But this is onely to defend the Latine translation. For as Pontus, so is Hellepont farre distant, and out of the way to send any Armies into Arabia Petraea, or into Idumaea, which Countries these foure King chiefly invaded.<sup>30</sup> Besides that, it is certaine, that the Assyrians (when they were greatest) had neuer any dominion in Asia the lesse. For at such time as the Assyrians feared the inuasion of the Medes and Persians, they sent not into Asia the lesse as commanders: but vfed all the Art they had to inuite Craesus to their assistance: perswading him that nothing could be more dangerous for himselfe, and the other Kings of those parts, than the successe of the Medes against the Assyrians. But examine the enterprife what it was. These Kings (saith the Text) made warre with Bera, King of Sodome, Birsha King of Gomorra, Shinab King of Admath, and Shemebar King of Zeboim, and the King of Bela which is Zoar. All which five Kings had not so much ground as Middlesex: being such a kinde of Reguli, as Iosua found in the land long after: namely, Lords of Cities and small territories adioyning, of which Canaan had three and thirtie, all slaine or hanged by Iosua. Neither can the other Countries, which in the Text they are said also to haue inuaded, be imagined to haue beene at that time of any great power: and therefore to call in Kings from Pontus or Hellepont, had manifested a great impotence and weaknesse in the Kings of Babylon and Persia.

And though it be alleadged for an example, that diuers Kings farre off, came to assist Pompey against Caesar: yet these same examples without like occasions and circumstances, do neither leade nor teach. For there was no cause to feare the greatnesse of these petty Kings, or of the other Countries: But the eyes of the world were fixed on Caesar, and his vndertakings and intents were to all other Princes, no lesse doubtfull then fearefull: But the whole Countrie by these foure Kings mastered in their passage, was afterward giuen to the halfe tribe of Manasse, Gad, and Reuben: a narrow valley of ground lying betweene Jordan and the mountainer of Seir: inclosed by the riuer of Arnon on the South side, and by Lybanus on the North, consisting of the two smal Prouinces of Trachonitis or Basans, and the Region of the Moabites: a conquest farre vnualluable, and little answering to the power of the Assyrian Empire, if the same had remained in any comparable estate with the times of Ninus & Semiramis, who subiected all the great kings of that part of the World, without the assistance of any of the Kings of Hellepont, or any other part of Asia the lesse. But as the vulgar and Aquila conuert Ellas by Pontus: so Symmachus makes Arioch a King of the Scythians, a King indeed, as farre fetched to ioynewith the Assyrians in this Warre, as the World had any at that time.

The Septuagint doe not change the word of Ellas at all, but as they keepe the word Ararat, on the mountaines whereof the Arke did rest, so doe they in this place retaine the Hebrew word Ellas, being doubtfull to giue it a wrong interpretation. And Pererius himselfe remembreth other opinions farre more probable then this of Pontus or Hellepont: yet he dares not auow his liking of them, because the Latine Translation hath it otherwise. For Stephanus de Vrbius a Græcian Cosmographer, findeth the City of Ellas in the border of Cælesyria: and S. Hierome calleth Ellas the Citie of Arioch, as in truth it was. Now although the same be seated by Stephanus in Cælesyria, yet it standeth on the border of Arabia, of which Arioch was king: who formerly ioyned with Ninus in all his conquests, being of the same familie, and descended from Cham and Chus: after whom the name of Arius was by the Hebrew written Arioch: and afterward againe Aretas: as in the Machabees: the kings of Arabia holding that name euen to the time of S. Paul, who was sought to be betrayed by the Lieutenant of Aretas commanding in Damascus. They were Princes for the most part confederate and depending vpon the Assyrian Empire. It is true that wee finde in Daniel, that in the time of Nabuchodonosor, one Arioch was General of his armie, & the principall Commander vnder him, who was a King of Kings: which makes it plaine, that Arioch here spoken of, the sonne of that Arioch Confederate of Ninus, was no king of Pontus, nor of Scythia: regions farre remoued from the Assyrians and Babylonians. The name also of Arioch who commanded vnder Nabuchodonosor is mentioned in Iudith, by the name of King of the Elymeans: who are a Nation of Persians bordering Assyria, according to Stephanus: though Plinie sets it betweene the Sea-coast, and Media: and if any brother of the Arabian Kings or other of that house (knowne by the name of Arius, Arioch, Areta, or Aretas) had the government of that Persian Province called Elymais (as it seemeth they had by the places of Daniel and Iudith) yet the same was in Nabuchodonosors time. But this Arioch heere spoken of may with more reason bee taken for the King of Arabia, the sonne of Arius, the Confederate of Ninus: whose sonnes held league, as their Fathers did, being the next bordering Prince of all on that sidetowards the West vnto Babylonia, and Chaldea: and in amitie with them from the beginning, and of their owne house, and blood: which Diod. Siculus also confirmeth.

§. XI.

Of Tidal another of the foure Kings.

HE fourth King by Abr.aham ouerthrown was Tidal, King of the Nations. The Hebrew writes it Goyim, which Vatablus takes to be a proper name: Lyra of mixt people: Caluin of runnagates without habitation: Pererius out of Strabo findes that Galilee was inhabited by diuers Nations, which were a mixt people: namely of Agyptians, Arabians, and Phœnicians. Nam tales sunt qui Galileam habitant: Such are the inhabitants of Galilee, saith Strabo: and therefore was Tidal called King of these Nations, as they suppose. And it may be so: but the authoritie of Strabo is nothing in this question. For Galilee was not peopled at this time, as it was in the time of Strabo. For when Abraham came into Canaan, the Canaanite was then in the Land, howsoeuer they might be afterwards mixt; which I know not. But there are many petty kingdoms adioyning to Phœnicia, and Palestina; as Palmyrena, Batanea, Laodicene, Apamena, Chalcidice, Castotis, Chalibonitis, and all these doe also ioynethemselues to Mesopotamia, on the North, and to Arabia on the East. And that these Nations gathered themselues together vnder Tidal, I take to be the probablest coniecture.

§. XII.

That Chedorlaomer the chiefe of the foure Kings was not of Assyria, but of Persia: and thus the Assyrian Empire at this time was much impayred.

LASTLY, whereas it is conceiued that Chedorlaomer was the Assyrian Emperor, and that Amraphel was but a Satrape, Viceroy, or Provinciall gouernour of Babylon, and that the other Kings named were such also, I cannot agree with Paterius in this. For Moses was too well acquainted with the names of Assur and Shinar, to call the Assyrian a king of Elam: those kings being in the Scriptures euermore called by the name of Chaldea, Shinar, Babylon, or Assyria: but neuer by Elam; and Chedorlaomer or Kedorlaomer was so called of Kidor, from Cidarim which in the Hebrew signifieth Regale: for so Curtius calleth the garment which the Persian Kings were on their heads.

Neither doe I beleue that the Assyrian or Babylonian Empire stood in any greatnesse at the time of this inuasion, and my reasons are these: First, example and experience teach vs, that those things which are set vp hastily, or forced violently, doe not long last: Alexander became Lord of all Asia, on this side of Indus, in a time of so short a life, as it lasted not to ouer-look what it selfe had brought forth. His fortunes were violent, but not perpetuall. For his Empire died at once with himselfe: all whose chiefe Commanders became kings after him. Tambrlain conquered Asia and India with a storme-like and terrible successe: but to preualent furie God hath adioyned a short life: and whatsoeuer things Nature her selfe worketh in haste, she taketh the least care of their continuance. The fruit of his victories perished with him, if not before.

Ninus being the first whom the madnesse of boundlesse dominion transported, inuaded his neighbour Princes, and became victorious ouer them: a man violent, insolent, and cruell. Semiramis taking the opportunitie, and being more proud, aduenturous, and ambitious, then her Paramor: enlarged the Babylonian Empire, and beautified many places therein with buildings vnexampled. But her sonne hauing changed Nature and Condition with his Mother, proued no lesse feminine then she was masculine. And as wounds and wrongs, by their continuall smart, put the Patient in minde how to cure the one, and reuenge the other: so those Kings adioyning (whose subiection, and calamities incident, were but new, and therefore the more grievous) could not sleepe, when the aduantage was offered by such a successe. For in regno Babylónico hic parum respexit, this King shined little (saith Naclerus of Ninus) in the Babylonian Kingdome. And likely it is that the neckes of mortall men hauing bene neuer before galled with the yoke of forraigne dominion, nor hauing euer had experience of that most miserable and detested condition of liuing in slauerie: no long descent hauing as yet inuested the Assyrian with a right: nor any other title being for him pretended than a strong hand: the foolish and effeminate sonne of a tyrannous and hated Father, could very ill hold so many great Princes and Nations his vassals, with a powerlesse mastering, and a minde lesse industrious than his Father and Mother had vied before him. And hee that was so much giuen ouer to licentious idlenesse, as to suffer his Mother to reigne 42. yeeres, and thereof the greatest part after he came to mans estate: witnessed thereby to the World, that hee so much preferred ease before honour, and bodily pleasures before greatnesse, as he neither indeuoured to gaine what he could not gouerne, nor to keepe what he could not without contentious perilleny.

These Considerations being ioyned to the storie of Amraphel, deliuered by Moses, by which we find that Amraphel King of Shinar was rather an inferiour to the King of Persia, than either his superiour, or equall; make it seem probable, that the Empire of Ninus and Semiramis was at that time broken asunder, and restrained againe to Babylon.

For conclusion I will adde these two arguments confirming the former: First, that at such time as it pleased God to impose that great trauaile vpon Abraham, from E'r in Chaldea to Charran, and then to Canaan, a passage of 700. miles, or little lesse, with women, children, and carriages: the Countries through which he wandred were then settled, and in peace. For it was in the 23. yere of Ninus, when Abraham obeying the voyce of God, took this great iourney in hand: in which time of 23. yeeres after the death of Semiramis, the neighbour Princes had recovered their libertie and former estates. For Semiramis Armie of foure millions, with her selfe vtterly consumed in India, and al her armies and engins of warre, at the same time lost, gaue an occasion and opportunitie euen to the poorest foules and weakest hearted creatures of the World, to repurchase their former libertie.

Secondly, it is affirmed by the best and ancientest Historians, that Arius the sonne of Ninias, or Amraphel, inuaded the Bactrians and Caspians, and againe subiected them: which needed not if they had not bene reuolted from Ninias, after Ninus death. And as Arioch recouered one part, so did Balens or Balaneus, otherwise Xerxes, reduce the rest reuolted to their former obedience. Of whome it is said that he conquered from Egypt to India: and therefore was called Xerxes, i. deft, Victor & triumphator, a conquerour and triumpher, which vnder takings had bene no other then the effects of madnesse, had not those Countries freed themselues from the Babylonian subiection. Now if we shall make any doubt hereof, that is, of the reconquest of Arius and Xerxes, both which liued after Ninus and Ninias, we may as well thinke the rest of Ninus and Semiramis to be but fained: but if we grant this reconquest, then is it true that while Ninus or Amraphel ruled, the Assyrian Empire was torne asunder, according to that which hath bene gathered out of Moses as before remembred.

§. XIII.

That it is not vnprobable that the foure Kings had no dominion in the Countries named, but that they had else-where with their colonies planted themselues: and so retained the names of the Countries whence they came: which if it be so, we neede not say that Amraphel was Ninias, nor trouble our selues with many other difficulties.

HE consent of all writers, whose workes haue come to my perusall, agreeing as they doe, that these foure Kings, Amraphel of Shinar, Chedorlaomer of Elam, and those fellowes, were Lords of those Regions, whereunto they are or seeme intitled: doth almost inforce vs to thinke that the Historie must so be vnderstood, as I haue deliuered. But if in this place, as often elsewhere in the Scriptures, the names of Countries may be set for people of those lands, or if (as Hierome hath it) Chedorlaomer was king of the Elamites, as Tidal was said to be of the Nations, that is, of people either wanting a fixed habitation, or gathered out of sundry regions: then may wee otherwise conceiue of this Historie: remouing thereby so ne difficulties which men perhaps haue bene vnwilling to finde, because they could not finde how to resolute them. For as it had bene a strange coniecture to thinke that Arioch was drawne to assist the Persian, against the Sodomites, as far as from Pontus, where it is very vnlikely that Chedorlaomer was knowne, and almost impossible that the vale of Siddim should haue bene once named: so in true estimation it is a thing of great improbabilitie, that Chedorlaomer, if he were King of Persia alone, should passe through so great a part of the World, as the Countries of Assyria, Chaldea, Mesopotamia, Syria, and part of Arabia, and Canaan, to subdue those foue Townes, whose very names how they should come to his care, being disioyned by so many great Nations of different languages, a wise man could hardly coniecture. And if all the Countries bordering Persia together with the Babylonian himselfe, yea the kingdome of Ellasar, and that of Tidal, so far off removed, were become his dependants; what reason can wee finde that might haue induced him to hearken after Sodom and Gomorah? and when he should haue sought the establishment of his new gorten Empire, by rooting out the posterity of Ninus (as Ninus had dealt by Pharnus of Media, and Zoroaster of Bactria) then to employ the forces of Amraphel, and those other Kings, against foue pectie Townes, leauing Tyrus and Sidon, & the great Citie of Damasco, with many other places of much importance, and farre neerer vnto him, vnsuaded? Now as these doubts which may be alledgged against the first conquest of the vale of Siddim, are exceeding vehement: so are the obiections to be made against his reconquest of these foue Cities, when they had reuolted, as forcible; yea and more, as being grounded partly vpon the text it selfe. For first, what madnesse had it bene in that small Province to rebell against so powerfull a Monarch? Or if it were so that they dwelling farre from him, hoped rather to be forgotten, then that he should come or send to reclaim them: was it not more then madnesse in them, when his terrible armie approached, still to entertaine hope of euasion: yea to make resistance (being themselues a dissolute and therefore vnwarlike people) against the power of all the Nations betweene Ephrates, yea betweene themselues and the riuer of Indus?

Indus: Likewise on the part of Chedorlaomer we should finde no great wisdom, if he knowing the weakenesse of this people, had raised such a world of men against them: whom by any Lieutenant, with small forces he might haue subdued. For the perpetuall inheritance of that little Countrey, was not sufficient to counteruaile one moneths charges of so huge an armie. How small then must his valour haue bene, who with so mighty preparations effected no more then the wasting of that Valley, wherein he left the Cities standing, taking no one of them; but returned well contented with a few prisoners, and the pillage of the Countrey, although he had broken their armie in the field? Now the Scriptures doe not of this inuasion (supposed so great) make any fearefull matter: but compose the two armies, as equally matcht, saying they were foure kings against five: yea, if the place be literally expounded, we shall finde that Abraham slew all these kings, of which great slaughter no Historie makes mention: Neither will the reigne of Ninias, who liued foure or five yeeres longer, permit that he should haue died so soone: neither would Histories haue forgotten the manner of his death, if he had so strangely perished in Syria. Whereby it appears, that these foure kings were not the same that they are commonly thought: nor their forces so great as opinion hath made them. It may therefore well be true, that these kings were such as many others, who in that age carried the same title: Lords and Commanders euery one of his owne company, which he carried forth as a Colone, seeking place where to settle himselfe and them, as was the vsuall manner of those times.

Neither is it improbable, that Chedorlaomer leading a troupe of Persians, Amraphel some people out of Shinar, and Tidal others gathered out of sundry places, might con- sort together, and make the weakest of the Countrey which lay about them, to pay them tribute. Whosoever will consider the beginning of the first booke of Thucydides, with the manner of discoueries, conquests and plantations, in the infancie of Greece; or the manner of the Saracens inuading Africa and Spaine, with almost as many kings as seuerall Armies: or the proceedings of the Spaniards in their new discoueries, passages, and conquests in the West-Indies: may easily perceiue, that it was neither vnusall, for the leaders of Colonies to receiue title from the people whom they conducted: nor to make alliances together, and breake them againe, disturbing sometimes one the other, sometimes helping in pursuit of a conquest. That Amraphel and his associates were such manner of Commanders, it may seeme the more likely, by the sloathfull qualitie of Ninias then reigning in Assyria: whose vnmanlike temper was such, as might well giue occasion to such vnder-taking spirits, as wanted the imployments whereunto they were accustomed, in the reigne of Semiramis, rather to seeke aduentures abroad, than to remaine at home vnregarded: whilst others more vnworthy than themselves, were aduanced. If the content of the whole streame of writers vpon this place make this coniecture disagreeable to the Text, to the authoritie whereof all humane reason must subscribe, then we may hold our selues to the former coniecture, that Amraphel was Ninias: and that the power of his Ancestors being by his sloath decayed, he might well be inferiour to the Persian Chedorlaomer: or if this doe not satisfie, we may say that Amraphel was an Vnder king or Satrapa of Shinar, vnder Ninias; who may be supposed to haue had his Imperiall seat in his Fathers Citie Ninieue: and to haue preferred it before Shinar and Babylon the Citie of his Mother, whom he hated as an vsurper of his right. But if it were possible that in a case not concerning any mans Saluation, and wherein therefore none hath cared to take great paines, all might erre: then can I thinke that the opinion, That these foure Kings were leaders of Colonies, sent out of the Countries named in the Text, and not Kings of the Countries themselves, is most consonant both to the condition of those times, and to the Scripture. And hereto adde that Chedorlaomer seemes rather called a Persian king, then King of Persia: and that Arioch (whose kingdom vndoubtedly was betwene Syria and Arabia) hauing bene a man of action, or being a worthy mans sonne, was very well pleased, to giue passage and assistance, to these Captaines or pettie Kings. These and such like things here to vrge, were but with circumstances to adorne a supposition, which either may stand without them, or if it must fall, is vnworthy to haue cost bestowed vpon it: especially considering, that it is not my intent to employ any more time in making it good, but to leaue it wholly to the Readers pleasure, to follow any of these opinions, or any other, if he finde any that shall seeme better than these. But of what Countries or people focuser these foure were Kings, this expedition is the only publique action that we know of performed by Abraham. And as for other things belonging to his Storie, and of his sonnes, and of his Nephews Esaue and Iacob, as they are registred by Moses, because it is not our purpose, either to stand vpon things generally knowne to all Christians, nor to repeat what hath bene elsewhere already spoken, nor to preuent our selues in things that may hereafter in due place be remembred, we passe them here in silence. And because in this Storie of Abraham and his posteritie, there is much mention of Egypt: by which it appears that euen in the time of Abraham, it was a settled and flourishing kingdom; it will not be amisse in the next place to speake somewhat of the antiquities, and first kings thereof.

CHAP. II.

Of the Kings of Egypt from the first peopling of it after the Flood, to the time of the deliuerie of the Israelites from thence.

§. I.

A briefe of the names and times of the first Kings of Egypt: with a note of the causes of difficulty in resolving of the truth in these points.

Some after the confusion at Babel (as it seemes) Cham with many of his issue and followers (hauing doubtlesse knowne the fertilitye of Egypt before the Flood) came thither and tooke possession of the Countrey; in which they built many Cities: and beganne the kingdom one hundred ninie one yeeres after the deluge. The ancient Gouvernours of this Kingdom till such time as Israel departed Egypt, are shewne in the Table following.

| An. Mundi. | An. dil. |   |
|------------|----------|---|
| 1847.      | 191.     | Cham .                             |

| 2476.      | 820.     | Aenchere or Thermutis       |
|            |          | or Meris .                         |
| 2488.      | 832.     | Rathoris or Athoris .       |
| 2497.      | 841.     | Chencres drowned in the red Sea.   |

The Table and especially the Chronologie, is to be confirmed by probabilities and coniectures, because in such obscuritie, manifest and restless truth cannot be found. For Saint Augustine, a man of exceeding great iudgement, and incomparable diligence, who had sought into all antiquities, and had read the bookes of Varro, which now are lost, yet omitted the succession of the Egyptian Kings: which he would not haue done, if they had not bene more vncertaine then the Sicyonians, whom he remembreth, then whom doubtlesse they were more glorious. One great occasion of this obscuritie in the Egyptian Storie, was the ambition of the Priests: who to magnifie their Antiquities, filled the Records (which were in their hands) with many leafings, and recounted vnto strangers, the names of many Kings that neuer reigned. What ground they had for these reports of supposed Kings, it shall appeare anon. Sure it is that the magnificent workes and and royall buildings in Egypt, such as are neuer found but in States that haue greatly flourished, witnesse that their Princes were of maruailous greatnesse: and that the reports of the Priests were not altogether false. A second cause of our ignorance in the Egyptian History, was the too much credulity of some good Authors, who beleueing the manifold and contrary reports of sundry Egyptians, and publishing in their owne name, such as pleased them best, haue confirmed them, and as it were enforced them vpon vs, by their authority. A third and generall cause of more than Egyptian darkenesse in all ancient Histories, is the edition of many Authors by Iohn Anniius, of whom (if to the censures of sundry very learned, I may adde mine) I thinke thus; That Anniius hauing seene some fragments of those writers, and added vnto them what he would, maybe credited, as 10 an auoucher of true Histories, where approued writers confirme him: but otherwise is to be deemed fabulous. Hereupon it commeth to passe that the account of Authors, either in the Chronologie or Genealogie of the Egyptian Kings, runs three altogether different wayes. The Christian writers, such as are ancient, for the most part follow Eusebius: Many late writers follow the edition of Anniius his Authors: The prophane Histories follow Herodotus, Diodorus, and such others.

§. II.

That by the account of the Egyptian Dynasties, and otherwise, it appears that Chams reigne in Egypt began in the yeere after the Flood, 191.

WHOM reconcile these, or gather out of them the times of the ancient Kings, about whom is most controuerfie, the best meane is by helpe of the Dynasties: of whose continuance there is little or no disagreement. The account of the Dynasties (besides the authoritie of approued Authors) hath this good ground, that it agreeth for the most part, if not altogether with the Histories of the Assyrians, Troians, Italians, and others, &c. The beginning of the 16. Dyn. is ioyned by generall consent, with the 43. yeere of Ninus: in which Abraham was borne. The twelue first Dynasties lasted each of them seuen yeeres, vnder the twelue, which were called the greater gods: so that all the yeeres of their continuance were 84. The thirteenth Dynasty endured fourteene yeeres: the fourteenth 26. the fifteenth 37. These three last, are said to haue beene vnder the 30 three yonger Gods. So the fifteene first Dynasties lasted one hundred sixty one yeeres. As I doe not therefore beleue that the continuance of these Dyn. was such as hath beene mentioned, because Anniius in such wise limits out their time: so I cannot reiect the account vpon this onely reason, that Anniius hath it so: considering that both hitherto it hath passed as currant, and is greatly strengthened by many good reasons. For, whereas Eusebius placeth the beginning of the sixteenth Dynasty, in the yeere of Abraham's birth, as aforesaid: the reckoning is easily cast; by which the summe of 161. yeeres, which according to our account were spent in the fifteene former, being subducted out of the sum of 352. yeeres, which were betwene the Flood and Abraham's birth, shew that the beginning of the first Dynasty, which was the beginning of Chams reigne in Egypt, was in the 191. As also by other probabilities the same may appeare. For it is generally agreed, that the multitude of mankind which came into Shinar, arrived at Babel, Annals diluuii 131. In building the Tower were consumed fourtie yeeres, as Genesis recordeth: whose report I haue elsewhere confirmed with diuers probabilities. That Cham was long in passing with his company, their Wiues, Children, Cattell, and substance, through all Syria then desolate, and full of Bogges, Forrests, and Bryers (which the Deluge and want of culture in one hundred seuentie one yeeres had brought vpon it) no reasonable man will doubt. To this his passage therefore, and the leaving of himselfe in Egypt, we allow twenty yeeres: and these summes being added together, to wit, one hundred thirty one yeeres after the Flood, before they arrived at Babel, 40. yeeres for their stay there, 50 and 20. for Chams passage into Egypt, and settling there, make vp the summe of 191. yeeres; at which time we said that Cham began his reigne in Egypt, in the beginning of the first Dynasty. And to this summe of 191. yeeres if we adde the 161. yeeres of the 15. first Dynasties, as they are numbred in common account, wee shall fall right with the yeere of Abraham's birth, which was An. Dil. 352. And hereto omitting many other reasons, which might be brought to proue that these first Dynasties must needs haue beene very short, and not containing in the whole summe of their severall times times about 161. yeeres: Let it suffice that had they lasted longer, then either must Egypt haue beene peopled as soone as Babel after the Flood: or the Dynasties (as Mercator thinkes) must haue beene before the Flood. That the arrivall at Babel was many yeeres before the plantation of Egypt, after the Flood, enough hath beene said to proue: and that the Dynasties were not before the Flood, the number of the long-liu'd generations betwene Adam and the Flood, which was lesse than the number of the Dynasties, may sufficiently witnesse. Or if we will thinke, that one life might (perhaps) be diuided into many Dynasties, then may this haue beene as well after the Flood, as before: considering that the sonnes of Noah did not in euery Countrey erect such forme of Policie, as had 10 beene vsed in the same ere the Deluge: but such, as the disposition of the people, the authority and power of the Conducter, together with many other circumstances, did induce or enforce them to.

§. III.

That these Dynasties were not diuers families of Kings, but rather successions of Regents, of times many vnder one King.

HE short continuance of the Dynasties, doth shew that they were not severall races of Kings, as the vaunting Egyptians were wont to stile them. What they were it cannot certainly be warranted. For in restitutions of decayed antiquities, it is more easie to denie than to affirme. But this may be said partly vpon good circumstance, partly vpon the surest prooffe, That it was the manner of the Egyptian Kings, to put the gouernment of the Countrey into the hands of some trustie Counsellor, onely reseruing the Soueraignty to themselves, as the old Kings of France were wont to the Masters of the Palace, and as the Turke doth to the chiefe Vizier. This is confirmed, first, by the number of the Dynasties, whereof many are vnder Cham, and more then one vnder Osiris or Mizraim; and must therefore haue beene successions, not of Kings, but rather of Counsaillors and Regents. Secondly, by custome of such Princes borderers to Egypt, as are mentioned in the Scriptures: of whom Abimelech the Philistin in his dealing with Abraham and Isaac about confederation, did nothing without Phicol Captaine of his Hoste, though in taking Abraham's wife, and in his priuate carriage, he followed his owne pleasure. Likewise of Abimelech the sonne of Gideon it was said: Is not he the sonne of Ierubbaal: and Zebul is his Officer? Also Ishobabeth the sonne of Saul, feared Abner the Captaine of the Hoste. Yea, David himselfe hating Joab for his crueltie, did not punish him in regard of his greatnesse, which was such, as was feared euen of Hadaad the Edomite living then in Egypt. Thirdly, this is confirmed by the temper and disposition of Cham, who was lewd, as appeares by the Scriptures: therefore likely both for his owne idlenesse and pleasure, to haue laid the burden of gouernment vpon others; and vpon 40 iealousie, the companion of vnworthinesse, to haue changed his Lieutenants often. About all other proofes is the aduancement of Ioseph by Pharaoh. For Pharaoh said to Ioseph: Onely in the Kings throne will I be about thee: behold, I haue set thee ouer all the Land William. Tyr. de bell. Sacro. l. 19 c. 17. 18. 19. & 20. William, Archbishop of Tyre, who flourished about the yeere of our Lord, one thousand one hundred eightie, affirms that the like or very same forme of gouernment by Viceroyes, was in his time practised in Egypt, hauing there beene in vse (as he beleueed) euer since the time of Ioseph. He plainly shewes, that the Soldans of Egypt were not Lords of the Countrey, how euer they haue beene so deemed: but that they acknowledged and humbly performed the dutie of subiects vnto the Calippe: who residing in a most magnificent Palace in Cairo, did commit the charge, not onely of ciuill gouernment, but the power of making warre and peace, with the whole office & authority royall into the Soldans hands. He that shall read in William of Tyre, the state of the Calippe, or Mulene Elhadech, with the forme of his Court, shall plainly behold the image of the ancient Pharaoh, ruling by a Lieutenant, as great in authority as Ioseph was, though farre inferior in wisdom.

To thinke that many names of such Regents or Lieutenants as Ioseph was, haue crept into the List of the Egyptian Kings, were no strange imagination. For Ioseph's brethren called him, The man that is Lord of the Land, and the Lord of the Countrey: Besides, it is Genesis. 41. 30. 38. not vnlikely that the vaine glorious Egyptian Priests would as easly report him a King to posterity, as ignorant men & strangers deeme him such, vnder whose hand all dispatches of

of importance; and royall managing of the State had passed, whilest that the King himselfe intending his quiet, had giuen his office to another. How strangers haue mistaken in this kinde, the example already cited of Iosephs brethren, doth sufficiently witness. The reports of Priests doe appeare in Diodorus, and Herodotus: each of whom, citing their relations, as good authority, say; Diodorus, that Sesestris was the nineteenth King after Menus; Herodotus, that he was the 332. after Menus: which could not haue beene, if Menus had bene Adam. Therefore we may well conclude, That the Dynasties were not so many races of Kings, but successions of Regents, appointed by the kings of so many sundry linages or sorts of men. Now by whatsoeuer meanes a Dynastie or Regencie continued: whether in one familie, as being made an hereditary office: or in one order of men, as held by faction: sure it is that it was the Kings gift and free choyce, that gaue the office. But the Crowne royall alwaies passed by descent, and not by election: which besides consent of Authors the Scriptures also proue. For whereas Ioseph bought all the land of Egypt for Pharaoh, if the Crowne had passed by election, then should Pharaohs children hereby either haue bene intralled amongst the rest of the people, to the next successor: or inioying their Fathers land, though not his estate, haue bene more mighty then the King: as Land-lords of all Egypt, and the King himselfe their Tenant. Likewise we finde in Exod. 12. that God smote the first borne of Pharaoh, that was to sit on his Throne. And in Esay it is said of Pharaoh: I am the sonne of the ancient King.

Esay 19.

§. IIII.

Of Cham, and his sonne Mizraim, or Osiris.

That the succession of Kings began, and continued in such wise as the Table hath shewed from Cham to Chencres, now it followeth to shew. Egypt is called in the Scripture, the land of Ham. That this name is not giuen to it, because the posterity of Cham did reigne there, but for that himselfe did first plant it, we may gather by many circumstances. For I thinke it is no where found, that the Countries of Cush, Put, or Canaan, as well as Egypt, were called the Land of Ham. Further, it is found in Diodorus Siculus, that Osiris calleth himselfe the eldest sonne of Cham, saying, Nisi pater Saturnus deorum omnium iunior: also, Sum Saturni filius antiquior, germen ex pulchro & generoso ortum: which must needs be vnderstood of Cham: for this Saturnus Aegyptius was Cham: as it is said, that on the monument of Ninus was an inscription, wherein Cham was called Saturnus Aegyptius. Likewise the Temple of Hammon, not farre from Egypt, doth testifie, that Ham resided in those parts: And S. Hierome in questionibus Hebraicis saith, that the Aegyptians themselves did in his dayes call their Countrie Ham: as in foure seuerall places in the Psalmes this Countrie is called the land of Cham. And Oriolius, noting out of Plutarch in Osiride, that in the sacrifices of the Aegyptians this Countrie of Egypt was called Chemia, expounds it for Chamia: ut puto (saith he) à Chamō Notis filio, to which also he addeth out of Isidore, Aegyptum vsq; hodie Aegyptiorum lingua Kam vocari: that Egypt vnto this day in the tongue of the Aegyptians is called Kam. For the beginning and continuance of Chams reigne, the same reasons may suffice to be alleaged, which I haue already giuen in prooffe of the time spent in the 15. first Dynasties: Neither is it strange that the reigne of Cham should last so long as 161. yeeres: considering that Semliued 600: Arphachshad and Shelah each about 400. But strange it had bene, if one Saltis created by Manetho, had in those long-liued generations reigned there 19. yeeres, and with Baon, Apachnas, Apochis, and others of the same brood, obscured the fame and glory of Osiris Orus, and Sesestris. Reineccius in histor. Italia, placeth Mizraim next, otherwise called Osiris according to Diodorus: who saith he was the sonne of Hammon: Krentzhemius saith that Mizraim and Osiris are words of neere affinitie and found in the Hebrew tongue. Howsoeuer it be, we know that Mizraim the sonne of Cham, was Lord of Egypt, and Reineccius citing good authoritie in this case, affirmeth that Egypt is now called by the naturals in their owne language, Mezre. Neither doe I see cause of doubt whether Osiris were the same with Mizraim. It is more necessary, and hard to shew manifestly, how long Mizraim or Osiris reigned. For whereas the yeere of his death is no where precisely set downe, we must be faine to follow probabilities. That hee is not vainly said by Annius his Berosus, to haue begun his reigne at the birth of Abraham, when the Dynastie of the Thebais began, it appeareth, first, by the authoritie of Eusebius: who

auoucheth as much; next by Diodorus, who saith that he inhabited Thebes: which habitation of Osiris there, that it might be cause of that Dynastie, I can well beleue; assenting so farre to Reineccius, who thinke the Dynasties were named onely, according to the seuerall seats of the kings.

§. V.

Of the time when Osiris reigne ended: and that Iacob came into Egypt in the time of Orus the sonne of Osiris.

The death of Osiris, when it was, none can certainly affirme. The onely conclusion that I know is made thus: Lehabim the sonne of Mizraim called Hercules Lybius, made warre in Italy, to reuenge his Fathers death, on the associates of Typhon, in the 41. yeere of Baleus King of Assyria: before which yeere he had made many great warres in Egypt, Phenicia, Phrygia, Crete, Lybia, and Spaine: and hauing ended his Aegyptian warres, left the Kingdom to Orus. Thus saith Berosus, or authors following Berosus. That Orus last of all the gods (as they were stiled) held the Kingdom of Isis, Diodorus Siculus plainly saith: and Plutarch as much; to which all Histories agree. Krentzhemius hercupon inferres, that sixe yeeres may be allowed to the warres, which Hercules made in so many Countries, after the Aegyptian warres were ended: so should the death of Osiris haue bene the 34. of Baleus, when himselfe had reigned 297. yeeres. I thinke that Krentzhemius was a greater Scholler than a Souldier. For surely in those dayes when commerce was not such as now, but all Navigation made by coasting, a farre longer time would haue bene required, to the subduing of so many Countries. An allowance of more time though it would alter his computation, yet would it well agree with his intent: which was (doubtless) to finde the truth. If according to his account the death of Osiris had bene the 34. of Baleus, then must Israel haue come into Egypt but seuen yeeres before the death of Osiris: and haue liued there in the reigne of Typhon. A thing not easily beleueed. For it was the same king who advanced Ioseph, bade him send for his Father; and gaue him leaue to goe into Canaan, to the performance of his Fathers funerall: as may easily be gathered out of the booke of Genesis. Whereas therefore the reigne of Osiris cannot be extended by any possible allowance in account of times, beyond the seuenth yeere of Israels comming into Egypt: we must needs cut off 23. yeeres from that number, which Krentzhemius coniectures his reigne to haue continued: namely seuen which hee should haue liued after Iacobs comming into Egypt; nine in which Ioseph had there flourished, ere his fathers comming: and other seuen in which Typhon and Hercules had reigned after the death of Osiris, yet before Iosephs aduancement.

Neither will this disagree with the time of Hercules Lybius his wars. For the war which Hercules made in Italy, is said to haue indured 100. yeeres: After which proportion we may well giue not onely sixe yeeres, as Krentzhemius doth, but 23. more to so many wars in so many and so far distant Countries, as are named before: yea, by this proportion we may attribute vnto Orus the 13. yeeres, which passed betwene the time of Iosephs being sold into Egypt, vnto his aduancement: considering that Putiphar who bought him, & whose daughter he may seeme to haue married, continued all that while chiefe Steward vnto Pharaoh; a thing not likely to haue bene, if so violent alterations had hapned the whilest in Egypt, as the tyrannous vsurpation of Typhon must needs haue brought in. If citing some fragment of a lost old author, I should confidently say, that Putiphar for his faithfulness to Orus, the sonne of Osiris, was by him in the beginning of his reigne made his chiefe Steward: at which time buying Ioseph, and finding him a iust man, and one vnder whose hand all things did prosper, he rather committed his estate into Iosephs hands, than vnto any of his Aegyptian followers (many of whom he had found either fall-harted, or weak and vn lucky in the troublesome dayes of Typhon) I know not what could be objected against this. Perhaps I might proceed further and say, That when the saying of Ioseph pleased Pharaoh, and all his seruants; then Putiphar Priest of On, being chiefe Officer to Pharaoh, did acknowledge in Ioseph, the ancient graces of God, and his iniurious imprisonment: whereupon he gaue him his daughter to wife; and being old, resigned his office of chiefe Steward vnto him; who afterward in regard of Putiphar, did fauour the Priests; when he bought the lands of all other Aegyptians. This might appeare to some a tale not

vnlike to the stierly booke of Asenath, Putiphar's daughter: but vnto such as consider that God workes visually by meanes: and that Putiphar was the Steward of that king, vnder whom Jacob died: it would seeme a matter not probable, had it an Author of sufficient credit to auouch it. Concerning the warres of Hercules, in which by this reckoning he should haue spent 42. yeeres after he left Egypt, er he began in Italie, it is a circumstance which (the length of his Italian wars considered, and his former enterprises and achievements proportioned to them) doth not make against vs, but for vs: or if it were against vs, yet could it not so weaken our supposition, as these probabilities collected out of the vndisputable truth of Scripture doe confirme it. Neuerthelesse I freely grant that all these proofes are no other, than such as may be gathered out of Authors, not well agreeing, nor to be reconciled in such obscurity, otherwise than by likelihoods, answerable to the holy Text.

§. VI.

Of Typhon, Hercules, Egyptus, Orus, and the two Sefostres, successively reigning after Mizraim: and of diuers errors about the former Sefostres.

Concerning the reigne of Typhon, and of Hercules, I finde none that precisely doth define how long either of them continued. Daniel Angelocrator giueth three yeeres to Typhon, omitting Hercules. But he is so peremptorie without proofe, as it is owneword without sufficient authority, in many points very questionable, alleging no witnesse, but as it were saying, Tell me ipso: yet herein we may thinke him to speake probably, forasmuch as the learned Krentzhemius affirmeth, that Hercules did very soone vnder take his Fathers reuenge: and was not long in performing it: and that leauing Egypt to his brother, he followed other warres, in the same quarrell, as hath bene shewed before. True it is, that I cannot collect (as Krentzhemius doth) out of Berosus, that Hercules reigned after Typhon: yet seeing Aueninus a follower of Berosus hath it so, I will also beleue it. That in the reigne of Typhon and Hercules, seuen yeeres were spent, howsoeuer diuided betwene them, I gather out of Krentzhemius onely, who placeth the beginning of Orus seuen yeeres after the death of Osiris: forgetting to set downe his reasons, which in a matter so probable I thinke he wanted not. Now whereas he alloweth 90. yeeres of the eighteenth Dynastie to Osiris, Typhon, Hercules, and Orus: it seemes that the reigne of Orus lasted 115. yeeres. From the death of Orus to the departure of Israel out of Egypt, there passed 122. yeeres by our account: who (according to Berosus and others) thinke that Abraham was borne in the 130. yeere of Terah, and thereupon reckon thus. From the end of the Flood to the birth of Abraham ————— 352 which summe diuers other wayes may be collected. Since therefore to the departure out of Egypt, there doe remaine (as is aforesaid) onely 122. yeeres from the death of Orus: we are now to consider how many of them are to be allowed vnto Sefostres or Sesonchusis: who is placed next vnto Orus, by authority of the Scholastes Apollonij: not without good probability. For this great king or conquerour, is by many Histories recorded to haue ouer-run a great part of Asia: to haue built a fleet of ships on the red Sea: and so to haue entred into India: likewise with another fleet on the middle-earth Seas, to haue passed into Europe, and subdued many Nations. This is he (as Reineccius iudgeth) whom Iustine erring in account of his time calleth Vexoris: For Iustine placeth Vexoris in ages before Ninus: whereby it would follow that Sefostres, if he were Vexoris, was more ancient then was Osiris (otherwise Mizraim) a thing altogether vnlikely. Certaine it is that after the departure of Israel out of Egypt, no one Pharaoh came into the land of Canaan (which lieth in the way from Egypt into Asia) till the Father in law of Salomon, Pharaoh Vaphres, rooke Gerar, and gaue it to his daughter: (as wee may reade more at large in the holy historie of the Bible) after which time Sesac oppressed Rehoboam, and Necho sought passage through the land of Israel, when hee made his expedition against the Chaldeans. Of King Vaphres and Necho it is out of question, that neither of them was the great King Sefostres. Of Sesac it is doubted by some, forasmuch as he came into Iudas with with a great armie. Reineccius propounding the doubt, leaueth it vndecided; vnlesse it be sufficient proofe of his owne opinion, that he himselfe placeth Sefostres next to Orus: following the Scholastes Apollonij. But further answer may be made to shew that they were not one. For, as Iustine witnesseth, Sefostres, otherwise Vexoris, made warre on people farre removed, abstaining from his neighbours. Sesac came vp purposely against Hiernusalem. Sefostres, as Diodorus witnesseth, had but 24000. horse: Sesac had 60000. Sefostres had 8020. Chariots, Sesac but 1200. Sefostres made his expedition for no priuate purpose, but to get a great name: Sesac, as most agree, had no other purpose then to succour Ieroboam, and giue him countenance in his new reigne; whom he had fauoured euen against Salomon: therefore Sefostres must needs haue reigned whilst Israel abode in Egypt.

Whereas Krentzhemius collecteth out of Herodotus, and Diodorus, that one Menas, or Menis, was next to Orus: because those Historians affirme that he reigned next after the gods; it moueth me nothing. For Osiris did succede those fifteene gods, namely, the twelue greater, and three lesser: himselfe also (as the learned Reineccius noteth) being called Menas. Which name, as also Menaus, and Menis, were titles of dignitie: though mistaken by some as proper names. Krentzhemius doth very probably gather, that Menas was Mercurius Ter-maximus; the Hebrew word Meni signifying an Arithmetician, which name Ter-maximus might well be attributed to Osiris, who was a great Conquerour, Philosopher, and benefactor to mankind, by giuing good Lawes, and teaching profitable Arts. In prowess and great vnder takings Sefostres was no whit inferiour to Osiris. For he sought victory not for gaine, but for honour onely: and being well contented, that many Nations had acknowledged his power, and submitted themselves to his will and royall disposition, leauing them in a manner to their liberty, returned into Egypt. Soone vpon his returne he was endangered by a great Treason, the house in which hee was, being by his owne brother purposely fired: which neuer thelesse he is said to haue escaped, and to haue reigned in all thirte three yeeres: after which time he chose rather to die then to liue; because he fell blinde. Both Herodotus, and Diodorus, affirme that Sefostres left a sonne, whose name was Pheron or Pherones: who afterwards tooke the name of Sefostres; but was nothing like to his Father in glory: for he shortly fell blinde. The cause of his blindness Herodotus attributes to his assaulting the River Nilus with a iaculine: which tale Diodorus, hauing likewise heard, yet reports as a fable, saying that perhaps he tooke the disease naturally from his Father. How long this man reigned it is no where expressed: yet forasmuch as Orus the second, (otherwise Bufris) who succeeded him, began 14. yeeres after that this Sefostres had bene king, it must needs be that this reigned 14. yeeres at least. That Bufris began not vntill these 14. yeeres at least were expired, the very account of time from the first of Bufris, to the departure of Israel out of Egypt plainly shewes, being almost generally agreed vpon; to haue bene 75. yeeres. That none came betwene Sefostres the second and Bufris or Orus the second, it stands onely vpon probabilities: which are these. After Sefostres had reigned somewhile, he fell blinde: after certaine yeeres he recovered his sight, as is said: which may haue bene true, but is more like to haue bene a fable: surely the manner of his recovery as it is set downe, is very fabulous: namely that by looking vpon a woman, or washing his eyes with her water, who had onely knowne her owne husband, he got his sight againe. As the time of his reigne, before his blindness, and when he was well againe (if euer he were) may haue taken vp a good part of 14. yeeres: so his workes which were great, doe much more strongly argue, that his reigne was not very short. His words are largely set downe by Herodotus, and Diodorus: a part of which may seeme to haue bene the finishing of that which his Father had begun, about the channels and flues of Nilus: whom I thinke herather frighted, (as his Father had done) with spades and shouels, then with darts, and iaculins; and by his diligent ouer-sight of that worke, was like enough to lose both his eye-sight and his peoples loue; whom his Father had very busily employed in excessive labour about it.

§. VII.

Of Busiris the first oppressor of the Israelites; and of his successor Queene Thermutis that tooke up Moses out of the water.

And herein (if I may presume to coniecture) Busiris, who was afterwards king, is like to haue dealt with him, as Ieroboam did with the sonne of Salomon. For that Busiris himselfe was much addicted to magnificent workes, it well appeared, by the drudgerie wherewith he wearied the children of Israel in his buildings: If therefore he were employed by the great Sesostris, as Ieroboam was by Salomon, in the oversight of those businesses, he had good opportunitie to worke his greatesse with the king by industry: and afterward with the people by incensing them against their new king: as Ieroboam did. For what the multitude will endure at one Princes hands, they will not at anothers: vnlesse hee haue either an equall spirit, or a surer foundation. If moreover he fought to deriue all the paine and labour of publike workes from the Egyptians, to the Israelites: he surely did that which to his owne people was very plausible: who (as appears in Exodus) were nothing slacke in fulfilling the kings cruelty. Now that Orus the second, or Busiris was the king that first oppressed Israel, and made the Edict of drowning the Hebrew children, which (saith Cedrenus) lasted ten moneths: it is a common opinion of many great and most learned writers, who also thinke that hereupon grew the fable of Busiris sacrificing strangers. It is also a common interpretation of that place, Exod. 1. that the King who knew not Ioseph, was a king of a new family. That Busiris was of a new family, Reineccius doth shew; who also thinke him Author of the bloody edict. Neuertheless, true it is, that Busiris, according to all mens computation, began his reigne five yeeres after the birth of Moses; before whose birth it is most manifest, that the Law was made, and much more that the persecution began; which Buning thinke to haue lasted 87. yeeres, ere the departure out of Egypt. Let vs therefore consider, besides the blindness of Sesostris the second, how great the power of the Regents or Viceroyes in Egypt was; & how great confidence the kings did put in them, seeing Ioseph ruled with such full power, that he bought all Egypt, and all the Egyptians for bread; giuing at the same time the best of the land to his own father and brethren, for nothing: seeing also that when the Egyptians cried out vpon Pharaoh, for bread; Pharaoh said to all the Egyptians, Go to Ioseph; what he saith to you, do ye. If to a stranger borne, lately fetcht out of prison, a king well able to haue gouerned himselfe, would giue such trust, & soueraigne authority, it is not vnlikely that a blind Prince should doe it to a man of especiall reputation. For God often prospers, not onely the good (such as Ioseph was) but wicked men also, as his instruments against the day of wrath. Therefore perhaps the king did (as many haue done) resigne his kingdome to him, though his reigne was not accounted to haue begun, till the death of Sesostris. But whether Busiris did vsurpe the kingdome, or protection of the land by violence: or whether the blind king resigned it, keeping the title; or whether Busiris were onely Regent, whilst the king liued, and afterwards (as is acknowledged by all) king himselfe: it might well be said that Pharaohs daughter tooke vp Moses, and that Pharaoh vexed Israel; seeing he both at that time was king in effect, and shortly after king in deed and title both. It were not absurd for vs to say that the blind king Sesostris the second oppressed Israel: but forasmuch as it may seeme that the wicked Tyrant shewed his euill nature euen when he first arose: I thinke it more likely, that Busiris did it, vniuersally first the power of a king, and shortly after the stile. Thus of the 122. yeeres which passed betweene the beginning of Sesostris his reigne, & the departure of Israel out of Egypt, 47. being spent; the 75. which remaine, are to be accounted to Busiris or Orus the second, and his children. Busiris himselfe reigned 30. yeeres, according to Eusebius: whom very many iudicious authors herein approue. After him his daughter, who tooke Moses out of the water, is said by all that I haue read, to haue reigned 12. yeeres: Her name was Thermutis Phareis, or Muthis according to Cedrenus: Euseb. calls her Acencriis: & out of Antibanius his History Meris: Ioseph calls her both Acencheres, & Thermutis. Epiphanius in Panarion saith that shee was honoured afterward of the Egyptians, by the name of Thermutis the daughter of Amenophis, the son of Pharaoh. Of this last title question might be made, and much spoken: for the Scriptures call her not Pharaohs sons daughter, but Pharaohs daughter. Amenophis indeed is set next before Busiris or Orus the second by Eusebius & others: but but whether he were a king or onely a Regent I cannot coniecture. For Herodotus, Diodorus, and the ancient Historians name the sonne of Sesostris, Pheron. Perhaps his name was Pharaoh Amenophis: and his daughter by the Egyptians called rather the neece or grand-child, then the daughter of Pharaoh, because of the glory of Sesostris, and the disreputation of his sonne. If so, and if that Busiris or Orus the second marrying her, pretended any title by her, then is our coniecture strengthened, and then was shee both daughter, grand-child, and wife vnto Pharaoh: and suruiuing him, Queene of the land, 12. yeeres. But if she were daughter of Orus the second, and sister of Athoris, or Rathoris, as many thinke, to whose coniecture I will not oppose mine, then may it seeme, that either her brethren were degenerate, or too young to rule, when her Father died.

§. VIII.

Of the two brethren of Queene Thermutis: and what king it was, under whom Moses was borne: and who it was that perished in the red Sea.

He had two brethren: the one was Rathoris or Athoris, who succeeded her; the other Telegonus, who is onely named by Eusebius; but his lineage and off-spring described by Reineccius. Rathoris after his sisters death reigned nine yeeres: after whom Chenches, thought to be his sonne, reigned ten yeeres, and then perished in the red Sea. During the reigne of Chenches, Eusebius saith, that Telegonus begat Epaphus vpon Io: of which Historie elsewhere he reporteth otherwise. After the death of Chenches (whom some call Acencheres: but all or most doe stile Chenches, a fighter against God) Acherres reigned 8. yeeres; and then Cherres 15. This descent seemes from Father to sonne. In the 11. yeere of Cherres it is said by Eusebius, that Epaphus reigning in the lower part of Egypt, built Memphis. This is an argument of that which otherwise was not vnlikely: viz. That Egypt was greatly brought out of order by the plagues which God had laid vpon it, and the destruction of her king and armie in the red Sea: else could it not haue had two reigning in it at once; the later of whom, or his posterity seemes to haue taken all from Cherres the grand-child of Chenches. For whereas Armais is said to haue reigned foure yeeres after Cherres: and Armais one after Armais: these two Kings are by Eusebius and others accounted as one, and his reigne said to haue bene five yeeres. His name is called Armeus, otherwife Danaus: and his pedigree thus described by Reineccius in Historia Italia.

Telegonus:
Epaphus:
Lybia, who had

Agenor, Belus, and Busiris.

T

Egyptus or Ramestes who gaue name to the Countie, hauing expelled his brother
Danaus, reigned, and begat Lyncus, married to Hypermetra.

Danaus or Armeus expelled
by his brother Egyptus, after hee had reigned five yeeres, became king of Argos in Greece: was Father to Hypermetra.

How it might come to passe that the Nephewes sons of Epaphus should haue occupied the kingdome after Cherres, it is hard to say: considering that Epaphus himselfe is reported by Eusebius to haue bene borne in the time of Chenches. But forasmuch as the History of Epaphus his birth, is diuersly related by Eusebius, it may suffice, that Belus the father of Danaus & Egyptus, otherwife called Armeus and Ramestes, was equally distant from Busiris or Orus the second, with Cherres the grand-child of Chenches. And that the posterity of Telegonus did marry very young, it appears by the Historie of these two brethren, Danaus and and Aegyptus: of whom the former had 50. daughters, the later 50. sonnes: perhaps, or rather questionlesse by diuers Women: yet surely they began to beget children in their first youth: Howsoeuer it were, the generall consent of writers is, that Armenus or Danaus did succcede Cherres: and (according to Eusebius and good Authors approving him) reigned fūe yeeres. Rameſſes followed, who reigned 68. yeeres. This Rameſſes or Aegyptus is that Armeſefmiamum or Armeſefmianus, vnder whom, in the opinion of Mercator, and of Bunting that followes Mercator, Moses was borne: and the cruell Edict made of drowning the Hebrew children. The length of his reigne ſeemes to me the chiefe, if not the onely ground of Mercators opinion. For whereas the Lord ſaid to Moses, Goe, returne to Aegypt, for they are all dead which went about to kill thee: Mercator hereupon conceiues, that it was one and the ſame king vnder whom Moses was borne, and vnder whom he ſlew the Aegyptian at the 40. yeere of his age: and fled into the wilderneſſe, and there abode for feare: all which circumſtances could agree with none, but this Rameſſes, who reigned ſo long: wherefore deſirous rather to hold a true Paradox, then a common error, he placeth one Alisfragmuthofis (whoſe name is found in the liſt of Aegyptian kings, but the time vncertaine wherein he reigned) in an age 112. or 113. yeeres more ancient than others left him in: and ſo continuing the Catalogue of his ſucceſſours from Themoſis (whom Eusebius calls Amasifis) downewards with no other variation of the length of each mans reigne, than is the difference betweene Manetho and Eusebius, he findes Moses borne vnder Armeſefmiamum: and Israel deliuered in the dayes of his ſonne Amenophis.<sup>20</sup> The very name of Alisfragmuthofis ſeemes to him with little alteration to ſound like Pharates, of which name one was thought to haue flouriſhed either as a king, or a wife man about the time of Iſaac. For (ſaith he) from Alisfragmuthofis to Phragmuthofis, Pharmuthofis, or Pharates, the change is not great. Mercator was a man of excellent learning and induſtrie: and one to whom the World is bound for his many notable workes: yet my aſſent herein is with-held from him, by theſe reaſons. Firſt, I ſee all other writers agree, that Chencres was King who was drowned in the red Sea: Secondly, the place, Exod. 4. all are dead, &c. may better be vnderſtood of Buſiris and all his children, then of one king alone: Thirdly, Saint Cyrill in his firſt booke againſt Indian the Apoſtata, ſaith that Dardanus built Dardania, when Moses was 120. yeeres old: Rameſſes, which was this Armeſefmiamum, being then king of Aegypt. After Rameſſes, Amenophis reigned 19. yeeres: who is thought by Mercator and peremptorily by Bunting pronounced, to be the King that periſhed in the red Sea: of which our opinion being already laied open, I thinke it moſt expedient to referre the kings enſuing to their owne times (which a Chronologicall Table ſhall lay open) and here to ſpeake of that great deliuerance of Israel out of Aegypt: which for many great conſiderations depending thereupon, wee may not lightly ouerpaſſe.

CHAP. III.

Of the deliuey of Israel out of Aegypt.

§. I.

Of the time of Moses birth, and how long the Israelites were oppreſſed in Aegypt.

Rue it is that the Hiſtorie it ſelfe is generally and well knowne: yet concerning the time of Moses his birth, who was the excellent and famous inſtrument of this and other great workes of the Higheſt, the different opinions are verie neere as many, as the men that haue written of that Argument.

L. Vives in his annotations vpon Saint Auguſtine citeth very many of their coniectures: as that of Porphyrie out of Sanchoniato, that Moses liued in the time of Semiramis: but if hee did meane the firſt Semiramis, it was but a fond conceit: for beſides that the ſame is contrarie to all Stories Diuine and humane; while that Semiramis liued, ſhee commanded Syria, and all the parts thereof abſolutely: neither were the Ammonites, or Moabites, or Edomites, while ſhe ruled, in rerum natura.

A ſecond opinion heere remembreth of Apſion, taken from Ptolomie a Prieſt of Mendes, who ſaith that Moses was borne while Inachus did rule the Argiues, and Ameſis in Aegypt.

The third opinion is taken out of Polemon, in his Greeke Hiſtorie the firſt booke: that Moses was borne while Apis the third King ruled Argos.

A fourth is borrowed from Taiianus Aſſyrius, who though hee cite ſome authorities, that Moses liued after the Troian warre, is himſelfe of opinion, that Moses was farre more ancient, prouing it by many arguments.

Fiftly, he ſetteth downe the teſtimonie of Numenius the Philosopher, who tooke Musaeus and Moses to be one: confirming the ſame out of Artapanus, who confeſſeth that Moses was called Musaeus, by the Grecians: and who farther deliuereth that he was adopted by Chenephis, or Thermutis, the daughter of Aegypt: the ſame which Eupolemus calleth Meris; others (as Rabanus Maurus) Thermothos. Eusebius alſo affirmeth, that by Eusebius de prep. 1. 1. c. 14. polemus in his firſt booke de bono, Moses vir Deo conuinctiſſimus is called Musaeus Iudeo. Eusebius 1. 3. c. 3.

Eusebius in his Chronologie, findes that Moses was borne while Amenophis ruled Aegypt. The ancient Manethon calls that Pharao, which liued at Moses birth, Thumofis or Thmoſis: the ſame perchanee which Apſion the Grammarians will haue to bee Amoſis, and elſewhere Amenophis the Father of Sethoſis: to whom Lyſimachus and Cornelius Tacitus gaue the name of Bacchoris. To me it ſeemes moſt probable, that while Saphrus, called alſo Spherus or Sphereus, gouerned Aſſyria; Orthopolis, Sicyonia; and Criſius the Argiues; that then (Sefoſtris the ſecond ruling in Aegypt) Moses was borne. For if wee beleue S. Auguſtine, it was about the end of Cecrops time, that Moses led Israel out of Aegypt. Eusebius ſaith he led the people of God out of Aegypt, about the end of Cecrops time, King of the Athenians. In this ſort therefore is the time of Moses birth, and of his departure out of Aegypt beſt proued. S. Auguſtine affirmes (as before remembred) that Moses was borne: Saphrus gouerning Aſſyria: and that hee left Aegypt about the end of Cecrops time. Now Saphrus ruled 20. yeeres; his ſucceſſor Mamelus 30. yeeres; Sparetus after him 40. yeeres: in whoſe fourth yeere Cecrops began to gouerne in Attica: Aſcatades followed Sparetus, and held the Empire 41: So as Moses being borne while Saphrus ruled Aſſyria; Orthopolis Sicyonia; and Criſius Argos (for theſe three kings liued at once at his birth, ſaith S. Auguſtine, as Cecrops did when he departed Aegypt) it will follow that the birth of Moses was in the nineteenth yeere of the Aſſyrian Saphrus: for take one yeere remaining of 20. (for ſo long Saphrus reigned) to which adde the thirty yeeres of Mamelus; melus, and the 40. yeeres of Sparetus, these make 71. with which there were wasted three yeeres of Cecrops his 50. yeeres: then take nine yeeres out of the reigne of Ascatades, who was Sparetus successor, those nine yeeres added to 71. make 80. at which age Moses left Egypt: and adde these nine yeeres to the three yeeres of Cecrops formerly spent, there will remaine but foure yeeres of Cecrops his 50: and so it falleth right with S. Augustines words, affirming that towards the end of Cecrops his time, Moses led the people of Israel out of Egypt.

Now the time in which the Hebrewes were oppressed in Egypt, seemeth to haue had beginning some eight or nine yeeres before the birth of Moses, & 54. yeere, or rather more, after Ioseph: betweene whose death and the birth of Moses, there were consumed 64. 10 yeeres: some of which time, and 80. yeeres after, they liued in great seruitude and miserie. For as it is written in Exodus: They set task-masters ouer them, to keepe them under with burdens: and they built the Cities, Pithom and Ramases, &c. And by crueltie they caused the children of Israel to serue; and made them weary of their liues, by sore labour in clay and bricke, and in all worke of the field, with all manner of bondage. All which laid vpon them by a mastering power and strong hand, they endured to the time by the will-dome of God appointed: euen from 54. yeeres, or not much more after the death of Ioseph, who left the World when it had lasted 2370. yeeres, to the eightieth yeere of Moses, and vntill he wrought his miracles in the field of Zaan, which hee performed in the 2514. Worldage 2514. towards the end thereof, according to Codoman, or after our account, 20 2513. And because those things which we deliuer of Egypt, may the better bee vnderstood, I thinke it necessary to speake a few words of the principall places therein named, in this discourse.

§. II.

Of diuers Cities and places in Egypt, mentioned in this Storie, or elsewhere in the Scripture.

His Citie which the Hebrewes call Zaan, was built seuen yeeres after Hebron. Ezekiel calleth it Taphnes; and so doth Hieremie; the Septuagint, Tanis, Iosephus, 30 Ezekiel 30. Hierem 2. 43. Protaidis, after the name of an Egyptian Queene; Antonius giues it the name of Thani; Hegeffippus, Thamna, and William Tyrius, Tapins. It adioyneth to the land of Gosen, and is the same, wherein Hieremie the Prophet was stoned to death, for preaching against the Egyptian and Iewish Idolatry.

Zaan or Taphnes was in Moses time the Metropolis of the lower Egypt, in which their Pharaohs then commonly resided; and not vnlikely to be same Citie, where Abraham in his time found him. But Eusebius out of Ariapanus affirmeth, that Abraham did reade Astronomie in Heliopolis, or On, to Phareates King of Egypt. Alex. Polyhistor, out of Eupolemus hath it otherwise, saying, that Abraham instructed the Egyptian Priests, and not the King; both which authorities Eusebius citeth. The Septuagint, and the Vulgar edition, for Zaan write Heliopolis. Pagnin, Vatablus, Iunius, and our English call it On; and Ptolomee, Onium. There are two Cities of that name; the one on the frontier of the lower Egypt, towards the South; the other somewhat lower on the Easter-most branch of Nilus falling into the Sea at Pelusium. And it may be that Heliopolis to the South of the river Trian, was the same which Vatablus and our English call Auen. Of the latter it is, that the Scriptures take certaine knowledge: the same, which Pomp. Mela, and Plinie call Solis oppidum; Tyrius in the Holy Warre, Malbec; the Arabians, Bahabeth; and Simon Sethi, Fons Solis. Of this Heliopolis, or On, was Putiphar Priest, or Prince, whose daughter Ioseph married. In the Territory adioyning Jacob inhabited, while hee liued in Egypt. In the confines of this Citie, Onius, the high Priest of the Iewes, built a Temple, dedicated to the eternall God; not much inferiour to that of Hierusalem (Ptolomee Philopater then governing in Egypt) which stood in the time of Vespasian, 333. yeeres after the foundation by Onias, whom Iosephus falsly reporteth, herein to haue fulfilled a prophesie of Esaie, c. 19. In die illa erit Altare Domini in medio terra Egypti; In that day shall the Altar of the Lord bee in the midst of the Land of Egypt. Antiochus Epiphanes at that time of the building tyrannizing ouer the Iewes, gaue the occasion for the erecting of this Temple in Egypt. Lastly, there it was that our Saviour Christ Iesus remained, while Ioseph and the Virgin Mary feared the violence of Herod: neere which (saith Brochard) the fountaine aine is still found, called Iesus Well, whose streames doe afterward water the Gardens of Balsamum, no where else found in Egypt. And hereof see more in Brochard, in his description of Egypt.

There is also the Citie of Noph, remembred by Esaie and Ezekiel; the same which Hosea the Prophet calleth Moph: which later name it tooke from a Mountaine adioyning, so called, which Mountaine Herodotus remembreth. And this is that great City, which was called Memphis; and so the Septuagint write it. It is knowne to the Arabians by the name of Mazar. The Chaldeans name it Alchabyr; and Tudalensis Mizraim.

Pelusium, which Vatablus, Pagnin, Iunius, and our English write, Sin; the Septuagint call Sais; and Montanus, Lebna; is not the same with Damiata, as Gul. Tyrius witnesseth. In the time of Baldwin the third, Pelusium was called Belbeis. Belbeis (saith Tyrius) quæ olim dicta est Pelusium; Belbeis, that in times past was called Pelusium.

The Citie of No, the Septuagint call Diofpolis. Of which name there are two or three in Egypt. Hierome conuerteth it Alexandria, by anticipation, because it was so called in the future.

Bubastus, (for so Hierome and Zeigler doe write it) is the same which the Hebrewes call Pibeseeth.

To make the storie the more perceivable, I haue added a description of the land of Gosen, in which the Israelites inhabited; with those Cities and places so often remembred in the Scripture: as of Taphnes or Zaan, Heliopolis or Bethsemes, Balsaphon, Succoth, and the rest; together with Moses passage through the Desarts of Arabia the Stomie. For all storie without the knowledge of the places, wherein the actions were performed, as it wanteth a great part of the pleasure; so it no way enricheth the knowledge and vnderstanding of the Reader; neither doth any thing serue to retaine, what wee reade, in our memories, so well as these pictures and descriptions doe. In which respect I am driven to digresse in many places, and to interpose some such discourse, otherwise seeming impertinent: taking for my authority, after many others more ancient, that great learned man, Arias Montanus; who in his Preface to the Storie of the Holy Land, hath these words: Sic enim absque locorum obseruatione res gestæ narrentur, aut sine Topographie cognitione historia legantur, adeo confusa atq. perturbata erunt omnia; ut ex his nihil non obscurum, nihil non difficile elici possit; si narration (saith he) bee made of those things which are performed, without the obseruation of the places, wherein they were done: or if Histories bee read without Topographical knowledge; all things will appeare so intricate and confused, as we shall thereby vnderstand nothing but obscurely, nor draw thence any knowledge, but with the greatest difficulty.

§. III.

Of the crueltie against the Israelites young children in Egypt: and of Moses his preservation, and education.

BVt to returne to the story it selfe. It appeareth that notwithstanding the labour and slavery, which the Israelites endured, yet they decreased not in numbers: in so much as Pharaoh considering the danger of discontented pouertie, and the able bodies of an oppressed multitude, how perillous they might be to his estate, by suggestion of the Deuill resolved to slaughter all the male children of the Hebrewes, as soone as they should be borne. To which end he sent for Sephora and Thura, women the most famous and expert amongst them, que prærant (saith Commeffor) multitudini obsequium, who had command giuen them ouer all mid-wives; by whom (as it seemeth) hee gaue order to all the rest for the execution of his Edict. For to haue called all the mid-wives of Egypt together, had beene a strange Parliament. Now whether these two, before named, were of the Hebrewes, or of the Egyptians, it is diuersly disputed. S. Augustine calls them Hebrewes, because it is written Exodus the first, The King of Egypt commanded the Mid-wives of the Hebrew women, &c. But Iosephus, Abulenfis, and Petrus Blesensis beleeue them to be Egyptians. Whosoeuer they were, when it pleased God to frustrate the execution of that secret murder, to the end the world might witness both the wickedness of the Egyptians, and the iust cause, thereby made manifest, of his future indignation and reuenge: Pharaoh finding these women filled with pietie, & the feare of God, commanded commanded others of his people to execute his former intent; and publickly, or howsoever, to destroy all the male Hebrew children borne within his dominions.

Now besides the doubts, which Pharaoh had of the multitudes of the Hebrewes, the greatest part of whom hee might haue assured, by affoording them the iustice, which euery King oweth to his vassals, and the rest hee might haue employed or sent away at his pleasure; Iosephus giueth another cause of his rage against them, namely, That it was prophetically deliuered him by an Egyptian Priest, that among the Hebrews there should be borne a childe; who growing to mans estate, should become a plague and terrour to his whole Nation. To preuent which, (and presuming that he could resist the ordinance of God, by a meane, contrary to the lawes of Heauen and of nature) he stretched out his bloudie and mercilesse hand to the execution of his former intent. The same preuention Herod long after practised, when fearing the spirituall kingdome of Christ, as if it should haue bene temporall, he caused all the male children at that time borne, to be slaughtered. And that Pharaoh had some kinde of foreknowledge of the future successe, it may be gathered by these his owne words, in the tenth verse of the fifth of Exodus: Come, let vs worke wisely with them, lest they multiplie; and it come to passe, that if there be warre, they toyne themselves also vnto our enemies, and fight against vs, and get them out of the Land. But we see, and time hath told it vs from the beginning, how God derideth the wilddome of the worldly men, when forgetting the Lord of all power, they relie on the inuentions of their owne most feeble, and altogether darkened vnderstanding. For euen by the hands of the dearly beloued daughter of this tyrant, was that great Prophet and minister of Gods maruellous workes taken out of Nilus, being thereinto turned off, in an Arke of reedes; a sucking and powerlesse infant. And this Princeesse hauing beheld the childe his forme and beautie, though but yet in the blouth, so pierced her compassion, as shee did not onely preserue it, and cause it to be fostered; but commanded that it should be esteemed as her owne, and with equall care to the sonne of a King nourished. And for memory that it was her deede, she called the childe Moses, as it were, extractus, or erectus, taken out, to wit, out of the water: or, after Iosephus and Glicas, Moy, a voyce expressing water, and hises, as much to say, as that which is drawne out of water, or thence taken. Sermon 1.1: Clement Alexandrinus was of opinion, that Moses was circumcised, before hee was put into the Arke of Reedes, & that Amram his father had named him Ioachim. In his youth he was carefully bred, by the care, & at the charge of Pharaohs daughter, and by men of the most vnderstanding, taught and instructed: quem regio more educavit, praefectis sapientibus Egyptiorum Magistris, a quibus erudiretur, saith Basil; Vnto whom hee gaue princely education, appointing ouer him wise Masters of the Egyptians for his instructors. Thereby (say Iosephus and Philo) he became excellently learned in all the doctrine of the Egyptians; which also the Martyr Stephen, in the seuenth of the Acts consumeth; And Moses was learned in all the wisdom of the Egyptians. Which wisdom or sapience, such as it was, or at least so much thereof as Six. Senensis hath gathered, wee haue added, betwene the death of Moses, and the reigne of Iosua. 40

§. IIII.

Of Moses his flying out of Egypt; and the opinions of certaine ancient Historians of his warre in Aethiopia; and of his marriage there: Philo his iudgement of his Pastoral life; and that of Petorius of the Bookes of Genesis and Iob.

WHEN Moses was growne to mans estate, Iosephus and Eusebius, out of Artapanus, tell vs of ten yeeres warre that he made against the Aethiopians: of the besieging of Saba, afterward by Cambyses, called Meroe; and how he recovered that Citie by the fauour of Tharbis, a daughter of Aethiopia, whom he tooke to wife. So hath Comestor a prettie tale of Moses. How after the end of that warre, Tharbis resisting his returne into Egypt, Moses most skilfull in Astronomie, caused two Images to be ingrauen in two precious stones, whereof the one increased memorie; the other caused forgetfulness. These he set in two rings; whereof he gaue the one, to wit, that of obliuion, to his wife Tharbis, reseruing the other of memorie for himselfe: which ring of forgetfulness, after she had a while worne, she began to neglect the loue shee bare her husband; and so Moses without danger returned into Egypt. But leauing these fancies to the Authors of them: It is true, that about the 40. yeere of Moses age, when hee beheld an Egyptian

Egyptian offering violence to one of the oppressed Hebrewes, moved by compassion, in respect of his brother, and stirred up by disdain against the other, in the contention hee slew the Egyptian. Soone after which fact, finding a disposition in some of his own Nation to accuse him, for whose defence he had thus greatly endangered his owne life: by the ordinance and aduice of God, whose chosen seruant hee was, he fled into Arabia Petraea, the next bordering Countrie to Egypt; where wandring all alone, as a man left and forsaken, in a place vnkowne vnto him, as among a Nation of barbarous strangers; and who in future times were the irreconcilable enemies of the Hebrewes: it pleased God (working the greatest things by the weakest worldly meanes) to make the watering of a few sheep, & the assisting of the Daughters of Raguel the Midianite, an occasion whereby to prouide him a wife of one of those, and a father in law, that fed him, and sustained him in a Countrie neerer Egypt, fittest to returne from: necessarie to be knowne, because interiacent betwene Egypt and Iudaea, through which hee was to leade the Israelites; and wherein God held him, till the occasion which God presented, best serued. And lastly, where the glory of the world shined least, amidst mountainous Deserts, there the glorie of God, which shineth most, couered him over, and appeared vnto him, not finding him as a Kings sonne, or an adoptcd childe of great Pharaohs daughter, but as a meeke and humble sheepe-heard, sitting at a mountaines foot; a keeper and commander of those poore beasts onely.

20 In that part of Arabia, neere Madian, he consumed 40. yeeres. And though (as Philo in the story of Moses life obserueth) he did not neglect the care of those flocks, committed to his charge, but that he excelled all others in that Pastoral knowledge; yet in that solitary Desert hee enioyed himselfe: and being separate from the praise of the world, and the troublesome affaires thereof, hee gaue himselfe to contemplation, and to make perfect in himselfe all those knowledges, whereof his younger yeeres had gathered the grounds and principles: the same Author also iudging, that his Pastoral life did excellently prepare him for the execution of the Principallitie, which he afterward obtained. Est enim (saith Philo) ars Pastoralis, quasi praludium ad regnum, hoc est, ad regimen hominum, gregis mansuetissimi. Quemadmodum bellicosa ingenia praexercant se in venationibus, experientia in feris, quod postea in militia & bello perfectura sunt; brutis praebentibus materiam exercitij, tam belli quam pacis tempore. At vero praefectura mansueti pecoris, habet quidam simile cum regno in subditis; ideoque Reges cognominantur Pastores populorum, non contumeliosos hominis gratia; The art of keeping sheepe is, as it were, an introductorie exercise vnto a Kingdome, namely, the rule ouer men, the most gentle flocke: Euen as warlike natures doe before-hand exercise themselves in hunting, practising on wilde beasts those things, which after they will accomplish in warfare: those brute beasts affording matter, wherein to traine themselves, both in time of warre and of peace. But the gouernment of gentle cattell, hath a kinde of resemblance vnto a Kingly rule ouer subiects; therefore, Kings are stiled sheepe-heards of the people, not in way of reproch, but for their honour.

That Moses, in this time of his abode at Madian, wrote the Booke of Iob, as Pererius supposeth, I cannot iudge of it, because it is thought, that Iob was at that time liuing. Neither dare I subscribe to Pererius opinion, That Moses while hee liued in that part of Arabia, wrote the booke of Genesis; although I cannot denie the reason of Pererius coniecture, That by the example of Iobs patience he might strengthen the oppressed Hebrewes: and by the promises of God to Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, put them in assurance of their deliuerie from the Egyptian slavery, and of the Land of rest, and plentie promised.

Of his calling backe into Egypt by the Angell of God, and the maruailes and wonders which he performed, thereby to perswade Pharaoh, that hee was the messenger of the most High, the particulars are writen in the first fourteene Chapters of Exodus; and therefore to treat of all the particulars therein contained, it were needlesse. But for the first, it is to be noted, that when Moses desired to be taught by God, by what name hee should make him knowne, and by whom he was sent; he receiued from God so much, as man could comprehend of his infinite and eu-er-being nature. Out of which he deliuered him in the first part of his answer, a name to be considered of by the wisest: and in his second, to be vnderstood by all. For there is nothing that is, or hath being of it selfe, but the Eternall: which truly is; which is aboue all; which is immutable. The bodies of men are changed euery moment: their substance wasteth, and is repaired by nutriment;

ment; neuer continuing at one stay, nor being the same so long as while one may say. Now. Likewise, whatsoeuer is consumed in the longest continuance of time, the same in euery thortest piece of time suffereth decay; neither doth any thing abide in one state. Epiphanius ad D. *Vna est Dei & sola natura quæ verè est: id enim quod subsistit, non habet aliunde, sed summum est. Cetera quæ creata sunt, etiam si videntur esse, non sunt, quia aliquando non fuerunt, & potest rursum non esse, quod non fuit. It is the one and onely nature of God, which truly is; for hee hath his being of himselfe, and not from any thing without him. Other things that are created, although they seeme to be, yet they are not; for sometimes they were not: and that which hath not bene, may againe want being. And with this, in respect of the Diuine nature, the saying of Zeno Eleates excellently agreeth: Tota rerum natura umbra est, aut inanis, aut fallax. The whole nature of things is but a shadow, either empty or deceitfull: in comparison of whom (saith Esay) all Nations are as nothing, lesse then nothing, and meeke vanitie.*

Of the tenne plagues wherewith the Egyptians were stricken, the first was by changing the Riuer into blood: God punishing them by those waters, into which their Fore-fathers had throwne, and in which they had drowned, the innocent children of the Hebrewes. To which this place of the Reuelation may bee fitly applied: And I heard the Angell of the water say, Lord, thou art iust, which art, and which wast, and holy, because thou hast iudged these things: for they shed the blood of thy Saints and Prophets, and therefore hast thou giuen them blood to drinke.

The rest of the plagues by Frogges, Lice, Flies, or stinging Wasps, by the death of their Cattail; by leprous Scabbies, by Haile and Fire; by Grashoppers; by Darknesse, after which Pharaoh forbad Moses his presence: moued the hardened heart of the vbelieving King no longer, then the paine and perill lasted; till such time as his owne first-borne, and the first-borne of all his Nation perished. He then, while he feared his owne life, (a time wherein we remember God perforce) stood vpon no condition: whereas before, he first yeelded but to the departure of the men; then of the men, women, and children, reseruing their beastiall; but he was now content for the present, that the Israelites should not onely depart with all their owne, but with a part of the Siluer, Gold, and Jewels of his owne people: of which (the feare being past) hee suddenly repented him, as his pursuit after them proued. For when euery one of the Hebrewes had (according to direction from Moses received) slaine a Lambe, without spot or blemish, for the Passeouer, (a Sacrament of the most cleane and vnspotted Sauour,) and with the blood thereof coloured the poste and linterne of the doores; the Angel of God in the night smote euery first-borne of Egypt, from the sonne of the King, to that of the Begger and Slave: the children of the Israelites excepted. At which terrible iudgement of God, Pharaoh being more then euer amazed, yeelded, as before is said, to their departure. The Egyptians (saith Epiphanius) did in after-times imitate this colouring with blood, which the Israelites vsed after the Passeouer; ascribing an exceeding vertue to the Red Colour: and therefore they did not onely marke their Sheepe and Cattell, but their Trees bearing Fruit, to preferue them from lightning and other harmes.

§. V.

Of Pharaohs pursuit of the Israelites: and of their passage towards the Red Sea, so farre as Succoth.

Now, when the people were remoued, and on their way, (his heart being hardened by God) he bethought him as well of the Honour lost, as of the shame remaining after so many Calamities and Plagues, in suffering them to depart with the spoiles of his people, and in despight of himselfe. And hauing before this time great Companies of Souldiers in readinesse, he consulted with himselfe, what way the Israelites were like to take. Hee knew that the shortest and fairest passage was through the Country of the Philistines. But because these people were very strong, and a warlike Nation, and in all probability of his Allies, he suspected that Moses meant to finde some other out-let, to wit, through the Desart of Etham; and there, because the Country was exceeding mountainous, and of hard access, and that Moses was pestered with multitudes of Women, Children, and Cattell, hee thought it impossible for the Israelites to escape escape him that way. In the meane-while hauing gathered together all the Chariots of Egypt, and 600. of his owne, and Captaines ouer them; hee determined to set vpon them in the plaines of Gosen, which way soeuer they turned themselves. For it was the ancient manner to fight in those Chariots, armed with broad and sharpe Hooks on both sides, in fashion like the Mowers Sythe. Which kinde of fight in Chariots, but not hooked, the Brittaines vsed against the Romanes, while they made the Warre for the Conquest of this Land. Of this Armie of Pharaoh, Iosephus affirmeth, that it consisted of 50000. Horse, and 20000. foot; which, were it true, then it cannot bee doubted but that Pharaoh intended long before to assaile the Hebrewes at their departure, or to destroy them in Gosen; and refused them passage, till such time as hee had prepared an Armie, to set on them. For, as it is written in the first of Exodus, hee doubted two things, cyther that the Hebrewes might ioyn themselves to his enemies within the Land; or being so multiplied, as they were, might leaue his seruice, and get themselves thence at their pleasure. But the plagues which God grieved him withall, entorst him at this time to giue an assent to their departure: perchance fore-running his intent. But were it otherwise, and Iosephus partiall in this affaire, yet by the words of the Text it appeareth, that he gathered all the Chariots of Egypt: which could not bee done in haste. For Moses made but three dayes march, ere Pharaoh was at his heeles; and yet the last day he went on sixteene miles: which, in so hot a Countrey, and to driue their Cattell and Sheepe with them, pestered with a world of Women and Children, was a march witnessing the dread of a powerfull Enemie at hand. Now, as Moses well knew, that hee went out with a mightie hand, and that God guided his vnderstanding in all his Enterprizes: so hee lay not still in the ditch crying for helpe, but vsing the vnderstanding which God had giuen him, hee left nothing vnperformed, becomming a Wise man, and a valiant and skilfull Conductor; as by all his actions and counsailes from this day to his death well appeared.

When Moses perceiued that Pharaoh was enraged against him, & commanded him not to dare to come thenceforth into his presence: after that he had warned Israel of the Passeouer, he appointed a generall Assembly or Rendezvous of all the Hebrewes at Ramases in the 30 Territorie of Gosen; a Citie standing indifferent to receiue from all parts of the Country the dispersed Hebrewes: and gaue commandement, that euery Family should bring with them such store as they had of Dow, and Paste, not staying to make it into bread: knowing then that Pharaoh was on foote, and on his way towards them. Which done, and hauing considered the great strength of Pharaohs Horse-men and Chariots, of which kinde of defence Moses was vterly vnprovided (though as it is written, the Israelites went vp armed) he marched from Ramases East-ward, towards the Desarts of Etham, and incamped at Succoth; which hee performed on the fifteenth day of the Moneth Abib. Which Moneth from that time forward they were commanded to account as the first Moneth of the yeere. Whether in former times they had bene accustomed to begin their yere in some other Moneth, following the manner of the Egyptians, and were now recalled by Moses to the rule of their Fore-fathers, it is vncertain. Certaine it is, that they had, and retained, another beginning of their politicke yeere, which was not now abrogated, but rather by some solemnities thereunto annexed, was confirmed, and still continued in vse. Wherefore in referring things done, or hapning among them, vnto the beginning, midst, or ending of the yere; that distinction of the Sacred, and the Politicke yeere is not to be neglected. Concerning the number of dayes in euery Moneth, and the whole forme of their yeere, like enough it is that Moses himselfe in forty yeres space, did sufficiently instruct the Priests, to whose care the ordering thereof (as common opinion holds) was giuen in trust: but that any rule of framing their Kalendar, was made publicke, before the captiuitie of Babylon, I do not finde. Now because time and motion begin together, it will not, I thinke, be any great breach of order, to shew heere at their first setting forth, what was the forme of the Hebrew yeere: with the difference betwene them and other Nations, in ordering the accompt of time.

Of the Solarie and Lunarie yeeres: and how they are reconciled: with the forme of the Hebrew yeere, and their manner of intercalation.

The Hebrew Moneths are thus named.

The first Moneth, Nisan, or Abib.
The second, Iar, or Tiar, Zio, or Zin.
The third, Sinan, or Sinan, or Siban.
The fourth, Tamuz.
The fifth, Ab.
The sixth, Ebul.
The seventh, Tysri, or Ethanim, or Ethanim.
The eighth, Marchesuan, or Mechasuan, or Bul, or with Iosephus, Marsoname.
The ninth, Chisleu, or Casseu.
The tenth, Tebeth, or Thobeth.
The eleventh, Sebeth, or Sabath.
The twelfth, Adar, and Ve Adar.

VE Adar was an intercalarie Moneth, added, some yeeres, vnto the other twelve, to make the Solarie and Lunarie yeere agree; which (besides the generall inconvenience that would otherwise haue risen, by casting the Moneths of Summer into the Winter season, to the great confusion of all account) was more necessarily to be regarded of the Hebrewes, because of the diuine Precept. For God appointed especial Feasts to be celebrated precisely in such a Moneth of the yeere, and withall on a set day, both of the Moone and of the Moneth; as the Feast of the first fruits; the new Moones, and the like: which could not haue so bene kept, if eyther the day of the Moone had fallen in some other part of the Moneth, or the Moneth it selfe bene found farre distant from his place in the season of the yeere.

Other Nations, the better to obserue their Solemnities in the due time, and to ascertain all reckonings and remembrances, (which is the principall commoditie of time, that is the measure of endurance) were driven in like manner to make their yeeres vnequall, by adding sometimes, & sometimes abating one or more dayes, as the error committed in foregoing yeeres required. The error grew at first, by not knowing what number of daies made vp a compleat yeere. For though by the continuall course of the Sun, causing Summer and Winter duly to succeed each other, it is plaine enough euen to the most savage of all people, when a yeere hath passed ouer them; yet the necessity of ordinarie occurrences, that are to be numbred by a shorter Tally, makes this long measure of whole yeeres insufficient for the smaller sort of more daily affairs. Therefore men obserued the Monethly conspicuous reuolution of the Moone, by which they diuided the yeere into twelve parts, subdividing the Moneth into 29. dayes and nights, and those againe into their quarters and houres. But as the markes of time are sensible and easily discerned: so the exact calculation of it is very intricate, and worketh much perplexity in the vnderstanding. Twelve reuolutions of the Moone, containing lesse time by 11. daies or thereabout, than the yerely course of the Sunne, through the Zodiacke, in the space of fixteene yeeres, euery moneth was found in the quite contrary part of the yeere, to that wherein it was placed at the first. This caused them to adde some daies to the yeere, making it to consist of twelve Moneths, and as many daies more, as they thought would make the courses of the Sun and Moon, to agree. But herein were committed many new errors. For neither did the Sunne determine his yeerely reuolution by any set number of whole dayes; neyther did the Moone change alwaies at one houre; but the vnder minutes and lesser fractions were to be obserued by him, that would seeke to reduce their motions (which motions also were not still alike) into any certaine rule.

Heere lay much wisdom and deepe Art, which could not soone be brought to perfection. Yet as making an estimate at randome, the Athenians held the yeere to containe three hundred and fixtie daies, wherein most of the Greekes concurred with them. That 360. daies filled vp the Græcian yeere (besides many collaterall proofes) it is manifest by that which Plinie directlie affirmeth, telling of the Statues, erected in honour of

Demetrius Phalereus, which were (saith he) 360. whilst as yet the yeere exceeded not that number of dayes. By this account neyther did any certaine age of the Moone begin or end their Moneths; neither could their Moneths continue many yeeres; in their owne places: but must needs be shifted by little and little from Winter to Summer, and from Summer to Winter, as the dayes forgotten to be inserted into the Almanacke by men, but not forgotten by the superiour bodies in their courses, should occupie their owne rooms in their due turnes. Now, because the solemnities of the Olympian games was to be held at the full Moone, and withall on the 15. day of the Moneth Heecatombæon (which answereth in a manner to our Iune) they were careful to take order; that this Moneth might euer beginne with the new Moone; which they effected by adding someto daies to the last Moneth of euery yeere; those Games being held once in foure yeeres. This intercalation sufficed not to make the matter euen; which caused them sometimes to omit one day in the fourth yeere, which was the second of the Moneth Badromæon; (agreeing neerely with our August) sometimes not to omit it, or (which is all one) to insert another for it in their fourth Lunary yeere, accounting by the Moone, after a manner that was not vulgar. All this notwithstanding, their Moneth of Iune would euery yeere haue growne colder and colder, had they not sought to keepe all vpright, by intercalating in each other Olympiad, that is, each eighth yeere one whole Moneth, which they called the second Posideon or December; which was the deuice of Harpalus, who also taught them to make one Moneth of 29. daies, another of 30. daies, and so successiue through the whole yeere. Thus with much labour they kept their yeere as neere as they could, vnto the high way of the Planets; but these markes which they obserued, were found at length to be deceitfull Guides. For it was not possible so to fashion this eighth yeeres intercalation, that it should not deceiue them in 11. houres and 18. minutes at the least, or some waies in 34. houres and 10. minutes, or 36. and 41. minutes; which differences would, in few Ages, haue bred much confusion. The first that introduced a good method, likely to continue, was Meton the Athenian, who not regarding the Olympiads, and the eighth yeeres intercalation, deuised a Cycle of 19. yeeres, wherein the Moone hauing 235. times runne out her circuit, met with the Sunne in the same place, and on the same day of the yeere, as in the 19. yeere before past shee had done. This invention of Meton was entertained with great applause, and passing from Greece to Rome, was there inserted into the Kalendar in Golden Letters, being called the Golden Number, which name it retaineth vnto this day. Hereby were auoyded the great and vncertaine intercalations that formerly had been vied; for by the intercalation of 7. Moneths in the 19. yeeres, all was so euen, that no sensible difference could bee found. Yet that error which in one yeere could not bee perceiued, was very apparent in a few of those Cycles; the new Moones anticipating in one Cycle 7. houres, and some minutes of the precise rule. Therefore Calippus deuised a new Cycle containing foure of Metons, that is to say, 76. yeeres; and afterwards Hipparchus, a Noble Astrologer, framed another, containing foure of Calippus his Periods, each of them finding some error in the former obseruations, which they diligently corrected. The last reformation of the Kalendar was that which Iulius Cesar made, who by aduice of the best Mathematicians, then to bee found, examining the courses of those heauenly bodies, reduced the yeere vnto the forme which is now in vse with vs, containing 365. daies and six houres, which houres in foure yeeres make vp one whole day, that is intercalated euery fourth yeere, the 24. of February. The correction of the Iulian yeere by Pope Gregorie the 13. Anno Domini 1582. is not as yet entertained by generall consent; it was indeed, but as a note added vnto the worke of Cesar: yet a note of great importance. For whereas it was obserued, that the Sunne, which at the time of the Nicene Councell, Anno Dom. 324. entred the Aquinoctiall on the 21. day of March, was in the yeere 1582. ten daies sooner found in that time, Pope Gregorie strooke out of the Kalendar ten daies, following the fourth of October, so that instead of the fifth day was written the fifteenth; by which means the moueable Feasts depending on the Sunnes entrance into Aries, were againe celebrated in such time, as at the Nicene Councell they had bene. And the better to preuent the like alterations, it was by the Councell of Trent ordained, that from thence forward in euery hundredth yeere, the Leape day should be omitted, excepting still the fourth hundred: because the Sun doth not in his yeerely course take vp full fixe houres about the 365. daies; but faileth so many minutes, as in 400. yeeres make about three whole dayes.

But the Cycle of 19. yeeres, which the Hebrewes vsed, was such as neither did need any nice curiositie of houres, minutes, and other lesser Fractions to helpe it; neyther did in summing vp the dayes of the whole yeere, neglect the dayes of the Moone, confounding one Moneth with another. For with them it fell out so, that alwayes the Kalends or first day of the Moneth was at the new Moone, and because that day was festiuall, they were very carefull as well to obserue the short yeere of the Moone, passing through all the 12 Signes in one Moneth, as that longer of the Sun, which is needfully regarded in greater accounts. First, therefore they gaue it to Nisan their first Moneth, which is about our March or April, 30. dayes; to Iar their second Moneth 29. dayes; and so successively 30. to one, 29. to another. Heereby it came to passe, that euery two Moneths of theirs contained somewhat euently two reuolutions of the Moone, allowing 29. dayes, 12. houres, and odde minutes, from change to change. The spare minutes were bestowed among the superfluous or Epact dayes, which made vp 7. Moneths in 19. yeeres; to 6. of which 7. were commonly giuen 30. dayes; to one of them 29. dayes, or otherwise as was found requisite. Their common yeere (as appeareth by the feuerall dayes of each Moneth) contained 354. dayes, which faile of the yeere, wherein the Sunne finisheth his course, 11. whole dayes, with some fractions of time. But these dayes, and other broken pieces, howsoeuer they were neglected in one yeere, yet in the Cycle of 19. yeeres were so disposed of by conuenient intercalations, that still at the end of that Cycle, both the Sunne and Moone were found on the same day of the yeere, Moneth and weeke, yea commonly on the same houre of the day, where they had bene at the beginning of it 19. yeeres before.

Diuers haue diuersly set downe the forme of the Hebrew yeere, with the manner of their Intercalations. Sigonius tells vs, that euery second yeere they did adde a Moneth of 22. dayes; euery fourth yeere a Moneth of 23. in the regard of 11. dayes and a halfe wanting in 12. Moones to fulfill a yeere of the Sun. But herein Sigonius was very much deceived. For the Moone doth neuer finish her course in 22. or 23. dayes; and therefore to haue added so many dayes to the end of the yeere, had bene the way to change the fashion of all the Moneths in the yeeres following, which could not haue begun as they ought, with the new Moone. Genebrard saith, that euery third yeere, or second yeere, as need required, they did intercalate one Moneth, adding it at the yeeres end vnto the other 12. This I belecue to haue bene true; but in which of the yeeres the intercalation was (if it be worthy of consideration) me thinks they doe not probably deliuer, who keepe all farre from euennesse vntill the very last of the 19. yeeres. For (to omit such as erre grossely) some there are who say, that after three yeeres, when besides the dayes spent in 36. courses of the Moone, 33. dayes are left remaining, that is, 11. dayes of each yeere; then did the Hebrewes adde a Moneth of 30. dayes; keeping three dayes, as it were in plussage vnto the next account. The like, say they, was done at the end of the sixt yeere; at which time, besides the Intercalarie Moneth, remained sixe daies, namely, three summing that Moneth, and the Epact of three yeeres, besides the three formerly referred. Thus they goe on to the 18. yeere; at which time they haue 18. daies in hand: all which with the Epact of the 19. yeere, make vp a Moneth of 29. daies, that being intercalated at the end of the Cycle makes all euen.

Whether this were the practice, I can neither affirm nor denie, yet surely it must needs haue bred a great confusion, if in the 18. yeere euery Moneth were remooued from his owne place by the distance of 48. daies, that is, halfe a quarter of the yeere and more; which inconuenience by such a reckoning was vnauoydable. Wherefore, I preferre the common opinion, which preuenteth such dislocation of the Moneths, by setting downe a more conuenient way of Intercalation in the 8. yeere. For the 6. daies remaining after the two former Intercalations made in the third and sixt yeeres, added vnto the 22. daies, arising out of the Epacts of the 7. and 8. yeeres, doe fitly serue to make vp a Moneth, with the borrowing of one day or two from the yeere following; and this borrowing of two daies is so farre from causing any disorder, that indeed it helpe to make the yeeres ensuing vary the lesse from the proper season of euery Moneth. This may suffice to bee spoken of the Hebrew Moneths and yeeres, by which they guided their accounts.

§. VII.

§. VII.

Of the passage of Israel from Succoth towards the Red Sea: and of the diuers wayes leading out of Egypt.

From Succoth in the morning following, Moses led the Israelites towards the Desert of Etham, to recouer the Mountaine foot, by the edge of that Wildernesse, though he intended nothing lesse then to goe out of that way, of all other the neerer. But being assured of the multitude of Horsemen and armed Chariots, that followed him, he kept himselfe from being incompassed, by keeping the rough and mountainous ground on his left hand. At Etham he rested but one night, and then he reflected backe from the entrance thereof, and marched away directly towards the South; the distance betwene it and Succoth being about eight miles. That he forbore to enter Arabia being then in sight thereof, it seemeth to proceede from three respects; the first two naturall; the third diuine. For Pharaoh being then at hand, and hauing receiued intelligence of the way which Moses tooke, perswaded himselfe, that the numbers which Moses led, consisting of about a Million, if not two Millions of foules, (for as it is written, Exod. the 12. Great multitudes of sundry sorts of people went out with them) could not possibly passe over those desert and high Mountaines with so great multitudes of Women, Children, and Cattel, but that at the very entrance of that fastnesse he should haue overtaken them, and destroyed the greatest numbers of them. For these his owne words, They are tangled in the Land, the Wildernesse hath shut them in, doe shew his hopes and intentions; which Moses by turning another way did frustrate. Secondly, Moses by offering to enter Arabia that way, drew Pharaoh towards the East-side of the Land of Gosen, or Rameses: from whence (missing Moses there) his pursuit after him with his Chariots was more difficult: by reason of the roughnesse of the way; and howsoeuer, yet while the Hebrewes kept the Mountaine foot on the left hand, they were better secured from the our-bearing violence both of the Horse and Chariots. Thirdly, Moses confidence in the Al-powerfull God was such, by whose spirit, onely wise, he was directed, as he rather made choice to leaue the glory of his deliuerance and victory to Almighty God, than either by an escape the next way, or by the strength of his multitude, consisting of 600000 men, to cast the successe vpon his owne vnderstanding, wise conduction, or valour. The third day he marched with a double pace from Etham towards the Valley of Pihacheroth, 16. miles distant, and fare downe betwene two ledges of Mountaines adioyning to the Red Sea, to wit, the Mountains of Etham on the North, & Baalzephon towards the South: the time which Orosius calleth Climax: on the top whereof there stood a Temple dedicated to Baal. And, as Phagius noteth, the word so compounded, is as much to say, as, Dominus specule, siue custodie; Lord of the watch-towre. For the Egyptians beleueed, or at least made their slaues beleue, that if any of them offered to escape that way into Arabia, this Idoll would both arrest them, and force them to returne to their Lords and Masters. For the Egyptians had gods for all turnes. Aegyptij dijs fecundi; The Egyptians were fruitful in gods, saith Saint Hierome. But Moses, who incamped at the foot of this Mountaine with a million of foules, or as other conceiue, with two millions, found this Lord of the watch-towre asleepe, or out of countenance.

Now these two passages leading out of Egypt into Arabia vpon the firme land, Moses refused, as well that of Pelusium and Casiotis, the fairest and shortest of all other, in respect of Iudas, as the other by Etham, from which he reflected, for the reasons before remembered, and took the way by the Valley of Pihacheroth, betwene the Mountaines, which made a straight entrance towards the Sea. After whom Pharaoh made so great speed with his Horse-men and Chariots, as he gaue the Hebrewes no time at all to rest them after so long a march; but gate sight of them, and they of him, euen at the very brinke and wash of the Sea: inso much as the Hebrewes being terrified with Pharaohs sudden approach, began to despaire, and to mutine, at that time when it behoued them most to haue taken courage for their owne defence; laying it to Moses charge, that themselves foresaw those perils in which they were wrapped. And feare, which, saith the booke of Wisedome, is the betraying of those succours which reason offereth, made them both despaire in Gods former promises, and to be forgetfull of their owne strength and multitudes.

§. VIII

§. VIII.

Of their passage over the Red Sea: and of the Red Sea it selfe.

BVt Moses who feared nothing but God himselfe, perswaded them to be confident in his goodnesse, who hath neuer abandoned those, that assuredly trust in him; vñing this comfortable and resolu'd speech: Fear not, &c. for the Egyptians whom ye haue seene this day, ye shall neuer see them againe. The Lord shall fight for you. After which Moses called on God for succour, receiued encouragement, and commandment to goe on in these words: Wherefore cryest thou vnto mee? Speake vnto the children of Israel that they goe forward; and lift thou up thy rod, and stretch out thy hand vpon the Sea, to divide it, and let the children of Israel goe on dry ground through the midst of the Sea, Moses obeying the voice of God, in the darke of the night finding the sands vncovered, past on towards the other side and coast of Arabia: two parts of the night being spent ere he entred the Foord, which it pleased God by a forcible Easterne winde, and by Moses rod to prepare.

Pharaoh followed him euen at the heeles, finding the same dry ground which Moses trod on. Therefore, as it is written: The Angell of God which went before the Host of Israel, remoned, and went behinde them; also the pillar of the cloud went from before them, and stood behinde them; which is, that it pleased God therein either by his immediate power, or by the ministry of his Angell, to interpose his defence betweene the Hebrewes and their Enemies, to the end that the Egyptians might hereby be blinded, in such sort, as they could not pursue Israel with any harme full speede. But in the morning watch Moses seized the other banke of Arabia side: and Pharaoh (as the dawne of day began to illighten the obscure aire) finding a beginning of the Seas returne, hastened himselfe towards his own Coast: But Moses stretched forth his hand, and the Sea returned to his force, that is, the Sea moved by the power of God, ran backe towards the land with vnresistable furie and swiftnesse, and ouerwhelmed the whole Armie of Pharaoh, so as not one escaped. For it is written, that God tooke off their Chariot wheelles, that is, when the waters began to couer the sands, the Egyptians being stricken with teare of death, ran one athwart another, and missing the path by which they had past on after the Hebrewes, their wheelles stucke fast in the mud and quick-sands, and could not be drawne out: the Sea coming against them with supernaturall violence.

Lyranus vpon Exod. 14. and others, following the opinions or old Traditions of the Hebrewes, conceiued, that after Moses had by the power of God diuided the Red Sea, and that the children of Israel were fearefull to enter it, Aminadab Prince or Leader of the Tribe of Iuda first made the aduerture, and that therefore was that Tribe euer after honored about the rest, according to the prophetic of Iacob, Gen. 49. 8. Thy fathers sonnes shall bow downe vnto thee. But Hierome vpon the 11. of Hosee condemnes this opinion. And though it be true, that Iuda had the first place in all their marches in the Desert, and, as we now call it, led the Vantgard, (whereupon it may be inferred, that he also led the way through the Red Sea) yet that Moses himselfe was the Conducter of Israel at that time, it is generally receiued. For as it is written in the 77. Psalm: Thou didst leade thy people like sheepe by the hand of Moses and Aaron.

The Hebrewes haue also another fancie, that the Red Sea was diuided into twelue parts, and that every Tribe past ouer in a path apart, because it is written in the 135. Psalm according to the vulgar: Diuisit mare rubrum in diuisiones; He diuided the Red Sea in diuisions. Also that the bottome of the Sea became as a greene Field or Pasture. But Origen, Epiphanius, Abulensis, and Genebrard, fauouring this conceit, had forgotten to consider, that there were not twelue Pillars, nor twelue Armies of the Egyptians. It is written in 77. Psalm, v. 16. Thy way is in the Sea; not thy wayes; and in the last of the booke of Wisdom, vers. 7. In the Red Sea there was a way.

Now this Sea, through which Moses past, and in which Pharaoh, otherwise called Chenchres, perished in the 16. yeere of his reigne, is commonly knowne by the name of the Red Sea, though the same differ nothing at all in naturall colour from other waters. But as Philostratus in his third booke noteth, and our selues know by experience, it is of a bluish colour, as other Seas are. It entreteth at a narrow strait betweene Arabia the Happy and Ethiopia, or the land of the Abyssins: the mouth of the indraught from the Cape, which Ptolomie calleth Possodium, to the other Land of Ethiopia, hath not aboute fixe leagues in breadth, and the same also filled euery where with Ilands, but afterwards it extendeth it selfe 58. Leagues from Coast to Coast, and it runneth vp between Arabia the Happy, and Arabia Petrea, on one side, and Ethiopia and Egypt on the other, as far as Sues, the vttermost end and indraught of that Sea: where the Turke now keepeth his fleet of Gallies. The Cosmographers commonly giue it the name of the Arabian Gulfe: but the North part towards Sues, and where Moses past, is called Heropolites of the Citie Heropolis; sometime Troy, and of later times Sues. Plinie calls it Cambisus, by which name it was knowne, saith he, before it was called Hero many yeeres. The Arabians call this Sea towards the North Apocopa, Eccant, and Eant. Artemidorus writes it Elaniticum: King Iuba Lemiticum, others more properly Elaniticum, of the Port and Citie Elana: which the Septuagint call Elath: Ptolomie, Elana: Plinie, Lena: Iosephus, Ilana, and Marius Niger, Aila: Isidore, Ans. S. c. x. there is also Ilalah in Assyria, to which Salmanassar carried the Israelites captiue, Kings 2. c. 8. v. 11. which Ilalah in Assyria, the Septuagint call Elaa: and in the first of Chron. the 5. Aila. But as for this Red Sea or the parts thereof, thus diuersly named, the Moores and Arabians (Vassals to the Turke) know it by no other appellation, then the Gulfe of Mecca, after the name of Mahomets Towne Mecca. The Greekes write it the Sea Erythraum, of a King called Erythras, or Erythraus: and because Erythros in the Greeke signifieth Red: hence it is, that, being denominated of this Erythraus, the sonne of Perseus and Andromeda, yet it tooke the name of the Red Sea, as Quintus Curtius coniectureth: which Arianus and Strabo confirme. But it seemeth to me by the view of a discouery of that Sea in the yeere 1544. performed by Steuens Gama, Viceroy of the East India for the King of Portugal, that this Sea was so called from a reflection of rednesse, both from the banks, cliffs, and sands of many Ilands, and part of the Continent bordering it. For I finde by the report of Castro, a principall Commander vnder Gama (which discourse I gaue Master Richard Haclius to publish) that there is an Iland called Dalagua, sometime Leques, containing in length 25. Leagues, and 12. in breadth, the earth, sands, and cliffs, of which Iland, being of a reddish colour, serue for a foile to the waters about it: and make it seeme altogether of the same colour. Secondly, the same Castro reporteth, that from 24. degrees of Septentrional Latitude, to 27. (which make in length of Coast 180. miles, lying as it doth Northerly and Southerly) all the cliffs and bankes are of red earth, or stone, which by reflection of the Sun-beames, giue a kinde of reddish luster to the waters. Thirdly, those Portugals report, and we know it by many testimonies, that there are found in the bottome of this Sea towards the Shore, great abundance of red stones, on which the greatest store of Corall growes, which is carryed into most parts of Europe, and elswhere. There are also on the Ilands of this Sea many red Trees, saith Strabo, and those growing vnder water, may also be a cause of such a colour. Of these appearances of rednesse by the shadowes of these stones, sands, earth, and cliffs, I suppose that it first tooke the name of the Red Sea, because in so many places it seemeth to be such: which Iohannes Barros in his second Decade, eight Booke and first Chapter, confirmeth.

The breadth of this Sea from Elana or Ezion Gaber adioyning, now Toro, called by the ancient Cosmographers Sinus Elaniticus, which washeth the banks of Madiam or Midiam, is for 16. or 17. Leagues together, along Northward towards Sues, some three Leagues or nine English miles ouer, and from this Port of Toro to Sues, and the end of this Sea it is in length about 28. Leagues, of which the first 26. haue nine miles breadth, as aforesaid, and afterward the lands both from Egypt and Arabia, thrust themselues into the Sea, & streighten it so fast, as for fixe miles together it is not about three miles ouer; from thence vponward the land on Egypt side, falleth away and makes a kinde of Bay or Cose for some ten miles together, after which the land growes vpon the Sea againe, and so bindes it into the very end thereof, at foure miles breadth or thereabout, in which tract it was that Moses past it ouer, though others would haue it to be ouer-against Elana or Toro, but without iudgement: for from Ramases to Pihacheroth and Baalzephon, there is not about 30. miles interiacent, or 35. miles at most, which Moses past ouer in three dayes: and betweene the land of Egypt opposit to Elana or Toro, the distance is about 80. miles. For Ramases, to which Citie Moses came (being the Metropolis of Gosen) when hee left Pharao at Zaan, and tooke his last leaue, standeth in 30. degrees fixe minutes of Septentrional Latitude; and Migdol, or the Valley of Pihacheroth, at the foot of the Mountaine Climax, or Baalzephon, in nine and twentie and a halfe, which made a difference of fixe and thirtie English miles, the way lying in effect North and South.

§. IX.

That the passage through the Red Sea was miraculous, and not at a low Ebbe.

THe Egyptians, and of them the Memphites, and other Heathen Writers, who in hatred of the Hebrewes haue objected that Moses past ouer the Red Sea at a low ebbe, vpon a great spring-tyde, and that Pharaos conducted more by furiethen discretion, pursued him so far, as before he could recouer the coast of Egypt, he was ouer-taken by the flood and therein perished, did not well consider the nature of this place with other circumstances. For not to borrow strength from that part of the Scriptures, which makes it plaine, that the Waters were diuided, and that God wrought this miracle by an Easterly winde, and by the hand and rod of Moses (which authority to menthat beleuee not therein, perswadeth nothing) I say, that by the same naturall reason vnto which they fasten themselues, it is made manifest, that had there beene no other working power from aboue, or assistance giuen from God himselfe to Moses and the children of Israel than ordinary and casuall, then could not Pharaos and all his Armie haue perished in that pursuit.

For wheresoever there is any ebbing of the Sea in any gulfe, or indraught, there doe the waters fall away from the Land, and run downward towards the Ocean, leaving all that part towards the Land as farre as the Sea can ebbe, or fall off, to be dry Land. Now Moses entring the Sea at Migdol vnder Baalzephon (if he had taken the aduantage and opportunity of the tyde) must haue left all that end of the Red Sea towards Sues, on his left hand drie and vncovered. For if a passage were made by falling away of the water, ten or twelue miles farther into the Sea then Sues, and betwene it and where Moses past: who entred the same so farre below it, and towards the body of the same Sea: It followeth then, that if all that part of the Sleeue or Strait, had beene by the ebbe of a spring-tyde discovered, when Pharaos found the flood increasing, he needed not to haue returned by the same way toward Egypt side, but might haue gone on in his returne before the tyde, on his right hand: & so taken ground againe at the end of that Sea, at Sues it selfe, or elsewhere. But the Scriptures doe truly witness the contrary, that is, That the Sea did not fall away from the Land, as naturally it doth; but that Moses past on betwene two Seas,<sup>39</sup> and that the waters were diuided. Otherwise, Pharaos by any returne of waters could not haue perished, as he did: and therefore the effects of that great Armes destruction, proue the cause to haue beene a power aboue nature, and the miraculous worke of God himselfe. Again, those words of the Scriptures, that God caused the Sea to runne backe by a strong East-winde, doe rather proue the miracle, than that thereby was caused an ebbe more then ordinarie: for that Sea did not lye East and West, but, in effect North and South. And it must haue beene a West and North-west winde, that must haue driven those waters away through their proper Channels, and to the South-east into the Sea. But the East winde blew athwart the Sea, and cut it asunder: so as one part fell backe towards the South and maine body thereof: the other part remained towards Sues,<sup>40</sup> and the North. Which being vnknowne to Pharaos: while he was checkt by that Sea which vsed in all times before to ebbe away, the flood prest him and ouerwhelmed him. Thirdly, seeing Iosephus auoweth, that Moses was not onely of excellent iudgement generally, but also, so great a Captaine, as he ouer-threw the Ethiopians in battels, being employed by Pharaos, and wanne diuers Cities seeming impregnable: it were barbarous to condemne him of this grossenesse, and distraction: that rather then he would haue endured the hardnesse of a Mountainous passage at hand (had not God commanded him to take that way, and foretold him of the honour which hee would there winne vpon Pharaos) he would haue trusted to the aduantage of an ebbing water. For hee knew not the contrarie, but that Pharaos might haue found him, and prest him, as<sup>41</sup> well when it flowed as when it ebbed, as it seemeth he did. For the people, beholding Pharaos approach, cryed out against Moses, and despaired altogether of their safetie: and when Moses prayed vnto God for helpe, hee was answered by God: wherefore cryest thou vnto me? Speake vnto the children of Israel that they goe forward, and lift thou vp thy rod, and stretch out thy hand vpon the Sea, and diuide it: which proues that there was not at the time of Pharaos approach any ebbe at all; but that God did disperse and cut through the weight of waters, by a strong East-winde, whereby the Sands

discovered themselves betwene the Sea on the left hand toward Sues, from whence the waters moued not, and the Sea which was towards the South on the right hand, so that the waters were a wall vnto them on the right hand, and on the left hand, that is, the waters so defended them on both sides, as the Egyptians could onely follow them in the same path; not that the waters stood vp right as wals doe, as some of the Schoole-men haue fancied. For had Pharaos and the Egyptians perceiued any such buildings in the Sea, they would soone haue quitted the chace and pursuit of Israel. Furthermore, there is no man of iudgement, that can thinke, that Pharaos and the Egyptians, who then excelled all Nations in the obseruations of heavenly Motions, could be ignorant of the fluxes and refluxes of the Sea, in his owne Countre, on his owne Coast, & in his owne most traded and frequented Ports and Hauens; and wherein, his people hauing had so many hundreds of yeeres experience of the tydes, he could not be caught, as he was, through ignorance, nor by any foreknowne or naturall accident, but by Gods powerfull hand onely, which then falleth most heauily on all men, when looking through no other spectacle but their owne prosperitie, they least discern it comming, and least feare it. Lastly, if the Armie of the Egyptians had beene ouer-taken by the ordinary returne of the flood, before they could recouer their owne Coast; their bodies drowned would haue beene carried with the flood which runneth vp to Sues, and to the end of that Sea, and not haue beene cast ashore on that coast of Arabia where Moses landed, to wit, vpon the Sea-banke ouer against Baalzephon, on Arabia side: where it was that the Israelites saw their dead bodies; and not at the end of the Red Sea, to which place the ordinary flood would haue carried them: Which flood doth not any where crosse the Channell, and run athwart it, as it must haue done from Egypt side to Arabia, to haue cast the bodies there; but it keepe the naturall course towards the end of that Sea: and to which their carcasses should haue beene carried, if the worke had not beene supernaturall and miraculous. Apollonius in the liues of the Fathers affirmeth, that those of the Egyptians which staid in the Countre, and did not follow Pharaos in the pursuit of Israel, did euer after honor those Beasts, Birds, Plants, or other Creatures, about which they were busied at the time of Pharaos destruction: as he that was then labouring in his Garden, made a god of that Plant or Root, about which he was occupied: and so of the rest. But how those multitudes of gods were erected among them, a more probable reason shall be giuen elsewhere. Orosius in his first Booke and tenth Chapter against the Pagans, tels vs, that in his time, who liued some 400. yeeres after Christ, the prints of Pharaos Chariot wheeles were to be seene at a low water on the Egyptian sands: and though they were sometime defaced by winde and weather, yet soone after they appeared againe. But hereof I leaue euery man to his owne beliefe.

CHAP. IV.

Of the iourning of the Israelites from the Red Sea, to the place where the Law was giuen them: with a discourse of Lawes.

§. I.

A transition, by way of recapitulation of some things touching Chronologie: with a continuance of the storie, vntill the Amalekites met with the Israelites.

VT to goe on with the storie of Israel, in this sort I collect the times. Moses was borne in the yeere of the World 2434. Saphrus then gouerning Assyria, Orthopolis Syconia, or Peloponnesus, Crisus the Argiues, Orus Egypt, AEthiopia, and Deucalion Thessalie. He fled into Midian when he had liued 40. yeeres, in the yeere of the World 2474. and two yeeres after was Caleb borne. He returned by the commandement and ordinance of God into Egypt, and wrought his 25 14. his miracles in the fields of Zaan, in the yeere 25 14. the last moneth of that yeere. On the 14. day of the first Hebrew moneth Abib, or the 15. of that moneth, beginning the day (as they) at Sunne setting, in the yeere of the World 25 14. was the celebration of the Passeouer: and in the dead of the night of the same day were all the first-borne slaine through Egypt, or in all those parts where the Hebrewes inhabited nor. The 15. day of the first moneth of the Hebrewes called Abib, being about the beginning of the yeere of the World 25 14. Moses with the children of Israel removed from the generall assembly at Ramases, and marched to Succoth.

And departing thence they made their third Station at Etham: and journeying from Etham, they incamped in the Valley of Pihacheroth, or Migdol, vnder the Mountaine Baal-zephon; and in the same night after mid-night, they past the Red Sea: Pharaoh and his Armie perishing in their returne, about the first dawne of the day. Moses hauing recovered the banks of Arabia, gaue thanks vnto God, for the deliuerie of Israel; and making no stay on that coast, entred the Desarts of Arabia Petraea, called Sur. But finding no water in that passage, he incamped at Marah, in the Desert of Etham, which in Exod. 15. v. 22. is also called Sur, 25. miles from the Sea: where the children of Israel prest with extreame thirst, murmured against Moses the second time; first at Pharaohs approach in Pihacheroth, and now in Arabia. But Moses taking the branches of a tree, growing neere a Lake of bitter water, and casting the same therinto, made the same sweet: a plaine type and figure of our Saviour; who vpon the tree of the Croesse changed the bitterneesse of euerlasting death into the sweetnesse of eternall life. Plinie remembers th. se. bitter Fountaines in his sixth Booke and 29. Chapter. From whence to Delia in Egypt, Sesostrius first, Darius after him, and lastly Ptolemie the second, began to cut an artificiall Riuer, thereby by Boats and small Shipping to trade and navigate the Red Sea, from the great Cities vpon Nilus. From Marah he removed to Elim, the sixth Mansion, a march of eight miles: where finding twelue Fountaines of sweet water, and three-score and ten Palmetrees, he rested diuers dayes.

Whether this Elim were the name of a Towne or Citie in Moses time, I cannot affirme. And yet the scarcitie of waters in that Region was such, as Elim, which had twelue Fountaines, could hardly be left vnpeopled. William, Archbishop of Tyre, in his Historie of the Holie Warre, found at Elim the ruines of a great and ancient Citie. And 30 at such time as Baldwine the first past that way into Egypt. Ingressus (saith he) Helim, Ciuitatem antiquissimam populo Israelitico aliquando familiarem; ad quam cum peruenisset, loci illius incole, Regis aduentu praecognito, nauiculam ingredientibus, in mare vicinum se conuulerunt, Entring Helim a very ancient Citie, well knowne sometime to the people of Israel; whither, when he came, the inhabitants forewarned of the Kings approach, tooke Boate, and shipted themselves into the Sea, lying neere them. From Elim he returned againe towards the South, and fare downe by the banks of the Red Sea: the seventh Mansion. For it seemeth that hee had knowledge of Amalech, who prepared to resist his passage through that part of Arabia. And Moses who had not as yet trained those of the Hebrewes, appointed to beare armes: nor assured the mindes of the rest, who encountering with the least miserie, were more apt to returne to their quiet slauerie, than either to endure the wants and perils which euery where accompanied them in that passage, or at this time to vndertake or sustaine so dangerous an enemy: hee therefore made stay at this Mansion, vntill the fifteenth of this second Moneth called Zim, or Iiar: and made the eight Mansion in the Desert of Zim, where the children of Israel murined against Moses the third time, hauing want of food. In the sixteenth Chapter of Exodus, Moses omitteth this retreat from Elim to the Red Sea, but in the collection of euery seuerall incamping, in the 33. of Numbers, it is set downe.

Here it pleased God to send so many flocks of Quailes, as all the Countrie about their incamping was couered with them. The morning following it also rained Manna, being 30 the sixteenth of their Moneth, which serued them in stead of bread. For now was the store consumed which the people carried with them out of Egypt. And though they had great numbers of Cattell, and Sheepe among them, yet it seemeth that they durst not feede themselves with many of those: but reserued them both for the milke to releue the children withall: and for breede to store themselves when they came to the Land promised.

From hence towards Raphidim they made two remoues of twentie miles: the one to Daphca, the other to Alus, distant from Raphidim sixe miles. Here being againe prest with want of water, they murmured the fourth time, and repented them of their departure from Egypt, where they rather contented themselves to be fed and beaten after the manner of beasts, than to suffer a casuall and sometime necessary want, and to vndergoe the hazzards and trauales which euery manly minde seeketh after, for the loue of God, and their owne freedoms. But Moses with the same rod which he diuided the Sea withall, in the sight of the Elders of Israel, brought waters out of the Rocke, wherewith the whole multitude were satisfied.

§. II.

Of the Amalekites, Madianites, and Kenites, vpon occasion of the battell with the Amalekites, and Iethroes coming: who being a Kenite, was Priest of Madian.

And while Moses incamped in this place, the Amalekites who had knowledge of his approach, and ghesied that he meant to leade the children of Israel through their Countrie (which being barren of it selfe, would be vterly wasted by so great a multitude of People and Cattell) thought it most for their aduantage to set vpon them at Raphidim: where the want of water, and all other things needefull for the life of 20 man inieebled them. On the other side Moses perceiuing their resolutions, gaue charge to Iosua, to draw out a sufficient number of the ablest Hebrewes, to incounter Amalech. Betweene whom and Israel, the victory remained doubtfull, for the most part of the day: the Hebrewes and Amalekites contending with equall hopes and repulies for many houres. And had not the strength of Moses prayers to God bene of farre greater force, and more preualent, than all resistance and attempt made by the bodies of men; that valiant and warlike Nation had greatly indangered the whole enterprife. For those bodies which are vnaquainted with scarcity of food, and those mindes whom a seruile education hath dulled, being beaten, and depaired in their first attempts, will hardly, or neuer be brought againe to hazzard themselves.

After this victory, Iethro repaired to Moses, bringing with him Moses his wife, and his two Sonnes, which either Iethro forbore to conduct, or Moses to receiue, till hee had by this ouerthrow of Amalech the better assured himselfe of that part of Arabia. For it is written in the 18. of Exod. v. 1. when Iethro the Priest of Madian, Moses Father in law heard all that God had done for Moses, &c. of which, the last deed, to wit, the ouerthrow of Amalech, gaue Iethro courage and assurance, he then repaired to his sonne in law Moses, at Sinai, where amongst other things, he aduised Moses to appoint Iudges, and other Officers, ouer 40 Israel, being himselfe vnable to giue order in all causes and controuersies, among so many thousands of people, full of discontentment and priuate controuersie.

This Iethro, although he dwelt amongst the Midianites, yet he was by Nation a Kenite, as in the fourth of Iudges v. 11 & 17. it is manifest; where it is written: Now Heber the Kenite, which was of the children of Hobab, to wit, the sonne of Iethro, the father in law of Moses, was departed from the Kenites, and pitched his Tents vntill the Platne of Zaanaim, which is by Kadesh. Likewise in the first of Samuel, Saul commanded the Kenites to depart from among the Amalekites, lest hee should destroy them with the Amalekites. For the Kenites inhabited the mountaines of Sin Kadesh: and the Amalekites dwelt in the Plaines, according to the saying of Balaam, speaking of the Kenites; Strong is thy dwelling place, and thou hast put thy nest in the Rocke. And that Saul spared this Nation, he giueth for cause, that they shewed mercie to all the children of Israel, when they came vp from 50 Egypt. For these Kenites were a Nation of the Madianites, and the Madianites were of the issues of Madian, one of the sixe sonnes which Abraham begat on Kethura: and might also take that name of Kenites from Kethura, of whom they descended by the Mother, who as it seemeth kept the knowledge of the true God among them, which they receiued from their parent Abraham. For Moses, when hee fled out of Egypt into Madian, and married the daughter of Iethro, would not (had hee found them Idolaters) haue made *Iethro*s Daughter the Mother of his children. And although the Kenites are named amongst those Nations, which God promised, that the seede of Abraham should roote out, and inherite their lands; yet it cannot be meant by these, who are descended from Abraham himselfe: but by some other Nation, bearing the

the same name; and in all likelihood of the race of Chus. For in the fifteenth of Genesis verse nineteenth, these Kenites or Chusites are lifted with the Hittites and Perizzites, with the Amorites, Canaanites, Gergesites, and Iebusites, which were indecde afterwards rooted out. But these Kenites, descended from Abraham, had leparated themselves from among the rest, which were altogether idolatrous. For, as is before remembered, Heber the Kenite, which was of the children of Hobab, was departed from the Kenites, that is to say, from those Kenites of Canaan, and inhabited in Zaanaim, which is by Kedesh or Kadesb. Again, Moses nameth that Nation of the Kenites, before Midian, or any of Abraham's other sonnes were borne: which he did (referring my selfe to better iudgement) rather, because they were more ancient, than by anticipation.

And as of the Kenites, so we may consider of the Madianites, parted by Moses into five Tribes. For some of them were corrupted, and Heathens; as those of Madian by the River Zared, afterwards destroyed by Moses. But the Madianites neere the banks of the Red Sea, where Moses married his wife Zippora, and with whom he left her and his children, till after the overthrow of Amalech, seeme likewise not to haue beene corrupted. For these Madianites with the Kenites assisted Israel, and guided them in the Desarts. But the Madianites in Moab, and to the North of the Metropolis of Arabia, called Petrea, were by Israel rooted out, when those adioyning to the Red Sea were not touched.

And though it may be doubted, whether those of Madian of whom Iethro was Priest, and the other Cities in Moab were the same, yet the contrary is more probable. For Moses would not haue sent 12000. Israelites, as far backe as the Red Sea, from the Plaines of Moab, to haue destroyed that Madian, where his wiues kindred inhabited, seeing himselfe comming with 60000. able men, was encountred by Amalech, in that passage. Neither could Moses forget the length of the way through those discomfortable Desarts, wherein himselfe and Israel had wandered 40. yeeres.

That Iethro, or Iothor, Raguel, or Reuel, and Hobab, were but one person, the Scriptures teach vs. For the Vulgar and Septuagint, which call him Raguel, and our Englisb Reuel, Exodus 2. 18. calls him Iethro, or Iothor, Exod. 2. & v. 1. c. 4. v. 18 & c. 18. 1. & 6. 9. 10 & 12. and in Num. c. 10. v. 29. Hobab. Others take Iethro & Hobab to be the same, but not Raguel.

§. III.

Of the time when the Law was giuen; with diuers commendations of the inuention of Lawes.

THe rest of the moneths of this yeere 2515. were spent in the Desart of Sinai, neere the mountaine of Sinai or Horeb, the twelfth Mansion. Eusebius thought that Sinai or Horeb were distinct mountaines: Hierome, to be but one, of a double name. And so it appeareth by many Scriptures. For in Exod. 3. v. 1. it is called Horeb: and in Exod. 24. v. 19. it is written Sinai. In the 106. Psalm v. 19. Horeb: in Exod. 19. 11. Sinai. And so it is called, Galatians 4. 24. and againe, Deut. 4. 10. & 15. & Deut. 5. 2. Horeb. And so it is in the first of Kings 8. 6. and the second of Chron. 5. 10. and in Malachie 4. 4. Finally, in Ecclesiasticus the 48. 7. they are named as one. which heardst (saith Ecclesiasticus) the rebuke of the Lord in Sinai, and in Horeb the iudgement of the vengeance. Somewhat they are disioyned at the top by the report of Peter Belonius, who in the yeere 1588. past out of Egypt into Arabia, with Monsieur de Fumes of France, and traualled to the top both of Sinai and Horeb: Sinai being by farre the higher hill. From the side of Horeb (saith he) there falleth a very faire spring of water into the Valley adioyning: where he found two Monasteries of Christian Maronites, containing some 100. Religious persons of diuers Nations, who had pleasant gardens, delicate fruits, and excellent wine. These (saith the same Author) giue entertainment to all strangers, which passe that way.

Now, that there was some such Torrent of water neere Sinai in Moses time, it is very probable: First, because he incamped there about almost a yeere, and drew no water, as in other places, by miracle: secondly, because it is written, Exod. 32. 20. that when Moses had broken the golden Calfe to powder, which Aaron set vp in his absence, he cast the powder thereof into the water, and made the children of Israel to drinke thereof.

On this mountaine, the Law by the Angell of God was giuen to Moses, where hee staied staied a whole yeere, wanting some ten or twelue dayes: for he removed not till the 20. day of the second moneth of the second yeere; and hee arriued about the 45. day after the egression: the Law being giuen the 50. day.

At this Mansion all was done, which is written from the beginning of the 29. Chapter of Exodus, to the end of that booke; all in Leuiticus; and all in Numbers, to the 10. Chapter. Whereof (because there is no storie nor other passage) I will omit the repetition, and in place thereof speake somewhat of the Law, and the kindes and vse thereof: whereby, if the Reader finde the story any way disioyned, hee may turne ouer a few leaues, and omitting this, finde the continuation thereof. We must first consider, that as there can be neither foundation, building, nor continuance of any Common-wealth, without the rule, leuell, and square of Lawes: so it pleased God to giue thereby vnto Moses the powerfulllest meane (his miraculous grace excepted) to gouern that multitude which he conducted; to make them victorious in their passage, and to establish them assuredly in their conquest. For as the North starre is the most fixed directour of the Seaman to his desired Port: so is the Law of God the guide and conductour of all in general, to the haue of eternall life: the Law of nature, from God his eternall law deduced, the rule of all his Creatures: the Law humane, depending on both these, the guard of Kings, Magistrates, and vertuous men; yea, the very spirit, & the very finewes of euery Estate in the world, by which they liue and moue: the Law, to wit, a iust law, being resembled to an Heart without affection, to an Eye without lust, and to a Minde without passion; a Treasurer, which keepeth for euery man what hee hath, and distributeth to euery man what he ought to haue. This benefit the Ancient, though barbarous, esteemed so highly, that among them, those which were taken for the first makers of Lawes, were honoured as gods, or as the sonnes of gods: and the rest, that made either additions or corrections, were commended to all posteritie for men of no lesse vertue, and no lesse liberally beneficiall to their Countries, than the greatest and most prosperous Conquerours that euer gouerned them. The Israelites, the Lacedemonians, and the Athenians, receiued their Lawes from one: as the Israelites from Moses; the Lacedemonians from Lycurgus; the Athenians from Solon; the Romanes sometime from their first Kings, from their Decemviri, from their Senatours, from their Lawyers, and from the people themselves: others from the Prince, Nobilitie, and People; as in England, France, and in other Christian Monarchies and Estates.

§. IIIII.

Of the name and meaning of the words, Law, and Right.

THe word Lex, or Law, is not alwaies taken alike, but is diuersly, and in an indifferent sense vsed. For if wee consider it at large, it may be vnderstood for any rule prescribing a necessarie meane, order, and methode, for the attaining of an end. And so the rules of Grammar, or other Arts, are called Lawes. Or it is taken for any priuate ordinance of Superiours to Inferiours: for the commandments of Tyrants, which they cause to be observed by force, for their decrees doe also vsurpe that title; according to the generall acceptation of the word Law: of which Esay Woe vnto them that Esay 10. decree wicked decrees, and write grieuous things. Likewise, the word is vsed for the tumultuarie resolutions of the people. For such constitutions doth Aristotle also call Lawes, though euill and vninsufficient: Malae lex est, quae tumultuarie posita est: It is an ill Law that is made tumultuously. So as all ordinances, eyther good or euill, are called by the name of Lawes.

The word Law is also taken for the morall habit of our minde, which doth (as it were) command our thoughts, words, and actions: framing and fashioning them according to itselfe, as to their patterne and plat-forme. And thus the law of the flesh which the Diuines call legem somitis, is to be vnderstood: For euery law is a kinde of patterne of that which is done according vnto it: in which sense as elsewhere, this morall habit or disposition of the heart is called the frame or figmentum of the heart: so in S. Paul to the Romans it is called a Law: But I see another law in my members, rebelling against the Law of sinne, and leading me captiue vnto the law of sinne. Again, the nature and iudiciall ones of all creatures are sometime called Lawes, so farre as they agree with the reason of the law eternall; as the law of a Lion, to be fierce or valiant.

Also priuate contracts among Merchants and other Tradef-men, doe often put on the name of lawes. But law commonly and properly is taken, for a right rule, prescribing a necessarie meane, for the good of a Common-wealth, or Ciuill communitie. The rest, to wit, the commandements of Tyrants, &c. which haue not the common good for their end, but being leges iniquae, are by Thomas called violentia magis quam leges; rather compulsion then lawes: And whatfoeuer is not iust, S. Augustine doth not allow for lawes, howfoeuer established: for he calls them iniqua hominum constituta, quae nec cura dicenda, nec putanda sunt; The vniust constitutions of men which are neither to bee termed nor thought lawes. For saith Aristotle, Legalia iusta sunt factiua, & conseruatiua felicitatis, Iust lawes are the workers and preseruers of happinesse: because by them we are directed ad vitam quietam, to a quiet life, according to Cicero: Yea, to life euerlasting, according to the Scriptures. For the end of the law, saith Plato, is God and his worship: Finis legis Dei & cultus eius. Lex, or the Law is so called by the Latines à legendo, or à ligando, of reading or binding: Leges quia leguntur & ad populum latae, saith Varro; For after Lawes were written and published, all men might reade them, & behold in them whereto they were bound. The other Etymologie, à ligando, is no lesse agreeable with the nature of a Law: whence in the Scripture it is called also a yoke, and a band: as confrugerunt iugum, diruperunt vincula: they haue broken the yoke, they haue broken the bands. And in the second Psalm, Dirumpamus vincula eorum, & proiciamus à nobis funes ipsorum; Let vs breake their bands in sunder, and cast away their cords from vs.

The Covenante it is called, because of the conditionall promises of God: and because of Gods peoples voluntarie submission of themselves vnto it: for which word the Septuagint, and the Epistle to the Hebrewes, vse the word διαθηκη, a Testament or last Will: which name it hath, because it is not otherwise effectually for our saluation, but in respect of the death of the Testator; for without the death of the Testator, the Testament is of no force: as Hebr. 9. 17. it is said, Testamentum in mortuis ratum est.

The Hebrewes call the law Thorah of teaching, because euery man is thereby taught his durtie, both to God and Men. The Greekes call it Nomos of distributing, because it distributeth to euery man his owne due, the power of the law is the power of God: Iustice being an attribute proper vnto God himselfe. Imperium legis imperium Dei est; The reigne of the Law, is the reigne of God.

Law in generall is thus defined by the Philosophers: Lex est vita regula, praecipiens quae sunt sequenda, & quae fugienda, Law is the rule of life, commanding what to follow, and what to shunne: or Lex est omnium diuinarum & humanarum rerum Regina; Law is the Queene or Princeesse of things both humane and diuine. But this description is grounded vpon the opinion of ineuitable fate. Law is the very wisdom of Nature: the reason and vnderstanding of the prudent: and the rule of right and wrong. For as a right line is called index sui & curui, the demonstration of it selfe, and of the crooked: so is the Law, the iudge and measure of right and wrong.

M. Hooker calls the Law a directiue rule to goodnesse of operation: and though law as touching the substance and essence, consist in vnderstanding: Concludit tamen actum voluntatis; Yet it comprehends the act of our will. The word Ius is also diuersly taken, as sometime for the matter of the law and for common right: sometime for the law it selfe: as Ius Civile, or Ius gentium. Isidore distinguisheth the two generall words Ius and Fas: whereof Ius, saith he, hath reference to men, Fas to God. Fas lex diuina, Ius lex humana. To goe ouer another mans field, is permitted, by Gods law, not by mans; and therefore in a thing out of controuersie, Virgil vsed both these words: as Fas & iura sinunt, God and men permit.

The word Ius or Right, is deriued or taken from the olde substantiue Nowne iustus, a bidding or commandement: or perhaps from the Greeke iura, which is the name of Iupiter, or of the Latine genitiue case Iouis; because as the Scripture speaks, the iudgement is Gods. For as it is certaine that iuramentum came of Iouis iurandum, (for so we finde it written in Nomus out of the ancient, in which sense the Scripture calls it iuramentum lehoue): so also we may say, that Ius came of Iouis, quia Iouis est: because as God is the Author, and Pattern, and Maintainer of right, so also in his Vicerents the Magistrates, hee is the pronouncer and executor of right. Of this Ius the iust are denominated, iustus à iure, and iustitia à iusto; The right giues name to the righteous: and iustice takes her name from the iust.

§. V.

§. V.

Of the definition of Lawes, and of the law eternall.

But because lawes are manifold, and that euery kinde hath a proper and peculiar definition, it agreeth with order, first to diuide and distinguish them. I meane those sorts of lawes, from whence all other particulars are drawne: leaving the individuals of humane lawes to their infinite and horrible confusion.

The law eternall is thus defined by Thomas. Lex aeterna est aeternus diuinae sapientiae conceptus, secundum quod ordinatur ad gubernationem rerum ab ipso praecognitum; The eternall law is the eternall concept of Gods wisdom as it is referred to the gouernment of things foreknowne by himselfe. Or Lex aeterna est summa atque aeterna ratio diuinae sapientiae: quatuor res omnes ad destinatos fines ita dirigit, ut illis iuxta conditionem ipsorum modum aliquem necessitatis adferat; It is the high and eternall reason of diuine sapience: as it directeth all things to their proper ends, imposing a kinde of necessitie according to their severall natures, or conditions. Now the difference lieth in this: That as the same diuine vnderstanding directeth all these to their proper ends; so it is called prouidence: but as it imposeth a necessity according to the natures of all things which it directeth, so it is called a law.

Of this eternall law Cicero tooke knowledge, when in his booke of Lawes, he wrote in this manner. Erat ratio perfecta, rerum natura, & ad recte faciendum impellens & à delicto auocans: quae non tum incipit lex esse cum scripta est: sed tum cum orta est. Orta autem simul est cum mente diuina: quoniam breuius lex vera atque princeps, apta ad iubendum & ad vetandum, ratio est recta summi Iouis; That perfect reason and nature of things incouraging or impelling to rightfull actions, and calling vs backe from euill, did not (saith he) then beginne to bee a law when it was written: but when it had being. Being and beginning it had together with diuine vnderstanding, and therefore a true Law and a fit Princeesse to command and forbid, is the right reason of the most high God. This eternall law, (if we consider it in God, or as God,) is alwaies one and the same; the nature of God being most simple: but as it is referred to diuers objects, so the reason of man findes it diuers and manifold. It also seemeth one law in respect of things necessarie, as the motions of the heauens; stabilitie of the earth, &c. but it appeareth otherwise to things contingent: another law to men, another to other creatures, hauing life, and to all those that be inanimate.

By this eternall law all things are directed, as by the counsaile and prouidence of God: from this law all lawes are deriued, as from the rule vniuersall: and thereto referred, as the operation of the second to the first.

The eternall, and the diuine Law, differ only in consideration; the eternall directing more largely: as well euery creature, to their proper and naturall ends, as it doth man to his supernaturall: but the diuine law to a supernaturall end only: the Naturall law is thence deriued, but an effect of the eternall: as it were a streame from this fountaine.

The law humane or temporall is also thence drawn: in that it hath the forme of right reason: from which if it differ, it is then impositio iniqua, a wicked imposition: and only borroweth the name of a law.

To this eternall law all things are subiected, as well Angels and Men, as all other creatures, creatures, or things created; whether necessary or contingent, naturall, or morall, and humane. For the law eternall runneth through all the vniuersall, and therefore it is the law also of things which are simple, naturall and inanimate.

Hence it is, that all things created are commanded to praise God their Creatour and Directour: as, Praise him all ye his Angels: praise him Sunne and Moone, all bright Starres: beames of heavens, for he hath established them for euer & euer. He hath made an ordinance which shall not passe: Praise ye the Lord from the earth ye Dragons and all Depths: Fire and haile, snow and vapours, stormie windes, which execute his Word: mountaines, and hills: fruitful trees and all Cedars: Beasts, and all Catiell, &c. Now as the reasonablen Creatures are by this eternall law bound, by the glory and felicitie proposed vnto them (beatitude being both the attractive, and the end) so all other naturall things and creatures, haue in themselves, and in their owne natures, an obedience formall to it, without any proper intention, knowne cause, or end proposed. For beasts are led by sense, and naturall instinct: things without life by their created forme, or formall appetites, as that which is heavy to fall downward: things light to mount vpward, &c. and fire to heate whatsoever is apposed. This kinde of working the Aristotelians ascribe to common nature: others to fate; a difference vied in termes onely; it being no other then Gods generall providence: for as it is truly said of God, that he is omnia super omnia: so are all things which appeare in themselves thence deriued: there vnder subiected: thence from by his eternall law and providence directed, euen from the greatest to the least of his creatures, in heauen and in earth.

The Schoolemen are very curious and ample in the consideration of these lawes: and in discourse of the profit, and of the matter, and object of the eternall law. But as the profit is manifest in the good of all creatures, who haue thence from, either reason, sense, vegetation, or appetite, to conduct them: so is the object and matter of the law, the whole creature. For according to S. Augustine, Lex eterna est, qua iustum est ut omnia sint ordinatissima; The law eternall is that, whereby it is iust, that all things should be disposed in the best and goodliest order.

Lastly, it is disputed, whether the eternall law be immutable, yea or no? But the resolution is, that it changeth not; for which S. Augustine vseth a sufficient argument in his first Booke of Free-Will, the sixth Chapter. For the law of Moses which had a time prefixed, was eternally by God ordained to last vntill the time of the Pedagogie of Gods people, or introduction to Christ should bee expired; which time of expiration some thinke our Saviour noted to be come, when on the Crosse he said, Consummatum est. But I rather thinke these words of our Saviour to haue no other signification, then that now the propheticie of their giuing him Vinegar to drinke was fulfilled. For so Saint Iohn expounds it, when he saith *28. That Christ seeing all (other) things to be fulfilled, vt consummaretur Scriptura, That the Scripture in this also might be fulfilled, Iud, I thirst: though I denie not, but at the same time also the date of the Law was expired, to wit, of the law ceremoniall, and of so much of the iudiciall, as appertained peculiarly to the Jewes, and agreeth not with the law of the new Testament and Gospel of Christ. For the immutable law of God, though prescribing things mutable, is not therefore changed in it selfe; but the things prescribed, change according to this eternall ordinance, of which the Wisdome of Salomon, And being one shee can doe all things, and remaining in her selfe reneweth all.*

§. VI.

Of the Law of Nature.

Of the law of Nature as it is taken in generall, I finde no definition among the Schoolemen: onely as it is considered in man, it is called the impression of diuine light, and a participation of the eternall law in the reasonablen creature. Lex naturalis est impressio diuini luminis in nobis, & participatio legis eterne in rationali creatura. Vlpian defines the naturall law to be the same which Nature hath taught all liuing creatures; Lex naturalis est quod Natura omnia animalia docuit: and hee afterward addeth, Lex ista non humani generis proprium, sed omnium animalium que terra marique nascuntur, animi quoque commune est; The law of Nature is not proper to man alone, but the same is common to all liuing creatures, as well to birds, as to those which the Land and Sea produceth.

But this definition is not generall, but of the naturall Law in things of life.

The Law of nature in generall, I take to be that disposition, instinct, and formall quality, which God in his eternall providence hath giuen and imprinted in the nature of euerie creature, animate, and inanimate. And as it is diuinum lumen in Men, inlightning our formall reason; so is it more then sense in Beasts; and more then vegetation in plants. For it is not sense alone in Beasts, which teacheth them at first sight, and without experience or instruction, to flee from the enemies of their liues: seeing that Bulles and Horses appeare vnto the sense more fearefull and terrible, then the least kinde of Dogges; and yet the Hare and Deere feedeth by the one, and flieth from the other, yea, though by them neuer seene before, and that as soone as they fall from their Dammes. Neither is it sense which hath taught other Beasts to provide for Winter, Birds to build their nests, high or low, according to the tempestuous or quiet seasons: or the Birds of India to make their nests on the smallest twiggies which hang ouer Riuers, and not on any other part of the tree, or elsewhere: to saue their egges and young ones from the Monkeys, and other Beasts, whose weight such a twigge will not beare: and which would feare to fall into the water. The instances in this kinde are exceeding many which may be giuen. Neither is it out of the vegetable or growing nature of plants, that some trees, as the female of the Palmitt, will not beare any fruite except the male grow in sight. But this they doe by that Law, which the infinite and vnsearchable wisdom of God had in all eternity provided for them, and for euerie nature created. In man this Law is double, corrupt, and incorrupt; corrupt, where the reason of man hath made it selfe subiect, and a Vassall to passions, and affections brutall: and incorrupt, where time and custome hath bred in men a new nature, which also, as is aforesaide, is a kinde of Law. For it was not by the Law of Nature incorrupt, which Saint Augustine calleth the Law of reason, but by a nature blinded and corrupted, that the Germans did anciently allow of theft: and that other Nations were by Law constrained to become Idolaters; that by the Lawes of Lycurgus it was permitted to men to vse one anothers Wife, and to the Woman to choose them others besides their Husbands, to beget them with childe: which Law in those parts hath lasted long, and is not forgotten to this day.

The Scythians, and the people of both Indies, hold it lawfull to bury with them the best beloued wiues: as also they haue many other customes remembred by G. Valentia, against nature and right reason.

And I know not from what authority it is, that these Lawes some men auow to be naturall: except it be of this corrupt nature, as (among others) to pay guile with guile: to become faithlesse among the faithlesse: to provide for our selues by another mans destruction: that iniury is not done to him that is willing: to destroy those whom we feare, and the like. For taking the definition of naturall Lawes, either out of Saint Augustine or Aquinas, (the one calling it the impression of diuine light; the other, the dictate or sentence of prauitue reason) the same can teach vs, or incline vs to no other thing, than to the exercise of iustice and vprightnesse: and not to offer or performe any thing toward others, saue that which wee would be content should be offered or performed toward our selues. For such is the Law of nature to the minde, as the eye is to the body; and that which according to David sheweth vs good, that is, the obseruation of those things which leade vs thereby to our last end; which is eternall life: though of themselves not sufficient without faith and grace.

Now, that which is truly and properly the law of Nature, where the corruption is not taken for the Law, is, as aforesaide, the impression of Gods diuine light in men, and a participation of the Law increated and eternall. For without any Law written, the right reason and vnderstanding, which God hath giuen vs, are abilities within our selues, sufficient to giue vs knowledge of the good and euill, which by our gratitude to God, and distribution of right to men, or by the contrary, we prepare and purchase for our selues. For when the Gentiles (saith Saint Paul) which haue not the Law, doe by nature those things contained in the Law: they hauing not the Law, are a Law vnto themselves. Now, to loue God by whom we are, and to doe the same right vnto all men, which we desire should be done vnto vs, is an effect of the purest reason: in whose highest Turrets, the quiet of conscience hath made her resting place, and habitation; In arce altissima rationis quies habitat. Therefore, the Gentiles (saith Saint Paul) which shew the effects of the Law written in their hearts, haue their consciences for a witness of those effects: and the reprobate their thoughts to accuse them.

And it is most true, that whosoever is not a law vnto himselfe (while hee hopeth to abuse the world by the aduantage of hypocrisie) worketh nothing else, but the betraying of his owne soule, by crafty vnrighteousnesse, purchasing eternall perdition. For it helpeth vs not to hide our corrupt hearts from the worlds eye, seeing from him, who is an infinite eye, we cannot hide them: some Garlands we may gather in this May-garne of the world, Sed flos ille, dum loquimur, arescit; Those flowers wither while we discourse of their colours, or are in gathering them. That we should therefore inhabite and dwell within our selues, and become fearefull witnesses of our secrettest euils, did that reuerend Philosopher Pythagoras teach in this golden precept: Nil turpe committas, neque coram alijs, neque tecum, maxime omnium, verere teipsum; Commit nothing foule or dishonest, faith he, neither to be knowne to others, nor to thine owne heart: but above all men reuerence thine owne conscience. And this may be a precept of nature and right reason: by which Law, men, and all creatures, and bodies, are inclined to those operations, which are answerable to their owne forme; as fire to giue heate. Now, as the reasonable minde is the forme of man, so is heaptly moued to those things which his proper forme presenteth vnto him: to wit, to that which right reason offereth; and the acts of right reason, are the acts of vertue: and in the breach of the rules of this reason, is man least excusable: as being a reasonable creature. For all else, both sensitiue, growing, and inanimate, obey the Law which God imposed on them at their first creation.

Gen. 1.

Job. c. 28.

The Earth performeth her office, according to the Law of God in nature: for it bringeth forth the bud of the hearbe which seedeth seede, &c. and the Beast, which liueth thereon. He gaue a Law to the Seas, and commanded them to keepe their bounds: which they obey. He made a decree for the raine, and a way for the lightning of the thunders. He caused the Sunne to moue, and to giue light, and to serue for signes and for seasons. Were these as rebellious as man, for whose sake they were created, or did they once breake the law of their natures and formes, the whole world would then perish, and all returne to the first Chaos, darkenesse, and confusion.

By this naturall Law, or Law of humane reason, did Caine perceiue his owne wickednesse, and offence, in the murder of Abel: for he not onely feared the displeasure of God, but the reuenge of men: it being written in his reason, that whatsoever he performed towards others, the same by others might be done vnto him againe. And that this iudgement of well and euill doing, was put into our natures by God, and his eternall Law, before the Law written: Moses in the person of God witnesseth, Gen. 4. If thou doe well, shalt thou not be accepted, and if thou doe not well, sinne lyeth at thy doore.

The Schoolemen are large also in this question of the naturall Law: the same being opened amply by Reinerius, Antoninus, and Valentia. But it is not my purpose to write a Volume of this subiect.

But this Law which Thomas Aquinas calleth an act of reason taken properly, and nota habite, as it is an euident naturall iudgement of practique reason: they diuide into indemonstrable, or needing no demonstration (as that good is to be followed, and euill eschewed) and demonstrable, which is euidently proued, out of higher and more vniuersall propositions. Again, as it answereth the naturall appetite, prescribing things to be desired as good, or to be auoyded as euill (as of the first, to desire to liue, and to satiate hunger, &c. and of the second, to eschew paines, sorrow, and death) in this consideration they diuide it, according to the diuers kinds of appetites that are in vs. For in euery man there are three sorts of appetites, which answer the three degrees of naturall Law. The first is, to be that which we are; in which is comprehended the desire, both to liue, and to preferue our being and life, also the desire of issue, with care to prouide for them: for the Father after his death liues in his children; and therefore the desire of life comprehends the desire of children. And to these appetites are referred the first indemonstrable laws of nature, for the most part. For it needs no prooffe, that all creatures should desire to be, to liue, and to be defended, and to liue in their issue, when they cannot in themselves. And as man is a being, Ens or Res: so he doth desire good, and shun euill. For it is common to all things, to desire things agreeable to their owne natures, which is, to desire their owne good. And so is Good defined by Aristotle, to be that which all desire. Which definition Basil vpon the 44. Psalme approueth: Recte quidem Bonum definitur, Quod omnia expetunt; Rightly haue some men defined Good, or Goodnesse, to be that which all things desire.

Tho. 9. 24. art. 2.

The

The second kinde of appetite is of those things which appertaine to vs, as wee haue sense. Whence, by the law of Nature, we desire the delights of euery sense; but with such moderation, as may neither glut vs with satiety, nor hurt vs with excessse. For as Sense it selfe is for the preservation of life and being: so is it meete, euen by the Law of nature, that the sensitiue appetite should not carry vs to the destruction, either of our life or being. And although (seeing both these kinds of appetites are in beasts) we may well say, that Nature hath giuen diuers Lawes vnto them: In which sense the Ciuitians define Naturall right, or Ius naturale, to be the same which Nature hath taught all liuing creatures; Yet the Schoolemen admit not, that the instincts of beasts can be properly called a Law, but onely a Ius, or Right, which is the matter, and aime of euery Law. For so they distinguish it; where Vlpian affirmeth, that Ius naturale is that, which Nature hath taught all liuing creatures. In this place (saith Valentia) Ius is not to be taken for a Law, but for the matter of the Law. And yet where Vlpian also distinguisheth the right belonging to liuing creatures in generall, from the right belonging to men; calling the one Ius nature, the other Ius gentium: the Diuines vnderstand the law of nature more largely, that is, for all euident dictates, precepts, or biddings of diuine reason: both in beasts and men; and restraints the law of Nations to a kinde of humane right.

The third appetite is of those things which appertaine properly to man, as he is a liuing creature reasonable: as well with relation to God, and to our Neighbour, as for our selues: and the Lawes of this appetite are the Commandements of our Religion.

Now although there are many other branches and diuisions of this law of nature answering the diuision of matter, which it prescribeth, and as manifold, as the morall actions are which it commandeth or forbiddeth: yet is the law of nature but one law, according to Aquinas: first, because it hath one fountaine or roote in the naturall or motiue faculty, which is but one, stirring vp to good, and declining the contrary: secondly, because all is contained in that generall naturall precept, That good is to be followed, and ill auoyded: and thirdly, because all the parts are reduced to one and the same last ende.

30 That this law of nature bindeth all creatures, it is manifest: and chiefly man; because he is indued with reason, in whom as reason groweth, so this band of obseruing the law of nature increaseth, Postquam ratio ad perfectum venit, tunc fit quod scriptum est, Adueniente mandato, peccatum reuincit; When reason grew to perfection, then it came to passe, which was written by Saint Paul, When the Commandement came, sinne reuined. Neither is it a small warrant for this law of nature, when those which breake the same, are said by Saint Paul, To be deliuered ouer into a reprobate sense (or minde) to doe those things which are not convenient: and againe, that their consciences beare witness, and their thoughts accuse them. For, though this law of nature stretch not to euery particular: as to command fasting and the like: yet, it commandeth in generall all good, and whatsoever is agreeable to right and reason. And therefore, saide Damasce, Homines facti sunt mali, declinando in id quod contra naturam est; Men (saith he) are made euill, by declining vnto that which is contrary to nature: and Saint Augustine, Omne vitium nature nocet, ac per hoc contra naturam est; Every vice doth wrong to nature, and is therefore contrary vnto it.

Rom. 1. 18.

Rom. 2. 15.

L. 2. Fid. ortho. c. 37.

Neither yet are the rules of this law of nature so straight, but that they suffer exceptions in some particulars. For whereas by this law all men are borne Lords of the earth, yet it well alloweth inequality of portions, according to vnequall merit: by taking from the euill, and giuing to the good: and by permitting and commanding that all men shall enjoy the fruites of their labours to themselves: according to the rules of iustice and equitie.

30 And though the Law of nature command, that all things be restored which are left in trust, yet in some causes, this her law shew suffereth to be broken: as to denie a mad man his weapons, and the like, which he left in keeping while he was sober. But the vniuersall principles can no more be changed, then the decrees of God are alterable: who according to Saint Paul, abideth faithfull, and cannot denie himselfe.

2 Tim. 2.

§. VII. Of the written Law of GOD.

Aug. de Ciuir.
Dei lib. 1.

After the eternall, and naturall, the law positiue or imposed is the next in order, which law, being nothing but an addition, or rather explication of the former, hath two kindes: Diuine and Humane. Againe, the diuine positiue law is double; the Olde and New: The Old was giuen vnto Moses in Mount Sinai or Flereb, at such time as the world had stooode 2511. whole yeeres: and in the 67. day of this yeere, when as Ascatades or Afcades gouerned the Assyrians, Marathres the Sycionians, Triopus the Argiues, Cecrops Attica, and Acherres Egypt: to wit, after the promise to Abraham, 430. yeeres. And this it seemes, was the first written law which the world receyued. For the very word Nomos, signifying a law, was not then, nor long after inuented by the Gracians: no nor in Homers time, who liued after the fall of Troy 80. years at least: and Troy it selfe was cast down 335. yeeres, after Moses led Israel out of Egypt. This Law, it pleased God to ingraue in stone, that it might remaine a lasting booke of his exprest wil in the Church; and that the Priests and people might haue, whereof to meditate, till the comming of Christ: and that so these Children of Israel, though bred among an Idolatrous people in Egypt, might be without excuse: the slight defences of ignorance being taken from them.

The reason knowne to vs why this Law was not written before, is, that when the people were few, and their liues long, the Elders of Families might easily without any written Law, instruct their owne Children: and yet as they increased, so doubtlesse they had, besides the law of Nature, many precepts from God, before the Law written. But now at length, forasmuch as the law of Nature did not define all kindes of good, and euill; nor condemne euery sinne in particular: nor sufficiently terrifie the consciences of offenders: nor so expound diuine worship, as for those after-ages was required, who gaue euery day lesse authority than other to the naturall Law; In these respects it was necessary, that the Law should be written, and set before the eyes of all men: which before, they might, but would not reade, in their owne consciences. The Schoolemen, and the Fathers before them, enlarge the causes and necessity, why the Law was written, whereof these are the chiefeest.

The first, for restraining of sinne, directly grounded vpon this place of Dauid, The law of the Lord is vndefiled, conuerting soules: The testimonies of the Lord are faithfull, giuing wisdom to children. For the humane Law, faith Saint Augustine, meeteth not with all offences, either by way of prohibition or punishment; seeing thereby it might take away something seeming necessary, and hinder common profit: but the diuine law written, forbiddeth euery euill, and therefore by Dauid it is called vndefiled.

Secondly, it serueth for the direction of our minds. For the Lawes of men can onely take knowledge of outward actions; but not of internall motions, or of our disposition and will: and yet it is required, that wee be no lesse cleane in the one, than in the other. And therefore were the words conuerting our soules, added by Dauid: wherein are all our outward acts first generated, according to the Cabalists. Actiones hominum nulla essent, nisi prius in mente dicerentur; The actions of men (say they) would be none at all, were they not first conceived in the minde.

Thirdly, it leadeth vs to the knowledge of truth, which by reason of diuersitie of opinion, and difference of peculiar Lawes among sundrie Nations, wee cannot be assured of; but the Law of GOD bindeth all men, and is without error: and therefore also sayde Dauid, That the testimony of the Law of God is faithfull: giuing Wisdom to children.

§. VIII. Of the vnwritten Law of God, giuen to the Patriarkes by Tradition.

NOW, that in all this long tract of time, betwene the creation and the written Law, the world and people of God were left altogether to the law of reason and nature, it doth not appeare. For the Patriarkes of the first Age receiued many precepts from God himselfe, and whatsoever was first imposed by Adam, the same was obserued by Seth, who instructed Enos: from whom it descended to Noah, Sem, Abraham, Isaac, Jacob, Ioseph, and Moses. Yea many particular Commandements afterward written, were formerly imposed and deliuered ouer by Tradition; which kinde of teaching the Jewes afterward called called Cabala, or Receptio: precepts receiued from the mouth of their Priests and Elders: to which the Jewes after the law written, added the interpretation of secret mysteries, referred in the bosoms of their Priests, and vnlawfull to be vttered to the people. But the true Cabala was not to be concealed from any; as being indeed the diuine law reuealed to the Patriarks, and from them deliuered to the posterity, when as yet it was vnwritten. The Commandements which God gaue vnto Adam in the beginning, were, that hee should impose names to all beasts, according to their natures; to whose perfection of vnderstanding they were sufficiently knowne. For finding the reason of his owne name Adam or Adamah, Earth, or red clay, he gaue other names significant, not onely to beasts, but to his Children and Nephewes, which afterward his issues imitated; as the name of Seth signifieth, as some take it, one that was laid for the ground or foundation of the Church, or rather, one giuen in recompence for Abel that was slaine: and Enosh signifieth man or miserable, &c. Further, God commanded Adam to till the ground, and to liue by the labour thereof: God also gaue him the choise of all fruites, but the forbidden, and in Adam also was marriage first instituted: all men thence-after being commanded to cohabit with their Wiues, rather than with their Father and Mother.

That murder and cruelty was also forbidden, both before the law written, and before the flood it selfe, it is manifest. God himselfe making it appeare, that it was one of the greatest causes of the destruction of mankind by the generall flood. For God said vnto Noah, An end of all flesh is come before me: for the earth is filled with cruelty through them: and behold, I will destroy them from the earth. That offence therefore, for which all perished, could not be vnknown to all that perished: Gods mercy and iustice interposing between the vntaught, and reuenge. This commandment God repeated to Noah, after the waters were dried vp from the earth. Who so sheddeth mans blood, by man shall his blood be shed: for in the Image of God hath he made man.

Also the law of honouring and reuerencing our parents, was obserued among the faithfull, and the contrary punished by the fathers curse: as, Cursed be Canaan, a seruant of seruants shall he be vnto his brethren. Againe, we find that the vnnaturall sin of the Sodomites was punished in the highest degree, as with fire from heauen. The sinne of Adulterie and Rauishment, was before the law no lesse detested than the rest, as appeareth by that reuenge, taken for Dina's forcing: and by the iudgement which Iuda gaue against Tamar. That she should be burnt: and by the repentance of Pharaoh & Abimelech, against whom this sentence was pronounced, Thou art but dead, because of the Woman which thou hast taken: for she is a mans wife. To these we may adde the ordinance of Sacrifice, of distinction of cleane and vncleane beasts; of Circumcision, of the brother to raise vp seed to his brother that left a widow childlesse, and diuers other constitutions, partly Morall, and partly Ceremoniall, which being deliuered before the written law, were after by it confirmed. So that this Diuine Law imposed, of which the Law of Moses containeth that which is called The old Testament, may be saide, not onely to haue bene written in the hearts of men, before it was engrauen in stone, but also in substance to haue bene giuen in precept to the Patriarks. For as S. Paul witnesseth of himselfe, I knew not sinne, but by the Law: so euer the Law naturally preceded, and went before offences, though written after offences committed. It is true, that all the creatures of God were directed by some kinde of vnwritten law; the Angels intuitiue; Men by reason; Beasts by sense and instinct, without discourse; Plants by their vegetatiue powers; and things inanimate by their necessary motions, without sense or preception.

§. IX. Of the Morall, Iudiciall, and Ceremoniall Law, with a note prefixed, How the Scripture speaketh not alway in one sense, when it nameth the Law of Moses.

NOW as the word (Law) in generall, as is aforesaid, hath diuers significations, and is taken for all doctrine which doth prescribe and restraine: so this Law, called the Law of Moses in particular, is taken by S. Paul diuersly; as sometime for all the old Testament, as, Now we know whatsoever the Law saith, it saith to them which are vnder the Law. When it is opposed, or differenced from the Prophets and Psalmes, it is there taken for the five Bookes of Moses. For so S. Luke hath distinguished them; as, All must bee fulfilled which are written of me in the Law, in the Prophets, and in the Psalmes.

Rom. 3. 28. When it is opposed to the Gospel, then it is taken for the Law Morall, Ceremoniall, and Iudiciall; as, Therefore we conclude, that a man is iustified by Faith, without the works of the Law.

Rom. 6. 4. Gal. 3. 18. When it is opposed to Grace, it signifieth the declaration of Gods wrath, and our guilt of condemnation; or the extremity of the law, and summum ius: as, For ye are not under the Law, but under Grace.

John 1. 17. When it is opposed to the Truth, namely, where the Ceremonies or signes are taken for the things signified; as, The Law was given by Moses, but grace & truth came by Iesus Christ.

Gal. 3. 22. Luc. 16. 6. Lastly, when it is opposed to the time of Christs comming, it signifieth the whole policy of the times Common-weale; as, Before faith came, we were kept under the Law, &c. Or the Law of the order and institution of the Aaronicall Priesthood; as, All the Prophets and the Law, or the Priests, prophesied unto Iohn. And if the Priesthood be changed, the Law also, to wit, of the Priesthood, must needs be changed.

Rom. 8. 2. Rom. 7. 23. The word (Law) is sometime also taken by the Figure Metonymia, for Interest, Authority, and Empire, or for constraining force; as, The Law of the Spirit of life, the law or the force of sinne and death, the enforcements of concupiscence, &c.

But the written Law of Moses, or the Law of the Olde Testament, of which we now speake, is thus defined. The Law is a doctrine, which was first put into the minds of men by God, and afterwards written by Moses, or by him repeated, commanding Holinesse and Iustice, promising eternall life conditionally, that is, to the obseruers of the law, and threatening death to those which breake the law in the least. For, according to S. Iames, who soeuer shall keepe the whole, and faileth in one point, is guilty of all. The definition vied by the Schoolemen, in which both the Old and New law are comprehended, is thus giuen. Lex diuina est diuinum decretum, hominibus prescribens modum necessarium ut apte peruenire possint ad supernaturalem beatitudinem, quæ est ultimus humana vite finis; The diuine Law (say they) is the decree of God, prescribing vnto men a necessary meane, whereby they may aptly attaine supernaturall beatitude, which is the last end of mans life.

Rom. 7. 12. The law of Moses hath three parts: Morall, Ceremoniall, and Iudiciall. The Morall part commandeth this or that good to be done, and this or that euill to be avoided, in particular; as also it declareth, for whose sake it is to bee done; as, Do this, for I am the Lord, whereas the law of nature commands it but in generall. Again, the Morall law entreateth of vertue and goodnesse; the Ceremoniall of diuine seruice, and of holinesse; (for eternall worship, and the order of hallowing our selues vnto God is called Ceremony) and the Iudiciall teacheth the particular gouernment, fit for the Common-wealth of the times, and prescribeth orders for iustice and equiry. And therefore was it saide of Saint Paul, The commandement is iust, holy, and good: iust, or iustice being referred to the Iudiciall: holy, or holinesse to the Ceremoniall; good, or honest to the Morall. The Iudiciall part is touching the gouernment of the Common-wealth of the times, in which many things must needs be proper to that estate, as such as were instituted either in respect of place or persons.

The Ceremoniall is diuided into foure parts, according to the foure kindes of things of which it speaketh, to wit, Sacrifice, Holy things, Sacraments, and Obseruances. To Sacrifices belong beasts, and the fruites of the earth; to Holy things the Tabernacle, Temple, Vessels, Altars, and the like; to Sacraments, Circumcision, the Pascheouer, and such like. For the Obseruances, they consisted either in prohibition of certaine meates, as not to eate the blood and fat of beasts: or in some other outward things, as in washings, purifyinges, annointings, and attire, as not to weare mixt Garments of Linnen and Wollen: as also it prohibiteth other vnnatural and vnproper commixtions, as Thou shalt not yoke together in a Plough an Oxe and an Asse, or cast mingled seede in one field. It also exhorteth to naturall compassion, and forbiddeth cruelty euen to beasts, birds, and plants, whereby the creatures of God might be destroyed without any profit to man. For so some referre these precepts, Thou shalt not kill the bird sitting on her nest; nor beate downe the first buds of the tree, nor muzzle the labouring Oxe, and the like, to the Ceremoniall Law.

Neither is there any of these three parts of the Law of Moses, but it hath as yet in some respects, the same power which it had before the comming of Christ. For the Morall liueth still, and is not abrogated or taken away: sauing in the ability of iustifying or condemning; for therein are wee commanded to loue and worship God: and to vse charitie

one towards another: which for euer shall be required at our hands. Therein also are we in particular directed, how this ought to bee done: which power of directing by speciall rules and precepts of life, it retaineth still. For these things also are commanded in both Testaments to be obserued: though principally for the feare of God in the one, & for the loue of God in the other.

The Ceremoniall also liueth in the things which it fore-signified. For the shadow is not destroyed, but perfected, when the body it selfe is represented to vs. Besides, it stil liueth, in that it giueth both instruction and testimony of Christ, and in that it giueth direction to the Church, for some Ceremonies and Types of holy signification, which are stil expedient; though in a farre fewer number than before Christs comming, and in a farre lesse degree of necessity.

Lastly, the Iudiciall liueth in substance, and concerning the end, and the naturall and vniuersall equity thereof.

But the Morall liueth in the point of iustification, the Ceremoniall as touching the vse and externall obseruation (because Christ himselfe is come, of whom the ceremonies were signes and shadowes) and the Iudiciall is taken away, as farre forth as it was peculiar to the times Common-weale and policie.

§. X. A proposall of nine other points to be considered, with a touch of the five first.

As for that which remaineth in the generall consideration of the diuine written Law, it may in effect be reduced into these nine points.

1. The dignity and worth of the Law.
2. The Maiesty of the Law-giuer.
3. The property and peculiarity of the people receiuing it.
4. The conueniency of the time in which it was giuen.
5. The efficacie and power thereof.
6. The difference and agreement of the old & new Testament.
7. The end and vse of the Law.
8. The sense and vnderstanding of the Law.
9. The durance and continuance thereof.

1. The dignity of the Law is sufficiently proued by S. Paul, in these words: Wherefore the Law is holy, and the Commandement is holy, and iust, and good: which three attributes are referred, as aforesaid, to the Morall, Ceremoniall, and Iudiciall.

2. The Maiesty of the Law-giuer is approued in all his creatures: who as he hath giuen all things their liues, and beings, so he onely gaue the Law, who could onely giue the end & reward promised, to wit, the saluation of mankind: but he gaue it not to Moses immediately, but by the ministry of Angels: as it is said. And the Law was ordained by Angels, in the hand of a Mediator: and in the Acts, He gaue the Law by the ordinance of Angels.

3. The propriety and peculiarity of the people, receiuing this Law, is in three respects. First, in that they were prepared: Secondly, in that they were a Nation apart and disscuered: Thirdly, in that they were the children of the promise made to Abraham. Prepared they were, because they had the knowledge of one God, when all other Nations were Idolaters. A Nation apart and seuered they were, because of Gods choice and election. Children of the promise they were, for the promise was made by God vnto Abraham and his seede: not vnto his seede, as to Esau and Iacob. but to his seede, as to Iacob or Israel singularly, of whom Christ. Now to Abraham and his seede were the promises made: see sayth Gal. 3. 6. not to the seede, as speaking of many, but to thy seede, as of one, which is Christ.

4. The conueniency of the time, in which it was giuen, is noted by S. Augustine: that it was about the middle time, betwene the Law of Nature, and Grace: the law of Nature continued from Adam to Moses: the Law written in the Commandements receiued by Moses in the worlds yeere 2514. continued to the Baptisme of Iohn: from which time, begun the Law of Grace, which shall continue to the worlds end. Other reasons for the conueniency are formerly giuen.

5. The fit consideration is of the efficacie of this Law, the same being a disposition to, or or signe of our Iustification : but not by it selfe sufficient, but as a figure of Christ in ceremonies, and a preparation to righteousness in morall precepts. For through the passion of Christ were sinnes forgiven, who taketh away the sinnes of the world : and therefore S. Paul calleth the rudiments of the law beggerly and weak; beggerly as containing no grace, weak as not able to forgive and iustifie. The blood of Goats and Bulles, and the ashes of an Heifer could onely cleanse the body; but they were figures of Christ's blood, which doth cleanse the inward soule. For if the law could iustifie, then Christ died in vaine.

§. XI. Of the sixth point, to wit, of the difference and agreement of the Old and New Testament.

THe Old and New Testament differ in name, and in the meane and way proposed for attaining to saluation: as the Olde by workes, the New by grace: but in the thing selfe, or object and remote end, they agree: which is mans happinesse and saluation.

The Old Testament, or Law, or Letter, or the Witnesse of Gods will, was called the Old, because it preceded the New Testament; which is an explication of the Old: from which the New taketh witnesse. Yet the New of more excellencie, in that it doeth more lively expresse, and openly and directly delineate the wayes of our redemption. It is also called the Old, to shew that in part it was to be abrogated: In that he saith the New Testament, he hath abrogated the Old. For the Old law, though greatly extolled by the Prophets, and deliuered with wonderfull miracles, yet was it constituted in a policy perishable: but the New was giuen in a promise of an euermore Kingdome, and therefore called in the Apocalyps, a Testament and Gospel for euer during.

The Old Testament is called the Law, because the first and cheefe part is the Law of Moses, of which the Prophets and Psalmes are Commentaries, explicating that Law.

The New Testament is called the Gospell, because the first and cheefe part thereof, is the glad tidings of our Redemption: the other Bookes, as the Epistles, or Letters of the Apostles, and the Acts or story of the Apostles, are plentifull interpreters thereof: The word Euangelion, signifying a ioyfull, happy, and prosperous message, or (as Homer vsed it) the reward giuen to the Messenger, bringing ioyfull newes. It is also sometime taken for a sacrifice, offered after victory, or other pleasing successe, as by Xenophon. In the Scriptures it hath three significations. First, for glad tydings in generall, as in Esay the 52. verse, concerning peace: Secondly, by an excellencie it is restrained, to signifie that most ioyfull message of saluation, as in Luc. 2. 10. whence also by figure it is taken for the History of Christ: and so we vnderstand the four Gospels.

Lastly, for the preaching and diuulging the doctrine of Christ, as 1 Cor. 9. 14. & 2 Cor. 8. 18.

The agreement of both Testaments (taken, I thinke, as they are diuided in volumes) is by Dan. 9. comprised in these foure.

In their Author.

In the substance of the Couenant, or things promised.

In the foundation, to wit, Christ.

In the effects, that is, in righteousness and iustification.

In the Author they agree, because both are of God, and therefore both one Testament and will of God in substance of doctrine. For as there was euer one Church, so was there one Couenant, one Adoption, and one Doctrine. As the old law doth point at Christ, so doth the new Law teach Christ: the olde proposing him as to come, the new as already come; one and the same thing being promised in both; both tending to one, and the same end: euen the saluation of our soules: which according to S. Peter, is the end of our Faith. For although it be said, that Moses did promise by obseruing the Law, an earthly Kingdome, a land flowing with milke and hony, the propagation of children, and other worldly blessings: yet all these were but figures to teach, and pledges to assure the Fathers of those spirituall blessings by Christ; for by the earthly, he raised their minds to the hope of heavenly. And the Fathers notwithstanding these worldly goods, did yet acknowledge themselves strangers, and pilgrims, expecting the heavenly Hierusalem: according to this place of the Hebrewes: All these dyed in faith, and receiued not the promises, but saw them farre off, and beleued them; confessing that they were strangers and pilgrims on the earth. To which purpose also Saint Augustine: Omnino pauci veterem legem intelligunt, non attendentes

Cyp. II. 13.

Lib. de Ciuit. Dei. 18. c. 15.

tendentes per promissa terrena aeterna promitti: Few (saith he) do vnderstand the old law: not attending that by things earthly eternall are promised. And S. Hierome: Noluit Deus pascere Indaeos more pecorum corporalibus donis opibusque, ut Indaei somniant; God would not feed the Iewes as beasts with corporall gifts and riches, as themselves dreame. And this may be gathered out of Gods owne words, Ego sum Deus tuus, & ero vobis in Deum; I am thy God, and I will be your God. For the words, I will be your God, proue that it was not for the present, or for perishable things, that God gaue them this promise, but in respect of the future: to wit, the safety of their soules. For as God created both body and soule, so hath he of his goodnesse, not left the better part vncaared for, which liueth euer.

The agreement betwene the Old and New Testament in substance, inferres also the agreement in foundation. For Christ is called the foundation of the law, laide both by the Apostles and Prophets; in whom all the promises of God in the Olde and New, are assured: the Fathers hauing eaten the same spirituall food, which we eate in our Sacraments.

The agreement in effects is, in that the knowledge of our sinne and miserie, which is taught vs by the law, maketh way, and as it were, serueth in subordination to the Gospell, the proper effects whereof are mercy and saluation: to which the Law serueth as an introduction (for to those which acknowledge their sin and misery, God sheweth his mercy and saluation) may be said to agree with the Gospell in the effect. For otherwise if we seuer the Law from subordination to the Gospell, the effects are very different: the one sheweth the way of righteousness by workes, the other by faith: the Law woundeth, the Gospell healeth: the Law terrifieth, the Gospell allureth; Moses accuseth, Christ defendeth: Moses condemneth, Christ pardoneth. The Old restraineth the hand, the New the minde. Data est lex quae non sanaret (saith Saint Augustine) sed quae egrotantes probaret; The Law was giuen, not to helpe, but to discover sicknesse: and Saint Chrysostome, Data est lex, ut se homo inueniret, non ut moribus sanaretur, sed ut medicus quaereretur; The Law was giuen that man might finde and know his owne imperfection: not that his disease was thereby holpen, but that he might then seeke out the physitian. For Christ came to saue the world, which the law had condemned. And as Moses was but a seruant, and Christ a Son; so the greatest benefit was reserued to be brought, as by the worthiest person, saith Cyril: for this law made nothing perfect, but was an introduction of a better hope.

§. XII. Of the rest of the points proposed.

The seventh consideration is of the end, and vse of the law: which is to bring vs to Christ: for finding no righteousness in our owne workes, wee must seeke it in some other. But this is the last, and remote, and vtmost end: the next and proper end of the law, is to prescribe righteousness, and to exact absolute and perfect obedience to God. Cursed is he which continueth not in all the things of this law.

The second end of the Law, is to render vs inexcusable before God: who knowing so perfect a law, do not keepe it: the law requiring a perfect and intire, not a broken or halfe obedience: but both inward and outward righteousness, and performance of duty to God and Men.

The third and cheefe end of the law, is as hath beene said, to send vs to Christ, and his grace, being in our selues condemned and lost. For the law was deliuered with thunder, and with a most violent and fearfull tempest, threatening eternall death.

The fourth end of the law was to designe, and preserue, the place of the Church and true people of God: and to hold them in one Discipline, and awe, till the coming of Christ: after whom the Church was to be dispersed ouer the whole world.

These be the ends of the Morall law. The end and vse of the Ceremoniall law, is to confirme the truth of Christ, and the new Testament. The vse of the Iudiciall, to teach vs naturall equity, and right, whereto we must conforme our selues.

The sence and vnderstanding of the Law is double, littell and spirituall: by the littell we are taught the worship and seruice of God: by the spirituall, the figures and mysticall fore-speakings of Christ.

Lastly, for the durance or continuance of the Law, the same had being vntil the passion of Christ: before which time, and while Christ taught in the world, both the old and the new were in force. But after that the true sacrifice was offered vpon the Altar of the Crosse, come,

* Gen. 49. 10.

Crosse, come.

Crosse, then the Iewish sacrifices and ceremonies, which were Types and figures of Christ (Christ being the body of those shadowes) ceased to binde the consciences any longer: the mystery of our redemption being now by Christ and in him finished. In token whereof, the vaile of the Temple rent asunder; noting that the ceremoniall vailes and shadowes were now to be removed, not that the morall law of the Commandements was hereby abolished, or weakened at all: otherwise then that it had not power to condemn according to the Iewish doctrine, as aforesaid. For the obseruing of the law was by Christ himselfe feuerly commanded: our loue towards God being thereby to be witnessed. And heerein Dauid so much reioyced, as he preferred the obseruation of the Law, before all that the world could yeeld. In via testimoniorum tuorum delatus sum, sicut in omnibus diuitijs; I have been delighted in thy law, as in all manner of riches: And againe, The law of thy mouth is good for me above thousands of gold and silver. This is the loue of God (saith S. Iohn) that we keepe his Commandement. And that there is no excuse for the neglect of the things commanded in the law, God himselfe in Deuteronomy witnesseth. This Commandement (saith he) which I command thee this day, is not hid from thee, neither is it farre off. It is not in heauen that thou shouldst say, Who shall go up for vs to heauen, and bring it vs, and cause vs to heare it that we may do it? neither is it beyond the Sea, that thou shouldst say, Who shall go over the Sea for vs and bring it vs? &c. but the word is very neere vnto thee, euen in thy mouth, & in thy heart for to do it. Behold (saith Moses) I haue set before thee this day, life and death, good and euill, in that I command thee this day, to loue the Lord thy God, to walke in his waies, and to keepe his Commandements, and his Ordinances, and his Lawes, that thou mayst liue, &c. Neither is it faide in vaine in Saint Mathew. Si vis ad vitam ingredi, serua mandata; if thou wilt enter into life keepe the Commandements: and in S. Iohn; Scio quia mandatum eius vita eterna est; I know that his Commandement is life euerslasting. And if this bee the charitie of God, or of Men towards God, as S. Iohn hath taught, to wit, that we keepe his Commandements: certainly hee is but a lyar, that professeth to loue God, and neglecteth to obserue the word of his will, with all his power. And though I confesse it not in mansability, without the speciall grace of God, to fulfill the law (Christ only as man excepted) yet if wee rightly consider the mercifull care which God had of his people in those his Commandements, we shall finde in our selues, how wee borrow liberty, and rather let slip our affections, and voluntarily loosen them from the chaines of obedience, to which the word of God and diuine reason hath fastened them, than that wee are excusable by those difficulties and impossibilities, which our minde (greedy of libertie) proposeth to it selfe. For this is the loue of God, that we keepe his Commandements, & his Commandements are not grieuous, 1. Iohn 3. 12. and if wee examine euery precept apart, and then weigh them each after other, in the ballance of our consciences, it is not harde for any man to iudge, by what easie persuasions, we steale away from our owne power, as vnwilling to vfe it against our pleasing desires.

§. XIII. Of the seuerall Commandements of the Decalogue: and that the difficulty is not in respect of the Commandements, but by our default.

For by the first we are commanded to acknowledge, serue, and loue one God. Now, whereby are we inticed to the breach of this precept? seeing euery reasonable man may conceiue and know, that infinite power cannot be diuided into many infinities: and that it is of necessity, that by this almighty Vnity, all things haue bin caused, and are continued. And if brute beasts had this knowledge of their Creator, and how in his providence he hath also provided for euery of them, Which giueth to beasts their foode, &c. there is no doubt but that they would also serue and loue him only.

The second precept is the forbidding of Idolatry, and worship of Images: the making whereof, out of doubt, was not the inuention of an ill intent in the beginning, seeing this is generally true. Omnia mala exempla bonis initijs orta sunt; All ill examples did spring and arise from good beginnings. For their first erection was to keep the memory of men famous for their vertue: vntill (saith Lactantius) the deuill crept into them, and (hauing blotted out the first intent) working in weak and ignorant foules, changed the nature of the one, and the reason of the other, to serue himselfe thereby. For what reasonable man, if hee be not forsaken of God, will call on those blinde, deafe, dumbe, and dead stocks, more worthlesse then the most worthlesse of those, that hauing life and reason, implore their helpe, which haue neither: yea, of more vilde prize and baser, then the basest of beasts, who haue sense and estimation? For what do we thereby (saith the Wisedome of Salomon) but call to the weake for helpe, pray to the dead for life, require aide of him that hath no experience, assistance in our iournies of him that cannot go, and succeffe in our affaires of him that hath no power? And whether the Idolater, or the blocke, to which he prayeth, bee more senselesse: Dauid maketh a doubt. For (saith he) they that make them are like vnto them, and so are all the rest that trust in them. Psalm 135. 18.

The breach of the third Commandement, is neither perswaded by worldly pleasure, nor worldly profit: the two greatest inchanters of mortall men. No, we are no way allured to this horrible disdaine of God, vnlesse the hate of good men, and Gods curse, be accounted an aduantage. For as our corruptest nature giues vs nothing towards it, so can it satisfie no one appetite, except euerslasting sorrow, and hell dwell in our desire. And therefore this strange custome hath the deuill brought vp among men, without all subtilty of argument, or cunning perswasion, taking thereby the greatest and most scornfull aduantage ouer vs. For slaughter satisfieth hatred, Theft giues satisfaction to need, Adultery to lust, Oppression to couetousnesse: but this contemptuous offence of blasphemy, and the irreuerent abuse of Gods name, as it giueth no helpe to any of our worldly affections, so the most saluage Nations of the world do not vfe it.

The fourth Commandement, to keepe the Sabbath day holy, hath neither pain, burthen, nor inconuenience. For it giueth rest to the laborer, and consolation to their Masters. And that this law was imposed on man for his benefit, Moses teacheth in the reason of the law: as in Exod. 23. 12. And in the seventh day thou shalt rest, that thine Oxe and thine Asse may rest, and the sonne of thy maide, and the stranger may be refreshed.

The first of the second Table to honour our Parents, with whom we are one and the same, is a gratitude which nature it selfe hath taught vs towards them, who after God gaue vs life and being, haue begotten vs, and borne vs, cherished vs in our weake and helpless infancy, and bestowed on vs the haruest and profit of their labours and cares. Therefore, in the Temporall and Iudiciall ordinances, cursing of parents, or the offering so them violence, was made death.

The next is, that thou shalt not Murther, that is, thou shalt not do the actes following the affections of hatred. For the law of God, and after it our owne lawes, and in effect the law of all Nations, haue made difference between slaughter casuall, and furious. Affectio enim tua (saith Bracton) imponit nomen operi tuo; It is the affection and will that makes the work such as it is. And certainly, whosoever cannot forbear to commit murther, hath neither the grace of God, nor any vfe of his owne will.

The third of the second Table, commands vs from Adultery. Now, if the preservation of Virginitie haue bene possible, for thousands of Men and Women, who in all Ages haue mastered their fleshly desires, and haue returned chaste to the graue: It cannot be accounted a burthen, to forbear the dishonour and iniurie, which we offer to others by such a violation, seeing marriage is permitted by the lawes of God, and Men, to all that affect it. And there is no man liuing whom the desire of beauty and forme hath so constrained, but he might with ease forbear the prosecution of this ill: did not himselfe giue sucke to this Infant, and nourish warmth till it grow to strong heate, heate till it turne to fire, and fire to flame.

The fourth of the second Table, is, that we shall not steale. And if that kinde of violent robbery had bene vfed in Moses time, which many Russians practise now a dayes in England, and to the dishonor of our Nation more in England, than in any Region of the world among Christians; out of doubt, he would haue censured them by death, and not by restitution, though quadruple. For I speake not of the poore and miserable foules, whom hunger and extreame necessity inforceth, but of those detested Theeves, who to maintaine themselves Lord-like, assault, rob, and wound the Merchant, Artificer, and Labouring man; or break by violence into other mens houses, and spend in Brauerie, Drunkennesse, and vpon Harlots, in one day, what other men sometime haue laboured for all their liues: impoverishing whole Families, and taking the bread and foode from the mouths of their children. And that this Commandement might easily be obserued, it would soone appeare, if Princes would resolue, but for a few yeeres to pardon none. For, it is the hope of life, and the argument of sparing the first offence, that incourageth these these Hell-hounds. And if euery man presume to be pardoned once, there is no State or Common-wealth, but these men would in a short time impouerish or destroy it.

The fifth Commandement of this second Table, is, the prohibition of false witness: from which if men could not forbear, all surety of estate and life were taken away. And so much did God detest a false witness, and a false accuser, especially in matters criminal, that the law ordained him to suffer the same death or punishment, which he sought by falsehood to lay on his brother.

The last of the ten Commandements forbiddeth vs to couet any thing, which belongeth to another man, either the bodies of their wiues for concupiscence, or their goodes for desire of gaine. And this precept seemeth the hardest for men to obserue; so esteemed by reason of our fraile affections: and yet if wee iudge heereof rightly, it may be doubted whether it extend to all our inconsiderate fancies and vaine thoughtes. For although it be not easie to master all our sudden passions, yet we may restraîne and hinder the growing, and farther increase, if we please to intend our strength, & seeke for grace. How the word Coueting reacheth to all those it is to be considered. For Concupiscencia, according to some, Est effrenatus habendi appetitus; An vnbridled, or unrestrained appetite of hauing: And as touching such an appetite, we cannot excuse our felmes by any our naturall frailty, or vnaduised error; But as I suppose, the word Concupiscence is more largely taken, either for a determinate and vnbridled euill intent, or for some vrging inclination thereunto. All the question is of the later sort: which is, Actus imperfectus, id est, non deliberatus ratione, quæ est principium proprium actus boni aut visiofi; Such passions, or inclinations are imperfect acts, that is, not deliberated upon by reason, which is the proper principle of a good or vicious action. And sure, it may seeme, that so long as we resist such motions, they harme vs not: as they say, Quamdiu refragmur nihil nocent: nocent autem cum eas dominari permittimus; As long as wee giue no assent vnto them, it is thought by some that they hurt vs not; and that then onely they hurt, when we suffer them to beare sway. But these men, as it seemes, make nothing forbidden in this tenth precept, but what hath bene forbidden in the other: for in euery Commandement, not onely the outward acte, but also the inward assent vnto euill, though it breake not out into acte, is forbidden: therefore, that we may know the difference between this Commandement and the rest, the distinction of desires is to be held: that some are with assent, and vnbridled; others bridled, and without assent. For so euen the Morall Philosopher can tell vs, that the Continent man hath euill desires, but without assent (for they are bridled by the strength of right reason) as on the other side the Incontinent hath good desires, but restrained and suppressed by contrary passions. The euill desires when they are accompanied with assent, are in euery Commandement forbidden, together with the outward acte: and therefore, if we will haue any thing proper to this Commandement, wee must needs say, that the euill desires of the Continent man (that is, euen those which wee resist and bridle) are heere forbidden. For though he that bridled his euill desires, bee much better than he that yeeldeth vnto them: yet such a man, euen according to the Heathen Philosopher, is not worthy the name of a vertuous man. For Aristotle himselfe makes Continentia, not to be vertue, but onely a degree vnto it: confessing, that though the Continent man do well in bridling his euill affections, yet he doth not all, seeing he ought not so much as to haue the at all. Neither is it much more, that true diuinity deliuereth touching this matter. For, as he saith, that in the Continent man the hauing of these euill desires, though he resist them, is the cause that he cannot be called a vertuous man: so we, that the hauing of them is a sinne. Only in this we excell him heere: that we are able out of diuinity to giue the true reason of this doctrine: which is, that euery one sinneth, that doeth not loue God with his whole heart and affection: whence it followeth, that the euill desires of the Continent man, that is, of him which bridled them, must needs be sinne: seeing such desires, though bridled, are a-pulling away of a part of our heart and affection from God.

Seeing therefore it hath pleased God, to make vs know, that by our faithfull endeouours to keepe his commandements, we witnesse our loue toward himselfe: we may not safely giue libertie to our vanities, by casting backe vpon God (who is iustice it selfe) that he hath giuen vs precepts altogether beyond our power, and Commandements impossible for vs to keepe. For, as hee is accused (saith Saint Hierome) that auowes that the Law is in all things possible to be obserued: so he hath made this addition: Maledictus qui qui dicit impossibilia Deum præcepisse; Accused is hee that saith that God hath commanded things (in themselves, and not through our fault) impossible. Now, as the places are many which command vs to keepe the Law: so is our weaknesse also in the Scriptures laide before vs, and therefore it is thus safely to be vnderstood, that we should without euasion, or without betraying of our felues, doe our faithfull endeouours to obserue them: which if we doe vnfaignedly, no doubt, but God will accept our desires therein. For that there is no man iust, David witnesseth: Enter not into iudgement with thy seruant, for in thy sight no flesh that liueth shall be iustified. And in the first of Kings, There is no man that sinneth not: And againe, Who can say, I haue made my heart cleane? But seeing there is no sinne greuous without deliberation; let euery mans conscience iudge him, whether hee giue way willingly, or restraîne himselfe in all that he can, yea, or no: For when a King giues to his subiect a commandement vpon paine of losse of his loue, to performe some seruice: if the subiect neglecting the same, seeke to satisfie his Soueraigne with shifting excuses, out of doubt such a Prince will take himselfe to be derided therein.

§. XIII.

If there were not any Religion nor Iudgement to come, yet the Decalogue were most necessary to be obserued.

20 And if wee consider aduisedly and soberly, of the Morall Law, or ten Commandements, which God by the hand of Moses gaue vnto his people, it will appeare that such was his mercifull providence in the choise of them, as were there neither paine, nor profit adioyned to the obseruing, or not obseruing of them; were there no diuine power at all, nor any Religion among men; yet if wee did not for our owne sakes strue to obserue these Lawes, all society of men, and all endeouours, all happinesse and contentment in this life would be taken away: and euery State and common-wealth in the World fall to the ground and dissolve. Therefore, these Lawes were not imposed as a burthen, but as a blessing: to the end that the innocent might be defended, that euery man might enjoy the fruites of his owne trauaile, that right might be done to all men from all men: that by iustice, order, and peace, we might liue the liues of reasonable men, and not of beasts; 30 of free-men, and not of slaves; of ciuill men, and not of sauaiges. And hereof making our humane reason onely Iudge, let vs see the inconueniences in this life which would follow by the breach and neglect of these Lawes.

As first, what would the issue be if we acknowledged many Gods? would not a farre greater hatred, warre, and blood-shed follow, than that which the difference of ceremonie, and diuersity of interpretation, hath already brought into the World, euen among those Nations which acknowledge one God, and one Christ?

And what could it profit man-kinde to pray to Idols, and Images of gold, mettall, dead stones, and rotten wood, whence nothing can be hoped, but the losse of time, and an impossibility to receiue thence-from, either helpe or comfort?

The breach of the third Commandement bringeth there-with this disadvantage, and ill to man, that whosoever taketh the name of God in vaine, shall not at any time benefit himselfe by calling God to witnesse for him, when hee may iustly vse his holy name.

The obseruing the Sabbath holy, giueth rest to men and beasts, and nature herselfe requireth intermission of labour.

If we despise our Parents, who haue giuen vs being, we thereby teach our owne children to scorne and neglect vs, when our aged yeeres require comfort and helpe at their hands.

50 If murder were not forbidden, and seuerely punished, the race of mankinde would be extinguished: and whosoever would take the liberty to destroy others, giueth liberty to others to destroy himselfe.

If adultery were lawfull and permitted, no man could say vnto himselfe, This is my sonne: there could be no inheritance proper, no honour descend to posterity, no endeour by vertue and vnder-taking to raise Families: murders and poysonings betwene man and wife would be daily committed: and euery man subiect to most filthy and vncleane diseases.

If stealth and violent rapine were suffered, all man-kinde would shortly after perish.

or live as the saluages; by rootes and acornes. For no man laboureth but to enioy the fruites thereof. And such is the mischeefe of robbery, as where Moses for lesser crimes appointed restitution fourefold, policie of State and necessity hath made it death.

To permit false witness, is to take all mens liues and estates from them by corruption: the wicked would sweare against the vertuous: the waster against the wealthie: the idle begger and loyterer, against the carefull and painfull laborer: all triall of right were taken away, and iustice thereby banished out of the world.

The coueting of that which belongs to other men, bringeth no other profit than a distraction of minde, with an inward vexation: for while we couet what appertains to others, we neglect our owne: our appetites are therein fed with vaine and fruitlesse hopes, so long as we do but couet; and if we do attaine to the desire of the one, or the other, to wit, the wiues or goods of our neighbours, we can look for no other, but that our selues shall also, either by theft or by strong hand, be deprived of our owne.

Wherein then appeareth the burthen of Gods Commandements, if there bee nothing in them, but rules and directions for the generall and particular good of all living: Surely, for our owne good, and not in respect of himselfe, did the most mercifull & prouident God ordaine them; without the obseruation of which, the vertues of heavenly bodies, the fertility of the earth, with all the blessings giuen vs in this life, would be vnto vs altogether vnprofitable, and of no vse. For wee should remaine but in the state of brute beasts, if not in a farre more vnhappy condition.

§. XV. Of humane Law, written and vnwritten.

Humane Law, of which now it followeth to speake, is first diuided into two, (Viz.) Written, and Vnwritten. The vnwritten consists of vsage, approved by time: which Isidore calls Mores: and he defines Mores: to be Consuetudines vetustate probate, to be customs approved by antiquity, or vnwritten lawes. Now custome differeth from vse, as the cause from the effect: in that custome is by vse and continuance established into a Law: but yet there where the law is defectiue, saith Isidore.

And of customes there are two generall natures, containing innumerable particulars, the first are written customes, receiued and exercised by Nations, as the customes of Burgundie and Normandie: the ancient generall custome of England, & the customes of Castill, and other Prouinces.

The second are these petty customes, vsed in particular Places, Cities, Hundreds, and Mannors. The generall or Nationall customes are some written, others vnwritten.

The particular or petty customes are seldome written, but witnessed by testimony of the inhabitants. The customes of the Duchie of Cornwall comprehending also the Stannerie of Deuon, as touching Tin, and Tin causes, are written in Deuon, but not in Cornwall. But howsoeuer vse and time hath made these customes as lawes, yet ought euery custome to be rationabilis, as well as prescripta. Non firmatur tractu temporis quod de iure ab initio non subsistit; That which at first was not grounded upon good right, is not made good by continuance of time. And (saith Vlpian) quod ab initio vitiosum est, non potest tractu temporis conualescere; Course of time amends not that which was naught from the first beginning.

For these two defences are necessary in all lawes of custome; the one, that it be not repugnant to the law diuine, and naturall: the other, that the cause and reason be strong, prouing a right birth, and necessary continuance: it being manifest, that euery custome which is against the law, had his beginning from euill deeds, & therefore not without the former considerations to be allowed. And it is true, that all customes of this nature were but tolerated for a time, by the Law-makers, though they haue bene since continued, because posterity is not bound to examine by what cause their Ancestors were thereto moued. For non sufficit simplex toleratio. And it is in this sort ouer-ruled in the law; Per populum consuetudo contra legem induci non potest, nisi de voluntate illius qui nonam legem, & nonam constitutionem statuere potest, qui solus Princeps est; The people cannot bring in a new custome against law: saue by his will, who hath power so make a new law and ordinance, which is onely the Prince.

Humane Law generally taken, to wit, humane law written, is by some defined to be the decree or doome of practique reason: by which humane actions are ruled and directed. Papinian calls the Law a common precept, the aduiselement of wisemen, & the restraint of offences committed, either willingly or ignorantly. Isidore calles the Law a Constitution written, agreeing with Religion, fittest for Government and common profit: And more largely, Omne id quod ratione consistit, All that stands with reason.

Lastly, and more precisely it is thus defined. Humane Law is a righteous decree, agreeing with the Law natural, and eternall: made by the rational discourse of those, that exercise publique authority: prescribing necessary obseruances to the subiect. That euery Law ought to be a righteous decree, S. Augustine teacheth, saying: Mihi lex esse non videtur, quae iusta non fuerit; It seems to be no law at all to me, which is not iust: and iust it cannot be, except it agree with the law naturall and eternall. For there is no Law iust and legitimate (saith S. Augustine) which the Law-makers haue not deriued from the eternall. Nihil iustum atque legitimum est, quod non ab aeterna lege sibi homines deriuauerint.

Secondly, it ought to be constituted by discourse of reason, whereby it is distinguished from the Law naturall, to wit, the naturall, indemonstrable, or needing no demonstration, from whence the law humane is taken and deduced.

Thirdly, that it ought to bee made by an authorized Magistrate, it cannot bee doubted, be the government of what kinde soeuer. For it falleth otherwise vnder the Title of those decrees called Violentia, or iniqua constitutiones; Violences, or wicked constitutions.

Of humane Law there are foure properties, especially answering these foure conditions in the former definition. First, as it is drawne out of the law of nature: so euery particular of the humane Law may be resolved into some principle or rule of the naturall.

Secondly, it is to be considered as it is referred vnto, and doth respect the common good.

Thirdly, it is to be made by publique authority.

Fourthly, concerning the matter of the Law, it prescribeth, and directeth, all humane actions. And so is the Law as large and diuers, as all humane actions are diuers, which may fall vnder it. For according to Thomas, Alia lex Iulia de Adulterij, alia Cornelia de Sycarijs; The Law of Iulian against Adultery is one, the Cornelian against Ruffians, is another.

Now the humane Law, generally taken, is in respect of the first of these considerations, diuided into the Law of Nations, and the Ciuill.

The Law of Nations is taken lesse or more properly; lesse properly for euery Law which is not of it selfe, but from other higher principles deduced: and so it seemeth that Vlpian vnderstands it: for he defineth Ius gentium, or the Law of Nations, to be that which is onely common amongst Men, as Religion, and the worship of God: which is not in the very nature of this Law of Nations; but from the principles of the Scriptures, and other diuine Reuelations. But the Law of Nations properly taken, is that dictate, or sentence, which is drawne from a very probable, though not from an euident principle, yet so probable, that all Nations doe assent vnto the conclusion, as that the free passage of Ambassadors be granted betweene enemies, &c. which Nationall Law, according to diuers acceptions, and diuers considerations had of the humane Law, may be sometime taken for a Species of the Naturall, sometime of the Humane.

Ius Civile, or the Ciuill Law, is not the same in all Common-wealths, but in diuers states it is also diuers and peculiar, and this Law is not so immediately deriued from the Law of Nature, as the Law of Nations is: For it is partly deduced out of such principles as all Nations doe not agree in, or easily assent vnto; because they depend on particular circumstances, which are diuers, and doe not fit all estates. Hereof Vlpian, Ius civile, neque in totum à naturali & gentium recedit, neque per omnia ei seruit: ita q. cum aliquid addimus vel de iustitia iuris derelinquimus iuri communi, Ius proprium, id est, Civile efficitur; The Ciuill Law (saith he) doth neither wholly differ from the Law of Nature, and Nations, nor yet in all points obey it: therefore when we adde ought to, or take from the Law that is common, we make a Law proper, that is, the Ciuill Law.

The Law now commonly called the Ciuill Law, had its birth in Rome; and was first written by the Decem-viri, 303. yeeres after the foundation of the City. It was compounded as well out of the Athenian, & other Grecian Lawes, as out of the ancient Romane customes and Lawes Regall. The Regal Lawes were deuised by the first Kings, and called Leges Regiae, or Papirianae, because they were gathered by Papirius, Tarquius then reigning. For though so many of the former Lawes as maintained Kingly authority, were abolished, shed, with the name; yet those of Servius Tullius, for Commerce and Contracts, and all that appertained to Religion, and common utility, were continued, and were a part of the Lawes of the twelve Tables. To these Lawes of the twelve Tables were added (as the times gave occasion) those made by the Senate, called Senatus-consulta: those of the common people, called Plebi-scita: those of the Lawyers, called responsa prudentum: and the Edicts of the Annual Magistrate: which Edicts being first gathered and interpreted by Julian, and presented to Adrian the Emperour, they were by him confirmed and made perpetuall Lawes; and the Volume stiled Edictum perpetuum; as those and the like Collections of Iustinian afterward were.

The difference anciently betwene Lawes and Edicts, which the French call Reglements, consisted in this, that Lawes are the Constitutions made or confirmed by soveraign authority (be the soveraignty in the people, in a few, or in one) and are withall generall and permanent: but an Edict (which is but Iussum Magistratus, unless by authority it be made a Law) hath end with the Officer, who made the same, saith Varro. Quipsum Edicto tribuit, legem annuam esse dicunt; They who ascribe the most unto an Edict, say that it is a Law for one yeere: Though Isidore doth also expresse by the word Constitutiones or Edicts, those Ordinances called Acts of Prerogatives; as Constitutio vel Edictum est quod Rex, vel Imperator constituit, vel edicit; An Ordinance or Edict is that which a King or Emperour doth ordaine or proclaime.

Lastly, the Humane Law is diuided into the Secular, and into the Ecclesiasticall, or Canon. The Secular commanding temporall good, to wit, the peace and tranquillity of the Common-weale: the Ecclesiasticall the spirituall good, and right Government of the Ecclesiasticall Common-weale, or Church, Illud naturæ legem, hoc diuinam spectat; That respecteth the Law of Nature, this the Law of God. And so may Ius Civile be taken two ways; first, as distinguished from the Law of Nations, as in the first diuision: Secondly, as it is the same with the Secular, and differs from the Ecclesiasticall. But this diuision of the Schoolemen is obscure. For although the Ciuilt be the same with the Secular, as the Ciuilt is a Law, yet the Secular is more generall, and comprehendeth both the Ciuilt, and all other Lawes not Ecclesiasticall. For of Secular Lawes, in vse among Christian Princes, and in Christian Common-weales, there are three kinds; the Ciuilt which hath euery where a voyce; and is in all Christian Estates (England excepted) most powerfull; the Lawes of England called Common, and the Lawes of custome or Provinciall. In Spain besides the Law Ciuilt, they haue the customes of Castill, and other Prouinces. In France besides the Ciuilt, the customes of Burgundy, Blois, Berry, Niemois, and Lodunois, &c. Tous lieux situes & assis en Lodunois, seront gouuernez selonc les customes du dit pays; All places lying within the precincts of Lodunois, shall be gouerned according to the customes of that place. There are also in France the customes of Normandy, and these of two kinds; Generall, and Locall; and all purged and reformed by diuers Acts of the three Estates. The Charters of confirmation of these ancient customes, before and since their reformation haue these words; Nos autem, registrum prædictum, res laudabiles, & consuetudines antiquas, &c. laudamus, approbamus, & autoritate Regia confirmamus; The Register aforesaid, laudable use, and ancient customes we praise, approve, and by our Kingly authority confirme. The common Law of England is also compounded of the ancient customes of the same, and of certaine Maxims by those customes of the Realme approoued. Vpon which customes also are grounded those Courts of Record, of the Chancery, Kings Bench, Common Pleas, and Exchequer, with other small Courts.

These ancient customes of England haue beene approoued by the Kings thereof, from age to age: as that custome by which no man shall be taken, imprisoned, disseised, nor otherwise destroyed, but he must first be put to answer by the Law of the Land, was confirmed by the Statute of Magna Charta. It is by the ancient custome of England, that the eldest Sonne should inherit without partition. In Germany, France, and elsewhere otherwise, and by partition. In Ireland it is the custome for all Landes (that haue not beene resigned into the Kings hands) that the eldest of the House shall enjoy the Inheritance during his owne life: and so the second and third eldest (if there be so many brothers) before the Heire in lineall descent: this is called the custome of Tanistrie. For example, if a Lord of Land haue foure sonnes, and the eldest of those foure haue also a Sonne, the three Brothers of the eldest Sonne, shall after the death of their Brother, enjoy their Fathers Lands before the Grand-child: the custome being grounded grounded vpon the reason of necessity. For the Irish in former times, hauing alwayes liued in a subdiuided Ciuilt Warre, not onely the greatest against the greatest, but euery Baron and Gentleman one against another, were enforst to leaue successors of age and ability, to defend their owne Territories. Now as in Normandie, Burgundie, and other Prouinces of France, there are certaine peculiar and petty Customes, besides the great and generall custome of the Land, so are there in England, and in euery part thereof. But the greatest bulke of our Lawes, as I take it, are the Acts of Parliament: lawes propounded and approved by the three estates of the Realme, and confirmed by the King, to the obedience of which all men are therefore bound, because they are Actes of choise, and seife-desire. Leges nulla alia causa nos tenent quam quod iudicio populi receptæ sunt; The lawes vpon which we do therefore binde the subiect, because they are receiued by the iudgement of the subiect. Tum de legibus humana leges habent vim suam, cum fuerint non modo institutæ, sed etiam firmatæ approbatione communitatis; It is then that humane lawes haue their strength, when they shall not onely be desired, but by the approbation of the people confirmed.

Isidore fasteneth these properties to euery Christian Law, that the same bee honest, that it bee possible, that it bee according to Nature, and according to the custome of the Country; also for the time and place conuenient, profitable, and manifest, and without respect of priuate profite, that it be written for the generall good. He also giues foure effects of the Law, which Modestinus comprehends in two; to wit, obligation, and instigation: the former bindes vs by feare, to auoide vice; the latter incourageth with hope, to follow vertue. For according to Cicero, Legem oportet esse vitiorum emendatricem, commendatricemque virtutum; It becometh the Law to bee a mender of vices, and a commender of vertues. The part obligatorie or binding vs to the obseruation of things commanded or forbidden, is an effect common to all lawes: and it is two-fold; the one constraineth vs by feare of our consciences, the other by feare of externall punishment. These two effects the law performeth, by the exercise of those two powers, to wit, Coactive and Directiue.

The second of these two effects remembred by Modestinus, is Instigation, or incorage-ment to vertue, as Aristotle makes it the end of the Law, to make men vertuous. For lawes being such as they ought to be, doe both by prescribing and forbidding, iurge vs to well-doing; laying before vs the good and the euill, by the one and the other purchased. And this power affirmatiue commanding good, and power negatiue forbidding euil, are those into which the law is diuided, as touching the matter: and in which David comprehendeth the whole body and substance thereof: saying, Declina à malo, & fac bonum: Decline from euil, and do good.

§. XVI. That onely the Prince is exempt from humane Lawes, and in what sort.

NOW whether the power of the humane Law bee without exception of any person, it is doubtfully disputed among those that haue written of this subiect, as well Diuines as Lawyers: and namely, whether Soueraigne Princes bee compellable; yea, or no? But whereas there are two powers of the Law, as aforesaid; the one Directiue, the other Coactive: to the power Directiue they ought to bee subiect, but not to that which constraineth. For as touching violence or punishments, no man is bound to giue a preiudiciall iudgement against himselfe; and if equals haue not any power ouer each other, much lesse haue inferiours ouer their superiours, from whom they receiue their authority and strength.

And speaking of the supreme power of lawes, simply then is the Prince so much about the Lawes, as the soule and body vnited, is about a dead and senselesse carkasse. For the King is truly called, Ius viuum, & lex animata: An animate and liuing Law. But this is true, that by giuing authority to lawes, Princes both adde greatnes to themselues, & conferue it; and therefore was it said of Bracton out of Iustinian, Merito debet Rex tribuere legi quod lex attribuit ei: namely, facit ut ipse sit Rex; Rightfully ought the King to attribute that to the Law, which the Law first attributeth to the King; for it is the Law that doth make Kings.

But whereas Bracton ascribeth this power to the humane law, he is therein mistaken. For Kings are made by God, and lawes diuine; and by humane lawes onely, declared to bee Kings. As for the places remembred by the Diuines and Lawyers, which inferre a kinde of obligation of Princes, they teach no other thing therein, then the bond of conscience, and profit arising from the examples of vertuous Princes, who are to giue an account of their actions to God onely.

Tibi soli peccavi, faith David; Against thee onely have I sinned: therefore, the Prince cannot be saide to be subiect to the Law, Principes non subijcitur legi. For seeing according to the Schoolemen, the Law humane is but quoddam organum & instrumentum potestatis gubernativæ: non videtur posse eius obligatio ad eum se extendere, ad quem ipsa vis potestatis humana non pertinet; sed vis potestatis humana non se extendit ad gubernatorem, in quo illa residet. Ergo neq; lex condita per talem potestatem obligare potest ipsum conditorem. Omnis enim potentia actiua, est principium transmutandi aliud; Seeing humane Law (say they) is but a kind of Organ or Instrument of the power that governeth, it seemes that it cannot extend it selfe to binde any one whom no humane power can controll, or lay hold of: but the Governour himselfe, in whom the governing power doth reside, is a person that cannot by himselfe, or by his owne power be controlled. And therefore the Law which is made by such a power, cannot binde the law-maker himselfe: for euery actiue ability, is a cause or principle of alteration in another body, not in the body in which it selfe resides. And seeing Princes haue power to deliuer others from the obligation of the Law: Ergo etiam potest ipsemet Principes siue legislator siue voluntate prohibito ab obligatione legis liberare; Therefore also may a Prince or Law-maker at his owne will and pleasure deliuer himselfe from the bond of the Law. Therefore in the rules of the Law it is thus concluded: Subditi tenentur leges obseruare necessitate coactionis, Principes vero sola voluntate sua, & intuitu boni communis; The subiects are bound to fulfill the Law by necessity of compulsion, but the Prince onely by his owne will, and regard of the common good.

Now concerning the politique Lawes, giuen by Moses to the Nation of the Israelites, whether they ought to be a Preident, from which no ciuill institutions of other people should presume to digresse, I will not presume to determine, but leaue it as a question for such men to decide, whose professions giue them greater ability. Thus much I may be bold to affirme, that wee ought not to seeme wiser then God himselfe, who hath told vs that there are no Lawes so righteous, as those which it pleased him to giue to his Elect people to be gouerned by. True it is, that all Nations haue their seuerall qualities, wherein they differ, euen from their next borderers, no lesse than in their peculiar languages: which disagreeable conditions to gouerne aptly, one and the same Law very hardly were able. The Roman ciuill Lawes did indeede containe in order a great part of the then knowne World, without any notable inconuenience, after such time as once it was receiued and become familiar: yet was not the administration of it alike in all parts, but yeelded much vnto the naturall customes of the sundry people, which it gouerned. For whether it be through a long continued perswasion, or (as Astrologers more willingly grant) some influence of the Heauens, or peraduenture some temper of the soile and climate, affording matter of prouocation to vice (as plenty made the Sybarites luxurious: want and opportunity to steale, makes the Arabians to be Theeues) very hard it were to forbid by Law an offence so common with any people, as it wanted a name, whereby to be distinguished from iust and honest. By such rigour was the Kingdome of Congo unhappily diuered from the Christian Religion, which it willingly at the first embraced, but after with great fury reiected, because plurality of Wiues was denied vnto them, I know not how necessarily, but more contentiously then seasonably. In such cases, me thinks, it were not amisse to consider that the high God himselfe permitted some things to the Israelites, rather in regard of their naturall disposition (for they were hard-hearted) than because they were consonant vnto the ancient rules of the first perfection. So, where euen the generall nature of man doth condemne (as many things it doth) for wicked and vniust; there may the Law, giuen by Moses, worthily be deemed the most exact reformer of the euill, which forceth man, as neere as may be, to the will and pleasure of his Maker. But where nature or custome hath entertained a vicious, yet not intolerable habite, with so long and so publike approbation, that the vertue opposing it would seeme as vnouth, as it were to walke naked in England, or to wear the English fashion of apparel in Turkie: there may a wise and vpriht Law-giuer, without presumption, omit somewhat that the rigour of Moses his Law required; euen as the good King Hezekiah did, in a matter meereley Ecclesiasticall, and therefore the lesse capable of dispensation, praying for the people; The good Lord be mercifull vnto him, that prepareth his whole heart to seeke the Lord God, the God of his Fathers, though hee be not cleansed according to the purification of the Sanctuary: which prayer the Lord heard and granted.

To this effect it is well obserued by Master Doctor Willet, that the morall Iudicial of Moses doe partly binde, and partly are let free. They doe not hold affirmatiuely that wee are cryed to the same severity of punishment now, which was inflicted then; but negatiuely they doe hold, that now the punishment of death should not be adiudged, where sentence of death is not giuen by Moses: Christian Magistrates ruling vnder Christ the Prince of peace, that is, of Clemency and Mercy, may abate of the severity of Moses Law, and mitigate the punishment of death, but they cannot adde vnto it to make the burden more heavy: for to shew more rigour then Moses, becommeth not the Gospel.

But I will not wander in this copious argument, which hath bene the subiect of many learned discourses, neither wil I take vpon me, to speak any thing definitiuely in a case which dependeth still in some controuersie among worthy Diuines. Thus much (as in honour of the Iudicial Law, or rather of him that gaue it) I may well and truly say, that the defence of it hath alwayes bene very plausible. And surely howsoeuer they be not accepted (neither were it expedient) as a generall and onely Law; yet shall we hardly find any other ground, whereon the conscience of a Iudge may rest, with equall satisfaction, in making interpretation, or giuing sentence vpon doubts, arising out of any Law besides it. Hereof, perhaps, that Iudge could haue bene witnesse, of whom Fortescue that notable Bulwarke of our Lawes doth speake, complaining of a iudgement giuen against a Gentlewoman at Salisbury, who being accused by her owne Man, without any other prooff, for murdering her Husband, was thereupon condemned, and burnt to ashes: the Man who accused her, within a yeere after being Conuict for the same offence, confest that his Mistis was altogether innocent of that cruell fact, whose terrible death hee then (though ouer-late) greeuously lamented: but this Iudge, faith the same Authour, Sapius ipse mihi fassus est, quod nunquam in vita sua animum eius de hoc facto ipse purgaret; He himselfe often confessed vnto me, that he should neuer during his life, be able to cleare his conscience of that fact. Wherefore that acknowledgement which other Sciences yeeld vnto the Metaphysiques, that from thence are drawne propositions, able to proue the principles of Sciences, which out of the Sciences themselues cannot be proued, may iustly be granted by all other politique institutions, to that of Moses; and so much the more iustly, by how much the subiect of the Metaphysiques, which is, Ens quatenus Ens; Being as it is being, is infinitely inferiour to the Ens Entium; The being of beings, the onely good, the fountaine of truth, whose feare is the beginning of wisdom. To which purpose well faith Saint Augustine, Conditor legum temporalium si vir bonus est & sapiens, illam ipsam consulit aternam, de qua nulli anime iudicare datum est; The Author of temporall Lawes, if hee be good and wise, doth therein consult the Law eternall, to determine of which there is no power giuen to any soule. And as well Prince Edward, in Fortescue his discourse, Nemo potest melius aut aliud fundamentum ponere, quam posuit Dominus; No man can lay a better, or another foundation, then the Lord hath laide.

CHAP. V.

The Story of the Israelites from the receiuing of the Law to the death of Moses.

§. 1. Of the numbring and disposing of the Host of Israel, for their marches through the Wildernesse; with a note of the reuerence giuen to the worship of God, in this ordering of their troups.

When Moses had receiued the Law from God, and published it among the people, and finished the Tabernacle of the Arke and Sanctuary, he mustred all the Tribes and Families of Israel: and hauing seene what numbers of Men fit to beare armes, were found in euery Tribe, from 20. yeeres of age vpwards; he appointed vnto them, by direction from the Lord, such Princes and Leaders, as in worth and reputation were in euery Tribe most eminent. The number number of the whole Army was 603550. able men for the wars, besides women & children; also, besides the strangers which followed them out of Aegypt; This great Army was diuided by Moses into foure grosse and mighty Battalions, each of which contained the strength of three whole Tribes.

The first of these containing 186400. able men, consisted of three Regiments, which may well, in respect of their numbers, be called Armies; as containing the three whole Tribes of Judah, Issachar, and Zabulon. In the Tribe of Judah were 74600. fighting men, led by Naaſon: in Issachar 54400. led by Nathaniel: in Zabulon 57400. led by Eliab. All these marched vnder the Standard of the Tribe of Judah, who held the Vantage-guard, and was the first that moued & marched, being lodged and quartered at their generall incampment on the East-side of the Army, which was held the first place, and of greatest dignity.

The second Battalion or Army, called in the Scriptures the Host of Reuben, had joynt vnto it Simcon and Gad, in number 151450. All which marched vnder the Standard of Reuben. In the Tribe of Reuben were 46500. vnder Elizur: in Simcon 59300. vnder Shelumiel: in Gad 45650. vnder Elisaph: These had the second place, and incamped on the South-side of the Tabernacle.

The third Army marched vnder the Standard of Ephraim, to whom were ioyned the Regiments of Manasse and Beniamin; who, ioyned together, made in number 108100. able men. These marched in the third place, incamping on the West quarter of the Tabernacle. Ephraim had 40500. vnder Elisbama: Manasse 32200. vnder Gamliel: Beniamin 35400. vnder Abidana.

The fourth and last Army, or Squadron, of the generall Army, containing 157600. able men, marched vnder the Standard of Dan; to whom were ioyned the two Tribes of Nephthali and Asher. And these had the Rereward, and moued last, incamping on the North-side. Dan had 62700. vnder Abiezzer: Asher 41500. vnder Pagiel: Nephthali 53400. vnder Abira.

Besides these Princes of the severall Tribes, there were ordained Captaines ouer Thousands, ouer Hundreds, ouer Fifties, and ouer Tens; as it may appeare by that mutinie and insurrection against Moses; Num. 16. v. 1. & 2. For there arose vp against Moses 250. Captaines of the Assembly, famous in the Congregation, and men of renoune: of which number were Korah, Dathan, and Abiram. Which three principal Mutiners, with those 250. Caprains that followed them, were not any of the 12. Princes of the Tribes, or Generall Colonels before spoken of, as by their names, Num. 1. is made manifest.

The blessing which Israel gaue to his children, tooke place not onely in the diuision of the Land of promise, and other things of more consequence, long after following; but euen in sorting them vnder their severall Standards in the wilderness it was obserued. For Judah had the precedency and the greatest Army, which also was wholly compounded of the Sonnes of Leah, Jacobs wife. Reuben hauing lost his birth-right, followed in the second place, accompanied with his brother Simcon, who had vndergone his Fathers curse; and with Gad, the sonne of his Mothers Hand-maide. Ioseph, who in temporall blessings had the prerogative of the first borne a double portion, was accounted as two Tribes, and diuided into two Regiments: the younger (according to Jacobs prophecy) taking place before the elder. He was assisted by Beniamin, his best-beloued brother, the other son of Rachel. To Dan, the eldest son of Jacobs Concubines, was giuen the leading of the fourth Army, according to Jacobs prophecy. He had with him vnder his Standard none of the children of Lea, or Rachel, but onely the sonnes of the Hand-maides.

In the middle of these foure Armies, was the Tabernacle, or portable Temple of the Congregation carried, sur-rounded by the Leuites. Neere vnto which, as the Heathens and Pagans could not approach, by reason of these foure powerfull Armies which guarded the same: so was it death for any of the children of Israel to come neere it, who were not of the Leuites, to whom the charge was committed. So sacred was the moueable Temple of God, and with such reuerence guarded and transported, as 22000. persons were dedicated to the seruice and attendance thereof: of which 8580. had the peculiar charge, according to their severall offices and functions; the particulars whereof are written in the third and fourth of Numbers. And as the Armies of the people obserued the former order in their incampings: so did the Leuites quarter themselves, as in an inner square, on euery side of the Tabernacle; the Gershonites on the West, within the Arme, and Standard of Ephraim, ouer whom Elisaph commanded, in number 7500. The

The Family of Cohath on the South-side, guided by Elisaphan, within the Army of Reuben, and betweene him and the Tabernacle, in number 8600. The third company were of the Family of Merari, ouer whom Zuriel commanded, in number 6200. and these were lodged on the North-side, within the Army of Dan; On the East-side, and next within those Tribes and Forces which Judah led, did Moses and Aaron lodge, and their children, who were the first and immediate Commanders, both of the Ceremonies and of the People; vnder whom, as the chiefe of all the other Leuiticall Families, was Eleazar the sonne of Aaron, his successeur in the high Priesthood.

This was the order of the Army of Israel, and of their incamping and marching; the Tabernacle of God being alway set in the middle and center thereof. The reuerend care, which Moses the Prophet, and chosen seruant of God, had in all that belonged euen to the outward and least parts of the Tabernacle, Arke and Sanctuary, witnessed well the inward and most humble zeale borne towards God himselfe. The industry vsed in the framing thereof, and euery, and the least part thereof, the curious workmanship thereon bestowed; the exceeding charge and expence in the prouisions; the dutifull obsequence in the laying vp, and preferring the holy Vessels; the solemne remouing thereof; the vigilant attendance thereon, and the prouident defence of the same, which all Ages haue in some degree imitated, is now so forgotten and cast away in this super-fine Age, by those of the Family, by the Anabaptists, Brownists, and other Seitaries, as all cost and care bestowed and had of the Church, wherein God is to be serued and worshipped, is accounted a kinde of Popery, and as proceeding from an idolatrous disposition: inso much as Time would soone bring to passe (if it were not resisted) that God would be turned out of Churches into Barnes, and from thence again: into the Fields and Mountaines, and vnder the hedges; and the Offices of the Ministry (robbed of all dignity and respect) be as contemptible as these places; all Order, Discipline, and Church-gouernment, fit to newnesse of opinion, and mens fancies: yea, and soone after, as many kindes of Religions would spring vp, as there are Parish-Churches within England: euery contentious and ignorant person clothing his fancy with the Spirit of God, and his imagination with the gift of Revelation; inso much, as when the Truth, which is but one, shall appeare to the simple multitude, no lesse variable then contrary to it selfe, the Faith of Men will soone after dye away by degrees, and all Religion be held in scorne and contempt. Which distraction gaue a great Prince of Germany cause of this answer to those that perswaded him to become a Lutheran: Si me adiungo vobis, tunc condemnor ab alijs: si me alijs adiungo, à vobis condemnor, quid fugiam video, sed quid sequar, non habeo: If I adioyne my selfe to you, I am condemned by others: If I tiorne with others, I am condemned by you: What I should auoide I see, but I know not what I should follow.

§. II. The offerings of the twelue Princes: the Passenger of the second yeere: The departing of Iethro.

Now when Moses had taken order for all things necessary, prouided for the seruice of God, written the Lawes, numbred his Army, and diuided them into the battailes and troupes before remembred, and appointed them Leaders of all sorts; The twelue Princes or Commanders of the Tribes brought their offerings before the Lord, to wit, fixe couered Chariots, and twelue Oxen to draw them, therein to transport, as they marched, the parts of the Tabernacle, with all that belonged thereunto: the Sanctuary excepted, which for reuerence was carried vpon the shoulders of the sons of Korah, to whom the charge was committed, and the Chariots in which was conueyed the other parts of the Tabernacles and Vessels thereto belonging, were deliuered to the Leuites for that seruice, namely to the Sonnes of Gershon and Merari.

Besides these Chariots, each of these Commanders, Princes, or Heads of Tribes, offered vnto God, and for his seruice in the Temple, a Charger of fine silver, weighing 130. sheekles, a silver Boll of 70. sheekles; after the sheckle of the Sanctuary; and an Incense-Cup of gold, of ten sheekles, which they performed at the same time when the Altar was dedicated vnto God by Aaron: and before they marched from Sinai towards

The Hebrew Gerah weigheth fixtene graines: so a Gerah of silver is about three halfe-pence sterling: the Sicle of the Sanctuary (as it is expounded, Exod. 30. 13.) containeth 20. *Gersh*s; so a Sanctuary Sicle of silver is about 7 grs; the common Sicle is but halfe as much. to wit ten *Gersh*s: as it is usually expounded; though Vallartius and Tabours so prove that the common and the Sanctuary Sicle were all one, Num. 9. verse 5. Num. 10. 11. Exodus. 26. 34. Numbers 9. 17.

their

their conquest, besides the Beasts which they offered for sacrifice, according to the Law Ceremoniall, the weight of all the twelue siluer Chargers, and twelue siluer Bolles, amounted vnto 2400. sheckles of siluer; and the weight of gold in the Incense-Cuppes, to 120. sheckles of gold; which makes of sheckles of siluer 1200. euery sheckle of gold valuing ten of siluer, so that the whole of gold and siluer which they offered at this time, was about foure hundredth and twenty pound sterling. This done, Moses, as in all the rest by the Spirit of God conducted, gaue order for the celebrating of the Passeouer, which they performed on the foureteenth day of the second moneth of the second yeere: and on the twentieth day of the same, the cloude was lifted vp from aboue the Tabernacle as a signe of going forward; Moses beginning his march with this inuocation to God: Rise up Lord, and let thine enemies be scattered, and let them that hate thee, flee before thee. Then all the people of Israel removed from their incamping at the foote of the Mountaine Sinai, towards Paran, the Armie, or great Squadron of Iuda, led by Naashon, taking the Vanguard, followed by Nethaneel and Eliab, Leaders of the Tribes of Issachar and Zabulon: after whom the rest marched, as in the figure exprest. And because the passage through so many deserts and mountaines, was exceeding difficult: Moses leauing nothing vnforethought which might serue for the aduancement of his enterprize, he instantly intreated his Father in Law, whom in the tenth of Numbers he calleth Hobab, to accompany them in their journey towards Canaan; promising him such part and profit of the enterprize, as God should bestow on them: for this man, as he was of great vnderstanding & iudgement (as appeared by the Counsell hee gaue to Moses for the appointing of Iudges over the people) so was he a perfect guide in all those parts, himselfe inhabiting on the frontier thereof, at Midian, or Madian: and (as it seemeth) a man of great yeeres and experience; for he was then the Priest or Prince of Madian, when Moses fled first out of Egypt, and married his Daughter, which was 42. yeeres before this request made. And though Moses himselfe had liued 40. yeeres in these parts of Arabia, through which he was now to trauell: yet the better to assure his passage, and so great a multitude of foules, which could not be so few as a Million, it was necessary to vse many guides, and many conducters. To this request of Moses, it may seeme by the places, Exod. 18. 27. and Num. 10. 30. that Iethro, otherwise called Hobab, yeelded not: for it is euident, that he went backe from Moses into his owne Countrey. But because it appeareth by other places of Scripture, that the posterity of this Hobab was mingled with the Israelites, it is most likely that this his returne to his owne Countrey, was rather to fetch away his Family, and to take his leaue of his owne Countrey, by setting things in order, then to abide there.

The voyage from Horeb to Kades: the mutinies by the way: and the cause of their turning backe to the Red Sea.

AFTER this dismission of Hobab, Israel beganne to march towards the Deserts of Paran: and after three dayes wandering, they late downe at the Sepulchers of lust, afterward called Tabeera, or Incenso: by reason that God consumed with fire those Mutiners and Murmurers which rose vp in this remoue, which happened about the 23. day of the same Moneth. And from this 23. day of the second Moneth, of the second yeere, they rested and fed themselves with Quails (which it pleased God by a Sea-winde to cast vpon them) to the 24. day of the third moneth, to wit, all the moneth of Sinan or Iune: whereof surfaiting there dyed great numbers: from whence in the following moneth, called Thamus, answering to our Iuly, they went on to Hazereth, where Miriam the sister of Moses was stricken with the leprosie, which continued vpon her seuen dayes, after whose recovery Israel remooued toward the border of Idumaea; and incamped at Rithma, neere Kades Barnea, from whence Moses sent the twelue discoverers into the Territory of Canaan, both to informe themselves of the fertility and strength of the Countrey; as also to take knowledge of the Wayes, Passages, Riuers, Fords, and Mountaines. For Adrad king of the Canaanites surprized diuers companies of the Israelites, by lying in ambush neere those wayes, through which the discoverers and searchers of the Land had formerly past. Now, after the returne of the discoverers of Kades, the wrath of God was turned against Israel; whose ingratitude and rebellion after his so many benefites, so many remissions, so many miracles wrought, was such, as they esteemed their deliuerance from the

the Egyptian slavery, his feeding them, and conducting them through that great and terrible Wildernesse (for so Moses calleth it) with the victory which he gaue them against the powerfull Amalekites, to be no other then the effects of his hatred, thinking that hee led them on and preferred them, but to bring them, their wiues, and children to be slaughtered, and giuen for a prey and spoyle to the Amorites, or Canaanites. For it was reported vnto them, by the searchers of the Land, that the Cities of their enemies were walled and defended with many strong Towers and Castles; that many of the people were Giant-like, (for they confest that they saw the sonnes of Anac there) who were men of fearefull stature, and so farre ouer-topped the Israelites, as they appeared to them, and to themselves, but as Grashoppers in their respect. Now, as this mutiny exceeded all the rest, wherein they both accused God, and consulted to choosethem a Captaine (or as they call it now adayes, an Elefio) to carry them backe againe into Egypt; so did God punish the same in a greater measure, than any of the former. For he extinguished euery soule of the whole multitude (Joshua and Caleb excepted) who being confident in Gods promises, periuaded the people to enter Canaan, being then neere it; and at the mountaine foote of Idumaea, which is but narrow, laying before them the fertility thereof; and assuring them of victory. But as men, whom the passion of feare had bereaued both of reason and common sense, they threatened to stone these encouragers to death; accounting them as men either desperate in themselves, or betrayers of the liues, goods, and children of all their brethren, to their enemies; but God resisted these wicked purposes, and interposing the feare of his bright glory between the vnaduised fury of the multitude, and the innocency and constancy of his seruants, preferred them thereby from their violence; threatening an intire destruction of the whole Nation, by sending among them a consuming and mercilesse pestilence. For this was the tenth insurrection and rebellion, which they had made, since God deliuered them from the slavery of the Egyptians. But Moses (the mildest or meekest of all men) prayed vnto God to remember his infinite mercies; alledging, that this so seuer a iudgement, how deferredly soeuer inflicted, would increase the pride of the Heathen Nations, and giue them occasion to vaunt, that the God of Israel, failing in power to performe his promises, suffered them to perish in these barren and fruitlesse Deserts. Yet as God is no lesse iust than mercifull, as God is slow to anger, so is his wrath a consuming fire; the same being once kindled by the violent breath of mans ingratitude: and therefore, as with a hand lesse heavy than hoped for, he scourged this inquiry, so by the measure of his glory (euermore ielous of neglect and derision) he suffered not the wicked to passe vnpunished, reseruing his compassion for the innocent: whom, because they participated not with the offences of their Fathers, he was pleased to preferue, and in them to performe his promises, which haue neuer bene frustrate.

Num. 12. 5.

§. III.

Of their unwillingnesse to returne: with the punishment thereof, and of diuers accidents in the returne.

NOW when Moses had reuealed the purposes of God to the people, and made them know his heavy displeasure towards them, they began to bewail themselves, though ouer-late: the times of grace and mens repentance, hauing also their appointment. And then when God had left them to themselves, and was no more among them, after they had so often plaid and dallied with his mercifull sufferings, they wold needs amend their former disobedience by a second contempt: and make offer to enter the Land contrary againe to the aduice of Moses, who assured them, that God was not among them; and that the Arke of his couenant should not moue, but by His direction; who could not erre; and that the enemies sword which God had hitherto benedicted and rebated, was now left no lesse sharpe than death; and in the hands of the Amalekites, and Canaanites no lesse cruell. But as men from whom God hath with-drawne his grace, doe alwayes follow those counsels which carry them to their owne destructions: so the Hemewas, after they had forsaken the opportunity by God and their Conducters offered, and might then haue entered Iudaa before their enemies were prepared and ioyfully did after ward, contrary to Gods commandement, vnder take the enterprife of themselves; and ranne head-long and without aduice into the mountaines of Idumaea. There the the Canaanites and the Amalekites being ioyned, and attending their aduantage, feron them, brake them : and of their numbers slaughtered the greatest part : and following their victory and pursuite, consumed them all the way of their flight, euen vnto Hormah: the Amalekites in reuenge of their former losse, and ouerthrow at Raphidim: the Canaanites to prevent their displantation and destruction threatned. Of which powerfull assembly of those two Nations (assisted in all likelihood with the neighbour Kings ioyned together for their common safety) it pleased God to forewarne Moses, and to direct him another way, than that formerly intended. For he commanded him to returne by those painefull passages of the Deserts, through which they had formerly trauelled, till they found the bankes of the red Sea againe: in which retraite before they came back to passe 10 ouer Jordan, there were consumed 38. yeeres; and the whole number of the 600. and odde thousand, which came out of Egypt (Moses, Ioshua, and Caleb excepted) were dead in the Wildernesse, the stubborne and carelesse generations were wholly wome out, and the promised Land bestowed on their children; which were increased to 600000. and more. For besides the double fault both of refusing to enter the Land 20 vpon the returne of the discourers, and the presumption then to attempt it, when they were countermaunded: it seemeth that they had committed that horrible Idolatry of worshipping Moloch, and the Host of Heauen. For although Moses doth not mention it, yet Amos doth, and so doth the Martyr Stephen; as also that the Israelites worshipped 20 the Sunne and Moone in after-times, it is proued out of sundry other places.

Now after the broken Companies were returned to the Campe at Cades, Moses, according to the commaundement receiued from God, departed towards the South from whence he came, to recouer the shoares of the Red Sea. And so from Cades or Rithma he remoued to Remmonparez, so called of abundance of Pomegranates there found and he diuided among them. From thence he went on to Libnah, taking that name of the Frandiuid among them. From Libnah he crost the Valley, and fate downe at Refsa, neere kincense there found. From Libnah he crost the Valley, and fate downe at Refsa, neere the foote of the mountaine. And after he had rested there, he bended towards the West, and incamped at Ceelata; where one of the Hebrewes, for gathering broken wood on the Sabbath, was stoned to death. After which, Moses alwayes keeping the Valley, betwene two great ledges of mountaines, (those which bound the Desert of Sinne; and those of 30 Pharan) crost the same from Ceelata, and marched Eastward to the mountaine of Sapher, then to Maceloth; and then to Thabab, and so to Tharsa or Thare; the foure and twentieth mansion. Where Moses rested, the people began that insolent and dangerous mutiny of Korah, Dathan, & Abiram; who for their contempt of God & his Ministers, were some of them swallowed vp aliue, and by the Earth opening her mouth deuoured; others, euen two hundred and fifty which offered incense with Korah, were consumed with fire from Heauen; and 14700. of their party, which murmured against Moses, stricken dead with a sudden pestilence: one of the greatest maruailes and iudgements of God, that hath bene shewed in all the time of Moses his gouernment, or before. For among so great a multitude, those lay-men who would haue vsurped Ecclesiasticall authority, were suddenly swallowed vp aliue into the Earth with their families and goods; euen while they sought to ouerthrow the Order, Discipline, and power of the Church, and to make all men alike therein, rebelliously contending against the High Priest and Magistrate, to whom God had committed the gouernment both of his Church and Common-weale of his people. And the better to assure the people, and out of his great mercy to confirme them, it pleased him in this place also to approoue by miracle the former election of his seruant Aaron, by the twelue rods giuen in by the Heads of the twelue Tribes; of which Moses receiued one of euery Head, and Prince of his Tribe: which being all withered and dried 40 Wands, and on euery rod the name of the Prince of the Tribe written, and Aarons of Levi, it pleased God, that the rod of Aaron receiued by his power a vegetable spirit, and hauing laine in the Tabernacle of the Congregation, before the Arke one night, had on it both Buddes, Blossomes, and ripe Almonds.

From Tharab the whole Army remoued to Meibra; and thence to Esmona; and thence to Moseroth, (or Masurit, after Saint Hierome) and from Moseroth to Beniaca; and so to Gadgad, which Hierome calleth Gadgada; thence to Ietabata, the thirtieth Mansion; where from certaine fountaines of water gathered in one, Adrichomius maketh a Riuer, which falleth into the Red Sea, betwene Madian and Esiongaber. Now

Now although it be very probable, that at Esiongaber, where Salomon furnished his Fleets for the East India, there was store of fresh water; and though Herodotus maketh mention of a great Riuer in Arabia the stonie, which he calleth Corys, from whence (saith he) the inhabitants conueigh water in pipes of leather to other places, by which deuice the King of Arabia receiued the Army of Cambyses: yet is Adrichomius greatly deceiued, as many times hee is, in finding these Springs at Gadgad, or Ietabata, being the nine and twentieth or thirtieth Mansion. For it was at Punon, that those Springs are spoken of, which in Deuteronomy the tenth, and the seauenth Verse, is also called Ietabata, or Iotabath, a Land of running waters, and which by all probability fall into the Riuer Zared, the next adioyning. And that these Springes should fall into the Red Sea, at Esiongaber, or Eloth, I cannot beleeue, for the way thither is very long. And this I finde in Belonius, that there are diuers Torrents of fresh water in those sandy parts of Arabia: which though they continue their course for a few miles, yet they are drunken vp by the hot and thirsty sand, before they can recouer the bankes of the Red Sea.

From Ietabata, Moses directed his journey towards the Red Sea, and incamped at Hebrons, and from thence to Esiongaber: which City in Iosephus time had the name of Bernice; and in Hieroms, Esia. From thence, keeping the Sea, and Eloth on his right hand, hee turned towards the North, as hee was by God commanded: Esiongaber being the farthest place towards the South-East, that Moses trauielled in that passage.

It seemeth that Esiongaber or Asiongaber, Eloth and Madian, were not at this time in the possession of the Kings of Edom. For it is saide, That the Lord spake vnto Moses and Aaron in the Mount Hor; neere the Coast of the Land of Edom; so as the Mount Hor was at this time in the South border of Idumaea. And if Esiongaber, and the other places neere the Red Sea, had at this present bene subiect vnto the Idumaans. Moses would also haue demanded a free passage through them. It is true, that in the future the Idumaans obtained those places: for it is saide; And they arose out of Madian, and came to Paran, and tooke men with them; which were those companies that followed young Adad of Idumaea, into Egypt, when he fled from Ioaab. Likewise it is saide of Salomon, that hee made a Nauy of shippes in Esiongaber besides Eloth, in the Land of Edom.

§. V.

Of Moses arriuall at Zin Kadis: and of the accidents while that they abode there.

From Esiongaber hee turned againe towards the North, and pitched in the Wildernesse of Zin, which is Kadesh: or in Beroth, of the children of Iacan; where they fate downe in the first Moneth of the fortieth yeere, after they left Egypt. For at the next Mansion Aaron died in the first day of the fifth Moneth of the fortieth yeere: the nine and thirtieth yeere taking ende at Esiongaber. And at this City of Cades (for so it was thought to be) or neere it, died Miriam or Mary, Moses sister, whose Sepulcher was to be seene in Saint Hieromes time, as himselfe auoweth. From hence ere they departed to the Mountaine Hor, all the people murmured most violently against Moses, by reason of the scarcity of water. For neither the punishments by fire from Heauen; by being deuoured and swallowed vp by the Earth; by the sudden pestilence, which often seized them; nor any miracle formerly shewing, either the loue or wrath of God, could preuaile with this Nation any longer, than while they were full fed and satisfied in euery of their appetites: but in stead of seeking for helpe and reliefe at Gods hands, when they suffered hunger, thirst, or any other want, they murmured, repined, and rebelled, repenting them of their changed estates, and casting vngatefully on Moses all their misaduentures; yea, though they well knew that their owne Fathers had left their bodies in the Deserts, and that they were now entred into the fortieth yeere, wherein all their miseries were to take end. And being, as it were, in the sight of the Land promised, they againe as obstinately tempted God as in former times, and neither trusted his promises, nor feared his indignation. But as the will and purposes of God

God

Num. 20. 9. God are without beginning; so his mercies being without ende; he commanded Moses to strike a Rocke adioyning with his rod; and the waters issued out in a great abundance, with which both themselves and their cattell were satisfied. Neuertheless, because God perceived a kinde of diffidence both in Moses and Aaron, at this place, therefore he permitted neither of them to enter the Land promised, whereto perchance their worldly desires might inuite them. But it pleased him to ende the trauailes of Aaron at the Mountaine Hor, being the next, and foure and thirtieth Station. At which Mountaine of Hor, Aaron was despoyled of the garments of his Priest-hood, and the same put on Eleazar his sonne, as God had commanded. Which done, Moses and Eleazar descended the Mountaine; but G O D receiued Aaron on the top thereof, and he was no more to seene.

Num. 35. Of this Mountaine called Hor, otherwise Mosera, as in Deuteronomy 10. Verse 6. those Horites tooke name, which the Idumeans had formerly vanquished. Some there are which make Mosera, which was the seauen and twentieth Mansion; and Mosera which they write Moseroth for difference, which was the foure and thirtieth Mansion, and is also called Hor, to betwo distinct places: because Moses in passing from Cadesbarne towards Egipt, incamped at Mosera, after hee departed from Hesmona, and before he came to Bemaacan. And this Mosera, which is also called Hor, he came vnto after he left Cades, where Miriam, Moses sister dyed, the first being the seauen and twentieth, and the second being the foure and thirtieth Mansion. But for Hor, which is also called Mosera, it should haue beene written, Hor iuxta Mosera; Hor neere Mosera: for it is but one roote of a Mountaine, diuided into diuers tops, as Sinai and Horeb are: Whereof the West part Moses calleth Mosera, and the East part Horeb. By the West part Moses encamped, as hee past towards the Red Sea, on his left hand; by the East part, as hee went backe againe North-wards towards Moab: as in the description of Moses his passage through Arabia, the Reader may perceiue.

Deut. 24. Now it was from Cades, before they came to Hor, because Hor belonged to Edom, that Moses sent messengers to the Prince of Idumea, praying him that he might passe with the people of Israel through his Territory into the Land of Canaan, which bordered it. For it was the neereft way of all other from the City of Kadesh, where Moses then encamped; whereas otherwise taking his journey by the Riuer of Zared, Arnon, and Iordan, hee might haue runne into many hazards in the passage of those Riueres, the farre way about, and the many powerfull Kings, which commanded in those Regions. Now the better to perswade the Prince of Idumea hereunto, Moses remembered him, that hee was of the same race and family with Israel: calling him by the name of brother, because both the Edomites and Israelites were the sonnes of one father, to wit, Isaac; inferring thereby, that hee had more reason to fauour and respect them, than hee had to assilt the Canaanites; against whom Esau his Ancestor had made warre, and driuen out the Horites (who were of their ancient races descended of Cham) out of the Region of Seir, calling it by his owne name Edom, or Edumaea. He also making a short repetition of Gods blessings bestowed on them, and of his purposes and promises; assured Edom, or the King thereof, that hee would no way offend his people, or waste his Countrey, but that hee would restraints his Army within the bounds of the Common, and Kings high wayes, paying money for whatsoeuer he vsed, yea, euen for the water, which themselves or their Cattell should drinke. For Moses was commanded by God, not to prouoke the children of Esau. But the King of Edumaea knowing the strength of his owne Countrey, the same being neere Canaan, rampard with high and sharpe mountaines: and withall suspecting, as a naturall wise man, that 600000. strangers being once entred his Countrey, it would rest in their willes to giue him law, resolutely refused them passage, and deliuered this answer to the

Num. 20. 20. & 21. Messengers: That, if they attempted to enter that way, he would take them for enemies, and resist them by all possible means. And not knowing whether such a deniall might satisfie or exasperate, hee gathered the strength of his Countrey together, and shewed himselfe prepared to defend their passage. For, as it is written; Then Edom came out against him (to wit, Moses) with much people, and with a mighty power. Whereupon Moses considering, that the ende of his enterprize was not the conquest of Seir or Edumaea, and that the Land promised was that of Canaan: like vnto himselfe who was of naturall vnderstanding the greatest of any man, & the skilfullest man of war that the world had, he refused

Num. 6. 20. against him (to wit, Moses) with much people, and with a mighty power. Whereupon Moses considering, that the ende of his enterprize was not the conquest of Seir or Edumaea, and that the Land promised was that of Canaan: like vnto himselfe who was of naturall vnderstanding the greatest of any man, & the skilfullest man of war that the world had, he refused sed to aduenture the Army of Israel against a Nation, which being ouercome, gaue but a passage to inuade others; and which by reason of the state of their mountainous Countrey, could not but haue endangered, or (at least) greatly enfeebled the strength of Israel, and rendred them lesse able, if not altogether powerlesse, to haue conquered the rest.

§. V I.

Of their compassing Idumea, and travelling to Arnon, the border of Moab.

10 Etherefore leauing the way of Idumea, turned himselfe towards the East, and marched towards the Deserts of Moab. Which when Arad King of the Canaanites vnderstood, and that Moses had blanced the way of Idumea, and knowing that it was Canaan, and not Edom, which Israel aimed at, he thought it safest, rather to find his enemies in his neighbours Countrey, than to be found by them in his owne: which he might haue done with a farre greater hope of victory, had Moses beene enforst first to haue made his way by the Sword through Idumea, and thereby though victorious, greatly haue lessened his numbers. But although it fell out otherwise than Arad hoped for, yet being resolutely to make triall, what courage the Israelites brought with them out of Egipt, before they came neerer his owne home, leading the strength of his Nation to the edge of the Desert, he set vpon some part of the Army, which, for the multitude occupied a great space, and for the many heards of Cattell that they draue with them, could not encampe so neere together, but that some quarter or other was euermore subiect to surpris. By which aduantage, and in that his attempts were then perchance vnexpected, hee slew some few of the Israelites, and carried with him many prisoners.

Now it is very probable, that it was this Canaanite, or his Predecessour, which ioynd his forces with the Amalekites, and gaue an ouerthrow to those mutinous Israelites, which without direction from God by Moses, would haue entred Canaan from Cadesbarne. For it seemeth that the greatest number of that Army were of the Canaanites, because in the first of Deuteronomy, 44. the Amorites are named alone without the Amalekites, and are saide to haue braten the Israelites at that time. And this Arad, if he were the same that had a victory ouer Israel, neere Cadesbarne; or if it were his Predecessour that then preuailed, this man finding that Moses was returned from the Red Sea; and in his way towards Canaan, and that the South part of Canaan was first to be inuaded, and in danger of being conquered, not knowing of Moses purpose to compass Moab, determined while he was yet in the Desert to trie the quarrell. And whereas it followeth in the third verse of the twelfth Chapter of Numbers, that the Israelites utterly destroyed the Canaanites and their Cities, they are much mistaken that thinke, that this destruction was presently performed by the Israelites. But it is to be vnderstood, to haue beene done in the future, to wit, in the time of Iosua. For had Moses at this time entred Canaan in the pursuit of Arad, he would not haue fallen backe againe into the Deserts of Zin and Moab, and haue fetcht a wearisome and needlesse compasse, by the Riueres of Zared and Arnon.

Neither is their coniecture to be valued at any thing, which affirme, that Arad did not inhabit any part of Canaan it selfe, but that his Territory lay without it, and neere the Mountaine Hor. For Hor and Zin Cades were the South borders of Edom, and not of Canaan. And it was in the South of the Land of Canaan, that Arad dwelt: which South part of Canaan was the North part of Edom.

Again, Horma (for so farre the Israelites after their victory pursued the Canaanites) is so feared in the South of Iudea. There is also a City of that name in Simeon. But there is no such place to the South of Edom. And were there no other argument, but the mutiny which followed presently after the repetition of this victory, it were enough to proue, that the same was obtained in the future, and in Iosua his time, and not at the instant of Arads assault. For had the Israelites at this time sackt the Cities of Arad, they would not the next day haue complained for want of water and bread. For where there are great Cities, there is also water and bread. But it was in the time of Iosua, that the Israelites tooke their reuenge, and after they had past Iordan: Iosua then gouerning them; who in the twelfth Chapter and fourteenth Verse, nameth this Arad by the name of his City Citic so called; and with him the King of Horma: to which place the Israelites pursued the Canaanites. And he nameth them amongst those Kings, which he vanquished, and put to death.

Now after this assault and surprize by Arad, Moses finding that all entrance on that side was defended, he led the people Eastward to compass Idumea and the Dead Sea, and to make his entrance by Arnon and the Plains of Moab, at that time in the possession of the Amorites. But the Israelites, to whom the very name of a Desert was terrible, began againe to rebell against their Leader, till God by a multitude of fiery Serpents, (that is, by the biting of Serpents, whose venom inflamed them, and burnt them as fire) made them know their error, and afterward, according to his plentiful grace, cured them againe by their beholding an artificiall Serpent, by his Commandement set vp.

From the Mount Hor, Moses leauing the ordinary way which lyeth between the Red Sea, and Callosyria, encamped at Zalmora: and thence he remoued to Phunon, where he erected the Brazen Serpent, making these journeys by the edge of Idumea, but without it. For Phunon was sometime a principall City of the Edomites. Now where it is written in Numbers 21. Verse 4. That from Mount Hor they departed by the way of the Red Sea, which grieved the people, it was not thereby meant that the Israelites turned backe towards the Red Sea; neither did they march (according to Fonscca) per viam qua habet à latere mare rubrum; By the way that sided the Red Sea, but in dede they crost, and went athwart the common way from Galaad, Trachonitis, and the Countreies of Moab, to the Red Sea, 20 that is, to Esfongaber, Eloth, and Midian: which way, as it lay North and South, so Israel to shunne the border of Edom, and to take the utmost East part of Moab, crost the common way towards the East, and then they turned againe towards the North, as before.

From Phunon he went to Oboth, where they entred the Territory of Moab, adioyning to the Land of Suph, a Countrey bordering on the Dead Sea; and from thence to Abarim, the eight and thirtieth Mansion, that is, where the Mountaines so called take beginning, and are as yet but small Mountures of Hilles, on the East border of Moab; From thence they recouered Dibon Gad, or the Riuer of Zared, which riseth in the mountaines of Arabia, and runneth towards the Dead Sea, not fure from Petra the Metropolis thereof, being the nine and thirtieth Station. And hauing past that Riuer, they lodged at Dibon Gad, 30 and from thence they kept the way to Diblatbaim, one of the Citices of Moab, which Hieremie the Prophet Chap. 48. Verse 22. calleth the House of Diblatbaim, the same which afterward was destroyed among the rest by Nabuchadnezzar. From thence they came to the Riuer of Arnon, and encamped in the mountaines of Abarim: though in the 22. of Numbers, Moses doth not remember Helmondiblatbaim, but speaketh of his remouefrom the Riuer of Zared, immediately to the other side of Arnon; calling Arnon the border of Moab, betweene them and the Amorites: speaking, as he found the state of the Countrey at that time. For Arnon was not anciently the border of Moab, but was lately conquered from the Moabites, by Sehon, King of the Amorites: euen from the Predecessour of Balac Peor then reigning. From Diblatbaim, Moses sent messengers to Sehon, King of the 40 Amorites, to desire a passage through his Countrey: which though he knew would be denied him, yet he desired to giue a reason to the neighbour Nations, of the warre he vnder-tooke. And though Edom had refused him as Sehon did, yet he had no warrant from God to enforce him. Moses also in sending messengers to Sehon, obferued the same precept, which he left to his posterity and successours, for a law of the warre; namely in Deut. 20. Verse 10. in these words; When thou comest neere vnto a City to fight against it, thou shalt offer it peace, which if it doe accept of and open vnto thee, then let all the people found therein be tributaries vnto thee, and serue thee; but if it refuse, &c. thou shalt smite all the males thereof with the edge of the sword. Which ordinance all commanders of Armies haue obserued to this day, or ought to haue done.

§. VII.

Of the Booke of the battailes of the Lord, mentioned in this Story, and of other Bookes mentioned in Scripture, which are lost.

Nuim. c. 21. v. 14.

OW concerning the Warre betweene Israel and Sehon, Moses seemeth to refferre a great part of this Storie to that Booke entituled, Liber bellorum Domini; The booke of Gods battailes: and therefore passeth ouer many encounters, and other things memoramemorable, with greater breuery in this place. His words after the Geneua Translation are these: Wherefore it shall be spoken in the Booke of the battailes of the Lord, what things he did in the Red Sea, and in the Rivers of Arnon. The Vulgar copie differeth not in sense from this: But the Greeke Septuagint vary. For the Greeke writes it to this effect; For thus it is said in the Booke: The warre of the Lord hath burnt (or inflamed) Zool, and the brookes of Arnon. Iunius for the Red Sea, which is in the Geneuan and Vulgar Edition, names the Region of Suph, a Countrey bordering the Dead Sea towards the East, as he coniectureth. The Text he readeth thus. Idcirco dicitur in recensione bellorum Ichoua, contra Vahebum in Regione Suph: & contra flumina, flumina Arnonis; Therefore is it spoken in repeating of the battailes of Ichoua, against Vaheb in the Countrey of Suph: and against the Rivers, the Rivers of Arnon. In which words he vnderstands, that amongst the warres which the Lord disposed for the good of the Israelites, there was in those times a famous memory in the mouth of most men, concerning the warre of Sehon against Vaheb, the King of the Moabites, and of his winning the Countrey neere Arnon, out of the possession of the Moabites. For this Vaheb was the immediate predecessor of Balac, who liued with Moses: though it be written that this Balac was the son of Zippor, and not of Vaheb. For it seemes (as it is plaine in the succession of the Edomites) that these Kingdomes were electiue, and not successiue. And as Iunius in this Translation vnderstandeth no speciall Booke of the battailes of the Lord: so others, as Vatablus in his Annotations, doubt whether in this place any speciall Booke be meant; and if any, whether it be not a prediction of warres in future ages, to be waged in these places, and to be written in the Book of Iudges. Syracides c. 46. telles vs plainly, that those battailes of the Lord were fought by Iosua. Who was there (saith he) before him like to him? for he fought the battailes of the Lord. But seeing the Histories of the Scripture elswhere often passe ouer matters of great weight in few words, referring the Reader to other Bookes, written of the same matter at large: therefore it seemeth probable, that such a Booke as this there was; wherein the severall victories by Israel obtained, and also victories of other Kings, making way for the good of the Israelites, were particularly and largely written. And that the same should now be wanting, it is not strange, seeing so many other Volumes, filled with diuine discourse, haue perished 30 in the long race of time, or haue beene destroyed by the ignorant and malicious Heathen Magistrate. For the Bookes of Henoch, howsoeuer they haue beene in later ages corrupted, and therefore now suspected, are remembered in an Epistle of Thaddaus, and cited by Origen and Augustine, and by Tertullian.

That worke also of the Patriarch Abraham, of Formation, which others bestow on Rabbi Achiba, is no where found. The Bookes remembered by Iosua c. 10. v. 13. and in the second of Samuel, c. 1. v. 18. called the Booke of Iasher, or Iustorum, is also lost; wherein the stay of the Sunne and Moone in the midst of the Heauens is recorded, and how they stood still till Israel had auenged themselves of their enemies: out of which also Dauid took the precept, of teaching the children of Juda, to exercise their bowes against 40 their enemies.

Some thinke this to be the Booke of eternall Predestination, in which the iust are written, according vnto the sixty and ninth Psalm, Verse 28. where it is said; Let them be put out of the Booke of Life, neither let them be written with the righteous. Hierome thinks, that Dauid by this Booke vnderstood those of Samuel; Rabbi Salomon, that the Bookes of the Law are thereby meant, in which the actes of the iust Abraham, of Isaac, Jacob, and Moses, are written; Others, that it was the Booke of Exodus; others, as Theodoretus, that it was a Commentary vpon Iosua, by an vknowne Author.

The booke of Chozai, concerning Manasse, remembered in the second of Chron. 33. v. 18. & 16. Of this booke, also lost, Hierome conceiues that the Prophet Isay was the Author.

The same mischance came aswell to the Story of Salomon, written by Abia Silonites, who met with Ieroboam, and foretold him of his obtaining the Kingdome of Israel from the sonne of Salomon: as to the bookes of Nathan the Prophet, and to those of Ieda the Seer, remembered in the second of Chron. c. 9. v. 29. with these haue the bookes of She-maiah and of Ido, remembered in the second of Chron. c. 12. v. 15. perished: and that of Iehu the sonne of Hanani, of the acts of Iehusaphat, cited in the second of Chron. c. 20. v. 34. Also that booke of Salomon which the Hebrewes write Hafirim, of 5000. verses, ness of him, vnto whom in his prayers he commended them: He also commanded the Priests to lay vp the Booke of the Law, by the side of the Arke of God: The last that he indited was that Prophetical Song, beginning: Hearken ye Heauens and I will speake, and let the Earth heare the words of my mouth: and being called by God from the labours and sorrowes of this life, vnto that rest which neuer afterward hath disquiet, hee was buried in the Land of Moab, ouer against Beth-peor: but no man knoweth of his Sepulcher to this day, which happened in the yeere of the World 2554.

§. X.

Observations out of the Story of Moses, how God disposeth both the smallest occasions, and the greatest resistances, to the effecting of his purpose.

NOW lets a little, for instruction, looke backe to the occasions of sundry of the great euents, which haue beene mentioned in this Story of the life of Moses, for (excepting Gods miracles, his promise, and fore-choise of this people) hee wrought in all things else by the medium of mens affections, and naturall appetites. And so we shall find that the feare which Pharaoh had of the increase of the Hebrewes, multiplied by God to exceeding great numbers, was the next naturall cause of the sorrowes and losse, which befell himselfe, and the Egyptian Nation: which numbers when hee sought by cruell and vngodly policies to cut off and lessen, as when hee commanded all the male-children of the Hebrewes to be slaine, God (whose prouidence cannot be resisted, nor his purposes preuented by all the foolish and saluage craft of mortall men) moued compassion in the heart of Pharaoh's owne daughter, to preserve that child, which afterward became the most wise, and of all men the most gentle and milde, the most excellently learned in all Diuine and Humane knowledge, to be the conductor and deliuerer of his oppressed brethren, and the ouerthrow of Pharaoh, and all the flower of his Nation; euen then, when he sought by the strength of his men of Warre, of his Horse, and Chariots, to tread them vnder, and bury them in the dust. The griefe which Moses conceiued of the iniuries, and of the violence offered to one of the Hebrewes in his owne presence, moued him to take reuenge of the Egyptian that offered it: the ingratitude of one of his owne Nation, by threatening him to discouer the slaughter of the Egyptian, moued him to flie into Midian: the contention betweene the Shepherds of that place, and Leib's Daughters, made him knowne to their Father: who not onely entertained him, but married him to one of those Sisters: and in that solitary life of keeping of his Father in lawes sheepe, farre from the presse of the World, contenting himselfe (though bred as a Kings Sonne) with the lot of a poore Herd-man, God found him out in that Desert, wherein hee first suffered him to liue many yeeres, the better to know the wayes and passages through which he purposed that he should conduct his people, toward the Land promised: and therein appearing vnto him, he made him know his will and diuine pleasure for his returne into Egypt. The like may be saide of all things else, which Moses afterward by Gods direction performed in the Story of Israel before remembred. There is not therefore the smallest accident, which may seeme vnto men as falling out by chance, and of no consequence: but that the same is caused by God to effect somewhat else by: yea, and oftentimes to effect things of the greatest worldly importance, either presently, or in many yeeres after, when the occasions are either not considered, or forgotten.

CHAP. VI.

Of the Nations with whom the Israelites had dealing after their comming out of Egypt; and of the Men of renowne in other Nations; about the times of Moses and Iosua, with the summe of the History of Iosua.

§. I.

How the Nation with whom the Israelites were to haue Warre, were diuers wayes, as it were, prepared to be their enemies.

IN like manner if we looke to the quality of the Nations, with whom the Israelites, after their comming out of Egypt, had to doe, either in the Wildernesse, or afterward: we shall find them long before-hand, by the disposing prouidence of God, as it were prepared for enmity: partly in respect that they were most of them of the issue of Canaan, or at least of Ham: and the rest (as the Edomites, Moabites, Ammonites, and Ismaelites) were mingled with them by mutuall marriages: whereas the Israelites still continued strangers, and separate from them: and so partly in this respect, and partly by ancient injuries or enmities, and partly by reason of diuinity in Religion, were these Nations, as it were prepared to be enemies to the Israelites: and so to serue for such purposes as God had reserved them for. To make these things more manifest, wee must vnderstand that this part of Syria, bounded by the mountaines of Libanus, and Zidon on the North, by the same mountaines continued as farre as the Springs of Arnon on the East: by the way of Egypt, and the Red Sea on the South: and by the Mediterran Sea on the West: was inhabited and peopled by two Nations, the one springing from the sonnes of Cham, the other from Sem: but those of Sem, were but as strangers therein for a long time, and came thither in effect but with * one Family, to wit, that of Abraham, and a few of his kindred. The other for the greatest part were the Canaanites, the ancient Lords and Possessors of those Territories: by proceesse of time diuided into severall Families and names: whereof some of them were of eminent stature and strength, as the Anakims, Zamzummims, or Zuzi, Emims, Horites, and others. These (as men most valiant and able commonly doe) did inhabit the better borders and mountaines of their Countries: the rest were the Zidonians, Iebusites, Amorites, Huuites, Hetites, and others, who tooke name after the sonnes of Canaan, and after whom the Country in generall was still called.

As for the Hebrewes which descended of Shem by Abraham, they were of another Familie, and strangers in that Country: especially the Israelites, and this was some cause that the Canaanites did not affect them, or indure them: no more then the Philistims did, who descended also of Cham by Mizraim. For though Abraham himselfe being a stranger, was highly esteemed and honoured among them: especially by the Amorites inhabiting the West part of Jordan: yet now euen they which descended from Abraham, or from his kindred, abode and multiplied in those parts, were alienated in affections from the Israelites: as holding them strangers and intruders: making more account of their alliance with the Canaanites, and the rest of the issue of Cham, with whom they daily contracted affinity, than of their old pedigree from Abraham.

True it is, that these Nations descended of Abraham, or of his kindred, who had linked themselves and marched with the Canaanites and others, had so farre posselt themselves of the borders of those Regions, as they began to be equall in strength to the bordering Canaanites, if not superiour. For of Lot came those two great Families of the Moabites and Ammonites: of Esau the Idumeans: of Madian the Madianites: of Ismael, the eldest sonne of Abraham, came the Ismaelites, with whom are ioyned as of the same Nation, the Amalekites, whom though the more common opinion thinketh to haue beene a Tribe of Edom, because Esau had a grand-child of that name, yet manifest reason conuinceth

* It seemeth also that Hur, the Sonne of Nachor, & Buz, his brother, planted themselves in the Eastside of Jordan, about Basra: where they finde the Land of Hur: in which Ieb dwelt as one of the issue of Hur the Sonne of Nachor, & Elihu, his friend, which is called a Buzi. See hereafter cha. 10. §. 7.

Exod. 17. 16

Deut. c. 11. v. 5 uinceth it to haue bene otherwise. For the Israelites were forbidden to prouoke the Edomites, or doe them any wrong, whereas contrariwise Amalek was cursed, and endlesse warre decreed against him: but hereof more elsewhere, Chap. 8. §. 3. Of Ismaels eldest sonne Naboth sprung the Arabians of Petra, called Nabatheas. Now euen as Abraham befought God to blesse Ismael, so it pleased him both to promise and performe it. For of him those twelue Princes came, which inhabited, in effect, all that Tract of Land betwene Hamilath vpon Tigris, and Sar which is the West part of the Desert of Arabia Petraa. Yet howsoever the strength of these later named Nations, which descended from Abraham, were great: it is not vnlikely, but that some reason which moued them not to fauour the entrance of the Israelites into Canaan, was in respect of feare: because 10 all Princes and States doe not willingly permit any stranger or powerfull Nation to enter their Territories. Wherefore, though all these Families before named, were not so vnited, in and among themselves, but that they had their zealousses of each other, and contended for dominion: yet fearing a third more strong than themselves, whether they stood apart or vnited, they were taught by the care of their owne preseruacion, to ioyne themselves together against Israel: though they did it nothing so maliciously and resolutely as the Canaanites did. For the Edumians onely denied the Hebrewes a passage: which the Moabites durst not denie: because their Countrey lay more open; and because themselves had lately bene beaten out of the richest part of their Dominions, by the Amorites: and as for the Ammonites, their Countrey lay altogether out of the way, and the 20 strength of Sehon and Og Kings of the Amorites, was interiacent: and besides that, the border of the Ammonites was strong, by reason of the mountaines which diuided it from Basan. Again, that which moued the Moabites in their owne reason not much to interrupt Israel, in the conquest of Sehon the Amorite, and of Og his confederate, was that the Moabites might hope after such time as the Amorites were beaten by Moses, that themselves might recouer againe their owne inheritance: to wit, the Vallies and Plaines lying betwene the mountaines of Arabia and Jordan: But as soone as Sehon was slaine, and that the King of Moab, Balaam, perceiued that Moses allotted that valley to the Tribes of Gad and Ruben, he began to practise with Balaam against Israel, and by the daughters of Midian as aforefaide, to allure them to Idolatry: and thus at the length the Moabites by spe- 30 ciall occasion were more and more stirred vp to enmity against Israel. And as for diuers of the rest that were descended from Abraham kindred, we may note, how in the beginning, betwene the Authors of their Perigrees, God permitted some enmities to be as it were prefaces of future quarrels, which in the posterity might be the easier incensed, by the memory of old grudges: and withall by some disdaine from the elder in nature to the younger. For the Ismaelites being descended from the eldest sonne of Abraham, and the Edomites from the eldest sonne of Isaac, Jacob, being but a second sonne, of a second brother, those Princes which were descended of the elder Houses, being naturall men, might come to giue place, much lesse to subiect themselves to their inferiours, as they tooke it: and for a more aggrauation, the issues of Esaue Princes of Edumaea, might 40 keepe in record that their Parent was bought out of his birth-right by Jacob taking his aduantage, and that he was deceived of his fathers blessing also by him: and that Jacob after reconciliation came not vnto him as he promised, into Sir or Edumaea.

So also in the posterity of Ismael, it might remaine as a feede or pretence of enmity, that their fore-father was by the instigation of Sara, cast out into the Desert, with his mother Hagar: and had therein perished, but that it pleased God by his Angell to releue them. Ismael also had an Egyptian both to his mother and to his wife: and Amalec was also an Horite by his mother: which Horites were of the ancient Canaanites. The Edumians also, or Edomites, were by their Maternall line descended of the Canaanites. For Esaue tooke two wiues of that Nation: one of them was Adah, the daughter of Eloah, the 50 Elitite, and the other Abolibamah, the grand-child of Zibeon the Heuite, Lord of Sir, before the same was conquered by Esaue, and called after his name, Edom, or Edumaea.

Lastly, it appeareth that all those Families of the Ismaelites, Amalekites, Moabites, Ammonites, Edomites, &c. were in proceesse of time corrupted, and drawne from the knowledge and worship of God, and became Idolaters, infected and seduced by the conuersation of those people among whom they dwelt, and by those wiues of the Canaanites which they had married: onely a few of the Kenites and those Midianites, which inhabited on the edge of the Red Sea, whereof Iethro was Priest, or Prince, or both, worshipped the true and euer-living God.

§. II.

Of the Kings of the Canaanites and Midianites, mentioned in the ancient Warres of the Israelites.

EF the Kings of the Canaanites, descended of Cham, (for Melchizedek may be thought to be of a better Perigree) we find foure named by Moses: and one and thirty remembered by Iosua, though few of these named, otherwise than by the Cities ouer which they commanded: to which each of them had a small Territory adioyning, and no other Dominion. These Canaanites in a generall consideration are to be vnderstood for all those Nations, descended of Cham by Canaan, as the Hittites, Iebusites, Amorites, Gergesites, Heuites, &c. and so here we vnderstand this name in speaking of the Kings of the Canaanites: and so also we call the Countrey of their habitation, the holy Land, or the Land of promise: for God hath appointed that the seauen principle Families should be rooted out: and that his owne people should inherit their Lands and Cities. But if we consider of the Name and Nation in particular, then is their proper habitation bounded by Jordan, on the East, and by the Mediterran Sea on the West: in which narrow Countrey, and in the choysiest places thereof, those Canaanites which held their Paternall name chiefly inhabited.

20 The first King of these Nations, named in the Scriptures, was Hamor or Hemer, of the Heuites, whom Simeon and Leui slew, together with his sonne Sichem, in reuenge of their sisters rauishment. Gen. 34.

Arad was the second King which the Scriptures haue remembered, who had that part of Canaan towards the South, neighbouring Edom and the dead Sea; the same which surprised Israel, as they encamped in the wildernesse in the edge of Edumaea. Num. 21. I.

The third named was Sehon King of Essebon, who before Moses arriually had beaten the Moabites out of the West part of Arabia Petraa or Nabatheas, and thrust them ouer Arnon into the Deserts, the same whom Moses ouerthrew in the plaines of Moab: at which time he tooke Essebon, and all the Cities of the Amorites. Num. 21. 24. Ios. 9. Ios. 10. 11. 12. 13.

30 Presently after which victory, Og was also slaine by Israel, who commanded the North part of that Valley betwene the Mountaines Tracon or Galaad and Jordan, who was also a King of the Amorites. Num. 21. 35.

The fifth was Adonizedek King of the Iebusites, and of Hierusalem, with whom Iosua nameth foure other Kings.

Hobam, King of Hebron.

Piram, King of Iarmuth.

Iapia, King of Lachis: and

Deber, King of Eglon, who were all Amorites ouerthrowne in battell: and hanged by Iosua. After this ouerthrow Iosua nameth Iabin, King of Hazor, and Iosua 10. Ios. 10. 11. 12. 13.

40 Iobab, King of Madon: whom he also slaughtered, and tooke his Cities: and this Iabin seemed to haue some Dominion ouer the rest; for it is saide in the Text, For Hazor before times was the head of all those Kingdomes. Iosua 11. v. 10.

After these Adonibezek that notorious Tyrant is named: who confest that he had cut off the thumbs of the hands and fetere of seauenty Kings, inforcing them to gather crummes vnder his Table: who, after Iuda and Simeon had vsed the same execution vpon himselfe, acknowledged it to be a iust reuenge of God: this King was carried to Hierusalem where he died. Iud. 1. Ios. 10. 11. 12. 13.

The last King named is Iabin the second, who as it seemeth had rebuilt Hazor, burnt by Iosua. For at such time as he employed Sisara against Israel, whom he oppressed twenty 50 yeeres, after the death of Ehad, He inhabited Hazor. This Iabin, Barac (encouraged by Debora) ouerthrew; and his Captaine Sisara had by Iael, the wife of Heber the Kenite, a nail driuen into his head while he slept in her Tent: Iabin himselfe perishing afterward in that warre. Iud. 4. Iud. 4. Psal. 83.

The Midianites had also their Kings at times, but commonly mixt with the Moabites: and they held a corner of Land in Nabatheas: to the South-east of the Dead Sea. They descended from Midian, Abraham sonne, by Cethura. Raguel surnamed Gethegleus or Iethres, saith Iosephus, called Iethro in Exodus, Kenis in the first of Iudges, the sonne of Dathan, the grand-child of Iexanis, or Ioksham, the great grand-child of Abraham by Cethura, Exod. 3.

thura, was Priest or Prince of the Madianites by the Red Sea: whose Daughter or Neece, Moses married: and of whom I haue spoken elsewhere more at large. This Iethro if he were not the same with Hobab, must be his father: and this Hobab had seauen daughters. He guided Moses in the Wildernesse: and became one of the Israelites: of him descended the Kenites, so called of his father Raguels surname, of which Kenites was Heber, which had peace with Iabin the second, euen now remembred.

At such time as Saul inuaded the Amalekites, he knowing the good affection of the Kenites to Israel, gaue them warning to separate themselves: and yet the Kenites had strong feates, and liued in the mountaines of the Deserts.

The Kings of the Canaanites, and Madianites, and the Amalekites, as many as I find named, were these:

1. Homer the Heuiste of Sichem
2. Arad of the South parts
3. Sehon of Essebon
4. Og of Basan
5. Adonizedek the Iebusite, King of Hierusalem
6. Hobam of Hebron
7. Piram of Iarmuth
8. Iapia of Lachis
9. Debir of Eglon
10. Iabin of Hazor
11. Iobab of Modon
12. Adonibezek of Bezek, and
13. Iabin the second King of Hazor.

Of the Madianites these:

* Eui or Euis.

Rekam or Recem who built Petra the Metropolis of Petrea, so called by the Greekes: and by Esaie, cap. 16, verse 1. and Selah, which is as much as Petra: and so also it is called 2 Reg. 14. 7. where it is also called Ioktheel.

- Zur*
Hur and
Reba
¶ Oreb
Zeb
Zebah
Zalmunna.

After the death of Barac, Iudge of Israel, the foure last named of these Madianite Kings, vexed Israel seuen yeeres: till they being put to flight by Gideon, two of them, to wit, Oreb and Zeb, were taken and slaine by the Ephraimites, at the passage of Iordan, as in the 6. 7. and 8. of Judges it is written at large. Afterward in the pursuit of the rest, Gideon himselfe laide hands vpon Zebah and Salmana, or Zalmunna, and executed them, being prisoners; in which expedition of Gideon there perished 120000. of the Madianites and their confederates. Of the Edumians, Moabites, and Ammonites, I will speake hereafter in the description of their Territories.

§. III.

Of the Amalekites, and Ismaelites.

F the Kings of the Amalekites and Ismaelites, I finde few that are named, and though of the Ismaelites there were more in number than of the rest (for they were multiplied into a greater Nation, according vnto the promise of God made vnto Abraham; yet the Amalekites, who together with the Madianites were numbered among them, were more renowned in Moses time than the rest of the Ismaelites. So also were they when Saul gouerned Israel. For Saul pursued them from Sur vnto Hamilah, to wit, ouer a great part of Arabia Petrea, and the Desert. The reason to me seemeth to be this: That the twelue Princes which came of Ismael, were content to leaue those barren Deserts of Arabia Petrea, called Sur, Paran, and Sin, to the issue of Abraham by Cethura, that * These five were first all at one time Kings of several portions of the Madianites: slaine by Phinehas and the 12000 which he led against them: Num. 31: v. 8. ¶ These foure last were slaine at one time, slaine in the pursuit of Gideon's victory: Iud. c. 7: v. 25, & cap. 8. v. 12.

that ioyned with them (for so seeme the Amalekites to haue bene, and so were the Madianites): themselves taking possession of a better soyle in Arabia the Happy, and about the Mountaines of Galaad in Arabia Petrea. For Nabaioth the eldest of those twelue Princes planted that part of Arabia Petrea, which was very fruitful though adioyning to the Desert, in which Moses wandred, afterward called Nabathes: the same which neighboureth Judea on the East-side. They also peopled a Prouince in Arabia the Happy, whereof the people were in after-times called Napathes (B) changed into (P).

Kedar, the second of Ismaels sonnes, gaue his owne name to the East-part of Basan, or Batanea, which was afterward posselt by Mamasse, so much thereof as lay within the mountaines Traceni, or Gilead. Which Nation Lampriidius calleth Kedarens, and Plinie Cedraens. Abdel late downe in the Desert Arabia, neere the Mountaines which diuide it from the Happy: and gaue name to the Adubens, which Ptolomy calleth Agubens.

Misiam was the Parent of the Masamancuses, neere the Mountaine Zamath, in the same Arabia the Happy.

The Raabens were of Mishma: who ioyned to the Orchens, neere the Arabian gulfe, where Ptolomy setteth Zagmas.

Of Duma were the Dumians, betweene the Adubens and Raabens: where the Citie Dumeth sometimes stood.

Of Massa the Massani, and of Hadar, or Chadar the Athrits, who bordered the Napathes in the same Happy Arabia.

Thema begat the Themaneans, among the Arabian Mountaines, where also the City of Thema is seated.

Of Ietur the Iuraens, or Chamathens: of whom Tohu was King in Dauids time.

Of Naphi the Nubeian Arabians: inhabiting Syria Zoba: ouer whom Adadecer commanded, while Dauid ruled Israel. P. 5m. l. 6. c. 28.

Cadma, the last and twelfth of Ismaels sonnes, was the Ancestor of the Cadmonians: who were afterward called Asites: because they worshipped the fire with the Babylonians. Iustin.

The Amalekites gaue their Kings the name of Agag, as the Egyptians the name of Pharaoh to theirs, and the ancient Syrians Adad to theirs, and the Arabian Nabatheans Aretas, as Names of Honour.

The Amalekites were the first that fought with Moses, after he past the Red Sea: when of all times they flourished most, and yet were vanquished. Exod. 17.

Afterward they ioyned with the Canaanites, and beate the Israelites neere Cadesbarne. After the gouernment of Othoniel, they ioyned them with the Moabites: after Barac with the Madianites: and inuaded Israel. God commanded that as soone as Israel had rest; they should roote out the name of the Amalekites: which Saul executed in part, when he wasted them from the border of Egypt, to the border of Chaldea: from Hamilah to Shur. Num. 14.

In Dauids time they tooke Siklag in Simcon: but Dauid followed them, and surprised them, recovering his prisoners and spoiles. And yet, after Dauid became King, they againe vexed him, but to their owne losse. 1 Sam. 30: 2 Sam. 8: 2.

In Ezekias time as many of them as ioyned to Edumaea were wasted and displant by the children of Simcon. 1 Chron. 4.

§. IIII.

Of the institution of ciuility in Europe about these times, and of Prometheus and Adas.

Here liued at this time, and in the same age together with Moses, many men exceeding famous, as well in bodily strength, as in all sorts of learning. And as the World was but euen now enriched with the written Law of the liuing God, so did Art and Ciuility (bred and fostered farre off in the East, and in Egypt) begin at this time to discouer a passage into Europe, and into those parts of Greece, neighbouring Asia and Judea. For if Pelasgus besides his bodily strength, was chosen King of Arcadia, because he taught those people to erect them simple Cortages, to defend them from raine and storme: and learned them withall to make a kinde of Meale, and bread of Acornes, who before liued for the most part, by Hearbes and Rootes: wee may thereby iudge how poore, and wretched those times were, and how falsely those Nations haue vaunted of those their antiquities accompanied not onely with ciuill learning, but with all other kinds of knowledge. And it was in this age of the World, as both

both Eusebius and Saint Augustine haue obserued, that Prometheus flourished: *Quem propterea ferunt de luto formasse homines, quia optimus sapientia doctor fuisse perhibetur, Of whom it is reported that he formed men out of clay, because he was an excellent teacher of wisdom: and so Theophrastus expoundeth the inuention of fire ascribed to Prometheus, Ad inuenta sapientia pertinere; To haue reference to wise inuentions: and Æschylus affirmeth, That by the stealing of Iupiters fire, was meant, that the knowledge of Prometheus reached to the Starres, and other celestiall bodies. Againe, it is written of him, that he had the art so to vse this fire, as thereby he gaue life to Images of Wood, Stone, and Clay: meaning that before his birth and being, those people among whom hee liued, had nothing else worthy of men, but externall forme and figure. By that fiction of Prometheus, being bound on the top of the Hill Caucasus, his entrailes the while deuoured by an Eagle, was meant the inward care and restless desire he had to inuestigate the Natures, Motions, and Influences of Heauenly bodies, for so it is saide: *Ideo altissimum ascendisse Caucasum, ut sereno celo quam longissimè astra, signorum obitus & ortus spectaret; That he ascended Caucasus, to the end that he might in a cleere skye discerne as farre off the settings and risings of the Starres: though Diodorus Siculus expounds it otherwise, and others diuersly.

Africanus makes Prometheus farre more ancient, and but 94. yeeres after Ogyges. Phrygius sayes that he liued at once with Inachus, who liued with Isaac.

Aug. lib. 18. c. 3. De Ciuit. Dei.

There liued also at once with Moses, that famous Atlas, brother to Prometheus, both being the sonnes of Iapetus, of whom though it be saide, that they were borne before Moses dayes, and therefore are by others esteemed of a more ancient date: yet the advantage of their long liues gaue them a part of other ages among men, which came into the World long after them. Besides these sonnes of Iapetus, Æschylus findes two other, to wit, Oceanus and Hesperus, who being famous in the West, gaue name to the Evening, and so to the euening Starre. Also besides this Atlas of Libya or Mauritania, there were others, which bare the same name: but of the Libyan, and the brother of Prometheus, it was that those Mountaines which crosse Africa, to the South of Marocco, Sus, and Hes, with the Sea adioyning tooke name, which memory Plato in Critias bestowes on Atlas, the sonne of Neptune.

Cicero in the fifth of his Tusculan questions, affirmeth that all things written of Prometheus and Atlas, were but by those names to expresse diuine knowledge. Nec verò Atlas sustinere celum, nec Prometheus affixus Caucasus, nec stellatus Cepheus cum uxore traheretur, nisi diuina cognitio nomen eorum ad errorem fabulæ traduxisset; Neither should Atlas be saide to beare up heauen, nor Prometheus to be fastened to Caucasus, nor Cepheus with his wife to be stelled; vntil their diuine knowledge had raised upon their names these erroneous fables.

Orpheus sometime exprest Time by Prometheus, sometime he tooke him for Saturne, as Rheæ coniuæ alme Promethen. But that the story of Prometheus was not altogether a fiction:

a fiction: and that he liued about this time, the mozt approued Historians and Antiquaries, and among them Eusebius and Saint Augustine haue not doubted; For the great judgement which Atlas had in Astronomy, saith Saint Augustine, were his daughters called by the names of constellations, Pleiades and Hyades: Others attribute vnto him the finding out of the Moones course, of which Archas the sonne of Orchomenus challengeth the inuention. Of this Archas Arcadia in Peloponnesus tooke name; and therefore did the Arcadians vaunt that they were more ancient than the Moone. Et Luna genitrix prior illis Ouid. de fast. lib. 18. cap. 8. d. Crut. Dei. fuit: which is to be vnderstood, saith Natalis Comes, before there had beene any obseruation of the Moones course: or of her working in inferiour bodies. And though there be that bestow the finding out thereof vpon Endymion: others (as Xenagoras) on Typhon: yet Isacus Tzetzes, a curious searcher of antiquities, gaue it Atlas of Libya: who besides his gifts of minde, was a man of vnequaled and incomparable strength: from whom Thales the Milesian, as it is saide, had the ground of his Philosophy.

§. V. Of Deucalion and Phaeton.

And in this age of the World, and while Moses yet liued, Deucalion reigned in Thessalie, Crotopus then ruling the Argives. This Deucalion was the sonne of Prometheus, saith Herodotus, Apollonius, Hesiodus, and Strabo. Hesiodus gaue him Pandora for mother; the rest Clymene: Homer in the fifteenth of his Odyssees, makes Deucalion the sonne of Minos: but he must needs haue meant some other Deucalion, for else either Vlysses was mistaken, or Homer, who put the tale into his mouth. For Vlysses after his returne from Troy, fained himselfe to be the brother of Idomeneus, who was sonne to this later Deucalion, the sonne of Minos: but this Minos liued but one age before Troy was taken: (for Idomeneus serued in that warre) and this Deucalion the sonne of Prometheus, who liued at once with Moses, was long before. In the first Deucalions time happened that great inundation in Thessalie: by which in effect euery foule, in those parts, perished, but Deucalion, Pyrrha his wife, and some few others. It is affirmed that at the time of this flood in Thessalie, those people exceeded in all kinde of wickednesse and villanie: and as the impiety of men is the forcible attractive of Gods vengeance, so did all that Nation for their foule finnes perish by waters: as in the time of Noah, the corruption and cruelty of all mankind drew on them that generall destruction by the flood vniuersall. Onely Deucalion, and Pyrrha his wife, whom God spared, were both of them esteemed to belouers of Vertue, of Iustice and of Religion. Of whom Ouid:

*Non illa melior quisquam, nec amantior equi
Vir fuit: aut illa reuerentior vlla deorum.*

No man was better, nor more iust than hee:
Nor any woman godlier than shee.

It is also affirmed that Prometheus fore-told his sonne Deucalion of this ouer-flowing; and aduised him to provide for his safety: who hereupon prepared himselfe a kinde of Vessell, which Lucian in his Dialogue of Timon calles Cibotium; and others Larnax. And because to these circumstances, they afterward adde the sending out of the Doue, to discover the waters fall and decrease, I should verily thinke that this Story had beene but an imitation of Noahs flood deuised by the Greekes, did not the times so much differ, and Saint Augustine with others of the Fathers and reuerent Writers approue this story of Deucalion. Among other his children Deucalion had these two of note, Hellen of whom Greece had first the name of Hellas, and Melantho, on whom Neptune is saide to haue begot Delphus, which gaue name to Delphos, so renowned among the Heathen for the Oracle of Apollo therein founded.

And that which was no lesse strange and maruailous than this flood, was that great burning and conflagration which about this time also happened vnder Phaeton; not onely in Ethiopia, but in Isiria, a Region in Italie, and about Cume, and the Mountaines of Vesunius: of both which the Greekes, after their manner, haue inuented many strange fables.

§. VI.

Of Hermes Trismegistus.

Vt of all other which this age brought forth among the Heathen, Mercurius was the most famous, and renowned; the same which was also called Trismegistus, or Ter maximus; and of the Greekes, Hermes.

Many there were of this name; and how to distinguish, and set them in their owne times, both S. Augustine & Lactantius find it difficult. For that Mercury which was esteemed the God of Theeues, the God of Wrestlers, of Merchants, and Sea-men, and the God of Eloquence (though all by one name confounded) was not the same with that Mercury, of whose many workes some fragments are now extant.

Cicero, Clemens Alexandrinus, Arnobius, and certaine of the Greekes reckon five Mercuries. Of which, two were famous in Egypt, and there worshipped; one, the sonne of Nilus, whose name the Egyptians feared to utter, as the Jewes did their Tetragrammaton; the other, that Mercury, which slew Argus in Greece, and flying into Egypt, is said to have deliuered literature to the Egyptians, and to haue giuen them Lawes. But Diadorus affirmeth, that Orpheus, and others after him, brought learning and letters out of Egypt into Greece: which Plato also confirmeth, saying; That letters were not found out by that Mercury which slew Argus, but by that ancient Mercury, otherwise Theuet; whom Philos. Biblius writeth Taanutus, the Egyptians Thoyth; the Alexandrines Thot; and the Greekes (as before) Hermes. And to this Taanutus, Sanchoiatho, who liued about the warre of Troy, giues the inuention of letters. But Saint Augustine making two Mercuries, which were both Egyptians, calles neither of them the sonne of Nilus, nor acknowledgeth either of them to haue slaine Argus. For he finds this Mercury, the slayer of Argus, to be the grand-child of that Atlas, which liued while Moses was yet young. And yet L. Vives vpon Saint Augustine seemes to vnderstand them to be the same with those, whom Cicero, Alexandrinus, and the rest haue remembred. But that coniecture of theirs, that any Græcian Mercury brought letters into Egypt, hath no ground. For it is manifest, (if there be any truth in prophane antiquity) that all the knowledge which the Greekes had, was transported out of Egypt or Phenicia; and not out of Greece, nor by any Græcian into Egypt. For they all confesse, that Cadmus brought letters first into Bæotia, either out of Egypt, or out of Phenicia: it being true, that betwene Mercurius, that liued at once with Moses, and Cadmus, there were these descents cast; Crotopus King of the Argives, with whom Moses liued, and in whose time about his tenth yeere Moses died; after Crotopus, Sthenelus, who reigned eleuen yeeres; after him Danaus fifty yeeres; after him Lyncæus: in whose time, and after him in the time of Minos King of Crete, this Cadmus arrived in Bæotia. And therefore it cannot be true, that any Mercurius about Moses his time, flying out of Greece for the slaughter of Argus, brought literature out of Greece into Egypt. Neither did either of those two Mercuries of Egypt, whom Saint Augustine remembreth, the one the grand-son, the other the Nephew or grand-child, come out of Greece. Eupolemus and Artapanus note, that Moses found out Letters and taught the vse of them to the Jewes; of whom the Phenicians their Neighbors receiued them; and the Greekes of the Phenicians by Cadmus. But this inuention was also ascribed to Moses, for the reason before remembred; that is, because the Jewes and the Phenicians had them first from him. For every Nation gaue vnto those men the honour of first Inuentors, from whom they receiued the profit. Ficinus makes that Mercury, vpon part of whose workes hee Commenteth, to haue bene foure descents after Moses; which he hath out of Virgil, who calles Atlas, that liued with Moses, the maternel grand-father of the first famous Mercury, whom others, as Diadorus, call the Counsailler and Instructer of that renowned Isis, wife of Osiris. But Ficinus giueth no reason for his opinion herein. But that the elder Mercury instructed Isis, Diadorus Siculus affirmeth, and that such an inscription was found on a pillar erected on the Tombe of Isis. Lod. Vives vpon the fixe and twentieth Chapter of the eighth Booke of Saint Augustine, De Ciuitate Dei, conceiuet, that this Mercury, whose workes are extant, was not the first which was entituled, Ter maximus, but his Nephew or grand-child. Sanchoiatho, an ancient Phenician, who liued shortly after Moses, hath other fancies of this Mercury, affirming that he was the Scribe of Saurme, and called by the Phenicians, Taanutus; and by the Egyptians Thot, or Thoyt. It may be, that the many yeeres which he is said to haue liued, to wit, three hundred yeeres, gaue occasion to some Writers to finde him in one time, and to others in other times. But by those which haue collected the grounds of the Egyptian Philosophie and Diuinitie, he is found more ancient than Moses: because the Inuentor of the Egyptian Wisedome, wherein it is said, that Moses was excellently learned.

It is true, that although this Mercurie or Hermes doth in his Diuinitie differ in manie particulars from the Scriptures, especially in the approuing of Images, which Moses of all things most detested; yet whosoever shall read him with an euen iudgement, will rather resolute, that these workes which are now extant, were by the Greekes and Egyptian Priests corrupted, and those fooleries inserted, than that euer they were by the hand of Hermes written, or by his heart and Spirit deuised. For there is no man of vnderstanding; and master of his owne wits, that hath affirmed in one and the same Tract, those things which are directly contrarie in doctrine, and in nature: For out of doubt (Moses excepted) there was neuer any man of those elder times that hath attributed more, and in a stile more reuerend and diuine, vnto almighty God, than he hath done. And therefore if those his two Treatises, now among vs; the one conuerted by Apuleius, the other by that learned Ficinus, had bene found in all things like themselves: I thinke it had not bene perilous to haue thought with Eupolemus, that this Hermes was Moses himselfe; and that the Egyptian Theologie hereafter written, was deuised by the first, and more ancient Mercurie, which others haue thought to haue beene Ioseph, the son of Iacob: whom, after the exposition of Pharaohs dreames, they called Saphane phane, which is as much to say, as absconditorum repertor; a finder out of hidden things. But these are ouer-venturous opinions. For what this man was, it is known to God. Enuie & aged time hath partly defaced, and partly worne out the certaine knowledge of him: of whom, whosoever he were, Lactantius writeth in this sort: Hic scripsit libros, & quidem multos, ad cognitionem diuinarum rerum pertinentes, in quibus Maiestatem summi ac singularis Dei asserit, ipsamque nominibus appellat, quibus nos, Deum & Patrem; Hec hath written many bookes belonging to, or expressing the knowledge of diuine things, in which hee affirmeth the Maiestie of the most High and one God, calling him by the same names of God and Father, which wee doe. The same Father also seareth not to number him among the Sybls and Prophets. And so contrary are these his acknowledgements to those Idolatrous fictions of the Egyptians and Græcians, as for my selfe I am perswaded, that whatsoever is found in him contrary thereto, was by corruption inserted. For thus much himselfe confesseth: Deus omnium Dominus, & Pater, fons & vita, potentia & lux, & mens, & Spiritus; & omnis in ipso, & sub ipso sum. Verbum enim ex eis esse prodians, perfectissimum existens, & generator & opifex, &c. God (saith hee) the Lord and Father of all things, the fountaine, and life, and power, and light, and minde, and Spirit: and all things are in him and vnder him. For his Word out of himselfe proceeding, most perfect, and generatiue, and operative, filling vpon fruitfull nature, made it also fruitfull and producing. And hee was therefore (saith Suidas) called Ter maximus, quia de Trinitate loquutus est: in Trinitate unum esse Deum asserens; Because hee spake of the Trinitie, affirming that there is one God in Trinitie. Hic ruinam (saith Ficinus) præuidit priscae Religionis, hic ortum nouæ fidei, hic aduentum Christi, hic futurum iudicium, resurrectionem saculi, beatorum gloriam, supplicia peccatorum; This Mercury foresaw the ruine of the olde or superstitious Religion, and the birth of the new faith, and of the coming of Christ, the future iudgement, the resurrection, the glory of the Blessed, and the torment or affliction of the wicked or damned.

To this I will onely adde his two last speeches reported by Calcidius the Platonist, and by Volterran out of Suidas. Hæcenus filipulus a patria, vixi peregrinus & exul, nunc incolam repero: cumq; post paulum a vobis corporeis vinculis absolutus discessero, videtis ne me quasi mortuum lugeatis: Nam ad illam optimam beatamq; Ciuitatem regredior, ad quam vniuersi citius mortis conditione venturi sunt. Ibi namq; solus Deus est summus Princeps: qui ciues suos replet suauitate mirifica: ad quam hæc, quam multi vitam existimant, mors est potius dicenda quam vita; Hicerto, O Sonne, being driuen from my Countrey, I haue liued a stranger and banished man: but now I am repairing home-ward againe in safety. And when I shall after a few dayes (or in a short time) by being loosed from these bonds of flesh and blood depart from you, see that you doe not bewaile me as a man dead, for I doe but returne to that best and blessed Citie, to which all her Citizens (by the condition of death) shall repaire. Therein is the onely God, the most high and chiefe Prince, who filleth or feedeth his Citizens with a sweetnesse heere marvellous:

maruiculous: in regard whereof, this being, which others call a life, is rather to be accounted a death then a life. The other, and that which seemeth to be his last, is thus conuerted by others, agreeing in sense but not in words with Suydas: O cælum magni Dei sapiens opus, teq; O vox patris quam ille primam emisit, quando vniuersum constituit mundum, adiutor vniuersum eius verbum, & Spiritum cuncta comprehendentem, miseremini mei: I adiuue thee O heauen, thou wise worke of the great God, and thee O voyce of the Father, which he first uttered, when he framed the whole world, by his onely begotten Word, and Spirit, comprehending all things, Haue mercy vpon me.

But Suydas hath his inuocation in these words: Obsecro te cælum magni Dei sapiens opus, obsecro te vocem Patris quam loquutus est primum, cum omnia mundum firmavit, obsecro te per vniuersum Sermonem omnia continentem, propitius, propitius esto: I beseech thee O heauen, wise worke of the great God, I beseech thee O voyce of the Father, which hee spake first when hee establihed all the world, I beseech thee by the onely begotten Word containing all things, be fauourable, be fauourable.

§. VII.

Of Iannes and Iambres, and some other that liued about those times.

Here were also in this age both Æsculapius, which after his death became the God of Physicians, being the brother of Mercurius, as Vines thinkes in his Commentary vpon Augustine, de Ciuitate Dei. lib. 8. and also those two notorious Sorcerers, Iannes and Iambres, who in that impious art excelled all that euer had beene heard of to this day: and yet Moses himselfe doth not charge them with any familiarity with Diuels, or ill Spirits: words indeed that seldome came out of his mouth; how-euer by the Septuagint they are called Sophiste or Venefici and Incantatores, Sophists, poysoners, and Inchanters: by Hierome, Sapientes & malefici, Wise men, and euill doers: and so by Vatablus, who also vseth the word Magi. The Greeke it selfe seemes to attribute somewhat of what they did to naturall Magick: calling them, magici, workers by drugs. The Geneuian, Sorcerers and Inchanters: Iunius Sapientes prestigiatores & Magi. Magicians and Wisemen here by him are taken in one sense: and Prestigiators are such, as dazell mens eyes, and make them seeme to see what they see not: as false colours, and false shapes. But as some vertues and some vices are so nicely distinguished, and so resembling each other, as they are often confounded, and the one taken for the other: (Religion and superstition hauing one face and countenance) so did the workes and workings of Moses, and of Pharaos Sorceres appeare in outward shew, and to the beholders of common capacities, to be one and the same art and gift of knowledge. For the Diuell changeth himselfe into an Angell of light: and imitateth in all he can the wayes and workings of the most High. And yet on the contrary euery worke which surmounteth the wisdom of most men, is not to be condemned, as performed by the helpe or ministry of ill Spirits. For the properties and powers which God hath giuen to naturall things; are such as where he also bestoweth the knowledge to vnderstand their hidden and best vertues, many things by them are brought to passe, which seeme altogether impossible, and about nature or art: which two speculations of workes of nature, and of miracle, the Cabalists distinguished by these names; Opus de Beresith, & opus de mercana: the one they call Sapientiam naturæ, The Wisedome of nature: the other Sapientiam diuinitatis, The Wisedome of diuinity: the one Iacob practised in breeding the pied Lambes in Mesopotamia, the other Moses exercised in his miracles wrought in Ægypt, hauing receiued from God the knowledge of the one in the highest perfection, to wit, the knowledge of nature: of the other so farre as it pleased God to proportion him, both which he vsed to his glory that gaue them: assuming to himselfe nothing at all, either in the least or most. Also Saint Augustine noteth, that from the time that Moses left Ægypt, to the death of Iosua, diuers other famous men liued in the World, who after their deaths for their eminent vertues and inuentions, were numbred among the Gods: as Dionysius otherwise Liber Pater, who taught the Gracians the vse of the Vine in Attica: at which time also there were instituted Musickall playes to Apollo Delphicus: thereby to regaine his fauour, who brought barrenesse and scarcity vpon that part of Greece, because they resisted not the attempts of Dæmons, who spoyled his Temple and set it on fire: so did Erichonius institute the like games to Minerua: wherein the Victor was rewarded with a present of Oyle, in memory of her that first prest it out of the Oliue.

In this age also Xanthus rauished Europa: and begat on her Radamanthus, Sarpedon, and Minos, which three are also giuen to Iupiter by other Historians. To these Saint Augustine addeth Hercules; the same to whom the twelue labours are ascribed, natiue of Tyrinthia a City of Peloponnesus: (or as others say, onely nursed and brought vp there) who came into Italy, and destroyed many Monsters there; being neither that Hercules, which Eusebius sumameth Delphin, famous in Phœnicia; nor that Hercules, according to Philostatus, which came to Gades, whom he calleth an Ægyptian: Manifestum sit, non Thebanum Herculem, sed Ægyptium ad Gades peruenisse, & ibi finem statuiffe terræ (saith Philostatus.) It is manifest that it was the Ægypti Hercules, and not the Theban, which traualled as farre as the freights of Gades, and there determined the bounds of the earth. In this time also while Moses wandered in the Deserts, Dardanius built Dardania.

But whosoever they were, or how worthy focuer they were that liued in the dayes and age of Moses, there was neuer any man, that was no more than man, by whom it pleased God to worke greater things; whom he fauoured more, to whom (according to the appearing of an infinite God) he so often appeared; neuer any man more familiar and conuersant with Angels; neuer any more learned both in Diuine and Humane knowledge, neuer a greater Prophet in Israel. He was the first that receiued and deliuered the Law of God entire; the first that left to posterity by letters, the truth and power of one infinite God; his creating out of nothing the World vniuersall, and all the creatures therein; that taught the detestation of Idolatry, and the punishment, vengeance, and eradication, which followed.

Syracides calleth Moses the beloved of God and Men, whose remembrance is blessed. He made him (saith the same Authour) like to the glorious Saints, and magnified him by the feare of his enemies, made him glorious in the sight of Kings, shewed him his glory, caused him to heare his voyce, sanctified him with faithfulness and meeknesse, and chose him out of all men.

He is remembered among prophane Authours; as by Clearchus the Peripatetic: by Megasthenes, and Numenius the Pythagorian. The long liues which the Patriarchs enioyed before the flood, remembered by Moses, Esaius, Hieronymus, Ægyptius, Hecateus, Elanicus, Acusilaus, Ephorus, and Alexander the Historian, confirme. The vniuersall flood which God reuealed vnto Moses, Berosus, Nicolaus Damascenus, and others haue testified. The building of the Tower of Babel, and confusion of tongues, Abydenus, Esaius, and Sybilla haue approued. Berosus also honoureth Abraham. Hecateus wrote a Booke of him. Damascenus before cited, speaketh of Abrahams passage from Damascus into Canaan, agreeing with the Bookes of Moses. Eupolemon writeth the very same of Abraham, which Moses did. For beginning with the building of Babel, and the ouerthrow thereof by diuine power, he saith that Abraham, borne in the tenth generation, in the City called Camerina, or Frien, excelled all men in wisdom: and by whom the Astrology of the Chaldeans was inuented. Isustitia pietateq; sua (saith Eusebius out of the same Authour) sic Deo gratus fuit, ut diuino precepto in Phœnicem venerit, ibi habitauerit. For his iustice and piety he was so pleasing vnto God, as by his commandement he came into Phœnicia, and dwelt there. Likewise Diodorus Siculus, in his second Booke and fifth Chapter, speaketh reuerently of Moses: There are many other among prophane Authours, which doe confirme the Bookes of Moses, as Eusebius hath gathered in the ninth of his Preparation to the Gospel, Chapter the third and fourth, to whom I referre the Reader. Lastly, I cannot but for some things in it commend this notable testimony of Strabo, who writeth of Moses in these words. Moses enim affirmabat, docebatq; Ægyptios non recte sentire, qui bestiarum & pecorum imagines Deo tribuerunt: itemq; Afros & Græcos, qui Dii hominum figuram assignerant: id videri solum esse Deum, quod nos & terram & mare continet, quod cælum & mundum, & rerum omnium naturam appellamus: cuius perfectio imaginem, nemo sane mentis, alius earum rerum, quæ penes nos sunt, similem audeat offingere. Proinde (omni simulacrorum effigione repudiata) dignum ei Templum ac Delubrum constituendum, ac sine aliqua figura colendum: Moses affirmed and taught, that the Ægyptians thought amisse, which attributed vnto God the Images of beasts and cattell: Also that the Affricans and Greekes greatly erred in giuing vnto their Gods the shapes of men: whereas that onely is God indeede, which containeth both vs, the Earth and Sea, which we call Heaven, the World, and the nature of all things, whose image, image, doubtlesse, no wise man will dare to fashion out vnto the likenes of those things, which are amongst vs: That therefore (all deuising of Idols cast aside) a worthy Temple and place of prayer was to be erected vnto him, and he to be worshipped without any figure at all therein.

Now concerning the Egyptian wisdome, for which the Martyr Stephen commended Moses, saying, That Moses was learned in all the wisdome of the Egyptians; and was mighty in his works and words; the same is collected (how truly I know not) by Diodorus, Diogenes, Laertius, Iamblicus, Philo Iudeus, and Eusebius Casariensis, and diuided into foure parts, viz. Mathematicall, Naturall, Diuine, and Morall.

In the Mathematicall part, which is distinguish't into Geometrie, Astronomie, Arithmetick, and Musicke; the ancient Egyptians exceeded all others. For Geometry which is by interpretation, measuring of grounds, was vsfull vnto them: because it consisting of infallible principles, directed them certainly in bounding out their proper Lands, and Territories, when their fields and limits, by the inundations of Nilus, were yeerely overflowne and confounded, so as no man could know what in right belonged vnto him.

For the second part, to wit, Astronomie, the site of the Countrey being a lenell and spacious Plaine, free and cleere from the clouds, yeelded them delight with ease, in observing and contemplating the risings, fallings, and motions of the Starres.

Arithmetick also, which is the knowledge of numbers, they studied; because without it, in Geometrie and Astronomie, nothing can be demonstrated or concluded. But of Musicke they made no other account, nor desired farther knowledge, than seemed to them sufficient to serue and magnifie their Gods, their Kings, and good Men.

The Naturall part of this Wisdome, which handleth the principles, causes, elements, and operations of naturall things; differs little from Peripateticall Philosophie; teaching, that Materia prima is the beginning of all things; that of it all mixt bodies and liuing creatures haue their being; that Heauen is round like a Globe; that all Starres haue a certaine fouent heate, and temperate influences, whereby all things grow and are produced; that raines proceed and bee from mutations in the ayre; that the Planets haue their proper soules, &c.

The Diuine part of this wisdome, which is called Theologie, teacheth and beleaueth that the world had a beginning, and shall perish; that men had their first originall in Egypt; partly by meanes of the temperatenesse of that Countrey, where neither Winter with cold, nor Summer with heate are offensive; and partly through the fertilitie, that Nilus giueth in those places; That the soule is immortall, and hath transmigration from body to body; That God is one, the Father and Prince of all Gods; and that from this God, other Gods are, as the Sunne and Moone, whom they worshipped by the names of Osiris and Isis, and erected to them Temples, Statues, and diuers Images, because the true similitudes of the Gods is not knowne; that many of the Gods haue beene in the estate of mortall men, and after death, for their vertues, and benefits bestowed on mankind, haue beene Deified; that those beasts, whose Images and formes the Kings did carrie in their Armes, when they obtained victory, were adored for Gods: because vnder those Ensignes they preuailed ouer their enemies. Moreover, the Egyptian Diuines had a peculiar kinde of writing, mysticall and secrete, wherein the highest points of their Religion and worship of God, which was to be concealed from the vulgar sort, were obscured.

Clemens distributeth the whole summe of this later Egyptian learning into three seuerall sorts, viz. Epistolar, which is vsed in writing common Epistles; Sacerdotal, which is peculiar to their Priests; and Sacred; which Sacred containeth Scripture of two kinds: the one proper, which it expressed by letters Alphabetically in obscure and figuratiue words; as for example, where it is written: The Ibis by the Horner participateth the beauty of the Hawke; which is read thus: The Moone doth by the Sunne borrow part of the light of God: because Light is an Image of Diuine beauty; the other symbolically, or by signatures, which is threefold, viz. Imitatiue, Tropicall, and Ænigmaticall: Imitatiue, which designeth things by characters, like to the things signified, as by a Circle the Sun; and by the Hornes of the Moone, the Moone it selfe: Tropicall, or transferent, which applies the diuers formes and figures of naturall bodies or creatures, to signifie the dignities, fortunes, conditions, vertues, vices, affections, and actions of their Gods, and of men. So with the Egyptian Diuines, the Image of an Hawke signifieth God, the figure of the Horner signifieth the Sunne, the picture of the Bird Ibis signifieth the Moone: by by the forme of a Man, Prudence and Skilfulnesse: by a Lyon, Fortitude: by a Horse, Liberty: by a Crocodile, Impudency: by a Fish, Harred is to be vnderstood: Ænigmaticall is a composition or mixture of Images or Similitudes: in which sense, the monstrous Image of a Lyons body hauing a Mans head, was grauen on their Temples and Altars, to signifie, that to men all diuine things are Ænigmaticall and obscure. So the Image of the Sunne set on the head of a Crocodile, (which liueth aswell in the Waters, as on Land) expresseth that the Sunne nourisheth Meteors in the Ayre, aswell from the Waters as from the Earth. So a Scepter, at the top whereof is made an Eye, and an Eare, signifieth God, Hearing, Seeing, and Gouerning all things. The Scythians are thought to haue been delighted with this kinde of writing. For Pherecides Syrius reporteth, That when Darius sending letters, threatened Idanthura, King of the Scythians, with ruine and destruction of his Kingdome, vnlesse he would acknowledge subiection: Idanthura returned to him a Moule, a Frog, a Bird, a Dart, and a Ploughshare: which Orontopagus, Tribune of the Souldiers, interpreted to signifie, that by the moule, their dwellings: by the Frog, their waters: by the Bird, their ayre: by the Dart, their weapons: by the Plough, their lands: were signified to be ready to be deliuered to Darius, as their Soueraigne Lord. But Xyphodres made another construction, viz. that the King meant, That except Darius with his men did hasten away, as a Bird through the Ayre, or creepe into holes as a moule, or runne into the waters which they had passed as a Frog, they should not escape his armes, but either be slaine, or being made Captiues, Till his grounds. The same History is with little difference reported by Herodotus.

The fourth and last part, which is Morall and Politique, doth containe especially the Lawes, which (according to Laertius) Mercurius Trismegistus, or Ter Maximus deuised: who in his Bookes or Dialogues of Pimander and Asclepius, hath written so many things of God, worthy of admiration, aswell (saith Sextus Senensis) of the Trinity, and of the coming of Christ, as of the last and fearefull day of Iudgement: that (as saith the same Authour, the opinion being also ancient) he is not onely to be accounted a Philosopher, but a Prophet of things to come.

Iamblicus in his Bookes of Mysteries of the Egyptians, taking two very ancient Historians for his Authours, to wit, Seleucus and Menasus, affirmeth that this Mercury was not onely the Inuenter of the Egyptian Philosophy, but of all other learning, called, the Wisdome of the Egyptians before remembered: and that he wrote of that subiect 36525. Bookes, or Pages. Of which there were numbred, of Fiery Spirits, one hundred Bookes; of Aerall Spirits as many, and of Spirits Celestiall a thousand; which because they were out of the Egyptians language conuerted by certaine learned Philosophers into the naturall Greeke, they seemed to haue bene first written in that Tongue. Clemens Alexandrinus writeth, that among the Bookes of Hermes, to wit, of the wisdome of the Egyptians, there were extant in his time 36. of Physicke fixe bookes; of the orders of Priests; ten; and of Astrology foure.

§. VIII.

A Brieue of the History of Iosua; and of the space betweene him and Othoniel: and of the remainders of the Canaanites; with a note of some Contemporaries to Iosua: and of the breach of Faith.

After the death of Moses, and in the one and fortieth yeere of the Egression, in the first moneth called Nisan, or March, Iosua the sonne of Nun, of the Tribe of Ephraim, being filled with the Spirit of wisdome, tooke on him the gouernment of Israel: God giuing him comfort, and encouraging him to passe the Riuer of Jordan, and to possesse, and diuide among the Israelites the Land promised.

The beginning of Iosuas rule Saint Augustine dates with the reigne of Amynas, the eighteenth King in Assyria; with Corax the sixteenth King in Sicyonia, when Danaus gouerned the Argues; and Erichonius, Athens.

Iosua imitating in all things his Predecessor, sent ouer Jordan certaine discoverers to view the seate and strength of Jerico, the next City vnto him on the other side of the Riuer, which he was to passe ouer. Which discoverers being faued, and sent backe by Rahab, a woman of ill fame, because shee kept a Tauerne or Viding-houise, made Iosua know that the Inhabitants of Jerico, and those of the Countrey about it, hearing of the approach of 10f. 2. 11. of Israel, had lost courage. Whereupon the day after the returne of the Spies, which was the sixth day of the one and fortieth yeere after the Egression, Iosua remooued from Shitim in the plaines of Moab, and drew downe his Armie to the bankes of the Riuer Jordan, and gaue them commandement to put themselves in order to follow the Arke of God, when the Leuites tooke it vp, and moued towards the Riuer; giuing them withall this forcible encouragement, That they should thereby assure themselves of his fauour and presence who is Lord of all the world, when the Riuer of Jordan should be cut off and diuided, and the waters comming from aboue should stand still in a heape, whereby those below towards the Dead sea wanting supply, they might passe ouer into the land of Canaan with dry feet.

10f. 3. 1. Hee also commanded Reuben, Gad, and the halfe Tribe of Manasse, to prepare themselves (according to their Couenant made with Moses) to march in the head of the rest, and as we call it in this age, to leade in the Vanguard, which through all the Deserts of Arabia, from the Mount Sinai to this place, those of the Tribe of Juda had performed. For these Tribes being already provided of their habitations, and Countrie and Cities of the Amorites, by the helpe of the rest, conquered for them: It agreed with iustice and equality, that Reuben, Gad, and the halfe of Manasse should also assist their brethren in the obtaining of their parts, as yet in their enemies possession.

10f. 3. 12. On the banks of Jordan they rested themselves from the sixth day to the ninth; and on the tenth day of the first moneth Nisan, or March, they past ouer to the other side, taking 20 with them twelue stones from the drie ground in the midst of the Riuer: which, for a memorie of that miracle by God wrought, they set vp at Gilgal, on the East side of the Cite of Ierico, where they encamped the first night. At which place Iosua gaue commandement, that all borne in the last fortieth yeere in the Deserts should be circumcised, which ceremonie to that day had beene omitted. Of the neglect whereof S. Augustine giueth for cause, The peoples contempt of their superiours. Thomas excuseth it in this sort, That the Israelites knew not the certaine time of their remouing from one place to another: Damasen, That it was not needfull by circumcision to distinguish them from other Nations, at such time as they liued by themselves, and a-part from all Nations.

10f. 4. 19. On the fourteenth day of the same Moneth, the children of Israel celebrated the Passe 30 ouer now the third time; first, at their leauing Egypt; secondly, at Mount Sinai; and now at Gilgal. After which being desirous to taste of the fruits of the Countrie, and hawing, as it were, surfered on Man, they parched of the Corne of the land, being not yet fully ripe, and ate thereof.

10f. 5. 10. And as Moses began to distribute those Regions beyond Jordan, to wit, the Lands of the Amorites, which Og of Basan, and Sihon held, so did Iosua performe the rest; and after a view and partition made of the Territories, hee gaue to each Tribe his portion by lot. But this partition and distribution was not done at once, but at three seuerall times; first, by Moses to Gad, Ruben, and the halfe Tribe of Manasse, of the Lands ouer Jordan; 40 secondly, by Iosua, to the Tribe of Juda, Ephraim, and the other halfe Tribe of Manasse, about the fifth yeere of his gouernment; proued in the 14. of Iosua, v. 10. and a third diuision was made to the other seuen Tribes at Shilo, where Iosua feared the Tabernacle of the Congregation.

10f. 14. 3. The victories of Iosua against the Kings of the Canaanites, are so particularly set down in his owne books, as I shall not need to lengthen this part by their repetition. In whose storie I chiefly note these particulars. First, how in the beginning of the warre, those little Kings or Reguli of the Canaanites, had not so much vnderstanding, as to vnite themselves together against the Israelites; but according to the custome of those estates, from whose Gouernours God hath taken away all wisdom and fore-sight, they left those of their owne Nation, which were next the inuaders, to themselves, and to their owne 50 defences; hoping that the fire kindled somewhat farre off, might againe haue been quenched, ere it could spread it selfe so farre as their owne Territories and Cities. But after such times as Ierico and Ai were entred, and the Kings, People, and Cities consumed; five of those 31. Kings (all which at length perished in that warre) ioyned themselves together, first attempting the Gibeonites, who had rendered themselves to Iosua. Onely five (the rest looking on to the successe) namely, the King of the Iebusites, in Iebus, or Ierusalem, the Kings of Hebron, Iarmoth, Lachis, and Eglon, addrest themselves for resistance: whose Armie being by Iosua surpris'd and broken, themselves despairing to escape by flight, flight, and hopelesse of mercy by submission, creeping into a Caue vnder ground, were thence by Iosua drawne forth and hanged. In the prosecution of which victory he also 10f. 10. rooke Makedath, and Libnah, and Lachis. To the reliefe whereof Horam King of Gezar hastened, and perished. After which Iosua posselt himselfe of Eglon, Hebron, and Debir, 10f. 10: destroying the Cities with their Princes.

In the end, and when the South Countries were posselt, the Cities thereof conquered, and their Kings and People made dust: the rest of the Canaanites, guided by the ouer-late countsailes of necessity, vnited themselves, to make one grosse strength and body of an Armie: which Iabin, King of Hazor, practised and gathered together, by Iosua di- 10f. 10. 2. couered, as the same rested neere the Lake of Merom, he vsed such diligence, as he came on them vnawares; and obtaining absolute victory ouer them, he prosecuted the fame to the vttermost effect. And, besides the slaughter of the defendants, he entred their Cities, of which he burnt Hazor only, reseruing the rest for Israel to inhabite and enioy.

Secondly, I note, that Iosua shewed himselfe a skilfull man of Warre, for that in those ancient times he vsed the stratageme of an ambush in taking of Ai; and in that hee broke the Armies of the first five Kings of the Amorites, which attempted Gibeon by surpris. For he marched all night from his campe at Gilgal, and set on them early the next day; 10f. 10. 2. when he ouerthrew Iabin and his confederates, After which, making the best profit of his victory, he assailed the great Cite of Hazor.

20 Thirdly, the miracles which God wrought during this warre, were exceeding admirable; as the stay of the Riuer Jordan at the Springs, so as the Armie of Israel past it with a drie foote; the fall of Ierico by the sound of the Hornes; the showres of Haile-stones, 10f. 3. v. 13. which fell vpon the Amorites in their flight from Gibeon, whereby more of them perished Cap. 10. v. 11. than by the sword of Israel: againe, the arrest of the Sunne in the firmament, whereby the day was so much the more lengthened, as the Israelites had time to execute all those which fled after the ouerthrow: a wonder of wonders, and a worke onely proper to the all-powerfull God.

Fourthly, out of the passage between Iosua and the Gibeonites, the Doctrine of keeping Faith is so plainly and excellently taught, as it taketh away all euasion, it admitteth no 30 distinction, nor leaueth open any hole or out-let at all to that cunning perfidiousnes, and horrible deceit of this latter age, called Aquiuocation. For, notwithstanding that these Gibeonites were a people of the Heuites, expressly and by name, by the commandement of 10f. 9. 7. God to be rooted out, and notwithstanding that they were liars, and deceiuers, and counterfeiters, and that they did ouer-reach, and as it were, deride Iosua, and the Princes of Israel, by faining to bee sent as Embassadors from a farre Countrie, in which trauaile their clothes were worne; their bread mouldie; which they auowed to haue been warme for newnesse when they first set out; their barrels and bottels of wine broken; their shoes patcht; and their sacks rent and ragged: Yet Iosua hauing sworn vnto them by 10f. 9. From the 5. to the 13. the Lord God of Israel, hee durst not, though vrged by the multitude of the people, to 10f. 9. lay violent hands on them; but hee spared both their Liues, and the Cities of their inheritance.

Now if euer man had warrant to breake Faith, and to retract his promise made, Iosua had it. For first, the commandement which he receiued from God to root out this Nation among the rest, preceded by farre the peace which he had granted them. Secondly, hee might iustly haue put these men to the sword, and haue sackt their Cities; if there be any euasion from a promise made, whereof the liuing God is called to witnesse. For it was not to the Gibeonites he gaue peace, because hee knew them to be a people hated of God. Hee told them, that if they were of the Heuites, it was not in his power to make a 10f. 9. 7. league with them. But it was to a strange people that he gaue faith, & to a Nation which 50 came from farre, who hearing of the wonders which the God of Israel had done in Egypt and ouer Jordan, sought for peace and protection from his people. Thirdly, the accord, which Israel made with these craftie Canaanites, was without warrant. For it is written in the same place, That the Israelites accepted their tale, that is, beleued what they had said, and counsailed not with the mouth of the Lord. Fourthly, these men who were knowne Idolaters, and serued those Puppets of the Heathen, men of an Apish Religion, as all Worshippers of Images are, could not challenge the witnesse of the true God, in whom they beleued not. I say therefore, that if euer man might haue serued himselfe by any euasion or distinction, Iosua might iustly haue done it. For hee needed not not in this case the helpe of Equiuocation, or Mentall Reservation. For what hee swaie, he swaie in good Faith; but he swaie nothing, nor made any promise at all to the Gibeonites. And yet, to the end that the faithlesse subtiltie of man should borrow nothing in the future from his example, who knowing well, that the promises he made in the name of God, were made to the liuing God, and not to the dying Man, hee held them firme, and inuolable, notwithstanding that they, to whom he had sworne it, were worshippers of the Deuill.

For it is not, as faithlesse men take it, that he which sweareth to a Man, to a Societie, to a State, or to a King, and sweareth by the name of the liuing Lord, and in his presence, That this promise (if it be broken) is broken to a man, to a Societie, to a State, or to a Prince; but the promise in the name of God made, is broken to God. It is God, that we therein neglect: we therein professe that we feare him not, and that we set him at nought and defie him. If hee that without Reservation of honour giue a lie in the presence of the King, or of his Superiour, doth in point of Honour giue the lie to the King himselfe, or to his Superiour; how much more doth he breake Faith with God, that giue a lie in the presence of God, promifeth in his name, and makes him a witnesse of the Couenant made?

Out of doubt, it is a fearefull thing for a Sonne to breake the Promise, Will, or Deed of the Father; for a State, or Kingdome, to breake those Contracts which haue bene made in former times, and confirmed by publike faith. For though it were 400. yeeres 20 after Iosua, that Saul, euen out of deuotion, slaughtered some of those people descended of the Gibeonites: yet God who forgot not what the Predecessors and Fore-fathers of Saul and the Israelites had sworne in his name, afflicted the whole Nation with a consuming famine; and could not be appeased, till seuen of Sauls sonnes were deliuered to the Gibeonites grieved, and by them hanged vp.

And certainly, if it be permitted by the helpe of a ridiculous distinction, or by a God-mocking equiuocation, to swaie one thing by the name of the liuing God, and to reserve in silence a contrary intent: the life of man, the estates of men, the faith of Subiects to Kings, of Seruants to their Masters, of Vassals to their Lords, of Wiues to their Husbands, and of Children to their Parents, and of all trialls of right, will not onely be made 30 vncertaine, but all the chaines, whereby free men are tied in the world, be torne asunder. It is by oath (when Kings and Armies cannot passe) that wee enter into the Cities of our enemies, and into their Armies: it is by oath that warres take end, which weapons cannot end. And what is it or ought it to be that makes an oath thus powerfull, but this; That he that sweareth by the name of God, doth assure others that his words are true, as the Lord of all the World is true whom he calleth for a witnesse, and in whose presence he that taketh the oath hath promised: I am not ignorant of their poore euasions, which play with the severity of Gods Commandements in this kinde: But this indeed is the best answer, That hee breakes no faith, that hath none to breake. For whosoever hath faith 40 and the feare of God, dares not doe it.

The Christians in the Holie Land when they were at the greatest, and had brought the Caliph of Aegypt to pay them tribute, did not onely lose it againe, but were soone after beaten out of the Holie Land it selfe: by reason (saith William of Tyre, a reuerend Bishop which wrote that storie) that Almerick the fiftieth King after Godfrey brake faith with the Caliph Elhadach, and his Vicegerent, The Soldan Sanar; who being suddenly invaded by Almerick, drew in the Turke Syrac to their aide: whose Nephew Seladine, after hee had made Aegypt his owne, beat the Christians out of the Holie Land; neither would the wooden Crosse (the very Crosse, say they, that Christ died on) giue them victorie ouer Seladine, when they brought it into the field as their last refuge: seeing they had sworne themselves in his name, that was crucified thereon. And if it be a direction from 5 the holy Ghost, That he that speaketh lies, shall be destroyed, and that the mouth which uttereth them, slaieth the soule: how much more perillous is it (if any perill be greater than to destroy the soule) to swaie a lye? It was Eugenius the Pope, that perswaded, or rather commanded the King of Hungarie after his great victory ouer Amurath the Turk, & when the said King had compelled him to peace, the most aduantageous that euer was made for the Christians, to breake his Faith, and to prouoke the Turke to renew the warre. And though the said King was farre stronger in the field than euer; yet hee lost the battle with 30000. Christians, and his owne life. But I will stay my hand: For this first volume will not hold the repetition of Gods iudgements vpon faith-breakers; bee it against Infidels, Turkes, or Christians of diuers Religions. Lamentable it is, that the taking of oathes now-a-daies, is rather made a matter of custome than of conscience.

It is also very remarkable; That it pleased God to leaue so many Cities of the Canaanites vnconquered by Israel, to scourge and afflict them, by fore-seeing their Idolatrie, and as it is said in the Scriptures, To be Thornes in their eyes to proue them, and to teach them 10 to make Warre. For these Cities hereafter named did not onely remaine in the Canaanites possession all the time of Iosua; but soone after his death, the Children of Dan were beaten out of the plaine Countries, and enforst to inhabite the Mountaines, and places of 10 hardest access. And those of Iuda were not able to be Masters of their owne Vallies; because, as it is written in the Iudges, The Canaanites had Chariots of Iron. And those 10 principall Cities which stood on the Sea-side, adioyning vnto Iuda, were still held by the remainder of the Anakims, or Philistims: as Azzah, Gath, Asdod; out of one of which Cities came Goliath, remembered in Samuel. 10

Neither did the children of Manasse ouer Iordan expell the Geshurites, nor the Maachathites: which inhabited the North parts of Basan, afterward Traconitis.

Nor the Neptalims possesse themselves of Bethshemish: nor of Bethanah, but they inforst 10 those Canaanites to pay them tribute. Neither did Ashe expell the Zidonians, nor those of Acho, or Acon, Athlab, Achzib; Heblah, Aphike, and Rehob, nor inforce them to tribute. 10

No more could Zabulon enioy Kitron, and Nahaloh, but receiued tribute from them. 10 Also the Canaanites dwelt in Gesser among the Ephraims: and among the children of Manasse, on the West of Iordan, the Canaanites held Bethshean, Taanach, Dor, Ibleam, and 10 Megaddo; yea Hierusalem it selfe did the Iebusites defend about foure hundred yeeres, euen till Dauids time.

Now Iosua liued one hundred and ten yeeres, eighteene of which he gouerned Israel, and then changed this life for a better. The time of his rule is not expresse in the Scriptures, which causeth diuers to coniecture diuersly of the continuance. Iosephus giues him five and twentie yeeres, Seder Ollam Rabbi the Authors of the Hebrew Chronologie eight and twentie: And Massius fixe and twentie: Maimonius cited by Massius, fourteene: Ioannes Lucidus, seuentee: Caetan, ten: Eusebius giue him seuen & twentie: 30 and so doth S. Augustine: Melancthon, two and thirtie: Codoman, five and twentie. But whereas there passed 480. yeeres from the deliuerie of Israel out of Aegypt, vnto the building of the Temple, it is necessary that wee allow to Iosua onely eighteene of them; as finding therest supplied otherwise, which to mee seemes the most likely, and as I thinke, a well approoued opinion.

The same necessitie of retaining precisely 480. yeeres from the departure out of Aegypt vnto the building of the Temple, conuinceth of errour, such as haue inserted yeeres betweene Iosua and Othniel, of whom Eusebius findes eight yeeres, to which Arius Montanus adhereth; and for which hee giue his reason in his foure and twentieth and last 40

Chapters vpon Iosua: Bunting reckons it nine yeeres: Bucholzer and Reusner but one, Codoman twentie, and Nicephorus no lesse than three and thirtie: whereas following the sure direction of these 480. yeeres, there can be no void yeeres found betweene Iosua and Othniel, vnlesse they be taken out of those eighteene ascribed vnto Iosua by the account already specified. The prayles and acts of Iosua are briefly written in the fixe and fortieth Chapter of Ecclesiasticus, where among many other things it is said of him, who 40 was there before him like to him, for he fought the battels of the Lord?

That he wrote the booke called by this name, it was the opinion of Arius Montanus, because it is said in the last Chapter, v. 26. And Iosua wrote these words in the booke of the law of God: which seemeth rather to haue been meant by the couenant which Iosua made 50 with Israel in Sichem, where they all promised to serue & obey the Lord: which promise Iosua caused to be written in the booke of the Law: and of this opinion were Caetan and Abulen: Theodor doth likewise conceiue that the booke of Iosua was collected out of an ancient Volume, intituled Liber Iustorum, remembered by Iosua himselfe, and others, that it was the work of Samuel: for whereas Montanus groundeth his opinion vpon these words of the 26. verse, And Iosua wrote these words, &c. this place hath nothing in it to proue it, for when the people had answered Iosua; The Lord our God wil we serue, & his voice will we 50 obey, it followeth that Iosua made a couenant with the people, and wrote the same in the booke of the Law of God.

There

There liued at once with Iosua, Eriethonius in Attica, who taught that Nation to yoke beafts together, thereby to till the ground with more ease and speed: And about the same time the fiftie Daughters of *Danai*s (as it is said) slew the fiftie Sonnes of Aegyptus, all but Lyncus who succeeded *Danai*s, if the tale be true. There liued also with Iosua, Phenix, and Cadmus, and neere the end of *Iosua*s life, Iupiter is said to haue rauished Euroopa the Daughter of Phenix, (afterward married to Asterius King of Creta) and begot on her Minos, Radamanthus and Sarpedon. But S. Augustine reports this rauishment to be committed by Xanthus, and yet they are more commonly taken for the Sonnes of Iupiter. But it may be doubted whether Minos was father to Deucalion, & Deucalion to Idomenus, who was an old man at the warre of Troy, and Sarpedon was in person a young or strong man at the same Troian war. And so doth Nestor reckon vp in the Councell of the Greeks, Theseus and Perithous for men of Antiquitie, and of ages past: Minos being yet more ancient than any of these. But hereof elsewhere.

§. I.

The Proeme to the description of the whole Land of Canaan, with an Exposition of the name of Syria.

HE storie of the Iudges ought to follow that of Iosua, after whom the Common-wealth of the Iewes was gouerned by Kings, of which so many of them as ruled the tenne Tribes, shall be remembered when we come to the description of Samaria: but because the Land of Canaan, and the borders thereof, were the Stages and Theaters, whereon the greatest part of the Story past, with that which followeth, hath been acted, I thinke it very pertinent (for the better vnderstanding of both) to make a Geographical description of those Regions: that all things therein performed by the places knowne, may the better be vnderstood, and conceiued. To which purpose (besides the addition of the Neighbour Countries) I haue bestowed on euery Tribe his proper portion: and doe shew what Cities and Places of strength were by the Iewes obtained: and what numbers it pleased God to leaue vnconquered; by whom hee might correct and scourge them, when vngratefull for his many graces, they at sundry times forgot or neglected the Lord of all power, and adored those deafe and dead Idols of the Heathen. Diuina bonitas (saith Augustine) ideo maxime irascitur in hoc seculo, ne irascatur in futuro: & misericorditer temporalem adhibet seueritatem, ne eternam iuste inferat ultionem; The Diuine goodnesse is especially therefore angry in this world, that it may not be angry in the world to come, and doth mercifully vse temporall seuerity, that it may not iustly bring vpon vs eternall vengeance.

To the Cities herein described, I haue added a short Story of the beginnings and ends of diuers Kingdomes and common-wealths: and to helpe my selfe herein, I haue perused diuers of the best Authors vpon this subiect: among whom, because I finde so great disagreement in many particulars, I haue rather in such cases aduentured to follow mine owne reason, than to borrow any one of their old patternes.

And because Canaan, with Palestina of the Philistines, and the Lands of Og and Sihon Kings of Basan, and the Arabian Amorites, were but small Prouinces of Syria: it shall be necessarie, first to diuide and bound the generall, and so to descend to this particular, now called the holy Land.

Syria, now Soria, according to the largest description, and as it was anciently taken, imbraced all those Regions from the Euxine Sea, to the Red Sea: and therefore were the Cappadocians, which looke into Pontus, called Leucosyrians, or white Syrians. But taking it shorter, and from the coast of Cilicia, which is the North border, vnto Idumæa towards the South, Tigris towards the Sunne rising, and the Mediterran Sea Westward: it then containeth besides Babylonia, Chaldea, Arabia the Desert, and Arabia Petraea, that Region also which the Greekes call Mesopotamia, the Hebrewes Syria, of the two Riuers, to wit, Tigris and Euphrates, for so Aram Nabairaim is expounded: also Padan Aram: that is, Iugum Syria, because the two Riuers goe along in it as it were in a yoke.

Edeffa, sometime Rages, now Rage, was the Metropolis of this Region of Syria. In Syria taken largely, there were many small Prouinces, as Celestria which the Latines call Syria Cœlia, because it lay in that fruitfull Valley betweene the Mountaines of Lybanus, and Antioch, in which the famous Cities of Antioch, Laodicea, Apamea, with many others were seated. Then Damascena or Syria Lybanica, taking name of the Citie Damascus, and the Mountaines of Lybanus, the Regall seat of the Adades, the first Kings of Syria. Adjoining to it was the Prouince of Sophene, or Syria Soba, Choba, or Zobal: ouer which Adadzer commanded in Salomons time. Then Phœnicia and the people Syraphanices: and lastly Syria Palestina bordering Aegypt: of which Ptolomie maketh Iudea also a part: and to that Prouince which Moses calleth Seir and Edom, Pomponius Mela giueth the name of Syria Iudea.

§. II.

Of the bounds of the land of Canaan, and of the promises touching this Land.

VT that Land which was anciently Canaan, taketh a part of Phœnicia, and stretcheth from behinde Lybanus to the great Desert betweene Idumæa and Aegypt: bounded by the Mid-land Sea on the West, and the Mountaines of Hermon; Galaad and Arnon towards the East: the same Hills which Strabo calleth Traconi or Traconitis, and Ptolomie Hippus. The name of Canaan it had from Canaan the Sonne of Cham, & lingua appellata fuit Canaan; The language was also called Canaan, saith Montanus: and after Hebræa of the Hebrewes: who tooke name from Heber, the Sonne of Sale, according to S. Augustine. But Arias Montanus not so well allowing of this deriuation, makes it a common name to all those of Noahs Sonnes, which past ouer Euphrates towards the West Sea. For the word Heber, saith hee, is as much as transiens or transmittens, of going or passing ouer. And because the children of Abraham had for along time no certaine abiding: therefore as he thinks, they were by the Aegyptians called Hebræi, as it were passengers, which is also the opinion of C. Sigonius, and of Eusebius long before them both. It had also the name of Iudea from Iuda; and then afterwards intuled The holy Land, because therein our Saviour Christ was borne and buried. Now this part of Syria was againe diuided into foure; namely, into Edom, (otherwise Seir, or Idumæa) Galilee, Samaria, and Iudea. Galilee is double, the superior called Gentium, and the inferior: and that Galilee and Iudea are distinguished, it is plaine in the Euangelists, though both of them belong to Phœnicia.

Euseb. Prep. Euang. l. 7. c. 3.

Matth. 2:
Lucæ 3:
Ioh. 4:

Now besides these prouinces of Phœnicia, and Palestina (both which the Riuer of Jordan boundeth; sauing that Phœnicia stretcheth a little more Easterly towards Damascus) that part also to the East of Jordan, and within the Mountaines of Hermon Gilead, and Arnon, otherwise Traconi, fell to the possession of halfe Manasse, Gad, and Reuben; and therefore are accounted a part of Canaan also: as well because anciently possit by the Amorites, as for that they were conquered and enioyed by the Israelites, which Eastermost parts are againe diuided into Basan or Batanea, into Gilead, Moab, Midian, Ammoon, and the Territories of the Machabî, Gessuri, Argobe, Hus. They are knowne to the latter Cosmographers by the name of Arabia in generall: and by the names of Traconitis, Pieria, Batanea, &c. of which I will speake in their proper places.

But where Moses describeth the Land of Canaan in the renth of Genesis, hee maketh no mention of the later Prouinces, which fell to Manasse, Gad, and Reuben, for these be his words, Then the border of the Canaanites was from Zidon, as thou comest to Gerar vntill Azab (which is Gaza) and this was the length of the Countrey North and South: then it followeth in the Text; And as thou goest vnto Sodome and Gomorrah, and Admah, and Seboim, euen vnto Lasha: by which words Moses setteth downe the breadth, to wit, from the Dead Sea to the Mediterran. But in Deuteronomie it seemeth to be far more large: For it is therein written; All the places whereon the sole of your feet shall tread, shall be yours: your your coast shall be from the wilderness and from Libanon, and from the River Perah, unto the uttermost Sea. Now for the length of the Countrey North and South, this description agreeth with the former: only Libanon is put for Zidon: and the Wilderness for Gerar and Azazab, which make no difference: but for the breadth and extent East and West, if Perah be taken for Euphrates: then the Land promised stretcheth it selfe both ouer Arabia Petraea, and the Desert as farre as the border of Babylon: which the Israelites neuer possesse, nor at any time did so much as inuade or attempt. And therefore Vadianus doth conceiue that by the River Perah, was meant Jordan, and not Euphrates: taking light from this place of Iosua: Behold, I haue diuided vnto you by los these Nations, that remaine to be an inheritance according to your Tribes: from Jordan with all the Nations that I haue destroyed, euen vnto the great Sea Westward.

And though it be true that Dauid greatly enlarged the Territorie of the Holie Land: yet as Vadianus well noteth, if Perah in the former place be taken for Euphrates, then was it put per gentes in amicitiam receptas. For Dauid did not at any time enter so farre to the East as Assyria, or Babilonia. Neither doth the not possessing of all these Countries giue aduantage to those that would make any irreligious cauilt, as touching the promise of God to the Israelites vnperformed: For when both their Kings, Magistrates, and People, fell from his worship and seruice, it pleased him not onely to inclose them within that Territorie, which was for so many people exceeding narrow; but therein and elsewhere to subiect them vnto those Idolatrous Nations, whose false and foolish Gods they themselues also serued and obeyed. And sure the promise by which the Hebrewes claimed the inheritance of Canaan, and the lasting inioying thereof, to wit, as long as the heauens were about the earth, was tied to those conditions, both in the Verbes preceding, and subsequent; which the Israelites neuer performed. And therefore they could not hope for other then all mankind could or can expect; who knew that all sorts of comforts from the mercifull goodnesse of God looked for, as well in this life as after it, are no longer to be attended, than while we perseuer in his loue, seruice, and obedience. So in the eight Verse of the eleuenth of Deuteronomie, the keeping of Gods Commandements was a condition ioyned to the prosperity of Israel. For therein it is written, Therefore shall ye keepe all the Commandements which I command you this day: that ye may be strong, and goe in, and possesse the Land, whither ye goe to possesse it. Also that you may prolong your dayes in the Land which the Lord swaie vnto your Fathers, &c.

The like condition was also annexed to the enioying of the land conquered, and the possession thereof, so long as the heauens were about the earth. For if ye keepe diligently, saith hee, all these commandements, which I command you to doe, that is, to loue the Lord your God, &c. then will the Lord cast out all these Nations before you, and ye shall possesse great Nations, & mightier than you. And here, though it be manifest, that by reason of the breach of Gods Commandements, and their falling away from the worship of his all-powerfull Maiestie, to the Idolatrie of the Heathen, the conditionall promises of God were absolutely void, as depending vpon obedience vnperformed: yet I cannot mislike that exposition of Melancthon: For, saith hee, Offendit promissionem precipuam non esse de hoc Politico regno; He sheweth that his chiefe promise is not of a ciuill Kingdome. To which agrees that answer, which S. Hierome made to a certaine Heretique in his Epistle ad Dardanum, who accused S. Hierome that he ouerthrew the reputation of the Iewes Storie, & brought the truth thereof in question, by drawing it altogether into an Allegorie, and ad illam duntaxat videntium terram que in celis est; (that is) Onely to that Land of the liuing which is in Heauen. Quoniam tota Iudeorum Regio adeo angusta sit ambitu, ut vix longitudinem habeat 160. miliarium, latitudinem vero 40. & in his etiam regiones, loca, vrbes & oppida sunt plurima, nunquam a Iudeis occupata, sed tantum diuina pollicitatione promissa; Because the whole Countrey of the Iewes is so narrow in compasse, that it scarce hath 160. miles in length, & 40. miles in breadth, and in these are Countreies, places, Cities, & many Townes, which the Iewes neuer possesse, but were onely granted by diuine promise. In like manner the same Father speaketh vpon Esay touching the blessings promised vnto Hierusalem: where hee hath these words: De quo discimus Hierusalem nequaquam in Palestina Regione petendam: qua totius Prouincie deterrima est: & saxosis montibus asperatur, & penuriam patitur sitis: ita ut celestibus utatur pluuijs; & raritatem fontiu cisternarum extructione soletur: sed in Dei manibus, ad quam dicitur festinauerunt structores tui; From whence, saith he, we learne, that Hierusalem is not to be sought in that region of Palestina, which is the worst of the whole Prouince, & ragged with with craggie Mountaines, and suffereth the penurie of thirst: so as it preferneth raine water, and supplieth the scarcitie of Wells by building of Cisternes; but this Hierusalem is in Gods hands, to which it is said, Thy builders haue hastened: so farre S. Hierome, where also to prevent mistaking, he thus expoundeth himselfe. Neg, hoc dico in suggestionem terre Iudee, ut Hereticus Syecophanta mentitur: aut quo auferam historie veritatem: que fundamentum est intelligentie spiritualis, sed ut decusiam supercilium Iudeorum: qui Synagoge angustias latitudinis Ecclesie preferunt. Si enim occidentem tantum sequuntur literam, & non spiritum viuificantem: ostendant terram promissionis lacte & melle manentem; Neyther (saith hee) say I this to disgrace the land of Iudaea (as the Hereticall yecophant doth belie me) or to take away the truth of the Historie, which is the foundation of spirituall vnderstanding, but to beat down the pride of the Iewes: which eniarge the straits of the Synagogue farther then the breadth of the Church: for if they follow onely the killing letter, and not the quickening spirit, let them shew the Land of promise, flowing with milke and honnie.

By this it may also be gathered, howsoever it be vnlikely (seeing the West-bound in the place, Deut. 11. 24. had his truth in the literall sense, that Euphrates or Perath, which is made the East bound, should be taken onely in a spirituall sense) yet neuertheless that Hieroms opinion inclineth to this, as if this Perath were not to be vnderstood for Euphrates: and that the promise it selfe was neuer so large: much lesse the plantation and conquest of Israel.

And now for a more particular description of this Holy Land, because Asher, Nephthaim, and Zabulon, held the Northermost part, and were seated in Phenicia, I will begin with these three, taking Asher for the first: of which Tribe yet before I speake, I must admonish the Reader touching the names of places in this, and the other Tribes to be mentioned, that he remember that many names by reason of the diuers fancies of Translators, are diuersly expressed, so that to the vnskillfull they may seeme diuers, when they are one and the same: the reason of this diuersitie (as by those learned in the Hebrew I am taught) is, partly because the ancient Editions of the Hebrew want vowels, the old Translators imagined others vowels then now the Hebrew editions haue; and partly because the Ancient expressed or omitted diuers consonants, otherwise than the latter doe thinke fit.

THE TRIBE OF ASHER.

†. I.

The bounds of the Tribe of Asher.

He Asherites descended of Asher the Sonne of Iacob by Zelpha, the handmaid of Lea, were increased while they abode in Egypt, to the number of 41500. and odde persons, all men about twenty yeeres of age, and able to beare armes at the time, when they were mustered by Moses at Mount Sinai; all which number perishing in the Deserts, there remained of their issues, besides women and children 53400. bodies fit for the warres: which past the River of Arnon, into the Plaines of Moab, and after the Conquest of Canaan, had for their portion that part of Phenicia, from Zidon and the fields of Libanus, vnto Ptolemais along the Sea-coast: containing thirtie English miles or thereabout; and from the Mid-land sea to the East border some twelue miles: though Asher makes it somewhat larger. This part of Canaan was very fruitfull, abounding in Wine, Oile, and Wheate, besides the Balsamum, with other pleasant and profitable commodities: according to that Prophecie, Asher pinguis panis: Concerning Asher, his bread shall be fat: And he shall giue pleasures for a King.

Q. Curtius make Agenor the founder thereof: and Iustine deriues the name from the abundance of fish found on those shores: whereof it hath beene called Zidona. But that it was farre more ancient, Moses, Iosua, and Iosephus witness, the same being founded by Zidon the eldest of Canaan's Sonnes: and so strong it was in Iosua's time, as neither did himselfe attempt it, neither could the Assyrians, or any of their successors master it: but it continued all the time of the Judges and Kings, euen vnto the comming of Christ, a Citie interchangeably gouerned, by their owne Princes or other Magistrates: though according to the warnings and threats of the Prophets Esay, Hieremie, Ezechiel, and Zacharie, it was often afflicted both by the enemies sword, and by the pestilence.

Zidon is seated on the very wath of the Phenician Sea, which is a part of the Mediterran or Mid-land Sea. It hath to the North the Citie of Berythus, and the Riuer Leontis: and to the South Sarepta, or Sarphat: which standeth betweene it and Tyre, the distance betwene which two great and famous cities, to wit, Zidon and Tyre, is 14. thousand paces, faith Seiglerus: but Vadianus makes it two hundred furlongs, and so doth Weistunburie in his description of the holy Land, and both from Strabo: which two hundred furlongs make five and twentie miles. This difference of distance as well betwene these two known Cities, as all the rest, make it ouer-difficult to deuise any new scale to the Mappe and description of the holy Land.

What Kings it had till Agenor's time there is no memorie: The story which Zeno the Philosopher, who was a Zidonian, wrote thereof, being by time consumed and lost. It seemeth to bee more ancient then Tyre; which was also built by the Zidonians. For as Strabo noteth, Homer speaking of Zidon, neglecteth the memorie of Tyre, because it was but a member of Zidon, and a Citie subiect to the Kings thereof: though it be true that in after-times it contended with Zidon for Primacie, and became farre more renowned, opulent, and strong: From Zidon had Salomon and Zorobabel their principall workemen, both in Timber and Stone, for the building of the Temple. For as it flourished in all sorts of learning, so did it in all other Mechanicall Arts or Trades: the Prophet Zacharie calling them the wise Zidonians. The Citie was both by Nature & Art exceeding strong, hauing a Castle or Citadell on the North-side, standing vpon an vnaccessible Rocke, and compassed by the Sea, which after the Citizens became Christians, was held and defended by the Knights of the Dutch Order: and another Castle it hath on the South side by the Port of Egypt, which the Templers guarded. It also sent many other Colonies besides that of Tyre, into places remote: as vnto Thebes, and Sephyra, Cities of Baotia in Greece.

Strabo and Plinie giue the Zidonians the inuention of * Glasse, which they vsed to make of those lands which are taken out of the Riuer Belus, falling into the Mediterran Sea, neere Ptolomais or Acon: and from whence the Venetians fetch the matter of those cleere Glasse which they make at Murana: of which S. Hierome and Plinie: Zidon insignis artifex vitri: Zidon vitrarij officinis Nobilis; Zidon a famous Glassemaker, or a skilfull worker in Glasse-houses.

They were in Religion Idolaters (as the rest of the Canaanites) worshippers of Baal and Astarte: which Idols though common to the other of the issue of Canaan as Pineda and Astarte out of 1. Sam. 31. 10. and Iud. 10. 6.) yet especially and peculiarly were accounted the Gods of the Zidonians: as appeares 1. Kings 11. 5. in the storie of Salomon's Idolatrie: where Astarte is called the God of the Zidonians: and 1. Reg. 16. 33. in the story of Achab, the chiefe worshipper of Baal, where it is said that hee marrying Iezabel the Daughter of the King of the Zidonians, worshipped their Baal. Diuers Baals & diuers Astartes in their Idolatries they acknowledged: as it appeares by the plurall names of Baals and Astartes, 1. Sam. 12. 10. and elsewhere: for euen the name Astarte, as I am informed by a skilfull Hebreit, is plurall: the singular being Astarte: whence Iud. 2. 13. the Septuagint reads ἐκείνην τὴν ἀστέραν. They worshipped the Astartes. The occasion of this their multiplying of their Baals, and Astartes, may be diuersly vnderstood: either in respect of the diuersitie of the formes of the Images, or of the worship in diuers places, or of the diuers stories depending vpon them: which (as fables vse to be) were doubtlesse in diuers Cities diuers. Augustine quest. 12. in Iudg. thinks Baal and Astarte to be Iupiter and Iuno. For the Carthaginians (which were Tyrians) call Iuno by such a name as Astarte. Tullie, lib. 3. de Nat. Deorum, making diuers Goddesses of the name of Venus, expounds the fourth to be Astarte: whom hee makes to bee borne of Tyrrus and Syria, and to haue bene the Wife of Adonis: as also Macrobius, 2. Saturn. cap. 21. saies that Adonis was with great eneration commonly worshipped of the Assyrians: and Hierome vpon Ezek. 8. 44. notes that Thammuz (whom there the Idolatrous women are noted to bewaile) is the name of Adonis among the Syrians. So that it may seeme that in the worship of Astarte or Venus, they did bewaile her Husband Adonis: as also the Gracians did in their songs of Adonis: Mourne for Adonis the faire, dead is Adonis the faire. Howbeit others in that place of Ezekiel not without good probability, expound the mourning for Thammuz, to be the mourning for Osiris in the sacrifice of Isis: whose losse of her Husband Osiris, was as famous in the Egyptian Idolatry, as with the Gracians, Venus losse of Adonis. And to this agreeeth that which Plutarch hath, de Iside & Osiride; that Osiris with the Egyptians is called Ammuz: which word may seeme to be the same with Ezekiel's Thammuz. But howsoever these Zidonians were thus anciently fostered with the milke of Idolatry: yet they were more apt to receiue the Doctrine and Gospell of Christ after his Ascension, than the Iewes: who had beene taught by Moses and the Prophets so many yeeres, whereof our Saviour in Mathew and Luke: Woe be to the Corazin, &c. for if the great works which were done in thee, had beene done in Tyrrus and Zidon, they had repented long ago, &c. but I say vnto you, it shall be easier for Tyrrus and Zidon, at the day of iudgement, than for you.

It receiued a Christian Bishop with the first: who was afterward of the Diocesse of Tyre. But in the yeere of our Redemption 636. it fell into the hands of the Saracens: and continued in their possession till Baldwinus the first, then King of Hierusalem: in the yeere 1111. by the helpe of the Danes and Norwaies, who came with a Fleete to visite the holy Land, and tooke Port at Ioppa, it was againe recovered, the commandment thereof being giuen to Eustace Gremer a Noble man of that Countrey. And again in the yeere 1250. it was redified and strengthened by Lodowicke the French King: while he spent foure yeere in the Warre of the holy Land. Lastly, in the yeere 1289. it was reconquered by the Saracens: and is now in possession of the Turke, and hath the name of Zai.

t. III.

Of Sarepta, with a brieue History of Tyre in the same Coast.

Sarepta, or after the Hebrew, Sarphath, is the next City Southward from Zidon, between it and the Riuer called Naar, or Fons hortorum Libani (of which more hereafter) standing in the way towards Tyre, a City very famous for the excellent wine growing neere it: of which Sidonius:

Vina mihi non sunt Gazetica, Chia, Falerna,
Quæq; Sareptano palmitis missa bibas.

I haue no wine of Gaza, nor Falerna wine,
Nor any for thy drinking of Sarepta's vine.

This City had also a Bishop of the Diocesse of Tyre: after it came to the Saracens and Turkes as the rest: and is now called Saphet, faith Posellus.

Not farre from Sarepta was situate that sometime famous City of Tyre, whose fleets of shippes commanded, and gaue the law ouer all the Mediterran Sea, and the borders thereof: during which time of greatnesse and power, the Tyrians erected Tica, Leptis, and Carthage in Africa, of which Virgil. Vrbs antiqua fuit, Tyrij tenuere Coloni, Carthago. And Virgil: l. 1. Carthage was therefore called Punica quasi Phœnicum, a Colonie of the Phœnicians. In 50 Spain they founded Gades, now Cadiz. In Italie, Nola: in Asia the lesse, Dromos A- phellus, which City the Scholiast of Apollonius placeth neere the Riuer Phyllis, in Bi- thynia.

It had anciently the name of Zor, or Tzor: and so it is written in Iosua the 19. taking name from the situation, because built on a high Rocke, sharpe at one end. The Latines, as it seems, knew it by the name of Sarra; for Virgil calleth the purple of Tyre, Ostrum Sarvanum, by which name Iuuenal and Silius remember it. The Zidonians built it vpon a high Hill, whereof many ruines remaine to this day; the place being still knowne by the name of the ancient Tyre: and because it was a Colonie of the Zidonians, the Prophet Esay

The forme of

Astareth (or A-roth) in their Idolatries they acknowledged: as it appears by the plural names of *Baal*and Astareth, 1. Sam. 12. 10. and elsewhere: for euen the name Astareth, as I am infor-med by a skillfull Hebriitian, is plural: the singular being Astareth: whence Iud. 2. 13. the*Septuagint* reads They worshipped the Astarties. The occasion of this theirmultiplying of their Baals, and Astareths, may be diuerly understood: either in respect of the diuersitie of the formes of the Images, or of the worship in diuers places, or of the stories depending vpon them: which (as fables vse to be) were doubtlesse in diuers Cities diuers. Augustine quest. 19. in Iudg. thinks Baal and Astaret to be Iupiter and Iuno. Forthe Carthaginians (which were Tyrians) call Iuno by such a name as Astaret. Tullie, lib.

Q. Curtius make Agenor the founder thereof: and Iustine deriues the name from the abundance of fish found on those shores: whereof it hath beene called Zidona. But that it was farre more ancient, Moses, Iosua, and Iosephus witnesse, the same being founded by Zidon the eldest of Canaan's Sonnes: and so strong it was in Iosua's time, as neither did himselfe attempt it, neither could the Asserites, or any of their successors master it: but it continued all the time of the Iudges and Kings, euen vnto the comming of Christ, a Citie interchangeably gouerned, by their owne Princes or other Magistrates: though according to the warnings and threats of the Prophets Esay, Hieremie, Ezechiel, and Zacharie, it was often afflicted both by the enemies sword, and by the pestilence.

Zidon is seated on the very wash of the Phœnician Sea, which is a part of the Medierran or Mid-land Sea. It hath to the North the Citie of Berythus, and the Riuer Leontis: and to the South Sarepta, or Sarphat: which standeth betwene it and Tyre, the distance betwene which two great and famous cities, to wit, Zidon and Tyre, is 14. thousand paces, faith Seiglerus: but Vadianus makes it two hundred furlongs, and so doth Weisfinburie in his description of the holy Land, and both from Strabo: which two hundred furlongs make five and twentie miles. This difference of distance as well betwene these two known Cities, as all the rest, make it ouer-difficult to deuise any new scale to the Mappes and description of the holy Land.

What Kings it had till Agenor's time there is no memorie: The story which Zeno the Philosopher, who was a Zidonian, wrote thereof, being by time consumed and lost. It seemeth to bee more ancient then Tyre; which was also built by the Zidonians. For as Strabo noteth, Homer speaking of Zidon, neglecteth the memorie of Tyre, because it was but a member of Zidon, and a Citie subiect to the Kings thereof: though it be true that in after-times it contended with Zidon for Primacie, and became farre more renowned, opulent, and strong: From Zidon had Salomon and Zorobabel their principall workemen, both in Timber and Stone, for the building of the Temple. For as it flourished in all sorts of learning, so did it in all other Mechanicall Arts or Trades: the Prophet Zacharie calling them the wife Zidonians. The Citie was both by Nature & Art exceeding strong, hauing a Castle or Citadell on the North-side, standing vpon an vnacceffible Rocke, and compassed by the Sea, which after the Citizens became Christians, was held and defended by the Knights of the Dutch Order: and another Castle: hath on the South side by the Port of Egypt, which the Templers guarded. It also sent many other Colonies beside that of Tyre, into places remote: as vnto Thebes, and Sephya, Cities of Bœotia in Greece.

Strabo and Plinie giue the Zidonians the inuention of * Glasse, which they vied to make of those sands which are taken out of the Riuer Belus, falling into the Mediterran Sea, neere Ptolomais or Acon: and from whence the Venetians fetch the matter of those cleere Glasses which they make at Murana: of which S. Hierome and Plinie: Zidon insignis artifex vitri: Zidon vitrarj's officinis Nobilis; Zidon a famous Glassemaker, or a skillfull worker in Glasse-houses.

They were in Religion Idolaters (as the rest of the Canaanites) worshippers of Baal and Astareth: which Idols though common to the other of the issue of Canaan as Pineda gathers out of 1. Sam. 31. 10. and Iud. 10. 6. ) yet especially and peculiarly were accounted the Gods of the Zidonians: as appears 1. Kings 11. 5. in the storie of Salomon's Idolatrie: where Astareth is called the God of the Zidonians: and 1. Reg. 16. 33. in the story of Ahab, the chiefe worshipper of Baal, where it is said that hee marrying Iezabel the Daughter of the King of the Zidonians, worshipped their Baal, Diuers Baals & diuers Astareths. The forme of Astareth (or Aroth) in their Idolatries they acknowledged: as it appears by the plural names of Baal and Astareth, 1. Sam. 12. 10. and elsewhere: for euen the name Astareth, as I am informed by a skillfull Hebriitian, is plural: the singular being Astareth: whence Iud. 2. 13. the Septuagint reads They worshipped the Astarties. The occasion of this their multiplying of their Baals, and Astareths, may be diuerly understood: either in respect of the diuersitie of the formes of the Images, or of the worship in diuers places, or of the stories depending vpon them: which (as fables vse to be) were doubtlesse in diuers Cities diuers. Augustine quest. 19. in Iudg. thinks Baal and Astaret to be Iupiter and Iuno. For the Carthaginians (which were Tyrians) call Iuno by such a name as Astaret. Tullie, lib. 3. de Nat. Deorum, making diuers Goddesses of the name of Venus, expounds the fourth to bee Astaret: whom hee makes to bee borne of Tyrrus and Syria, and to haue bene the Wife of Adonis: as also Macrobius, 2. Saturn. cap. 21. saies that Adonis was with great eneration commonly worshipped of the Assyrians: and Hierome vpon Ezek. 8. 44. notes that Thammuz (whom there the Idolatrous women are noted to bewaile) is the name of Adonis among the Syrians. So that it may seeme that in the worship of Astarte or Venus, they did bewaile her Husband Adonis: as also the Græcians did in their songs of Adonis: Mourne for Adonis the faire, dead is Adonis the faire. Howbeit others in that place of Ezekiel not without good probability, expound the mourning for Thammuz, to be the mourning for Osiris in the sacrifice of Isis: whose losse of her Husband Osiris, was as famous in the Egyptian Idolatry, as with the Græcians, Venus losse of Adonis. And to this agreeeth that which Plutarch hath, de Iside & Osiride; that Osiris with the Egyptians is called Ammuz: which word may seeme to be the same with Ezekiels Thammuz. But howsoever these Zidonians were thus anciently fostered with the milke of Idolatry: yet they were more apt to receiue the Doctrine and Gospell of Christ after his Ascension, than the Iewes: who had beene taught by Moses and the Prophets so many yeeres, whereof our Saviour in Mathew and Luke: Woe be to the Corazim, &c. for if the great workes which were done in thee, had beene done in Tyrrus and Zidon, they had repented long agoe, &c. but I say vnto you, it shall be easier for Tyrrus and Zidon, at the day of iudgement, than for you.

It receiued a Christian Bishop with the first: who was afterward of the Diocesse of Tyre. But in the yeere of our Redemption 636. it fell into the hands of the Saracens: and continued in their possession till Baldwinus the first, then King of Hierusalem: in the yeere 1111. by the helpe of the Danes and Norwaies, who came with a Fleete to visite the holy Land, and tooke Port at Ioppa, it was againe recovered, the commandment thereof being giuen to Eustace Gremer a Noble man of that Countrey. And again in the yeere 1250. it was redified and strengthened by Lodowicke the French King: while he spent foure yeere in the Warre of the holy Land. Lastly, in the yeere 1289. it was reconquered by the Saracens: and is now in possession of the Turke, and hath the name of Zai.

Of Sarepta, with a brieffe History of Tyre in the same Coast.

Sarepta, or after the Hebrew, Sarphath, is the next City Southward from Zidon, between it and the Riuer called Naar, or Fons hortorum Libani (of which more hereafter) standing in the way towards Tyre, a City very famous for the excellent wine growing neere it: of which Sidonius:

Vina mihi non sunt Gazetica, Chia, Falerna,
Quæq; Sareptano palmite missa bibas.

I haue no wine of Gaza, nor Falerna wine,
Nor any for thy drinking of Sarepta's vine.

This City had also a Bishop of the Diocesse of Tyre: after it came to the Saracens and Turkes, as the rest: and is now called Saphet, faith Postellus.

Not farre from Sarepta was situate that sometime famous City of Tyre, whose fleets of shippes commanded, and gaue the law ouer all the Mediterran Sea, and the borders thereof: during which time of greatnesse and power, the Tyrians erected Vtica, Leptis, and Carthage in Africa, of which Virgil. Vrbs antiqua fuit, Tyrj tenuere Coloni, Carthago. And Carthage was therefore called Punica quasi Phœnicum, a Colonie of the Phœnicians. In 30 Spain they founded Gades, now Caliz. In Italie, Nola: in Asia the lesse, Dromos A- thilis, which City the Scholias of Apollonius placeth neere the Riuer Phyllis, in By- thynia.

It had anciently the name of Zor, or Tzor: and so it is written in Iosua the 19. taking name from the situation, because built on a high Rocke, sharpe at one end. The Latines, as it seems, knew it by the name of Sarra; for Virgil calleth the purple of Tyre, Oftrum Sarra- vum, by which name Iuuenal and Silius remember it. The Zidonians built it vpon a high Hill, whereof many ruines remaine to this day; the place being still knowne by the name of the ancient Tyre: and because it was a Colonie of the Zidonians, the Prophet

Cap: 23. Esay calleth it the Daughter of Zidon; which Trogus also confirmeth, though Berosus by affinity of name makes Thiras the sonne of Iaphet to be the Parent thereof: and though no doubt it was very ancient (for so much the Prophet Esay also witnesseth, Is not this your glorious City, whose antiquity is of ancient dayes?) yet, that Thiras the sonne of Iaphet set himselfe in the bosome of the Canaanites who built Zidon, and peopled all that Region: I see nothing to perswade me.

But that new Tyre in after-times so renowned, seemeth to be the worke of Agenor: and of this opinion was Curtius: and Iosephus, and Eusebius make this City elder than Solomons Temple 240. yeeres: Cedrenus 361. who also addeth that Tyrus the wife of Agenor gaue it her name: but of Agenor I will speake more at large in the story of their 10 Kings.

For strength and for the commodity of the harbour, and the better to receive Trade from all places, it was in this new erection founded in an Iland, 700. paces from the continent: and therefore Ezekiel placeth it in the midst of the Sea, as some reade, or as others in the inner-most part of the Sea, whence hee calleth it situate at the entry of the Sea, as also the same Prophet calleth it the Mart of the people for many Iles: and Esay a Mart of the Nations: and so Proude, Wealthy, and Magnificent was this City, as the Prophet Esay calleth the Merchants thereof Princes, and their Chapmen the Nobles of the World.

It excelled both in learning, and in manu-facture: especially in the making and dying 20 of Purple, and Scarlet-cloth: which, saith Iulius Pollux, was first found out by Hercules Dogge, who passing along the Sea-coast, and eating of the Fish Conchilis or Purpura: the haire of his lippes became of that colour. It worshipped the same Idols that Zidon did: sauing that Hercules became their Patron in after-times. For Alexander Macedon, when the Tyrians presented him with a Crowne of gold, and other gifts, desiring to remaine his friends and allies, answered them, that he had vowed a sacrifice to Hercules, the Defender of their City, and the Ancestor of the Macedonians Kings: and must therefore enter it. Whereupon they sent him word, that Hercules his Temple was in the Mountaine of old Tyre: where he might performe that ceremony: but this auailed not. For Alexander was not so superstitious, as ambitious; he desired to enter the Towne, which being denied, he 30 as one whom no perill could feare, nor labour weary, gathered together as many ships as he could, and brought from Libanus so great a number of Cedars, and so many weighty stones, from the old City of Tyre adioyning, as notwithstanding that his materials were often washt away with the strength of the Sea and the Tides, yet he neuer rested, till hee had made a foote passage from the Continent to the Iland: and hauing once approached their Walles, he ouer-toppt them with Turrets of wood, and other frames: from whence (hauing filled the body of force with the violent mouing Spirit of resolution) he became Lord thereof, putting all to the Sword that resisted; after which he caused 2000. more to be hung vp in a ranke all alongst the Sea-shore: which execution vpon cold blood he performed (as some Authours affirme) vpon the issues of those slaues which had formerly slaine all their Masters, taking their Wiues, Children, Riches, and power of Gouernement to themselves. This victory of Alexander ouer the Tyrians, Iosephus remembreth: 40 and how Sanaballat reuolted from Darius, and came to Alexander with 8000. Souldiers: who was the last Satrapa or Prouinciall Gouernour, which Darius seated in Samaria: the same who hauing married his Daughter to Manasse, brother to Iaddus the high Priest of Hierusalem, obtained of Alexander that a Temple might be built on the Mountaine Gabrisim ouer Samaria: that the forces of the Jewes being diuided, Alexander might the better hold them in obedience. The honour of which Priesthood he bestowed on his son in law Manasse, whom the Jewes oppugned, for that he had married out of their Tribes, and with a Gentile: but while Alexander besieged Gaza, Sanaballat, whom Guil. Tyrius 50 calleth Sanaballat, died.

Long before this desolation of Tyre by the cruelty of Alexander, it was attempted by Salmanasser the Assyrian King: when the growing pride of the Assyrians, after that they had conquered the ten Tribes, with the rest of Syria, became enuious of the beauties, riches, and power of that City. He besieged it both on the Land-side, and with three score shippes of Warre held the Port: to the end that neither any victuals nor any supply of men might enter it: but the Tyrians with twelue saile scattered that fleet, and rooke 500. prisoners of the Assyrians: notwithstanding, the Assyrian continued his resolution, and lay before before it by his Lieutenants five yeeres, but with ill successe. And this siege Menander Ephesus, cited by Iosephus, made report of in his Chronicles, as hee found the Story among the Annals of the Tyrians (which the saide Menander conuerted into Greeke) adding, that Eluleus, whom Tyrius calleth Helisaeus, was then King of Tyre, hauing gouerned the same fixe and twenty yeeres. Soone after this repulse of Salmanassar, and about 200. yeeres before the victory of Alexander, Nabuchodonosor at such time as he destroyed Hierusalem with the Temple, came before this City: who indeede gaue to Alexander the example of that despairfull worke, of ioyning it to the Continent. For Nabuchodonosor had formerly done it: though by the diligence of the Citizens, and the strength of the Sea, the 10 same cawsey and passage was againe broken downe, and demolished.

Against Nabuchodonosor, for many yeeres, the Tyrians defended themselves: for so long did these Babylonians continue before it, As euery head was made bald, and euery shoulder made bare, saith Ezekiel, who with the Prophet Esay had manifestly foretold the destruction of this proude place. In the end and after thirteene yeeres siege or more, the Tyrians depouled of all their hopes, and remembring ouer-late the predictions and threatenings of Gods Prophets, hauing prepared a conuenient number of shippes, abandoned their City, transporting with themselves the ablest of all that remained: and with their wiues, children, and portable riches sayled thence into Cyprus, Carthage, and other Maritime Cities of their Tributaries, or Confederates: so as the Babylonians finding nothing 20 therein, either to satisfie so many labours and perils, or any person vpon whom to auenge themselves for the losse of so many bodies in that Warre: It pleased God in recompence thereof (who strengthened this resolution, as in a worke of his owne) to make Nabuchodonosor victorious ouer the Egyptians: and gaue him that Kingdome and the spoile thereof, as it were in wages for his Army. Whereupon Saint Hierome noteth, that God lea- 30 ueth not the good deeds of the Heathen unrewarded: who though they cannot hope by any laudable worldly action, to attaine vnto that eternall happinesse reserved for his Ser-uants and Saints: yet such is the boundlesse goodnesse of God, as he often repayeth them with many worldly gifts and temporall blessings.

Now of this enterprise of Nabuchodonosor against Tyre, prophane Historians haue 30 not bene silent. For both Diocles, and Philostratus (as Iosephus citeth them) the one in his second Booke, the other in his Phenician Histories remember it.

After these two great Vassations by the Kings of Babylon and Macedon: this City of Tyre repaired and recovered it selfe againe: and continued in great glory about 300 yeeres, 40 cuento the coming of our Sauour Christ: and after him flourished in the Christian Faith neere 600. yeeres: the Archbishop whereof gaue place to none but to the Patriarke of Hierusalem onely, who within his owne Diocesse and foureteene great Cities, with their Bishops and Suffragans: namely Caipha, otherwise Porphiria, Acon, or Ptolomais, Sarepta, Zidon, Casarea, Philippi, Berytus, Byblus, Botrys, Tripolis, Orthofia, Archis, Aradus, Antaradus (or Toriosa) and Maraclea. But in the yeere 636. it was with the rest of that beautifull Region of Phenicia and Palestina, subiected to the cruell and faithlesse Saracens. Vnder the burthen and yoke of whose tyranny it suffered with the other Palestine Cities 488. yeeres.

In the yeere 1112. it was attempted by Baldwine King of Hierusalem; but in vaine: yet in the yeere 1124. by Guaremonde, Patriarke of Hierusalem, Viceregent to Baldwine the second, with the assistance of the Venetians, and their fleet of Gallies, it was againe recovered, and subiected to the Kings of Hierusalem, and so it remained 165. yeeres.

Finally, in the yeere 1189. Saladine hauing first taken Hierusalem, removed his whole Army and fate downe before Tyre: drawing his fleet of shippes and Gallies from Alexandria into the Port, this City as then onely remaining in the Christian power.

The Citizens finding themselves reduced into great famine, and many other miseries, they at once with certaine rafters of timber, fiered, burnt, and brake the Saracens fleet, and falling out resolutely vpon his armie, slew so great numbers of them, and followed their victory with such fury, as that the Saracens forsaking their Trenches and Tents, removed in great disorder and dishonour. Two yeeres after which victory the body of that famous Fredericke Barbarossa (who by the lamentable accident of following the Christians enemies ouer a Riuer vnfoordable, perished by the weight of his armour therein) was brought and interred in the Cathedral Church of Tyre, neere vnto that glorious Sepulchre of Origen, garnished and grauen with guilt pillars of Marble; 940. yeeres before

Of Ptolomais or Acon.

The third City alongst the coast of the Sea, which the Asserites could not obtaine, on the South bound of Affer was Acho, which was the ancient name thereof after Hierome, though other good Authours affirme that it tooke name from Acon the brother of Ptolomy. Plinie calleth it Ace: and otherwise the Colonie of Claudius. It had also the name of Coth, or Cod, and by Zeiglerus it is called Hactipos.

But lastly, it was intituled Ptolomais after the name of one of the Egyptian Ptolomies: which City also as it is, 1 Mac. 11. another of the Ptolomies, infideliouly wrested from his sonne in law Alexander, which called himselfe the sonne of Antiochus Epiphanes: the same Alexander hauing married Cleopatra daughter of the faide Ptolome not long before. Therein also was Ionathan Macchabees treacherously surprized and slaine, as it is 1 Mac. 12. 48. by the perfidioufnesse of Tryphon, whom soone after Antiochus pursued, as it is in the Story ensuing: and by like reason about the same time was the aforesaide Alexander in the warre against Demetrius, one of the sonnes of Antiochus the great with whom Ptolome ioyned, ouerthrowne & treacherously murdered by Zabdiel the Arabian: to whom he fled for succour: and his head presented vnto his father in law Ptolome: who enioyed not the glory of his victory and treason about three dayes, for God stricke him by death.

For the beauty and strength of this City, this Alexander made it his regall seate; two parts of the same being inuironed by the Sea, and the Port for safety and capacity not inferior to any other in all that Tract. This City is distant from Hierusalem some foure and thirty miles: foure miles to the North from the Mountaine Carmel, and as much to the South from Castrum Lamberti: from Tyre, Antonius maketh it two and thirty Italian miles. In the middest of the City there was a Tower of great strength, sometime the Temple of Belzeubub: and therefore called the Castle of Flics, on the top whereof there was maintained a perpetuall light, like vnto that called pharus in Egypt: to giue comfort in the night to those shippes, which came neere and sought that part. It had in it a Bishops seate, of the Diocese of Tyre, after it became Christian: but in the yeere 636. (a fatall yeere to the Christians in those parts) it was forced and taken by Haomar the Saracen. In the yeere 1104. it was regained by Baldwine the first, by the helpe of the Gallies of Genoa: to whom a third of the reueneue was giuen in recompence. Againe, in the yeere of our Lord God, one thousand one hundred fourescore and seuen, Saladine King of Egypt and Syria, became Lord thereof. In the yeere of Christ, one thousand one hundred ninety and one, by Richard King of England, and Philip King of France, it was repossessed and redeliuered to the Christians. Lastly, in the yeere 1291. it was by the fury of the Saracens besieged with an Army of 150000. entred, sackt, and vtterly demolished: though in some fort afterward reedified, and it is now Turkish.

Of the Castle of Saint George.

Five miles from Ptolomais towards the East, is the Castle of Saint George seated, in which he was borne: the Valley adioyning bearing the same name. And though for the credit of Saint Georges killing the Dragon, I leaue euery man to his owne beliefe: yet I cannot but thinke, that if the Kings of England had not some probable record of that his memorable act, among many others: it was strange that the Order full of Honour, which Edward the third founded, and which his Successours royally haue continued, should haue borne his name, seeing the World had not that scarcity of Saints in those dayes, as that the English were driuen to make such an erection vpon a fable, or person fained. The place is described by Adrichomius in his description of Affer, to haue bene in the fields of Libanus: betweene the Riuer Adonis, and Zidon: his owne wordes are these:

these: *Hoc loco qui ab incolis Cappadocia appellatur, non longè à Beryto, memorant inelyum Christi Militem D. Georgium, Regis filiam ab immanissimo Dracone asseruisse: eamq; mactata bestia parente restituisse. In cuius rei memoriam Ecclesia postmodum fuit edificata; In this place, which by the Inhabitants is called Cappadocia, not farre from Berytus, men say that the famous Knight of Christ Saint George, did rescue the Kings Daughter from a huge Dragon: and hauing killed the beast, deliuered the Virgin to her Parent. In memory of which deede a Church was after built there: Thus farre Adrichomius. His Authours he citeth Lodonicus Roman. Patric. Nauigationum l. 1. c. 3. and Bridenbach Itin. 5. The Valley vnder this Castle sometime called Affer, was afterward called the Valley of Saint George. If this authority suffice not, we may rather make the Story allegorically, figuring the victory of Christ, than accept of Georgethe Arrian Bishop, mentioned by Am. Marcellinus.*

†. VI.

Of Acziba, Sandalium, and others.

Betweene Ptolomais and Tyre alongst the Sea coast, was the strong City of Acziba, or Achazib, which Saint Hierome calleth Achziph, and Iosephus Ecaippos, Plinie Ecaippa, one of those which defended it selfe against the Asserites. Belforrest findes Acziba and Sandalium, or the Castle of Alexander to be one, but I know not whence he had it.

The twelue searchers of the Land which Moses sent from Cadesbarne, trauailed as farre to the North as Reob, or Rechob, in the Tribe of Affer, which Rechob, as also Berothe which by Ezekiel cap. 47. verse 16. is placed in these North borders, belonged in Dauids time to the King Hadarhexer, as it may be gathered out of the second of Samuel the 8. chap. and 8. verse, and chap. 10. verse 6. and it defended it selfe against the Asserites, as Zidon, Tyre, Achzaph, Ptolomais, Alab, Helbah, and Aphek did.

This Aphek it was, whose wall falling downe, slew seuen and twenty thousand of Benhadads Souldiers, after that a hundred thousand had bene slaughtered by the Israelites, vnder the conduct of Abah. Here Iunius finds that the Philistims encamped a litle before the battaile at Gilboa, though in his note vpon the first of Samuel, the 9. and 11. he takes Aphek there mentioned (at which battaile the Arke was taken) to haue bene in Iuda. Of which Ios. 15. and 53. and in the second of Kings 13. 17. he reades, Fortiter, for in Aphek. Where others conuert it, Percutens Syros in Aphek.

The next place alongst the coast is Sandalium, first called Schandalium of Schander, which we call Alexander, for Alexander Macedon built it, when he besieged Tyre: and set it on a point of Land which extendeth it selfe into the Sea, betweene Acziba and Tyre: which Castle Baldwine the first rebuilt and fortified, in the yeere of Christ 1157. when he vndertooke the recovery of Tyre.

Not much about a mile from this Castle, there ariseth that most plentiful Spring of water, which Salomon remembreth, called the Well of living Waters: from whence not only all the fields and plaines about Tyre are made fruitful by large pipes hence drawne: but the same Spring, which hath not about a bow-shot of ground to trauaile till it recover the Sea, driueth sixe great Milles in that short passage, saith Brochard.

Within the Land, and to the East of Acziba, and Sandalium, standeth Hofa: and beyond it, vnder the Mountaines of Tyre, the City of Achzaph, or Axab, or after Saint Hierome Aisaph: a City of great strength, whose King amongst the rest was slaine by Iosua, at the waters of Merom.

†. VII.

Of Thoron, Giscala, and some other places.

Farther into the Land towards Iordan, was seated the Castle of Thoron, which Hugo de Sancho Abdemare built on the Eastermost Hillies of Tyre, in the yeere 1107. thereby to restrain the excursions of the Saracens, while they held Tyre against the Christians: the place adioyning being very fruitful, and exceeding pleasant. From this Castle the Lords of Thoron, famous in the Story of the Warres for the recovery of the Holy Land, deriue their names, and take their Nobility. It had in it a curious Chappell, dedicated to the blessed Virgin, in which Humfrey of Thoron, Constable to Baldwine the third, King of Hierusalem, lyeth buried: There were five Castles besides this within the Territory of Affer: wherewhereof foure are seated almost of equall distance from each other: to wit, Castrum Lampertis, Montfort, Indin (or Saron) Castrum Regium, and Belfort: The first neere the Sea vnder the Hilles of Saron: the next three, to wit, Indin, Montfort, and Regium, stand more within the Land, and belonged to the Brotherhood and Fellowship of the Teutonicis, or Dutch Knights (by which they defended themselves, and gaue succour to other Christians at such time as the Saracens posselt the best part of the vpper Galilee) the chiefe of which Order was in Prothomais Acon. The first Fortresse was for beauty and strength called Belfort, seated in the high ground vpon the Riuer Naar, neere the City Rama: of which in this Tribe Ios. 19. 29. for which the Vulgar reads Horma: making the article a part of the word, and mistaking the vowels: from the siege of this Castle of Belfort, the great Saladine King of Syria and Egypt, was by the Christians Army raised, and with great losse and dishonour repulld.

To the East of Belfort, is the strong City of Alab (or Achlab) which Saint Hierome calleth Chalab, one of those that defended themselves against Affer, as Roob (or Rechob) nor farre thence did.

Towards the South from Roob they place Gabala (which Herod, surnamed the Ascalonite rebuilt) making it of the Territory of Chabul, Quod Syrorum lingua dispicere significat (saith Weissenburg) so called, because Hiram of Tyre was ill pleased with those twenty Cities, seated hereabout, which Salomon presented vnto him in recompence of those provisions sent him for the building of the Temple. Others thinke this Chabul or Cabul, containing a circuit of those twenty Cities giuen to Hiram, to haue bene without the compassse of the holy Land: though bordering Affer on the North-side: as it is saide, 1 Reg. 9. 11. that they were in Regione limitis: that is, in limite Regionis, in the border of the Country: for it was not lawfull, say they, to giue to strangers any part of the possessions allotted to the Israelites: howsoeuer, that after Hiram had refused them, they were peopled by the Israelites, it appears 2 Chron. 8. 14. And it seemes they were conquered by Dauid from the Syri Rechobea, whose City Roob, or Rechob, was in these parts.

Almost of equall distance from the Castle of Thoron, they place the Cities of Giscala, and Gadara: of which Gadara is rather to be placed ouer Jordan: Giscala was made famous by Iohn the sonne of Leui, who from a meane estate gathering together foure hundred<sup>30</sup> Theeues, greatly troubled all the vpper Galilee: at such time as the Romans attempted the conquest of Iudea: by whose practise Iosephus, who then commanded in the vpper Galilee, was greatly endangered: whereof himselfe hath written at large, in his second Booke of those Warres. This Iohn betraying in all he could the City of Giscala (whereof he was native) to the Roman State: and finding a resistance in the City, gaue opportunity, during the contention, to the Tyrians and Gadarims, to surprize it: who at the same time forst it, and burnt it to the ground: but being by Iosephus authority rebuilt, it was afterward redred to Titus by composition. They find also the Cities of Cana Maior, and * Cades, (or Cedessa) of the first was that Syro-phenician, whose Daughter Christ deliuered of the euill Spirit. Neere the other, they say, it was that Ionathas Machabeus ouerthrew the Army<sup>40</sup>

There are besides these forenamed Cities within the Tribe of Affer, diuers others: as on the South border, and neere the Sea, Messallor or Misheal: within the Land * Belara, Bethdagom, and Bethmec, standing on the South border betweene Affer and Zabulon: on the North side ioyning to Syro-phenicia, is the City of Bethalon, or Chethlon, the vmoist of the holy Land that way: vnder which towards the Sea is Chali, and then * Enoch supposed to be built by Cain, and named of his sonne Enoch, but without probability, as I haue formerly proued: there are others also besides these, as Ammon or Chammon, of which Ios. 19. 28. where also we read of Nehiel, Rama, Alamelec, and Beton: the Cities of Alcath, or Chelcath, Haddon, and Rechob, and Misheal, which wee haue already mentioned, were by the Afferites giuen to the Leuites. Of others held by the Canaanites, mention is made, Iudges 1. 30. to which out of Iosua wee may adde Ebron, Amhad, and others, on which no story dependeth; and therefore I will not pester the description with them.

†. VIII.

Of the Riuers and Mountaines of Affer.

THE Riuers to the North of Affer, are Adonis, afterward Canis, to which Ziegler ioyneth Lycus, Prothomie, Leontis: both which fall into the Sea neere Berytus: which Riuer of Leontis, Montanus drawes neere vnto Zidon: finding his head notwithstanding, where Prothomie doth, betweene Zidon and Tyre. It hath also a Riuer called fons hortorum Li. Affe. Tab. 4. bani, which Adrichome out of Brochard intituleth Eleutherus: for which hee also citeth Plinie, and the first of Machabees the 11. Chapter, but neither of those authorities proue Eleutherus to be in Affer: for this Riuer falleth into the Sea at the Ile of Aradus: not farre from Balanea, witnesseth Prothomie: and therefore Pmetus calleth it Valania, and Posfellus Ve-lana: which Riuer boundeth Phenicia on the North-side: to which Strabo also agreeth: as Tripolis. but this principall Riuer of Affer, Arias Montanus calleth Gabatus. Christians Schrot out of the mouth and Papers of Peter Laistlan (which Laistlan in this our age both viewed and describ'd the Holy Land) calleth the maine Riuer Fons hortorum Libani: and one of the fireames which runneth into it from the North-side, Naar, and another from the South-west, Chabul: of the City adioyning of the same name: for Eleutherus it cannot be. There is also another Riuer described by Adrichome, named Iepthael, which I finde in no other Authour, and for which hee citeth the nineteenth of Iosua, but the word * Ghe which is added there to Iepthael, is not taken for a Riuer, but for a Valley: and for a Valley the Vulgar, the Genea, and Arias Montanus turne it. There is also found in Affer, the Riuer of Belus, remembered by Iosephus and Tacitus, which is also called Pagidas, saith * Plinie: out of the sands of this Riuer are made the best Glasse, which sometime the Zidonians practised: and now the Venetians at Murana. Arias Montanus makes Belus to be a branch of Chedunim, which it cannot be: for Belus is knowne to flow from out the Lake Cendena, as all Cosmographers both Ancient and Moderne, and the later Trauailers into those parts witness. It is true that the Riuer of Chifon taketh water from Chedunim: but not in that fashion which Montanus hath described it: neither doth it find the Sea at Prothomais Acon, according to Montanus: but farther to the South betweene Caiphas and Sicaminum, witnesseth Ziegler, Adrichomius, and Schrot.

Besides these Riuers there are diuers famous Springs and Fountaines, as that of liuing waters adioyning to Tyre: and * Maserephot, or after Saint Hierome, Maserephotraim, whose Well filled by the flood of the Sea adioyning, (they say) the Inhabitants by seeing the water make salt thereof, as at Nantwich.

The Mountaines which bound Affer on the North, are those of Anti-libanus, which with Libanus bound Caelesyria: two great ledges of Hilles, which from the Sea of Phenicia and Syria, extend themselves farre into the Land East-ward: foure hundred stadia or furlongs, according to Strabo: for that length hee giueth to the Valley of Caelesyria: which those Mountaines inclose: but Plinie giues them 1500 furlongs in length from the West (where they begin at Theipsophon, or Desfacies, neere Tripolis) to the Mountaines of Arabia beyond Damascus: where Anti-libanus turneth towards the South. These ledges where they begin to part Traconitis and Basan, from the Desert Arabia, are called Herman: which Moses also nameth Sion, the Phenicians Syrion, and the Amorites Sanir, neither is this any one Mountain apart, but a continuation of Hilles: which running farther Southerly, is in the Scriptures called Galaad or Gilead: the same being still a part of Libanus, as the Prophet Hieremy proueth: Galaad tu mihi caput Libani: noting that this Galaad is the highest of those Hilles of Libanus. Strabo knowes them by the name of Traconitis: and Prothomie by Hippus. Arias Montanus calleth these Mountaines bordering Affer, Libanus, for Anti-libanus, contrary to all other Cosmographers, but hee giueth no reason of his opinion.

They take the name of Libanus from their white tops, because according to Tacitus, the highest of them are covered with Snow all the Summer, the Hebrew word Libanos (saith Weissenburg) signifieth whitenesse. Others call them by that name of the French which those Trees yeeld: because Libanus is also the Greeke word for that Gumme.

Niger out of Aphrodisius affirmeth, that on Libanus, there falleth a kinde of hony dew, which is by the Sunne congealed into hard sugar, which the Inhabitants call Sacchar, from whence came the Latine word Saccarum.

nothing remained with that Emperour, but the memory of his impiety: so in Saint Hieromes time the Citizens remembred their former Panas, and so recalled it, with the Territory adioyning by the ancient name. Of this City was that woman whom Christ healed of a bloody issue, by touching the hemme of his Garment with a constant Faith: who afterward, as shee was a woman of great wealth and ability, being mindfull of Gods goodnesse, and no lesse gratefull for the same, as Eusebius and Nicephorus report, caused two Statues to be cast in pure Copper: the one representing Christ, as neere as it could be moulded: the other made like her selfe, kneeling at his feete, and holding vp her hands towards him. These shee mounted vpon two great Bases or Pedestals of the same Metall, which shee placed by a Fountaine neere her owne House: both which (saith Eusebius) remained in their first perfection, euen to his owne time: which himselfe had seene, who liued in the Reigne of Constantine the Great. But in the yeere after Christ 363. that Monster Julian Apostata, caused that worthy Monument to be cast downe, and defaced: setting vp the like of his owne in the same place: which Image of his was with fire from Heauen broken into fitters: the head, body, and other parts, fundered and scattered, to the great admiration of the people at that time liuing. The truth of this accident is also confirmed by Sozomenus Salaminius, in his fifth booke, and twentieth Chapter.

This City built by the Danites, was neere the ioyning together of those two Riuers which arising from the springs of Ior and Dan, the two apparant Fontaines of Iordan: in a soyle exceeding fruitfull, and pleafant; for, as it is written, Iudges 18. it is a place which doth want nothing that is in the World. In the fields belonging to this City it was that Saint Peter acknowledged Christ to be the Sonne of God: whereupon it was answered, Tu es Petrus, & super hanc Petram, &c. After this City receiued the Christian faith, it was honoured with a Bishops seate: and it ranne the same fortune with the rest, for it was after taken and retaken by the Saracens, and Christians: vnder Fulch the fourth King of Ierusalem, and after the death of Godfry of Bullion, the King of Damascus wrested it from the Christians; and shortly after by them againe it was recouered. Lastly, now it remaineth with all that part of the World subiect to the Turke.

†. IIII.

Of Capernaum, and the Cities of Decapolis.

AMong the remarkable Cities within this Tribe, Capharnaum is not the least: so often remembered by the Evangelists. This City had the honour of Christs presence three yeeres: who for that time was a Citizen thereof, in which he first preached and taught the Doctrine of our salvation: according to that notable Prophecy of Esa 9. The people that walked in darknesse, have seene a great light: they that dwell in the Land of the shadow of death, upon them hath the light shined.

Capharnaum was leated on Iordan, euen where it entrencheth into the Sea of Galilee: in an excellent and rich soyle: of whose destruction Christ himselfe prophecied in these words. And thou Caphernaum which art lifted up vnto heauen, shalt be brought downe to Hell, &c. which shewed the pride and greatnesse of that City: for it was one of the principall Cities of Decapolis, and the Metropolis of Galilee. And although there were some marks of this Cities magnificence in Saint Hieromes time, as himselfe confesseth: it being then a reasonable Burge or Towne: yet those that haue since, and long since seene it, as *Brechar*d, Breidenbech, and Salimiac affirme, that it then consisted but of fix poore Fishermans houses.

The Region of ten principall Cities called Decapolitana or Decapolis, is in this description often mentioned, and in Saint Mathew, Marke and Luke, also remembered, but find no agreement among the Cosmographers, what proper limits it had: and so Plinie himselfe confesseth, for Marius Niger speaking from others, bounds it on the North by the mountain Casius in Casotis: and endeth it to the South at Egypt and Arabia, by which description it embraceth Phoenicia, a part of Celestjria, all Palestina, and Iudea.

Plinie also makes it large, and for theren Cities of which it taketh name, hee numbren four of them to be situated towards Arabia: to wit, first these three, Damascus, Opus, Raphana, then Philadelphia. ( which was first called Amana, faith Stephanus, or as Ighel
Amana rather, because it was the chiefe City of the Ammonites, knowne by the name of Rabbah, before Ptolo. Philadelphia gaue it this later and new name. ) Then Scythopolis

 This Riuer Ortelius takes to be the Riuer Iaboc: which boundeth Gad and Manasseh ouer
Jordan: but he mistaketh it; for Hieromax falleth into the Sea of Galilee, betwene Hippus reason for their opinion. One place of the Euangelist Saint Matthew makes it manifest, that this Region called Decapolis, was all that Tract betwene Zidon, and the Sea of Galilee. For thus it is written: And he departed againe from the coastes of Tyrus and Zidon, and came vnto the Sea of Galilee, through the midst of the coastes of Decapolis: so that it was bounded by Damascus and Libanus on the North: by the Phœnician Sea, betwene Zidon and Ptolomais on the West: by the Hilles of Gelbo and Bethſan on the South: and by the Mountaines Tracones, otherwise Hermion, Sanir; and Galaad, on the East: which is from East to West the whole breadth of the Holy Land: and from the North to the South, neere the same distance which may be each way forty English miles.

Of Hamath.

Bv<sup>t</sup> to looke backe againe towards Libanus, there is seated neere the foote thereof the City of Hammath or Chammath, of which (as they say) the Countrey adioyning taketh name: the same which Iosephus calleth Amathitis, and Amathensis: a Iacobus Zeigler, Ituraea, Ituraea Regio temet borealia tribus Nephtali, per montem Libanum usq; Trachones. The Countrey of Ituraea, saith he, containeth the North parts of the Tribe of Nephtali, along the Mount Libanus to Trachones.
 But herein following Strabo, who calles Trachonitis
Ituraea, he mistakes the seate of this Region : and so doth Mercator. For indeede were Ituraea ( which Hege- sippus calles Perea, and G. Tyrius, Baccar ) the same with Tracônitis, yet Tracônitis it selfe is farre more to the East than Hammath in Nephtalim: for Tracônitis lieth betweene Ca- sarea Philippi, and the Mountaines Trachones : which the Hebrewes call Gilead : and this Hammath or Chammath is seated vnder Casarea, towards the Sea West-ward. And it seemeth that this mistaking grew by confounding Emath or Hamath the great in Celestria, beyond the Mountaines Trachones, which <sup>b</sup> Hierome vpon Amos calles Antiochia, with <sup>50</sup> Hammath or Hamath the lesser in Phœnicia, and Nephtalim, which he calleth Epiphania : for this Hammath, or in our Translation Hamath, (and not that which is commonly called Emath, which 2 Chron. 8. 3. is set farre from the North border of Canaan in Syria Soba) is remem-side of the holy Land, is placed too neere the West coast, to be that Chamath-Tyberia: for in the line which should make the North border which begins at the great Sea, they make Mofer to name neuer a place Eastward along all the breadth of the holy Land, vntill we come to Hermon (for so they expound Mount Hir, Num. 34. 7.) and beyond Hermon Eastward in this North side, they make him to name diuers Townes, first Chamath, then Tyberia, then Ziphron, and lastly, Chastir-henim, a thing most vnilly: seeing Israel had little or nothing Eastward beyond Hermon. Therefore we must needs expound Her to be one of the Hilles neere Sidon, and so those Townes, as they are named to lie in order on the North side of Apher, Nephthalim, and Ma-nasser: and in like manner those in Ezekiel: first, Checlon, then Chamath, and so in order, Beratha, Sibraim, Tyberia, Chastirhenim. c Of which Ios. 19. 35. d Which Rehob, or Rechub, in Iosua 19. 28. is placed in Apher towards Zidon, in the confines of Nephthalim.

which it hath to the West Sea, and the City of Rehob adioyning prouue it: the other Hamath or Emath (being farre remoued and beyond the forenamed mountaines, which inclose all those Lands which Israel euer had possession of) is that Emath, which is also called Iturea, witness<sup>e</sup> Stella and Laicstan; and nor that in Nephthalim, where<sup>e</sup> Ionathas Macchabeus attended the Army of Demetrius, who fled from him, and remoued by

For though Tracomis be comprehended within Iturea (and therefore it is saide to be 20 finimita Galilee Gentium) yet it hath beginning ouer the mountaines Tracomis, and so it stretcheth into the plains of the Territory of Iturea; whence Philip the brother of Herod was Tetrarch or President both of Iturea and Trachonitis: both which are ouer Jordan towards the East. But Chamath in Nephthalim, is on the West side of Jordan towards the Mediterranean Sea.

The Countrey Iturea was so called of Iethur one of the sonnes of Ismael, it is placed in the bounds of Calesyria and Arabia* the Desert.

The people Iturei were valiant and warlike men, and excellent Archers: Of whom Virgil:

Ituraos Taxi torquentur in arcus.

Of Eugh the Ituraans bowes were made.

This City Chamath or Hamath in Nephthalim seemes to haue beene as ancient as the other in Iturea, both built by Amatheus the eleuenth son of Canaan. Whether in the time of David, this, or the other had Tobu for King, it is not certaine; for Hamath or Emath beyond the Mountaines, and Hammath in Nephthalim, were both neighbours to Damascus:
of whose subingation Tobu reioyced, because Hadadser whom the Damascuseni camero helpe, was his enemy. This Tobu fearing the strength and prosperity of David, hearing of his approach towards his Territory, bought his peace with many rich presents, and 40 with many ancient vessels of gold, siluer, and brasse.

But it seemeth that David in such great successe would not haue had peace with Tobu, if he had beene King of any place in Nephthalim, and therefore it is probable that he ruled in Tjoba: which City Salomon after his Fathers death made himselfe Master of, as a part of the lands (* in the larger and conditionall promise) allotted by God to the children of Israel.

But this Hammath of Nephthalim, in the end, and after diuers mutations and changes both of name and fortune, being, as it hath beene saide, possessed by Antiochus Epiphanius, it was called Epiphania.

While Saint Hierome liued, it remained a City well peopled, knowne to the Syrians by the name Amathe, and to the Greekes by Epiphania.

was Zedekias brought prisoner, after his surprize in the fields of Iericho: and deliuered to Nabuchodonosor: who to be auenged of Zedekias infidelity, beyond the proportion of pietie, first caused the Princes his children to be slaine in his presence: and to the end that this miserable spectacle might be the last that euer he should behold in this world, and so the most remembred, he commanded both his eyes presently to be thrust out: and binding him in yron chaines, he was led a slaue to Babylon, in which estate he ended his life.
Of which feldome-exempld calamitie, though not in expresse words, Hieremie the Prophet fore-told him in Hierusalem not long before: But Ezechiel thus directly, speaking in the person of God, I will bring him to Babel to the Land of the Chaldeans, yet shall he not see it, though he shall die therein.

There are besides these before remembred, many other strong Cities in Nephthalim, as that which is called a Cedes: there are two other of the same name, one in b Isachar, another in Iuda, of which Ios. 15. 23. and therefore to distinguish it, it is knowne by the addition of c Nephthalim, as Iudg. 4. It is seated on a high hill, whence Ios. 20. 7. Kedesh in Galilee in monte Nephthali: Iosephus calls it Cedesis, and in Saint Hieronims time it was called Cidissus. Belforest greatly mistakes this Cedes; and confounds it with Cades in the Desart of Pharan.

After the King thereof among other of the Canaanites perished by the hand of Iosua, it was made a Citie of refuge, and giuen to the Leuites. Herein was Barac borne; who o-uerthrow the Armie of the second Iabin of Hazor, at the Mount Tabor. It was sometime possessed by Teglatphalasser, when he wasted all Nephthalim: afterward by the Romans, and numbered for one of the ten Cities of the Decapollitan Region: When it had embraced the Christian faith, it was honoured with a Bishops seate, but in time it fell with the rest into the power of the Saracens and Turkes, and by them it was demolished.

From Cedes some foure Italian miles towards the South-west, standeth Sephet, otherwise Zephet, which was also one of the ten Decapollitan Cities: a place exceeding strong, and for many yeeres the inexpugnable Fortresse of the Christians, and afterward of the Saracens; for from hence they conquered all the neighbour Cities of those Regions, both
In-land and Maritime neere it. Touching Rama of Nephthalim, seated Northward neere 30 Sephet: this is to be noted; that there are c diuers places of this name in Palestine, all situated on Hills: and therefore called Rama (Rama Hebrais excelsum; Ramah with the He-brewes is high.) Also that from this Rama Ios. 19. 36. they read Arama, making the article (which it hath in the Hebrew, as being a name of diuers Towns) to be a part of the word:
whence casting away the aspiration, they read Arama. From Sephet towards the West they place * Bethseles, of which Ios. 19. 38. which defended it selfe against Nephthalim, Iud.
1. 33. but paid them tribute. On the other side of Sephet towards the East was Bethanath, who also kept their Citie from the Nephthalims.

Adioyning to which standeth Caribam<sup>d</sup> or Kiriat-hajim a Citie of the Leuites, not farre from the Mountaine out of which the springs of Gapharnaum arise, called Mons Christi: a 40 place by our Sauour often frequented: as also then when calling his Disciples together, he made choise of twelue, which he called and ordained to be his Apostles or Messengers:
of which place or the acts therein done, there is often mention in the e Euangelists.

Adioyning to these are Magdalen, a place of strength, f and Mesaloth, of which we read that it was forced by Bacchides in the time of the g Macchabees: also (according to Adrichomius) one of the two Berothas of Nephthalim. For Adrichomius maketh two of this name in this Tribe, h one neere Chamath in the North border, of which Ezek. 47. 6. another (vpon a weake coniecture out of Ioseph. ant. l. 5. c. 2.) he therefore placeth in this tract neere the waters of Merom; because the Kings that ioyned with Iabin against Iosua, which incamped at the waters of Merom, Ios. 11. 5. are by Iosephus saide to haue incamped at the 50 Citie Beratha in Galilee, not farre from Cedes a superior, which is also in Galilee: all which may be true of that Beratha of which Ezek. seeing it is in that Galilee which is called the vpper Galilee or Galilee of the Gentiles. The same Adrichomius placeth the Region of Be-rim neere Abela (of which Abela or Abel-beth Mahacah we haue spoken already) this he doth vpon a coniecture touching the place 2 Sam. 20. 14. where some read Abel cy Beth-mahacah, cy omnia loca Berim: but the better reading is, cy omnes Berim, that is, with all the Berai: for Shebah being of Beniamin (in which Tribe also there is a Citie called Beratha or Beeroth) drew the men of that Citie after him.

To the North of Beratha of Nephthalim standeth Sebarim vnder Libanus, remembred by Ezek.

streame Eastward to the Sea of Galilee, and with another streame Westward into the great Sea. This Riuer of Chifon where it riseth, and so farre as it runneth Southward, is called Chedumim or Cadumim: and for mine owne opinion, I take it to be the same which Ptolomie calleth Chorseus: though others distinguish them, and set Ciorseus by Casaria Palestina. There is a second Torrent or Brooke that riseth in the Hills of Bethulia, and falleth into the Sea of Galilee by Magdolum: and the third is a branch of a riuer rising out of the Fountaines of Capharnaum, which falleth also into the same Sea, and neere Magdolum; which Torrent they call Dotham, from the name of the Citie, from which it passeth Eastward to Bethsaida, and so ioyning with Jordanis parvus, which runneth from the Valley of Iephthael, which Iosua reckoneth in the bounds of Zabulon, it endeth in the Sea of Galilee.

§. VI.

THE TRIBE OF ISACHAR.

Henext adioyning Territorie to Zabulon, to the South and Southwest, was Isachar, who inhabited a part of the neather Galilee, within Jordan: of whom there were increased in Egypt, as appeared by their musters at Mount Sinai, 54,400. able and warlike men, who leauing their bodies with the rest in the Deserts, there entred to the Holy Land, 64,300.

Tarichea in Secten.

The first Citie of this Tribe neere the Sea of Galilee, was Tarichea, distant from Tiberias eight English mile, or somewhat more; a Citie wherein the Jewes (by the practice of a certaine mutinous ypsitart, Iohn the sonne of Leui) tooke armes against Iosephus the Historian, then Governour of both Galilees. This Citie was first taken by Cassius, and 3000. Jewes carried thence captiue; and afterward with great difficultie by Vespasian, who entred it by the Sea side, hauing first beaten the Jewes in a sea-fight vpon the Lake or Sea of Galilee; he put to the sword all forts of people, and of all ages: sauing that his furie being quenched with the riuers of blood running through euery street, he referred the remainder for slaues and bond-men.

Next to Tarichea is placed Ceston, or Cisbion, of the Leuites, and then Isachar, remembered in the first of Kings c. 4. v. 17. then Abes or Ebets, Ios. 19. 20. and Remeth, of which Ios. 19. 21. otherwise Ramoth, 1 Chron. 6. 73. or Iarmuth, Ios. 21. 29. this also was a City of the Leuites, from whose Territorie the Mountaines of Gilboe take beginning: and range themselues to the Mediterran Sea, and towards the West as farre as the Citie of Iezrael, between which and Ramoth, are the Cities of Bethpheses, or Bethpasses, according to Zegler; and Enadda, or Hen-chadda, neere which Saul slew himselfe: vnder those, Aphec or Apheca, which Adrichomius placeth in Isachar: betweene which and Suna, he saith, that the Philistims incamped against Israel, & afterward against Saul: a Land thirte of blood, for herein also, saith he, the Syrians with two and thirty Reguli assisting Benhadad, incoutered Achab: and were ouerthrowne and slaughtered: to whom the King of Israel made a most memorable answere, when Benhadad vaunted before the victory: which was, Tell Benhadad, Let not him that girdeth his harness boast himselfe, as he hath put it off: meaning that glorie followed after victorie, but ought not to precede it. In the yeere following, in the fields, as they say, adioyning to this Citie, was the same vaine-glorious Syrians viterly broken and discomfited by Acab: and 100,000. footmen of the Aramites or Syrians slaine: before which ouerthrow the seruants and Counsaillors of Benhadad (in derision of the God of Israel) told him, That the Gods of Israel were Gods of the Mountaines: and therefore if they fought with them in the plaines, they should ouercome them.

Vnder Aphec towards the Sea they set the Citie of Esdrelon, in the plaines of Galilee, so called also the great field of Esdrelon, and Mageddo: in the border whereof are the ruines of Aphec to be seene, saith Brochard, and Breidenbach. After these are the Cities of Casalosh, of which, 1. Machab. 9. 2. Anem or Hen-Gannim of the Leuites, and Seefima or Shahatsuma, the West border of Isachar, of which Ios. 19. 22. From hence ranging the Seacoast, there is found the Castle of Pilgrimes: a strong Castle inuironed with the Sea, sometime the store-houise and Magasine of the Christians, and built by the Earle of S. Giles or Toloufe.

From the Castle of Pilgrimes the Sea maketh a great Bay towards the North, and the farthest farthermost shore beginneth Mount Carmel, not farre from the Riuer Chifon, where Elijah assembled all the Prophets and Priests of Baal, and prayed King Achab and the people assembled, to make triall whether the God of Israel, or the Idoll of Baal were to be worshipped, by laying a sacrifice without fire on the Altar: which done, the Priests of Baal prayed, and cut their owne flesh after their manner, but the fire kindled not, while Elijah in derision told them that their God was either in pursuite of his enemies not at leisure, or perchance asleepe, &c. but at the prayer of Elijah his fire kindled, notwithstanding that he had caused the people to cast many Vessells of water thereon: by which miracle the people incensed, slew all those Idolaters on the bankes of Chifon adioyning.

At the foot of this Mountaine to the North standeth Caiphas, built, as they say, by Caiphas the high Priest. It is also knowne by the name of Porfina and Porphyria, sometime a Suffragane Bishop's seate. Returning againe from the Seacoast towards Tiberias by the bankes of Chifon, there are found the Citie of Hapharaim or Aphraim, and the Castles of Mezra, and Saba: of which Brochard and Breidenbach: and then Naim on the Riuer Chifon: a beautifull Citie while it stood, in the Gates whereof Christ raised from death the widdowes onely sonne.

Luc. 7.

Then Seon or Shion named Ios. 19. betweene the two Hills of Herman, in Isachar: beyond it standeth Endor, famous by reason of the Inchauntresse that vndertooke to raise vp the body of Samuel at the instigation of Saul.

Beyond it stands Anaharath and Rabbith named Ios. c. 19. v. 19. 20. Then Dabarath as it is named, Ios. 21. 28. or Dobratha, as it is named, 1. Chron. 6. 72. This Citie (which stretcht it selfe ouer Chifon) was a Citie of refuge belonging to the Leuites.

Next to Dabarath is Arbela situate, neere the Caues of those two Theeues which so greatly molested Galilee in Herods time. It ioyneth on one side to the Mountaine of Isachar or Herman, and on the other to the Valley of Iezrael: which valley continueth it selfe from Bethsan or Scythopolis, the East border of Isachar, euen to the Mediterran Sea: two parts whereof are inclosed by the Mountaines of Gilboe on the South, and by Herman, on the North. In these plaines Gedeon ouerthrew the Madianites, and herein, they thinke, Saul fought against the Philistims: Achab against the Syrians, and the Tartars against the Saracens.

THE HALFE OF THE TRIBE OF MANASSE.

†. I.

Of the bounds of this halfe Tribe: and of Scythopolis, Salem, Thersa, and others.

Henext Tribewhich ioyneth it selfe to Isachar towards the South, is the halfe of Manasse, on the West side of Jordan. Manasses was the first begotten of Joseph, the eleuenth sonne of Iacob. His mother was an Egyptian, the daughter of Putiphar, Priest and Prince of Heliopolis: which Manasses with his brother Ephraim, the grand-children of Iacob, were by adoption numbred amongst the sonnes of Iacob, and made vp the number of the twelue Patriarkes.

Of Manasse there were increased in Egypt, as they were numbred at Mount Sinai, 32,200. able men: all which being consumed in the Deserts, there entred of their issues, 32,700. bearing armes. The Territory which fell on this one halfe of Manasse, was bound by Jordan on the East, and Dora vpon the Mediterran Sea on the West, Iezrael on the North, and Machmata is the South border.

The first and principall Citie which stood in this Territorie was Bethsan, sometime Nysa, saith Plinie, built by Liber Pater, in honour of his Nurse there buried, of the same name, which Solinus confirmes. Afterward when the Scythians inuaded Asia the lesse, and pierst into the South, to the vttermost of Calosyria, they built this Citie a-new, and very magnificent: and it had thereupon the name of Scythopolis, or the Citie of Scythians giuen by the Greekes.

These barbarous Northren people constrained the Jewes to fight against their owne Nation

Nation and kindred, by whose hands when they had obtained victorie, they themselves set on the Iewes which ferued them, and slew them all. Stephanus makes it the utmost towards the South of Caelesyria: and Strabo ioynes it to Galilee. It is seated between Imdan and the Hills of Gilboe, in aulone ad montes acrabatena, saith Zeigler. But I finde it in the East part of the Valley of Iesrael neere Jordan: after that, Jordan strengtheneth it selfe againe into a Riuer, leauing the Sea or Lake Genesareth. Notwithstanding, Momanus describes it farre to the West, and towards the Mediterran Sea, neere Endor, contrarie to Stella, Laicstan, Adrichome, and all other the best Authors. This Citie was the greatest of all those of Decapolis: but the children of Manasse could not expell the inhabitants thereof: and therefore called it Sane an enemy, or Beth-san, the house of an enemy.

Ios. 17.
the Beth-facr.

Ouer the walls of this Bethsan the Philistims hung the bodie of Saul, and his sonnes flaine at Gilboe. It had, while the Christian Religion flourished in those parts, an Archbishop, who had nine other Bishops of his Diocese, numbered by Tyrius, in his 14. Booke and 12. Chapter: but the same was afterward translated to Nazareth. The later trauailers in those parts affirme, that there is daily taken out among the rubble and the ruines of that Citie, goodly pillars and other pieces of excellent marble, which witness the stately buildings, and magnificence which it had in elder times, but it is now a poore and desolate Village.

Hier. in Epist.
ad Euseb. &
in Loc. Hebr.

From Bethsan keeping the way by Jordan, they finde an ancient Citie called Salem, which Citie the ancient Kabbines, saith Hierome, doe not finde to be the same with Hierusalem: there being in the time of Hierome and since, a towne of that name, neere Scythopolis before remembred, which if the place of Scripture, Gen. 13. 18. doe not confirme, where the Vulgar readeth transmuting, in Salem urbem Sichemorum (for which others read uenit in columis ad Ciuitatem Sechemum, making the word Salem not to be a proper name, but an adiectiue) yet the place Iohn 3. 13. where it is said, that Iohn was baptizing in Anon neere Salem, may somewhat strengthen this opinion, and yet it is not vnlikely that this Salem of which S. Iohn speaketh, is but contracted of Shabulim, of which in the Tribe of Beniamin, 1. Sam. 9. 4. This word Iunius maketh to bee the plurall of Shubal: of which wee read, 1. Sam. 13. 17. for as for that which is added out of Canticles 6. 12. of Shalammitis, as if it had beene as much as a Woman of this Saleim, neere Anon, it hath no probability.

Not farre from thence where they place Salem, they find Bezeck the Citie of Adonibezek, Iosephus callit Bula, here it was that Saul assembled the strength of Israel and Iuda, to the number of 33,0000. when he meant to relieue Iabesh Gilead, against Nasib the Ammonite: who would giue them no other conditions of peace, than to suffer their right eyes to be thrust out. Neere Bezeck is the Citie of Bethbera or rather Beth-bara, of which Iudg. 7. 24. in the storie of Gideon: and then Ephra or Hophra, where in Geddon inhabited: in the border whereof stood an Altar consecrated to Baal, which hee pulled downe and defaced; and neere it that stone, on which Abimelech the Bastard slew his 70. brothers: a Heathenish cruelty, practised by the Turke to this day; and not farre hence, betwene the Village of Asophon and Jordan, Ptolomeus Latburus ouerthrew Alexander King of the Iewes, and slaughtered as Iosephus numbred them 3000. but according to Timagenes 50000. after which victory, as Ptolome pass by the Villages of the Iewes; he slew all their women, and caused the young children to be sod in great caldrons, that the rest of the Iewes might thereby thinke that the Egyptians were growne to be men-eaters, and strike them with the greater terror.

Towards the West and on the border of Issachar, they place the Cities of Aner of the Leuites, and Abel-Mehola, which Iunius, Iudg. 7. 22. placeth in Ephraim, it was the habitation of Helisaeus the Prophet, numbred among those places, 1. Reg. 4. 12. which were giuen in charge to Baana by Salomon, to whose charge also Tahanac belonging, a place of great strength, which at the first resisted Iosua, though their King was afterward hanged, and their Citie giuen to the Leuites.

In the bodie of this Territory of Manasse, but somewhat neerer Jordan, than to the Mediterran Sea, were three great Cities, to wit, Thersa, whose King was one of those that Iosua slew: which the Kings of Israel vsied for their Regall seate, till such time as Samaris was built. From hence the wife of Ieroboam went to Achia to enquire of her sons health: who knowing her, though she were disguised, told her of her sonnes death.

The second was Thebes neere Samaris, of which name there are both in Egypt, and Greece,

Greece, of great fame: in the assault of the Tower of this Towne, whereinto the Citizens retired, the Bastard Abimelec was wounded by a waighy stone, throwne by a Woman ouer the Wall, who despairing of his recovery, commanded his Page to slay him outright, because it should not be said that hee perished by the stroke of a Woman. But others set this Citie in Ephraim neere Sichem or Neapolis.

Iudg. 9. v. 54.

The third is Acrobata, of which the Territory adioyning is called Acrobatena, (one of the ten Toparchies or Governments in Iudea) for which Hierome, 1. Macc. 5. reads Acrobathena: but in the Greeke it is Acrobatine: Isidore callit Agrabat. This Citie had one of the largest Territories of all Palastine belonging to the Governour thereof. Iosephus re- membereth it often, as in his second Booke of the Iewes Warres, c. 11. 25. 28. & elsewhere.

Hier. Macc. 1. c. 5.

The difference betwene a Tetrarchie and a Toparchie, was, that the first was taken for a Prouince, and the other for a Citie with some lesser Territory adioyning, and a Tetrarch is the same with Præses in Latine, and Præsident in English, being commonly the fourth part of a Kingdome: and thereof so called: Plinie nameth seuenteen Tetrarchies in Syria: Plin. l. 5. the Holy Land had foure, and so hath the Kingdome of Ireland to this day, Lemsier, Flisier, Connath, and Mounster.

Euseb. in Chri

To the South-west of Acrobata they place the Cities of Balaam or Bilham, & Gethremmon of the Leuites: but Iunius out of Ios. 21. 25. and 1. Chron. 6. 70. gathers that these two are but one: and that Ibleham Ios. 16. 11. is another name of the same Citie.

Then is Iezabel a Regall Citie, set at the foot of the Mountaines of Gilboe, towards the South-west: herein Iezabel by a false accusation caused Naboth to be stoned, to the end she might possesse his Vineyard adioyning to the Citie, which Naboth refused to sell, because it was his inheritance from his Father.

Ioram also was cast vnburied into the same field: for which his Mother Iezabel murdered Naboth. King. 2. c. 2.

Toward the Sea from Iezabel is the Citie which they call Gaber: in whose ascent Ahabazab King of Iuda fled from Iehu, when he had slaine Ioram, he was wounded with the shot of an arrow, of which wound he died at Mageddo adioyning. The Scripture calls this Citie of Gaber, Gur. 2. King. 9. 27.

Then Adadremmon, neere vnto which the good King Iosias was slaine by Necho, King of Egypt, in a Warre vniuersally vnderaken. For Necho marched towards Affyria against the King thereof; by the commandement of God: whom Iosias thought to resist in his passage. It was afterward called Maximianopolis.

A neighbor Citie to Adadremmon was Mageddo, often remembred in the Scriptures; whole King was slaine among the rest by Iosua: yet they defended their Citie for a long time against Manasse. The Riuer which passeth by the Towne, may perhaps be the same which Ptolome calleth Chorfeus: and not that of which we haue spoken in Zabulon. For because this name is not found in the Scriptures, many of those that haue described the Holy Land, delineate no such Riuer. Moore onely sets it downe in his Geographie of the twelue Tribes: but the Riuer which passeth by Mageddo, he vnderstandeth to be but a branch, falling thereinto. Laicstan and Schrot make a great confluence of waters in this place, agreeable to this Scripture in the fifth of Iudges: Then fought the Kings of Canaan in Tanaac by the waters of Mageddo. But these Authors, and with them Stella, giue it no other name then the Torrent so called.

But seeing that ancient Cosmographers stretch out the bounds of Phanicia, euen to Sebaste or Samaris; and Strabo farre beyond it on the Sea-coast: And Iosephus calls Casaria Strab. l. 16. Palastine a Citie of Phanicia, yea Laurentius Cornutus extendeth Phanicia as farre as Geza: Ios. l. 13. c. 13. seeing also Ptolome sets downe Chorfeus for the partition of Phanicia and Iuda: this Riuer running East and West paralll with Samaris: it is very probable that this Torrent called Mageddo, after the name of the Citie, which it watereth, is the same which Ptolome in his fourth Table of Asia calleth Chorfeus. The later trauailers of the holy Land call Mageddo Subimbre at this day.

†. II.

Of Casaria Palastine, and some other Townes.

From Mageddo toward the West, and neere the Mediterran Sea, was that glorious Citie of Casaria Palastine: first, the Tower of Straton: the same which Plinie calls Apollonia: G g

Apollonia: though Ptolomei sets Apollonia elsewhere, & toward Egypt, between this City and Ioppe, to which Vespasian gaue the name of Flavia Colonia. It was by Herodre built, who therein laboured to exceed all the workes in that part of the world. For besides the edifices, which he reared within the Walls, of cut and polisht marbles, the Theater and Amphitheater, from whence he might looke ouer the Seas farre away, with the high and stately Towers and Gates: hee forced a Harborow of great capacitie, being in former times but an open Bay: and the winde blowing from the Sea the Marchants haunting that Port, had no other hope, but in the strength of their cables and Anchors. This worke he performed with such charge and labour, as the like of that hath not been found in any Kingdom, nor in any age: which, because the Materfalls were fetcht from farre, and the waight of the stones was such as it exceedeth beliefe, I haue added Iosephus owne words of this work, which are these: Hanc locorum incommoditatem correcturus, circumportus circumduxit, quantum putaret magne classi recipiende sufficere: & in viginti vulnarum profundum, prae grandia saxa demisit: quorum pleraque, pedum quinquaginta longitudinis, latitudinis vero octodecim, altitudine nouem pedali: fuerunt quadam etiam maiora, minora alia: To mend this inconuenience of place (saith Iosephus) hee compass in a Bay wherein a great flude might well ride: and let downe great stones twenty fadome deepe: whereof some were fifty foot long, eighteen foot broad, and nine foot thicke: some bigger, and some lesser. To this he added an arme or cawle of two hundred foote long, to breake the waues: the rest hee strengthened with a stone wall, with diuers stately Towers thereon builded: of which the 20 most magnificent he called Drusus, after the name of Drusus the sonne in law of Cesar: in whose honour he intituled the Citie it selfe, Caesaria of Palestine: all which he performed in twelue yeeres time. It was the first of the Easterne Cities that receiued a Bishop: afterward erected into an Archbishopricke, commanding twentie others vnder it, saith Tyrrius.

S. Hierome nameth Theophilus, Eusebius, Acacius, Euzorius, and Gelasius to haue bene Bishops thereof. In this Citie was Cornelius the Centurion baptized by Saint Peter: and herein dwelt Philip the Apostle: S. Paul was heerein two yerres prisoner, vnder the President Felix, vnto the time and gouernment of Porcius Festus: by whom making his appeale, he was sent to Cesar. Here, when Herod Agrippa was passing on to celebrate the 30 Quinquennalia, taking delight to be called a God by his flatteries, hee was stricken with an Angell vnto death, saith Iosephus.

To the North of Caesaria standeth Dora, or Naphoth Dor, as some reade, Ios. 1. 2. so called (saith Adrichomius) because it ioyneth to the Sea, whose King was slaine by Iosua. But Iunius for in Naphoth Dor, reades in tractibus Dor: and so the Vulgar, in regionibus Dor; although 1. Reg. 4. 11. for the like speech in the Hebrew it readeth omnis Nephath Dor: The Septuagint in the place of Iosua call it Nepheth-Dor, and in the other of the Kings, Nephah-Dor: but the true name by other places (as Ios. 12. 23. Iudg. 1. 27.) may seeme to be Dor. It was a strong and powerfull Citie, and the fourth in account of those twelue Principalities or Sitarchies, which Salomon erected. Iunius vpon Macchab. 15. 11. 40 placeth it betwene the Hill Carmel, and the mouth of the Riuer Chersesus: for so some name the Riuer Chersesus, of which we haue spoken already.

Into this Citie, for the strength thereof, Tryphon fled from Antiochus the son of Demetrius, where hee was by the same Antiochus besieged with 12000. foot-men, and 8000. Horse: the same perfidious villain that receiued 200. talents for the ranfome of Jonathan Macchabeus (whom he had taken by treacherie) and then slew him: and after him slew his owne Master, vsurping for a while the Kingdome of Syria. It had also a Bishops seate of the Diocese of Caesaria.

From Caesaria towards the South, they place the Cities of Capharnaum, Gabe, and Galgal: for besides that Capharnaum famous in the Euangelists, they finde in these parts neere 50 the West Sea, another of the same name. Of Gabe Hierome in locis Hebraicis. The famous Galgal or Gilgal, was in Benjamin: but this Gilgal, they say, it was whose King was slaine by Iosua.

Then Antipatris so called of Herode, in honour of his Father: but in the time of the 50 Macchabees it was called Capharsalama: in the fields whereof Iudas Macchabeus overthrew a part of the Armie of Nicanor, Lieutenant to Demetrius: an armie drawn into Iudea by a traitorous Jew, called Alcimus: who contended for the Priest-hood, first vnder Bacchides, and then vnder Nicanor. To this was S. Paul carried prisoner from Hierusalem, conducted conducted by 470. Souldiers, to defend him from the furie of the Iewes. In after-times the Armie of Godfrey of Bullion attempted it in vaine: yet was it taken by Baldwin. It was honoured in those daies with a Bishops seate, but it is now a poore Village called Affur, saith Brochard. Neere vnto this Citie the Prophet Ionas was three daies preferred in the bodie of a Whale.

Into the Land, from Antipatris and Caesaria, standeth Nabata, whereof the Territory taketh name: which Cestius the Romane waited with fire and sword, because the Iewes which dwelt at Caesaria fled thence, and carried with them the Bookes of Moses. Neere vnto it is the Mountaine of Abdia, the Steward of King Achab: wherein hee hid an hundred Prophets, and fedde them, after which he himselfe is said to haue obtained from God the Spirit of Prophecie also.

CHAP. VIII.

Of the Kingdome of Phœnicia.

§. I.

20 The boundes and chiefe Cities, and Founders, and Name, of this Kingdome: and of the invention of Letters ascribed to them.

30 Because these five Tribes, of Aijer, Nephthalim, Zabulon, Issachar, and the halfe of Manasse, possist the better part of that ancient Kingdome of Phœnicia, to wit, of so much as lay to the South part of Anti-libanus: I haue therefore gathered a brieue of those Kings which haue gouerned therein: at least so many of them as time (which deuoureth all things) hath left to posteritie: and that the rest haue perished, it is not strange; seeing so many volumes of excellent learning in so long a race and reuolution, and in so many changes of Estates and Conquests of Heathen Princes, haue bene torne, cast away, or otherwise consumed.

The limits of this Kingdome, as touching the South parts, are very vncertaine: but all Cosmographers doe in effect agree, that it takes beginning from the North, where the part of Syria, which is called Casiotis, ends: most of them bounding it by Orthosia, to the North of Tripolis. Ptolomei makes it a little larger, as reaching from the Riuer Eleutherus, that falls into the Sea at the Island of Aradus, somewhat to the North of Orthosia, and stretching from thence along the coast of the Mediterranean Sea, as farre as the Riuer of Chersesus, which seemes to be that which the Iewes call the Torrent or Riuer of 40 Mageddo. Plinie extends it farther, and comprehends Ioppe within it: Corunus and Budeus, Ioppe and Gaza. Phœnicia apud priscos appellata (saith Budeus) que nunc Palestina Syria dicitur: It was called Phœnicia of old (saith he) which now is called Palestina of Syria.

Strabo comprehends in this Countrey of Phœnicia, all the Sea side of Iudea, and 50 Palestina, euen vnto Pelusium, the first Port of Egypt. On the contrary Diodorus Siculus foldeth it vp in Calesyria, which hee boundeth not. But for my selfe I take a middle course, and like best of Ptolomies description, who was seldome deceiued in his owne Art. It had in it these famous Maritime Cities (besides all those of the Islands) to wit, Aradus, Orthosia, Tripolis, Botrys, Byblus, Berytus, Sidon, Tyre, Ptolomais (or Acon) Dora, and Caesaria Palestine: and by reason of the many Ports and goodly Sea-townes, it anciently commanded the Trades of the Easterne world: and they were absolute Kings of the Mediterranean Sea.

The ancient Regall Seate of those Princes was Zidon, built by Zidon the first sonne of Canaan: and the people then subiect to that people were called Zidonians: the same state continuing euen vnto Iosuas time. For till then it is probable that there was but one King of all that Region; afterward called Phœnicia: which Procopius also confirmeth in his second Booke of Vandalwarres. But in proceesse of time the Citie of Tyre adioyning 50 became the more magnificent: yet according to the Prophet, it was but a Daughter of Zidon, and by them first built and peopled.

F. 17.

But after the death of Moses, and while Iosua yet gouerned Israel, Agenor an Egyptian of Thebes, or a Phanician bred in Egypt, came thence with his sons of Cadmus, Phanix, Cyrus, and Cilix, (say Cedrenus & Curcius) and built & possit the Cities of Tyre and Zidon: to wit, the new Tyris, and brought into Phanicia (so called after the name of his second Son) the vse of letters: which also Cadmus in his pursuite after his sister Europa taught the Grecians. For Taurus King of Crete, when hee surpris'd Tyre, had stollen her thence: of which the Poets deuised the fable of *Insipier*s transformation into a Bull, by whom that stealth was also supposed to be made. Pomponius Sabinus makes Belus the first King of Phanicia: and findes Cadmus his succellour: whom hee calleth his grandchild: and it seemeth that Belus was the Father of Agenor, and not Neptune: because the 10 succellors of Dido held that name alwayes in reuerence, making it apart of their owne, as Asdrubal, Hannibal: which memorie Virgil also toucheth in these Verses:

*Hic Regina grauem gemmis auroq. poposcit
Impleuitq. moro pateram: quam Belus & omnes
A Belo soluit.*

The Queene anon commands the waightry bowle
(Waightrie with precious stones and massie gold)
To flow with wine. This Belus vs'd of old,
And all of Belus Line.

Whether this Belus were Father or Grand-father to Agenor, the matter is not great, But it seemes to be by comparing of times, that Belus was Ancellor to these Phanicians, and preceded Agenor. For were Belus, or Iupiter Belus, the sonne of Neptune by Libya, the Daughter of Epaphus, or were he the Sonne of Telegonus, according to Eusebius; yet it is agreed that Cecrops then ruled in Attica: and in the end of Cecrops time, saith S. Augustine, Moses l. fi. Egypt: *Agenor*s succellor liuing at once with Iosua. Now that Agenor returned about the same time into the Territory of Zidon, I cannot doubt: neither doe I denie, but that he gaue that Region the name of Phanicia, in honour of his Sonne. But in stead of the building of Tyre, and Zidon, it is probable that hee repaired and fortified 30 both: and therefore was called a Founder, as Semiramis and Nabuchodonosor were of Babylon.

For be it true that Agenor was of the same Nation, and brought vp in Egypt: where he learnt the vse of letters (Egypt flourishing in all kinde of learning in Mosestime) or were he by Nation an Egyptian, yet it is very likely that either he came to saue his own Territory: or otherwise to defend the coast of Canaan, from the Israelites: who were by Moses led out of Egypt, to the great losse and dishonour of that Nation: and by Iosua conducted ouer Iordan, to conquer and possesse the Canaanites Land. For though the Egyptians, by reason of the losse which they receiued by the hand of God, in the Red Sea, and by the ten plagues cast on them before that, and by the slaughter of so many of 40 the Male children at the same time, could not hinder the Hebrewes from inuading Canaan by Land: which also they knew had so many powerfull Nations to defend it: the Deserts inter-jacent, and the strong Edomites, Moabites, Emorites and Ammonites their borders: yet Egypt having such Vessels, or Ships, or Gallies, as were then in vse: did not in all probability neglect to Garrison the Sea coast, or assist Agenor with such forces, as they had to spare; and which they might performe with the greater facilitie, in that the Philistims which held the shores of Canaan, next adioyning vnto them, weretheir Friends and Confederates.

Now as it appeareth by the course of the storie, those Cities of Phanicia, which Agenor was said to haue built (that is, to haue fortified and defended against Iosua, and against 50 the Tribes after him, as Zidon, Sor, or Tyre, by Iosua called the strong Citie, Accho afterward Psolomais, Azzib and Dor) were all that Phanicia had in those dayes.

That the Kings of Phanicia were mighty, especially by Sea, it appeares, first by their defence against Israel: secondly by this, that Dauid and Salomon could not master them: but were glad of their alliance: thirdly, that one of their Cities, though they were then but Reguli, defended it selfe 13. yeers against a King of Kings, Nabuchodonosor: and that Alexander the great (who being made victorious by the prouidence of God, seemed vnreditt-able) spent more time in the recouery of Tyre, than in the conquest of all the Cities in Asia.
Other

Other opinions there are, as that of Berosus out of Iosephus, who conceiues that Tyre was founded by Tyras the sonne of Iaphet. And for the Region it selfe, though Calisthenes deriue it ab arbore dactylorum; and the Greekes from the word Phonos, of slaughter, because the Phanicians slew all that came on their coasts, yet for my selfe I take it that Phanix the sonne of Agenor gaue it that name. But that either Agenor in Phanicia, or Cadmus his sonne in Greece, were the Inuentors of Letters, it is ridiculous: and therefore the dispute vnecessary.

The Aethiopians affirme that Atlas, Orion, Orpheus, Linus, Hercules, Prometheus, Cadmus, and others, had from them the first light of all those Arts, Sciences, and ciuill Policies, which they afterward profess, and taught others: and that Pythagoras himselfe was instructed by the Libyans: to wit, from the South and Superior Egyptians: from whom those which inhabited neerer the out-let of Nilus, as they say, borrowed their Diuinitie and Philosophie: and from them the Greekes, then barbarous, receiued Ciuilitie. Again, the Phanicians challenge this inuention of Letters and of Learning: acknowledging nothing from the Egyptians at all, neither doe they allow that Agenor and his sonnes were Affricans; whence Lutan.

*Phenices primi (sima si creditur) ausi
Mansuram rudibus vocem signare figuris.*

Lucan. l. 5. 3.

*Phenicians first (if fame may credit haue)
In rude Characters dar'd our wordes to graue.*

And that Cadmus was the sonne of Agenor, and was a Phanician, and not an Egyptian, it appeareth by that answer made by Zeno; when he in a kinde of reproach was called a stranger and a Phanician:

Si patria est Phenix, quid tum? nam Cadmus & ipse Phenix; cui debet Gracia docta libros.

Athen. 1. Diogen.

If a Phanician borne I am, what then?
Cadmus was so: to whom Greece owes
The Bookes of learned men.

Out of doubt the Phanicians were very ancient: and from the Records and Chron- 50 nicles of Tyre, Iosephus the Historian confirms a great part of his Antiquities. The Thracians againe subscribe to none of these reports: but affirme constantly, that the great Zamolxis flourished among them: when Atlas liued in Mauritania: Nilus and Vulcan in Egypt; and Ochus in Phanicia. Yea, some of the French doe not blush to maintaine, that the ancient Gauls taught the Greekes the vse of Letters, and other Sciences. And doe not we know that our *Bard*s and Druides are as ancient as those Gauls, and that they sent their sonnes hither to be by them instructed in all kinde of learning?

Lastly, whereas others bestow this inuention on Moses, the same hath no probability at all, for he liued at such time as Learning and Arts flourished most, both in Egypt, and Affrica, and hee himselfe was brought vp in all the learning of the Egyptians, from his infancie.

But true it is, that letters were inuented by those excellent Spirits of the first age, and before the generall flood: either by Seth or Enos, or by whom else God knowes; from whom all wisdom and vnderstanding hath proceeded. And as the same infinite God is present with all his Creatures, so hath he giuen the same inuention to diuers Nations: whereof the one hath not had commerce with the other; as well in this as in many other knowledges: for euen in Mexico, when it was first discouered, there was found written Bookes after the manner of those Hieroglyphicks, anciently vsed by the Egyptians, and other Nations: and so had those Americans a kinde of Heraldrie; and their Princes differing in Armes and Scutcheions, like vnto those vsed by the Kings and Nobilitie of other Nations. Inua naturalia communia, & generalia, &c. Natural Lawes are common to all.

Of the Kings of Tyre.

Whatsoever remaineth of the storie and Kings of Phœnicia (the bookes of Zeno, Sachoniathe, Manasse, and others of that Nation, being no where found) the same is to bee gathered out of the Scriptures, Iosephus, and Theophilus Antiochenus.

Agenor lived at once with Iosua, to whom succeeded Phœnix; of whom that part of Canaan, and so farre towards the North as Aradus, tooke the name of Phœnicia; what King succeeded Phœnix it doth not appeare: but at such time as the Græcians besieged Troy, Phœnix governed Phœnicia.

In Hieremies time, and while Iehoiakim ruled in Juda, the Tyrians had a King apart: for Hieremie speaketh of the Kings of Zidon, of Tyre, of Edom, &c. as of severall Kings.

In Xerxes time, and when he prepared that incredible Armie wherewith hee invaded Greece, Tetramnestus ruled that part of Phœnicia, about Tyre, & Zidon: who commanded, as some writers affirme, Xerxes fleet, or rather, as I suppose, those 300. Gallies, which himselfe brought to his aide: for at this time it seemeth, that the Phœnicians were Tributaries to the Persians: for being broken into Reguli, and petty Kings in Hieremies time, they were subiect to Nabuchodonosor; of whose conquests in the Chapter before remembred, Hieremie prophesied.

Tennes, though not immediately, succeeded Tetramnestus, remembred by D. Siculus in his 14. Booke.

Strato, his successor, and King of Zidon, Alexander Macedon threw out, because of his dependencie vpon Darius, and that his Predecessors had served the East Empire against the Græcians. But diuers Kings, of whom there is no memorie, came betwene Tennes and Strato. For there were consumed 130. yeeres and somewhat more between Xerxes and Alexander Macedon. And this man was by Alexander esteemed the more unworthy of restitution, because (saith Curtius) he rather submitted himselfe by the instigation of his Subiects (who foresaw their utter ruine by resistance) than that he had any disposition therunto, or bare any good affection towards the Macedonians.

Of this Strato, Athenæus out of Theopompus reporteth, that he was a man of ill living: and most voluptuous; also that hee appointed certaine games and prizes for Women-dancers, and singers: whom hee to this end chiefly invited, and assembled: that hauing beheld the most beautifull and liuely among them, he might recouer them for his owne vse and delights. Of the strange accident about the death of one Strato King of these coasts, S. Hierome and others make mention: who hauing heard that the Persians were neer him with an Armie too waighy for his strength, & finding that he was to hope for little grace, because of his falling away from that Empire, and his adhering to the Egyptians: he determining to kill himselfe, but fainting in the execution, his wife being present, wrested the sword out of his hand and slew him: which done, shee also therewith pierced her owne bodie, and died.

After Alexander was posselt of Zidon, and the other Strato driuen thence, He gaue the Kingdome to Hephæstion, to dispose of: who hauing receiued great entertainment of one of the Citizens, in whose house he lodged, offered to recompence him therewith; and willingly offered to establish him therein: but this Citizen no lesse vertuous than rich, desired Hephæstion that this Honour might be inferred on some one of the bloud and race of their ancient Kings: and presented vnto him Balonymus, whom Curtius calls Abdolominus, Iustine Abdolominus, and Plutarch Alynomus: who at the very houre that he was called to this regall Estate, was with his owne hands working in his Garden, setting hearbs and rootes, for his reliefe and sustenance: though otherwise a wise man and exceeding iust.

These were the ancient Kings of Zidon: whose estate being afterward changed into Popular or Aristocraticall: and by times and turnes subiect to the Emperours of the East: there remaineth no farther memorie of them, than that which is formerly deliuered in the Tribe of Asser.

The Kings of Tyre, who they were before Samuels time, it doth not appeare: Iosephus the Historian, as is saide, had many things wherewith hee garnished his Antiquities from the Tyrian Chronicles: and out of Iosephus, and Theophilus Antiochenus, there may be begathered a descent of some twenty Kings of the Tyrians, but these Authours, though they both pretend to write out of Memander Ephesius, doe in no sort agree in the times of their reignes; nor in other particulars.

Abibalus is the first King of the Tyrians, that Iosephus and Theophilus remember: whom Theophilus calls Abernathus; the same perchance that the sonne of Sirach mentioneth in his fourth and sixth Chapter, speaking of the Princes of the Tyrians.

To this Abibalus, Suron succeeded, if he be no one and the same with Abibalus. David (saith Eusebius out of Eupolemus) constrained this Suron to pay him Tribute, of whom also David complaineth, Psal. 83.

Hiram succeeded Suron, whom Iosephus calls Irom, and Theophilus sometime Hierimimus sometime Hieromus, but Tatian and Zonaras Ghiram. He entred into a league with David, and sent him Cedars with Malons and Carpenters, to performe his buildings in Ierusalem: after he had beaten thence the Iebusites. The same was he that so greatly assisted Salomon: whom he not onely furnished with Cedars, and other Materials towards the raising of the Temple, and with great summes of mony, but also he ioynd with him in his enterprize of the East India, and of Ophir: and furnished Salomon with Mariners and Pilots: the Tyrians being of all Nations the most excellent Nauigators: & lent him 120. talents of gold. Of this Hiram, there is not onely mention in diuers places of Scripture, but in Iosephus in his Antiquities the 7. and 8. chap. 2. & 3. in Theophilus his 3<sup>d</sup> booke, in Tatianus his Oration against the Greekes: and in Zonaras Tome the first. This Prince seemed to be very mighty and magnificent, hee despised the 20. Townes which Salomon offered him: he defended himselfe against that victorious King David: & gaue his daughter in marriage to Salomon, called the Zidonian: for whose sake he was contented to worship Asteroth, the Idoll of the Phœnicians. Hiram liued 53. yeeres.

Baleastartus whom Theoph. Antiochenus, calleth Bazorus, succeeded Hiram, King of Tyre and Zidon, and reigned 7. yeeres according to Iosephus.

Abdastartus the eldest sonne of Baleastartus, gouerned 9. yeeres, and liued but 20. yeeres according to Iosephus: but after Theophilus hee reigned 12. yeere, and liued 54. who being slaine by the foure sonnes of his owne Nurse, the eldest of them held the Kingdome 12. yeeres.

Astarius brother to Abdastartus, recouered the Kingdome from this Vsurper, and reigned 12. yeeres.

Astarimus, or Atharimus, after Theophilus, a third brother followed Astarius, and ruled 9. yeeres, and liued in all 54.

Phelles the fourth sonne of Baleastartus, and brother to the three former Kings, slew Astarimus, and reigned 8. moneths, liued 50. yeeres.

Ithobalus (or Luithobalus, in Theophilus) son to the third brother Astarimus, who was the chiefe Priest of the Goddesse Astarta, which was a dignity next vnto the King, reuenged the death of his father, and slaughtered his Vnckle Phelles: and reigned 32. yeeres, the same which in the first Kings, chap. 16. is called Ethbaal, whose daughter Iezabel, Achab married.

Badezor or Bazor the sonne of Ithobalus or Ethbaal, brother to Iezabell, succeeded his Father, and reigned 6. yeeres, and liued in all 45.

Mettimus succeeded Badezor, & reigned but 9. yeeres (saith Iosephus) he had two sons, Pygmalion and Barca, and two daughters Elisa and Anna.

Pygmalion reigned after Mettimus his Father 40. yeeres, and liued 56. In the seuenth yeere of whose reigne, Elisa sailed into Affrica, and built Carthage, 143. yeeres and 8. moneths, after the Temple of Salomon: which by our account was 289. yeeres after Troy taken, and 143. before Rome: and therefore that fiction by Virgil of Aeneas and Dido must be farre out of square. For Pygmalion couetous of Sichens his riches, who had married his sister Elisa, slew him traiterously as he accompanied him in hunting: or if we beleue Iustine and Virgil, at the Altar: whereupon Elisa fearing to be despoiled of her husbands treasure, fled by Sea into Affrica, as aforesaid: whom when Pygmalion prepared to pursue, he was by his mothers teares, and by threats from the Oracle arrested. Barca accompanied his sister, and assisted her, in the erection of Carthage: and from him sprang that noble Family of the Barca in Affrica, of which race descended many famous Captaines, and the great Hanniball. Seruius interprets this name of Dido by Virago, because of her man-like acts, others from Iedidia, a surname of Salomon.

Eluleus succeeded Pygmalion: and reigned 36. yeeres: the same that overthrew the fleet of Salmanassar, in the Port of Tyre: notwithstanding which, he continued his siege before it on the Land side five yeeres, but in vaine.

After Eluleus, Ethobales gouerned the Tyrians, who vaunted himselfe to be as wise as Daniel: and that he knew all secrets (saith Ezekiel) of whom the Prophet writeth at large in his 28. Chapter: out of whom it was gathered, that this Prince dyed, or was slaine in that long siege of Nabuchodonosor: who surrounded and attempted Tyre, 13. yeeres together, ere he preuailed.

Baal followed Ethobales, and reigned 10. yeeres a tributary, perchance, to Nabuchodonosor: for after his death, it was gouerned by diuers Judges, succeeding each other: 10 First, by Ecnibalus, then by Chelbis, Abarus the Priest, Mittonus, and Girastus, who held it among them some 7. yeeres, and odde months: after whom Balaïorus commaunded therein as a King for one yeere: after him Merbalus sent from Babylon 4. yeeres: after him Irom sent thence also, 20. yeeres. In the 17. of whose reigne Cyrus beganne to gouerne Persia.

§. III.

Of Bozeus his conceit, that the Edumeans inhabiting along the Red Sea, were the Progenitors of the Tyrians, and that the Tyrians from them receiued and brought into Phenicia the knowledge of the true God.

For the great mutations of this Kingdome and State of the Tyrians, mixed with a discourse of diuers other Nations, there is one Bozeus that hath written a Tract at large, intituled de ruinis Gentium. And although the great, and many alterations found in this and other Cities, yea in all things vnder heauen, haue proceeded from his ordinance who onely is vnchangeable, and the same for euer; yet whereas the sayde Bozeus, inforcing heere-hence, that the prosperity and ruine of the Tyrians, were fruites of their embracing or forsaking the true Religion, to proue this his assertion, supposeth the Tyrians to haue bene Edumeans, descended from Esau, Iacobs brother: first, it can hardly be beleued that Tyre, when it flourished most in her ancient glory, was in anie sort truly deuout and religious. But to this end (besides the prooffe which the Scriptures giue of Hirams good affection when Salomon built the Temple) hee brings many coniectural arguments, whereof the strongest is their pedigree and descent: it being likely in his opinion, that the posterity of Esau receiued from him by Tradition the Religion of Abraham and Isaac. That the Tyrians were Edumeans, he endeouours to shew, partly by weakere reasons, painefully strained from some affinity of names, which are arguments of more delight than waight: partly by authority. For Strabo, Herodotus, Pliny, & others witnesse, that the Tyrians came from the Red Sea, in which there were three Ilands, called Tyrrus, Aradus, and Sidon: which very names (as he thinketh) were afterwards giuen to the Cities of Phenicia. Considering therefore that all the coast of the Red Sea, was (in his opinion) vnder the Edumeans: as Elah and Esiogaber, or vnder the Amalekites, who descended of Amalec the Nephew of Esau, whose cheefe City was Madian, so called of Madian the sonne of Abraham by Cethura, whose posterity did people it: the consequence appeares good (as he takes it) that the Tyrians originally were Edumites: differing little or nothing in Religion from the children of Israel. Heereunto he addes, that Cadmus and his Companions brought not into Greece the worship of Astartis, the Idoll of the Sidonians. That the Parents of Thales and Phercydes being Phenicians, themselves differed much in their Philosophy from the idolatrous customes of the Greekes. That in Teman, a Towne of the Edumeans, was an Vniuersity, wherein as may appeare by Eliphaz the Temanite, who disputed with Iob, Religion was sincerely taught.

Such is the discourse of Bozeus, who labouring to proue one Paradoxe by another, deserues in both very little credit. For neither doth it follow, that if the Tyrians were Edumeans, they were then of the true Religion, or well affected to God and his People: neither is it true that they were Edumeans at all. In what Religion Esau brought vp his children, it is no where found written, but that himselfe was a prophane man, and disauowed by God, the Scriptures in plaine termes expresse. That his posterity were Idolaters, is directly proued in the 25. Chapter of the second booke of Chronicles. That the Edumites were perpetuall enemies to the House of Israel, saue onely when Dauid & some of his race, Kings of Iuda, held them in subiection, who knowes not? or who is ignorant rant of Dauids vnfriendly behauiour amongst them, when first they were subdued: Surely it was not any argument of Kindred or Alliance, betwene Tyrrus & Mount Seir, that Hiram held such good correspondence with Dauid: euen then when Iobab slew all the males of Edom: neither was it for their deuotion to God, and good affection to Israel, that the Edumites were so ill intreated. It seemeth that the piety and ancient wisdom of Eliphaz the Temanite was then forgotten, and the Edumeans punished, for being such as Dauid in his owne dayes found them. Although indeede the City of Teman whence Eliphaz came to reason with Iob, is not that in Edumaea, but another of the same name, lying East from the Sea of Galilee, and adioyning to Hus, the Country of Iob: and to such the City of Bildad the Suhite, as both such Chorographers who best know those parts, do plainly shew, and the holy Text makes manifest. For Iob is said to haue exceeded in riches; and Salomon in wisdom, all the people of the East; nor the inhabitants of Mount Seir, which lay due South from Palestina. True it is that Eliphaz the sonne of Esau had a sonne called Teman: but that Fathers were wont in those dayes to take name of their sonnes, I no where finde. And Ismael also had a son called Thema: of whom it is not vnlike that Thema in the East had the name: for as much as in the 7. Chap. of the booke of Judges, the Midianites, Amalekites, & all they of the East are called Ismaelites. And he that wel considers how great and strong a Nation Amalec was, which durst giue bataille to the Host of Israel, wherein were 600000. able men, will hardly beleue that such a people were defended from one of Esaus his grand-children. For how powerfull and numberlesse must the forces of all Edom haue bene: if one Tribe of them, yea one Family of a Tribe had bene so great: surely Mount Seir and all the Regions adioyning could not haue held them. But we no where finde that Edom had to do with Amalec: or assisted the Amalekites: when Saul went to roote them out. For Amalec is no where in Scripture named as a Tribe of Edom: but a Nation of it selfe, if distinct from the Ismaelites. The like may be said of Midian, that the Founder thereof being son to Abraham by Cethura, doubtles was no Edomite. And thus much in generall for all the Seignory of the Red-sea coast, which Bozeus imagines the Edumeans to haue held: if the Edumites in after-times held some places as Elan and Esiogaber on the Red Sea shore, yet in Mosis time, which was long after the building of Tyre, they held them not. For Mosis himselfe saith, that Israel did compass all the borders of Edom: within which limits had Midian stood, Mosis must needs haue known it: because he had sojourned long in that Country: and there had left his wife and children, when he went into Egypt.

But coniectural Arguments, how probable soeuer, are needlesse in so manifest a case. For in the 83. Psalm, Edom, Amalec, and Tyre, are named as distinct Nations: yea the Tyrians and Sidonians being one people, as all good Authors shew, and Bozeus himselfe confesseth, were Canaanites, as appeares, Gen. c. 10. v. 15. & 19. appointed by God to haue bene destroyed, and their Lands giuen to the children of Assur, Ios. 24. because they were Idolaters, and of the cursed seed of Canaan, not Cousins to Israel, nor professors of the same Religion. For though Hiram said, Blessed bee God that hath sent King Dauid a wise sonne: we cannot inferre that he was of Dauids Religion. The Turke hath saydes much of Christian Princes, his confederates. Certaine it is, that the Sidonians then worshipped Astarte, and drew Salomon also to the same Idolatry.

Whereas Hiram ayded Salomon in building the Temple, he did it for his owne ends, receiuing therefore of Salomon great prouision of Corne, and Oyle, and the offer of 20. Townes or Villages in Galilee. And if wee rightly consider things, it will appeare that Hiram in all points, dealt Merchant-like with Salomon, He allowed him Timber, with which Libanus was, and yet is ouer-pestered: being otherwise apt to yeelde filkes: as the Andarine filkes which come from thence, and other good commodities. For Corne and Oyle, which he wanted, he gaue that which he could well spare to Salomon. Also Gold for Land: wherein Salomon was the wiser, who hauing got the gold first, gaue to Hiram the worst Villages that he had: with which the Tyrian was ill pleased. But it was a necessary policy which enforced Tyrrus to hold league with Israel. For Dauid had subdued Moab, Ammon, Edom, the Aramites, and a great part of Arabia, euen to Ephrates: thorough which Countries the Tyrians were wont to carrie and re-carrie their Wares on Camels, to their fleets on the Red Sea, and backe againe to Tyrrus: so that Salomon being Lord of all the Countries through which they were to passe, could haue cut off their Trade.

But the Israelites were no Sea-men, and therefore glad to share with the Tyrrians in their adventures. Yet Salomon as Lord of the Sea-townes, which his Father had taken from the Philistines, might have greatly distressed the Tyrrians, & perhaps haue brought them euen into subiection. Which Hiram knowing, was glad (and no meruaile) that Salomon rather meant as a man of peace to employ his Fathers treasure, in magnificent workes, than in pursuing the conquest of all Syria. Therefore he willingly ayded him, and sent him cunning workmen, to encrease his delight in goodly buildings, imageries, and instruments of pleasure.

As these passages betwene Salomon and Hiram, are no strong Arguments of pietie in the Tyrrians: so those other proofes which Bozins frames negatively vpon particular examples, are very weak. For what the Religion of Cadmus was, I think, no man knowes. It seemes to me, that hauing more cunning than the Greekes, and being very ambitious, he would faine haue purchased diuine honours: which his Daughters, Nephewes, and others of his house obtained, but his owne many misfortunes beguiled him of such hopes, if he had any. Thales and Phercydes are but single examples. Euery saluage Nation hath some wisdom excellen the vulgar, euen of ciuill people. Neither did the morall wisdom of these men expresse any true knowledge of the true God. Only they made no good mention of the Gods of Greece: whom being newly come thither, they knew not. It is no good argument to say, that Cadmus and Thales being Tyrrians, are not knowne to haue taught Idolatry, therefore the Tyrrians were not Idolaters. But this is of force, That Carthage, Utica, Leptis, Cadix, and all Colonies of the Tyrrians (of which I thinke, the Islands before mentioned in the Red Sea to haue beene, for they traded in all Seas) were Idolaters, euen from their first beginnings: therefore, the Tyrrians who planted them, and to whom they had reference, were so likewise.

This their Idolatry from Salomons time on-wards is acknowledged by Bozins, who would haue vs thinke them to haue beene formerly a strange kinde of deuout Edomites. In which fancie he is so peremptory, that he styleth men of contrary opinion, impious politicians, as if it were impiety to thinke that God (who euen among the Heathen, which haue not knowne his name, doth fauour Vertue and hate Vice) hath often rewarded morall honesty, with temporall happinesse. Doubtlesse, this doctrine of Bozins would better haue agreed with Julian the Apostata, than with Cyris. For if the Assyrians, Greeks, Romanes, and all those Nations of the Gentiles, did then prosper most, when they drew neerest vnto the true Religion: what may be saide of the foule Idolatry which grew in Rome, as fast as Rome it selfe grew: and was enlarged with some new superstition, almost vpon euery new victory? How few great battailes did the Romanes win, in which they vowed not either a Temple to some new God, or some new Honor to one of their olde Gods: yea, what one Nation, saue onely that of the Iewes, was subdued by them, whose Gods they did not afterward entertainge in their City? Onely the true God, which was the God of the Iewes, they reiected, vbraiding the Iewes with him, as if he were unworthy of the Romane Maiesty: shall we hereupon enforce the lewd and foolish conclusion which Heathen writers vsed against the Christians in the Primitive Church: That such Idolatry had caused the Citie of Rome to flourish, and that the decay of those abominations did also bring with it the decay of the Empire? It might well be thought so, if prosperitie were a signe or effect of true Religion. Such is the blinde zeale of Bozins, who writing against those whom he falsely termes impious, giues strength to such as are impious indeed. But such indiscretion is vsually found among men of his humour, who hauing once either foolishly embraced the dreames of others, or vainely fashioned in their owne braines any strange Chimeras of Diuinity, condemne all such in the pride of their zeale, as Atheists and Infidels, that are not transported with the like intemperate ignorance. Great pitty is it, that such mad dogges are oftentimes encouraged by those, who hauing the command of many tongues, when they themselues cannot touch a man in open and generous opposition, will wound him secretly by the malicious vertue of an Hypocrite.

CHAP. IX.

Of the Tribe of Ephraim, and of the Kings of the ten Tribes, whose head was Ephraim.

§. I.

Of the memorable places in the Tribe of Ephraim.

10 Auing now past ouer Phanicia, wee come to the next Territorie adioyning: which is that of Ephraim: sometime taken per excellentiam for the whole Kingdome of the ten Tribes. Ephraim was the second sonne of Ioseph, whose yssues when they left Egypt were in number 45000. all which dying in the Desarts, (Iosua excepted) there entred the Holy Land of their children growne to be able men 32500. who fate downe on the West side of Jordan, betwene Manasse, and Beniamin: who bounded Ephraim by the North and South; as Jordan, and the Mediterran Sea, did by the East and West.

The first and chiefe Citie which Ephraim had, was Samaria, the Metropolis of the Kingdome of Israel, built by Amris or Homri King thereof; and seated on the toppe of the Mountaine Somron, which ouer-looketh all the bottoime, and as farre as the Seacoast. It was afterward called Sebaste, or Augusta, in honour of August. Cesar. This City is often remembered in the Scriptures: and magnificent it was in the first building, for as Brochard obserueth, the ruines which yet remaine, and which Brochard found greater then those of Hiernsalem, tell those that behold them, what it was when it stood vpright: for to this day there are found great store of goodly Marble pillars, with other hewne and carued stone in great abundance, among the rubble.

It was beaten to the ground by the sonnes of Hircanus the high Priest: restored and built by the first Herod the son of Antipater: who to flatter Cesar called it Sebaste. Here in were the Prophets Heliseus, and Abdias buried: and so was Iohn Baptift. It now hath nothing but a few Cottages filled with Grecian Monkes.

Neere Samaria toward the South, is the Hill of Bethel, and a towne of that name: on the top of which Mountaine, Ieroboam erected one of his golden Calues, to be worshipped: with which he seduced the Israelites.

In sight off this Mountaine of Bethel, was that ancient City of Sichem; after the restoration called Neapolis, now Pelosa, and Napolasa: It was destroyed by Simeon and Leui, in reuenge of the rauishment of their sister Dina: and after that by Abimelec euened with the foyle. Ieroboam raised it vp againe: and the Damascens a third time cast it downe.

Vnder Sichem toward the Sea standeth Pharaton or Pirhathon on the Mountaine Abdon, the Citie of Abdon Iudge of Israel. And vnder it Bethoron of the Leuites, built as it is said by Sara, the daughter of Ephraim. Nere to this Citie Iudas Macchabeus ouerthrew Seron and Lysias, Lieutenants to Antiochus. This City had Salomon formerly repaired and fortified.

Betweene Bethoron and the Sea, standeth Samir, of which Ios. 10. And Saron whose King was slaine by Iosua: it is also mentioned Acts 9. 35. and of this Saron the Valley taketh name, which beginning at Casarea Palestina, extendeth it selfe alongst the coast as farre as Ioppe, saith Adrichomz. Though indeed the name Saron is not particularly giuen to this Valley, but to euery fruitfull plaine Region; for not onely this Valley is so called, to wit, betwene Casarea and Ioppe, but that also betwene the Mountaine Tabor and the Sea of Galilee: for so S. Hierome vpon the five and thirtieth Chapter of Esay, interprets the word Saron: and so doth the same Father in his Commentaries vpon Abdias, reade Saron for Assaron: vnderstanding thereby a Plaine neere Lidda: which Lidda in his time was called Diopolis, or the City of Iupiter, one of the Toparchies of Iudea, the chief in dignity (or the third after Pliny) where Saint Peter (non sua sed Christi virtute) culled Anias. Niger calls all that Region from Anti-libanus to Ioppe Saron. This Ioppe was was burnt to the ground by the Romanes, those Rauens and Spoylers of all Eftates, disturbers of Common-weales, vsurpers of other Princes Kingdomes; who with no other respect led than to amplify their own glory, troubled the whole world: and themselves, after murdering one another, became a prey to the most saluage and barbarous Nations.

Of this Saint George see more about in this 2 booke. C. 7. §. 3. & 5.

In Diospolis (saith Will. of Tyre) was S. George beheaded, and buried: in whose honour and memory Iustinian the Emperour caused a faire Church to be built ouer his Tombe, these be Tyrius his words: Relicta à dextris locis maritimis Antipatrie, & Ioppe, per late patentem planitiem Elutheriam pertranscuntes, Liddam qua est Diospolis, ubi & egregij Martyris Georgij usque hodie Sepulchrum ostenditur, peruenient, eius Ecclesiam quum ad honorem eiusdem Martyris pites & orthodoxus Princeps Romanorum, Augustus Iustinianus multo studio & deuotione prompta edificari preceperat, &c. They hauing left (saith he) on the right hand, the Sea Townes Antipatrie, and Ioppe, passing ouer the great open plaine of Elutheria, came to Lidda, which is Diospolis: where the sumptuous Tombe of the famous Martyr S. George is at this day shewed; whose Church, when the Godly & Orthodox Prince of the Romanes, High and Mighty Iustinian had commanded to bee built, with great earnestnesse and present deuotion, &c. Thus saith Tyrius, by whose testimonie, wee may coniecture that this S. George was not that Arrian Bishop of Alexandria; but rather some better Christian: for this of Alexandria was slaine there in an vprore of the people, and his ashes cast into the Sea, as Ammianus Marcellinus reports. And yet also it may be, that this Georgius was a better Christian, than he is commonly thought: for his words of the Temple of Genius, How long shall this Sepulcher stand? occasioned the vprore of the people against him: as fearing lest he would giue attempt to ouerthrow that beautifull Temple. This also Marcellinus reports, who though he say that this Georgius was also deadly hated of the Christians, who else might haue rescued him: yet hee adde, that his ashes, with the ashes of two others, were therefore cast into the Sea, lest if their Reliques had bene gathered vp, Churches should be built for them, as for others. But for my part, I rather thinke that it was not Georgius, whose name liues in the right honourable Order of our Knights of the Garter, but rather another, whom Tyrius about cited, witnesseth to haue bene buried at Lidda or Diospolis. The same also is confirmed by Vitruac. S. Hierome affirms that it was sometime called Tigrida, and while the Christians inhabited the Holy Land, it had a Bishop Suffagan.

Sam. 1. 25. v. 5.

Nearer to Lidda or Diospolis standeth Ramatha of the Leuites, or Aramathia: afterward Fama, and Ramula, the native Citie of Ioseph, which buried the body of Christ. There are many places which beare this name of Rama; one they set in the Tribe of Iuda neere Thecua in the way of Hebron; another in Nephthaim, not far from Sebeth; a third in Babylon, which they say, adioyneth to Sephoris; a fourth, which they make the same with Silo; and a fifth, which is this Rama, in the Hills of Ephraim, called Rama-Sophim, where Samuel liued, and wherein he is buried.

Ant. 13. 21. de Bell. Ind. 1. 5.

From hence to the North alongst the coast are Helon, or Aialon of the Leuites, of which 1. Chron. 6. Apollonia, of which Iosephus in his Antiquities, and in the war of the Iewes. Also Balsalifa (for which Iunius, 2. Reg. 4. 42. reads planities Shalisha) they place hereabout in this Tribe of Ephraim; but Iunius vpon 1. Sam. 6. where we reade of the Land of Shalisha, findeth it in Beniamin.

On the other side of the Mountaines of Ephraim standeth Gofna, one of the Toparchies or Cities of gouernment, the second in dignity, of which the Country about it taketh name.

Judg. 2. 9. It is called Thimnath Serach. 10. 19. 50.

Hieron. in locis Hebr.

Then Thamnath-sara, or according to the Hebrew, Thimnath-Serach: one also of the ten Toparchies or Presidencies of Iudaea, which they call Thamnathica; a goodly City and strong, seated on one of the high Hills of Ephraim; on the North of the hill called Gaas; which City and Territory, Israel gaue vnto their Leader Iosua; who also amplified it with buildings, neere which he was buried. His Sepulchre remained in S. Hieroms time, and ouer it the Sunne engrauen, in memory of that greates of wonders, which God wrought in Iosuas time.

Macc. 1. 7. 40

In the places adioyning standeth Adarsa, or Adafa; where Iudas Maccabens with 3000. Iewes ouerthrew the Army of Nicanor, Lieutenant of Syria; neere to Gaser or Gerzer which Iosua tooke, and hung their King; a Citie of the Leuites. It was afterward taken by Pharao of Aegypt; the people all slaine, and the Citie razed; Salomon re-built it.

To

To the East of this place is the Frontier Citie of Iefleri, of which Ios. 16. 3. otherwise Pelethi, whence Dauid had part of his Pratorian Souldiers, vnder the charge of Benaia. Then that high and famous Mountaine and Citie of Silo, whereon the Arke of God was kept so many yeeres, till the Philistims got it.

To this they ioyned the Citie of Machmas or Michmas: in which Ionathas Maccabens See in Beniamin. Min. Machab. 1. 9. v. 16.

was inhabited, a place often remembered in the Scriptures. It standeth in the common way from Samaria towards Hierusalem: and is now called Byra.

Then the Village of Naiioh where Saul prophesied; and neere it Ephron, one of those Cities which Abijah recovered from Ieroboam; after the great ouerthrow giuen him. Then Kibthaim, of the Leuites, of which Iosua 2. 1. 22. which Iunius thinks to be the same with Iokmeah, of which 1. Chro. 6. 28. As for Abisalom Baalasor, which they finde hereabout, Iunius reade it in the Plaine of Chatzor; and findes it in the Tribe of Iuda; as Ios. 15. we reade of two Chatzors in that Tribe; one neere Kedesh, v. 23. and the other the same as Chatzoron, v. 25.

In this Tribe also they finde the Citie of Mello; whose Citizens, they say, ioyned with the Sichemites in making the Bastard Abimelet King: adding that for the building thereof with other Cities, Salomon raised a Tribute vpon the people. But it seemes that Mello or Millo is a common name of a strong Fort or Cittadell: and so Iunius for domus Jud. 9. v. 56. c. 20.

Millo, reade in cole munitio, and for Salomo edificabit Millo, he reade edificabit munitio, and so the Septuagint reade in that place. And without doubt the Millo which Salomon built, cannot be that of Sichem, but another in Hierusalem.

The other Cities of marke in Ephraim, are Taphuach, whose King was slaine by Iosua, and Lanoach or Lanoah spoyled by Teglarphalasar; Pekah then gouerning Israel; with diuers others, but of no great fame. The Mountaines of Ephraim sometime signifie the greatest part of the Land of the Sonnes of Ioseph, on the West of Jordan: severall parts whereof are the Hill of Samron or Samaria, 1. Reg. 16. 24. * the Hill of Gahas, Judg. 2. 9. the Hill of Tsalmon or Salmon, Judg. 9. 48. the Hills of the Region of Tajuph or Tsophim, Judg. 9. 5. where Rama-Tsophim stood, which was the Citie of Samuel.

The great plenty of fruitfull Vines vpon the sides of the Mountaines, was the occasion that Jacob in the Spirit of Prophecie, Gen. 49. 22. compared Iosephs two branches, Ephraim and Manasse, to the branches of a fruitfull Vine planted by the Well side, and spreading her. Daughter-branches along the Wall: which Allegory also Ezekiel, c. 22. in his Lamentation for Ephraim (that is, for the tenne Tribes, whose head was Ephraim) prophesies: as also in his Lamentation for Iuda, he followeth the other Allegorie of Iacob, Gen. 49. 9. comparing Iuda to a Lyon. Vpon the top of one of the highest of these Hills of Ephraim, which ouer-looketh all the plaines on both sides of Jordan, they finde the Cattle called Dok: which they make to be the same with Dagon, of which Ioseph. 1. Bell. Judg. 2. 2. in which Cattle as it is, 1. Macc. 16. Ptolomie most traiterously, at a banquet, slew Simon Maccabens his Father in Law.

Among the Riuer of this Tribe of Ephraim, they name Gaas, remembered in the second of Samuel, c. 23. v. 30. where though Iunius reade Hiddai ex vna vallium Gabasi: yet the Vulgar and Vatablus reade Giddai of the Riuer of Gaas. Also in this Tribe they place the Riuer of Carith, by which the Prophet Elias abode during the great drought: where he was fed with the Rauens: and after that the Riuer was dried vp, he trauailed (by the Spirit of God guided) towards Sidon: where he was relieved by the poore Widow of Zarepta, whose dead sonne he reuiued, and increased her pittance of Meale and Oyle: whereby she sustained her life.

§. II.

Of the Kings of the ten Tribes from Ieroboam to Achab.

Of the first Kings of Israel, I omit in this place to speake: and referue it to the Catalogue of the Kings of Iuda: of whom hereafter.

Touching the acts of the Kings of the ten Tribes, but briefly, beginning after the diuision from Iuda and Beniamin, now it followeth to speake. The first of these Kings Ieroboam, the sonne of Nebat, an Ephraimite of Zereda, who being a man of strength & courage, was by Salomon made ouer-seeer of the buildings of the Munitio in Hierusalem, for as much as belonged to the charge of the Tribes of Ephraim & Manasse: & so many of them as wrought in those works. During which time as he went from Hierusalem.

Hli

Hierusalem.

Salem, he encountered the Prophet Ahijah : who made him know that hee was by God destined to be King of Israel : and to command ten of the twelue Tribes. After this fearing that those things might come to Salomons knowledge, he fled into Egypt to Shishak, whom Eusebius calleth Osochore, whose Daughter he married : the Predecessor of which Shishak (if not the same) did likewise entertaine Adad the Idumean, when he was carried yong into Egypt from the furie of Dauid, and his Captaine Ioab; which Adad, the King of Egypt married to his Wiues sister Taphnes; vsing both him and Ieroboam as instruments to shake the Kingdome of Iudea; that himselfe might the easier spoile it, as he did : for in the fift yeare of Rehoboam, Shishak sackt the Citie of Hiersusalem, and carried thence all the treasure of Dauid and Salomon, and all the spoiles which Dauid tooke from Adadazer of Soba, with the presents of Tohu, King of Hamath, which were of an inestimable value.

This Ieroboam after the death of Salomon became Lord of the ten Tribes : and though he were permitted by God to gouerne the Israelites, and from a meane man exalted to that state : yet preferring the policies of the world before the seruice and honour of God (as fearing that if the Tribes vnder his rule should repaire to Hiersusalem to doe their vsuall Sacrifices, they might be drawne from him by degrees) he erected two golden Calues, one in Dan, and another in Bethel, for the people to worship (an imitation of the Egyptian Apis, saith S. Ambrose, or rather of Aarons Calfe in Horeb) further he made election of his Priests out of the basest and vnlearned people. This King made his chiefe seate and Palace at Sichem : Hee despised the warning of the Iudean Prophet, whom Iosephus calleth Adon, and Glycas Isaiah : his hand there-after withered, and was againe restored : but continuing in his Idolatry, and hardened vpon occasion that the Prophet returning was slaine by a Lyon, Ahijah makes him know, that God purposed to roote out his posterity.

He was afterward ouerthrowne by Abia King of Iuda, and died after hee had gouerned two and twenty yeeres; whom Nadab his son succeeded : who in the second yeere of his raigne, together with all the race of Ieroboam was slaine, and rooted out by Baasha, who rained in his stead : so Nadab liued King but two yeeres.

Baasha the sonne of Ahijah, the third King after the partition, made warre with Asa King of Iuda : hee seated himselfe in Thersa : and fortified Rama against Iuda, to restraime their excursions. Hereupon Asa entertained Benhadad of Damascus against him, who inuaded Nepthalim, and destroyed many places therein : the meane while Asa carried away the Materials, with which Baasha intended to fortifie Rama; but being an Idolater, he was threatened by Iehu the Prophet, that it should befall his race, as it did to Ieroboam : which afterward came to passe : He ruled foure and twenty yeeres and died.

To Baasha succeeded Ela his sonne, who at a feast at his Palace of Thersa, was in his cups slaine by Zambris after he had rained two yeeres : and in him the prophcie of Iehu was fulfilled.

Zambris succeeded Ela, and assumed the name of a King seauen dayes; But Ambris in reuenge of the Kings Murder, set vpon Zambris, or Zimri, and inclosed him in Thersa, and forst him to burne himselfe.

Ambris or Humri succeeded Ela, and transferred the Regall seate from Thersa to Samaria : which he bought of Shemer, built, and fortified it. This Ambris was also an Idolater, no lesse impious than the rest : and therefore subiect to Tabremmon, King of Syria; the Father of Benadad according to Eusebius Nicephorus, and Zonaras : but how this should stand, I doe not well conceiue; seeing Benadad the Sonne of Tabremmon was inuited by Asa King of Iuda, to assaile Baasha King of Israel, the Father of Ela who forewent Ambris. This Ambris rained twelue yeeres, fixe in Thersa, and fixe in Samaria, and left two children, Achab and Atalia.

§. III.

Of Achab and his Successors, with the captiuitie of the ten Tribes.

Achab or Abah succeeded Omri, who not onely vp-held the Idolatry of Ieroboam, borrowed of the Egyptians : but he married Iezabel the Zidonian : and as Ieroboam followed the Religion of his Egyptian Wife: so did Achab of his Zidonian.

nian : and erected an Altar and a Groue to Baal in Samaria. He suffered Iezabel to kill the Prophets of the most high God. God sent famine on the Land of Israel. Achab met Elias : Elias preuailed in the triall of the Sacrifice, and killeth the false Prophets : and afterward flyeth for feare of Iezabel.

Benadad, not long after, besieged Samaria : and taken by Achab, was by him set at libertie : for which the Prophet (whom Glycas calleth Michaeas) reproveth him : afterward he caused Naboth by a false accusation to be stoned. Then ioyning with Iosaphat in the warre for the recovery of Ramoth, he was slaine as Michaeas had foretold him.

Hee had three sonnes named in the Scripture, Ochozias, Ioram, and Ioas : besides seauentie other sonnes by sundry wiues and Concubines.

Ochozias succeeded his father Achab. The Moabites fell from his obedience : he brui- selfe by a fall : and sent for counsaile to Beelzebub the God of Achaz. Eliab the Prophet meeteth the messenger on the way : and misliking that Ochozias sought helpe from that dead Idoll, asked the messenger, If there were not a God in Israel? Ochozias sendeth two Captaines, and with each fiftie souldiers to bring Eliab vnto him, both which with their Attendants were consumed with fire. The third Captaine besought mercie at Eliab's hands, and he spared him, and went with him to the king; auowing it to the king that he must then die, which came to passe in the second yeare of his raigne.

Ioram the brother of Ochozias by Iezabel, succeeded : He allured Iosaphat king of Iuda, and the king of Edom to assist him against the Moabites, who refused to pay him the tribute of 20000. sheepe. The three kings wanted water, for themselves and their Horses, in the Deserts. The Prophet Elisha causeth the ditches to flow. The Moabites are ouerthrowne: their king flyeth to Kirharaseth, and being besieged, according to some Expositors, burnt his sonne on the wals as a Sacrifice, whereat the three kings moued with compassion, returned and left Moab, waisting and spoiling that Region. Others, as it seemes with better reason, vnderstand the Text to speake of the sonne of the king of Edom, whom they suppose in this irruption to haue beene taken prisoner by the Moabites, and that the king of Moab shewed him ore the wals, threatening, vnlesse the siege were dissolved, that he would offer him in sacrifice to his Gods. Whereupon the king of Edom besought those of Iuda and Israel to breake off the siege for the safety of his sonne : which when the other kings refused to yeeld vnto, & that Moab according to his former threatening had burnt the king of Edom's sonne vpon the rampire, that all the assailants might disceime it, the king of Edom being by this sad spectacle enraged, forsooke the party of the other kings; for want of whose assistance the siege was broken vp.

After this the king of Aram sent to Ioram, to heale Naaman the Captaine of his Armie of the Leprosie. The answere of Ioram was; Am I God to kill, and to giue life, that he doth send to heale a man from his Leprosie? adding, that the Aramite fought but matter of quarrell against him. Elisha hearing thereof, willed the king to send Naaman to him; promising that hee should know that there was a Prophet in Israel, and so Naaman was healed by washing himselfe seauen times in Jordan. Elisha refused the gifts of Naaman. But his seruant Gehazi accepted a part thereof : from whence the sellers of spirituall gifts are called Gehazites, as the buyers are Simonians of Simon Magus.

Afterward Benhadad king of Aram or Damascus, hauing heard that this Prophet did discouer to the king of Israel whatsoever the Aramite consulted in his secretest counsell, sent a troupe of horse to take Elisha : all whom Elisha strooke blinde, and brought them captiues into Samaria : Ioram then asked leaue of the Prophet to slay them, Elisha forbade him to harme them : but caused them to be fed and sent back to their own Prince in safetie.

The king of Aram notwithstanding these benefits, did againe attempt Samaria, and brought the Citizens to extreame famine. Ioram imputeth the cause thereof to the Prophet Elisha. Elisha by prayer caused a noise of Chariots and armour to found in the ayre, whereby the Aramites affrighted, fled away, and left the siege; an act of great admiration, as the same is written in the second of Kings. After this, when Azuel obtained the kingdome of Syria by the death of his Maister, Ioram entring vpon his frontire, tooke Ramoth Gilead : in which war he receiued diuers wounds, and returned to Iezabel to be cured. But whilest he lay there, Iehu (who commanding the armie of Ioram in Gilead, was anointed king by one of the children of the Prophets sent by Elisha) surprized

and slew both him and all that belonged vnto him, rooting out the whole posteritie of Ahab.

Iehu who reigned after Iehoram, destroyed not onely the race of his fore-goers, but also their religion; for which he receiued a promise from God, That his seed should occupie the Throne vnto the fourth generation. Yet hee vpheld the idolatry of Ieroboam, for which he was plagued with greuous warre, wherein hee was beaten by Hazeel the Aramite, who spoiled all the Countries to the East of Jordan: in which warre hee was slaine, saith Cedrenus: whereof the Scriptures are silent. Iehu reigned 28. yeeres.

Ioachaz or Iehoahaz the sonne of Iehu succeeded his father, whom Azael and his son Benhadad often inuaded, and in the end subiected, leauing him onely 50. horse, 20. chariots, and 10000. foot; and as it is written in the Scriptures, he made them like dust beaten into powder. Ioachaz reigned 17. yeeres.

After Ioachaz Ioas his sonne gouerned Israel, who when hee repaired to Elisba the Prophet as hee lay on his death-bed, the Prophet promised him three victories ouer the Aramites: and first commanded him to lay his hand on his bowe, and Elisba couered the Kings hands with his, and bad him open the window westward (which was toward Damascus) and then shoot an arrow thence out. Hee againe willed him to beate the ground with his arrows, who smote it thrice, and ceased: The Prophet then told him, that hee should haue smitten five or six times; and then he should haue had so many victories ouer the Aramites as he gaue strokes. And so it succeeded with Ioas, who ouerthrew the Aramites in three battels, and recovered the Cities and Territorie from Benhadad the sonne of Azael, which his Father Ioachaz had lost. He also ouerthrew Anaxia King of Juda, who prouoked him to make the warre, whereupon he entred Hierusalem, and sacked it with the Temple. This Ioas reigned sixteene yeeres and died; in whose time also the Prophet Elisba exchanged this life for a better.

Ieroboam the third from Iehu, followed Ioas his father, an Idolater as his predecessors; but he recovered all the rest of the lands belonging to Israel, from Hamath which is neere Libanus, to the dead Sea, and reigned one and forty yeeres.

Zacharias the fift & last of the house of Iehu, slaine by Shallum his vassal, who reigned in his stead, gouerned six moneths. Shallum held the kingdome but one month, being slaughtered by Menahem of the Gadites.

Menahem who tooke reuenge of Shallum, vsed great cruelty to those that did not acknowledge him: ripping the bellies of those that were with childe. This Menahem being inuaded by Phul, bought his peace with ten thousand talents of siluer, which hee exacted by a Tribute of fifty shekels from euery man of wealth in Israel. Menahem gouerned twenty yeeres.

Pekahiah or Phaceia, or after Zonaras Phaceia, succeeded, and after hee had ruled two yeeres, he was slaine by Phaca or Pekah the Commander of his army, who reigned in his place. In this Pekahs time, Phulassar or Tiglat-Phylassar inuaded the kingdome of Israel, and wan Iion, Abel-Bethmaaca, Ianoach, Kedesb, Hafor, and Gilead, with all the Cities of Galilee, carrying them captiues into Assyria: he was drawne in by Achas king of Judea against Pekah and Rezin, the last of the Adades. For Achas being wasted by Pekah of Israel, and by Rezin of Damascus, did a third time borrow the Church riches, & therewith engaged the Assyrian, who first suppressed the Monarchy of Syria and Damascus, and then of Israel: and this inuading of the great Assyrian, was the vtter ruine of both States, of Israel and of Judea. Pekah reigned twenty yeeres.

Then Hoshea or Osea, who slew Pekah, became the vassall of Salmanassar; but hoping to shake off the Assyrian yoke, he sought aide from So, or Sua, or Sebicur king of Egypt: which being knowne to the Assyrian, he cast him into prison, besieged Samaria, and mastered it: carried thence idolatrous Tribes into Ninui in Assyria, and into Rages in Mesopotamia, and into other Easterne Regions, and there dispersed them: and replanted Samaria with diuers Nations, and chiefly with the Cutha (inhabiting about Cutha a riuer in Perfia, or rather in Arabia Deserta) and with the people Catanei bounding vpon Syria, and with those of Sepharuajim (a people of Sephar in Mesopotamia vpon Euphrates, of whose conquest Senacherib vaunteth) also with those of Aua, which were of the ancient Auims, who inhabited the Land of the Philistims in Abrahams time, dwelling neere vnto Gath, whom the Caphtorims rooted out: and at this time they were of Arabia the Desert, called Hauai, willing to returne to their ancient seates. To these he added those of Chamath or Iurea, the ancient enemies of the Israelites, and sometime the Vassalls of the Adades of Damascus, which so often afflicted them. And thus did this Assyrian aduise himselfe better than the Romanes did. For after Titus and Vespasian had wasted the Cities of Iudea, and Hierusalem, they carried the people away captiue: but left no others in their places, but a very few simple labourers, besides their owne thin Garrisons, which soone decayed: and thereby they gaue that dangerous entrance to the Arabians and Saracens, who neuer could be driuen thence againe to this day.

And this transmigration, plantation, and displantation, hapned in the yeare of the world 3292. the sixth yeare of Ezekiah King of Juda: and the ninth of Hoshea the last 10 King of Israel.

§. 1.

Of Dan, whereof Ioppe, Gath, Accaron, Azor, and other Townes.

Now following the coast of the Mediterran Sea, that portion of Land assigned to the Tribe of Dan, ioyneth to Ephraim, whereof I spake last: of which family there were numbered at Mount Sinai 62700. fighting men, all which leauing their bodies with the rest in the Desarts; there entred the Holy Land of their sons 66400. bearing armes. The first famous Citie in this Tribe on the Sea-coast was Ioppe, or Iapho, as in the 19. of Iosua: one of the most ancientest of the World, and the most famous of others on that coast, because it was the Port of Hierusalem. From hence Ionas embarked himselfe when he fled from the seruice of God, towards Tharsis in Cilicia. In the time of the Machabees this Citie receiued many changes: and while Iudas Macchabeus gouerned the Jewes, the Syrians that were Garrisons in Ioppe, hauing their fleet in the Port, inuited 200. principall Citizens aboard them, and cast them all into the Sea: which Iudas reuenged by firing their fleet, and putting the companies which sought to escape to the sword.

It was twice taken by the Romanes, and by Cestius the Lieutenant utterly burnt and ruined. But in the yeere of Christ, 1250. Lodowick the French King gaue it new Wall and Towers: It is now the Turkes, and called Iaffa. There are certaine Rockes in that Port, wherunto it is reported, that Andromeda was fastned with chaines: & from thence deliuered from the Sea-Monster by Perseus. This Fable (for so I take it) is confirmed by Iosephus, Solinus, and Plinie. Marcus Scaurus during his office of Adileship, shewed the bones of this Monster to the people of Rome. S. Hierome vpon Ionas speaks of it indifferently.

The next vnto Ioppe was Iamnia, where Iudas Macchabeus burnt the rest of the Syri. An fleet: the fire and flame wherof was seene at Hierusalem 240. furlongs off. It had 10 sometime a Bishops seate, saith Will. of Tyre; But there is no signe of it at this time, that such a place there was.

After Iamnia is the Citie of Geth or Gath, sometime Anthedon, saith Volaterran. And so Montanus seemes to vnderstand it. For he sets it next to Egypt, of all the Philistim Cities, and in the place of Anthedon. But Volaterran giues neither reason nor authority for his opinion; for Ptolomie sets Anthedon farre to the South of Ioppe: And Geth was the first and not the last (beginning from the North) of all the great Cities of the Philistims: and about sixteene miles from Ioppe; where S. Hierome in his time found a great Village of the same name. It was sometime the Habitation and Seminarie of the Anakims: strong and Giant-like-men, whom Iosua could not expell, nor the Danites after 20 him: nor any of the Israelites, till Dauids time: who slew Goliath, as his Captaines did diuers others, not much inferiour in strength and stature vnto Goliath.

Roboam the Sonne of Salomon rebuilt Geth: Ozias the sonne of Amazias destroyed it againe. It was also laid waste by Azazel King of Syria. Fulke the fourth King of Hierusalem, built a Castle in the same place out of the olde ruines. Whether this Geth was the same that Will. of Tyre in the holy Warre calls Ibgin, I much doubt: the error growing by taking Geth for Anthedon.

Not farre from Geth or Gath standeth Bethsems, or the house of the Sunne. In the fields adioyning to this City (as is thought) was the Arke of God brought by a yoke of two Kine, turned loose by the Philistims: and the Bethsemites presuming to lookethere-30 in, there were slain of the Elders 70. and of the people 50000. by the ordinance of God. After which slaughter & the great lamentation of the people: it was called the great Abel, saith S. Hierome. Benedictus Theologus finds three other Cities of this name: one in Nephtalim: another in Juda: and another in Isachar. Hierome finds a fifth in Beniamin. Keeping the Sea-Coast, the strong City of Accaron offeth it selfe, sometime one of the five Satrapies, or Governments of the Philistims. S. Hierome makes it the same with Casaria Palestina. Plinie confounds it with Apollonia: It was one of those that defended it selfe against the Canites & Judeans. It worshipped Beel-zebub the God of Hornets or Flies. To which Idoll it was that Ahaziah King of Israel, sent to enquire of his health: whose messengers Elijah meeting by the way, caused them to returne, with a for-40 rowfull answer to their Master. This City is remembred in many places of Scripture.

Christianus Schrot placeth Azotus next to Geth, and then Accaron or Ekon. This Azotus or Asdod was also an habitation of the Anakims, whom Iosua failed to destroy, though he once possit their Citie. Heerein stood a sumptuous Temple, dedicated to the Idoll Dagon: the same Idoll which fell twice to the ground of it selfe, after the Ark of God was by the Philistims carried into their Temple: and in the second fall, it was utterly broken and defaced. Neere it was that famous Iudas Macchabeus slain by Bacchides and Alcimus, the Lieutenants of Demetrius. Afterward it was taken by Ionathas: and the rest of the Citizens being put to the sword, all that fled into the Temple of Dagon, were with their Idoll therein consumed with fire: neere which also hee ouerthrew 50 Apollonius.

Gabinus the Romane re-built it. It had a Bishops seate while Christianity flourished in those parts. But in S. Hieromes time it was yet a faire Village. And this was the last of the Sea-Townes within the Tribe of Dan.

The Citties which are within the Land Eastward from Azotus, and beyond the Fountaine of Ethiopia, wherein Philip the Apostle baptized the Eunuch, are Tsorah, or Sarara, and Eschaol, and between them Castra Danis neere Hebron: though this place where Sampson was borne, may seeme by the words, Iud. 18. 12. to bee in the Tribe of Judah,

Judah, as the other also were bordering Townes betweene Dan and Juda. After these within the bounds of Juda, but belonging to the Danites, they finde Ge- dor, as it is 1. Mac. 15. Cedron, which Cendebeus the Lieutenant of Antiochus fortified against the Iewes, and neere which himselfe was by the Macchabees ouerthrowne. 1. Mac. 15. 16.

Then Modin the Natiue Citie of the Macchabees: and wherein they were buried, on whose Sepulcher the seuen Marble Pillars, which were erected of that heighth, as they serued for a marke to the Sea-men, remained many hundreds of yeeres after their first setting vp, as Brachard and Breidenbach witness.

There are besides these the Citie of Cariathiarim, that is, the Citie of the woods: seated in the border of Juda, Beniamin, and Dan, wherein the Arke of God remained twenty yeeres in the house of Aminadab: till such time as Dauid carried it thence to Hierusalem: Of this place (as they say) was Zacharias the sonne of Barachias, or Ichoida, who was slaine betweene the Temple and the Altar: also Urias whom Ioachim King of Hierusalem slaughtered as we finde in Jeremie. Many other places which they place in this Tribe, rather as I take it vpon presumption than warrant, I omitte: as that of Caspin taken with great slaughter by Iudas Macchabeus: and Lachis, whose King was slaine by Iosua, in which also Amazias was slaine: The same which Senacherib tooke, Ezekias raigning in Juda.

Of other Cities belonging to this Tribe, see in Iosua C. 19. from the Verse 41. where also it is added that the Danites portion was too little for their number of Families: and therefore that they invaded Lehem, and inhabited it: which City after amplified by Philip the brother of Herod Antipas, was called Casarea Philippi, as before, and made the Metropolis of Ituraa, and Trachonitis: of which coasts this Philip was Tetrarch: but of this Citie see more in Nephtalim. In this Tribe there are no Mountaines of fame.

It hath two Riueres or Torrents: the Norther-most riseth out of the Mountaines of Juda: and passing by Modin, falleth into the Sea by Sachrona. The other hath the name of Sorek or Sored, whose banks are plentifull of Vines which haue no feedes or stones: The wine they yeeld is red, of excellent colour, taste, and sauour, &c. In this Valley of Sorek, so called from the Riuer, inhabited Dalila whom Sampson loued.

§. II.

THE TRIBE OF SIMEON.

The Tribe of Simeon takes vp the rest of the Sea-coast of Canaan, to the border of Egypt: who being the second Sonne of Iacob by Lea, there were increased of that Familie while they abode in Egypt, as they were numbred at Mount Sinai, 59300. able men, all which ending their liues in the Desarts, there entred the Land of Promise of their issues 22200. bearing armes, who were * in part mixed with Juda, 40 and in part seuered, inhabiting a smal Territorie on the Sea-coast, belonging to Edumaea, of which the first Citie adioyning to Dan, was Ascalon.

The Reguli or pettie Kings thereof were called Ascalonites: of which Volaterran out of Xanthus, in the Historie of the Lydians, reports, that Tantalus and Ascalus were the sons of Hymenaeus: and that Ascalus being employed by Acimius King of the Lydians, with an Armie in Syria, falling in loue with a young Woman of that Countrie, built this Citie, and called it after his owne name: the same hath Nicolaus in his Historie, saith Volaterran.

Diodorus Siculus in his third booke remembreth a Lake neere Ascalon, wherein there hath bene a Temple dedicated to Derceto, the Goddesse of the Syrians; hauing the face 50 of a Woman, and the bodie of a Fish: who, as I haue said before, in the storie of Ninus, was the Mother of Semiramis, fained to be cast into this Lake, and fedde and releued by Doues. And therefore was the Doue worshipped both in Babylonia and Syria, of which Tibullus the Poet:

Alba Palestina sancta Columba Syro.

The white Doue is for holy held, in Syria Palestina.

It was one of the chiefeft and strongest Cities of the Philistims. It bred many learned men men (saith Volaterran) as Antiochus, Sofus, Cygnus, Dorotheus the Historian, and Artemidorus, who wrote the storie of Bithynia.

In Ascalon, as some say, was that wicked Herod borne, that seeking after our Sauour, caused all the Male-children of two yeeres olde and vnder to be slaine. In the Christian times it had a Bishop, and after that, when it was by the Saladine defaced, Richard King of England, while he made Warre in the Holy Land, gaue it a new wall and many buildings. Eius muros cum Saladinus diruisset, Richardus Anglorum Rex instaurauit, saith A. drichomius.

In Dauids time it was one of the most renowned Cities of the Philistims: for hee nameth Gath and Ascalon onely, when he lamenteth the death of Saul and Jonathan: not speaking of the other three. Tell it not in Gath, nor publish it not in the streetes of Ascalon: It is now called Scalome. Gabinus restored it as he did Azotus and Gaza.

Next to Ascalon stood Gaza or Gazera, which the Hebrewes call Hazza, the Syrians Azan: of Azonus (as they say) the sonne of Hercules. Other prophane writers affirme, that it was built by Iupiter. Pomp. Mela giues the building thereof to Cambyfes the Persian, because belike hee re-built it, and Gaza in the Persian tongue is as much to say as Treasure. This Gaza was the first of the five Satrapies of the Philistims: and the South bound of the Land of Canaan towards Egypt. But this Citie was farre more ancient than Cambyfes, as it is prooued by many Scriptures. It was once taken by Caleb: but the strength of the Anakims put him from it. At such time as Alexander Macedon 20 inualed the Empire of Persia, it receiued a Garrison for Darius: in despight whereof it was by the Macedonians after a long siege demolished, & was called Gaza of the Desert.

Alexander Linnus King of the Iewes surprized it: and slew five hundred Senators in the Temple of Apollo which fled thither for Sanctuary: but this Gaza was not set vp in the same place againe, to wit, on the foundations which Alexander Macedon had ouerturned, but somewhat neerer the Sea side: though the other was but two mile off. It was a Towne of great account in the time of the Macchabees, and gaue many wounds to the Iewes till it was forst by Simon: of which hee made so great account, as that hee purposed to reside therein himselfe, and in his absence left John his Sonne and Successor to bee Gouernour. In Brochard his time it was still a goodly Citie, and knowne by the 30 name of Gazara.

At the very out-let of the Riner of Besor, standeth Maioma the Port of Gaza: to which the priuiledge of a Citie was giuen by the great Constantine, and the place called Constantance after the name of the Eupérons Sonne. But Julian the Apostata soone after flourishing the Gazeans, made it subiect vnto them, and commanded it to bee called Gaza 40 maritima.

On the other side of Besor, standeth Anthedon, defaced by Alexander Ianneus, restored by Herod, and called Agrippias, after the name of Agrippa, the favorite of Augustus.

Then Raphia, where Philopater ouerthrew the great Antiochus: and beyond it Rhinocura, whose Torrent is knowne in the Scriptures by the name of * the Torrent of Egypt, 40 till the Septuagint conuerted it Rinocura: to difference it, Es. 27. 12. giuing the name of the Citie to the Torrent that watereth it. Plinie calls it Rhinocolora; and Iosephus, Rhinocorura: a Epiphanius reports it as a Tradition, that at this place the world was diuided by lot, betwene the three Sonnes of Noah.

Within the Land and vpon the Riuier of Besor they place Gerar: which the Scripture placeth between Kadesh & Shur, Gen. 20. 1. That it was neere to the Wildernesse of Beer-shebah, it appeares Gen. 20. 3 1. and therefore no maruell that as elsewhere Beer-shebah, so sometime Gerar, bee made the South bound of Canaan. It was of olde a distinct Kingdome from the Philistim Satrapies, the Kings by one common name were called Abimelechs; Saint Hierome saith that afterward it was called Regio salutaris; the heathly Countie: 50 so that it was no maruell that Abraham and Isaac liued much in those parts. Of King Asa's conquest of the Cities about Gerar, see 2. Chron. 14. 14.

More within the Land was Siceleg or Tsiglak, which was burnt by the Amalekites, when Dauid in his flying from Saul to the Philistims had left his carriages there, but Dauid followed them ouer the Riuier of Besor, and put them to the slaughter, and recovered the prey.

Next Dabir sometime Cariath-Sepher, the Citie of Letters, the Vniuersitie, as they say, or Academie of old Palestine. In Saint Hieromes time it seemes it had the name of 60

Diama: Iosua 15. 49. it is called Vrbs Sanna: from the name, as it seemes, of some of the Anakims, as Hebron was called Vrbs Arbahi. For euen hence also were these Giants expelled. It was taken chiefly by Othniel, encouraged by Calebs promise of his Daughter 10 in marriage: but that Iosua and the Hoast of Israel were at the surprize, it appeares Ios. 10. 39. This Citie Ios. 21. 15. is named among those which out of Simeon and Iuda were giuen to the Leuites. And hence it seemes they attribute it to this Tribe.

Besides these, there are many others in the Tribe of Simeon, but of lesse fame, as Hajin, of which Ios. 19. 7. which also Ios. 21. 16. is reckoned for one of the Cities of the Leuites, giuen out of the portion of Iuda and Simeon (for which Iunius thinkes Halbam is named 10 1. Chron. 6. 59. though in the place of Iosua these two are distinguished) also Tholad * And also so named 1. Chron. 4. 29. for which Iosua 19. 4. wee haue Eltholad. Chatzar-Susa so named Iosua 19. 5. for which Iosua 15. we haue Chatzar-Gadda, both names agreeing in 15 signification: for Gadda is Turma, and Susa Equitatus.

In the same places of Iosua and of the Chronicles Chorma is named, which they thinke to be the same with that of which Numb. 14. 45. to which the Amalekites and Canaanites pursued the Israelites. But that Chorma cannot be in Simeon, nor within the Mountaines of Edumea. For Israel fled not that way: but backe againe to the Campe, which lay to the South of Edumea, in the Desert.

The same places also name Beer-sheba in this Tribe: so called of the Oath betwene 20 Abraham and Abimelec: neere vnto which Hagar wandered with her Sonne Ismael. It was also called the Citie of Isaac, because hee dwelt long there. While the Christians held the Holy Land, they laboured much to strengthen this place, standing on the border of the Arabian Desert, and in the South bound of Canaan. It hath now the name of Gbe-lin. The other Cities of Simeon which are named in the places of Iosua, and of the Chronicles about noted, because they helpe vs nothing in storie, I omit them. In the time of Ezekia King of Iuda, certaine of this Tribe being strengthened in their owne Territories, 30 passed to * Gedor, as it is, 1. Chron. 4. 39. (the same place which Ios. 15. 36. is called Gedera and Gederothaima) which at that time was inhabited by the issue of Cham: where they scared themselves: as also five hundred others of this Tribe, destroyed the Reliques of Amalec in the Mountaines of Edom, and dwelt in their places. The Mountaines within this Tribe are few, and that of Sampson the chiefeft: vnto which hee carried the Gate-post of Gaza. The Riuers are Besor, and the Torrent of Egypt called Shichar, as is noted in Assef.

§. III.

THE TRIBE OF IUDA.

40  Iuda the fourth Sonne of Isaac by Lea, there were multiplied in Egypt 74600. All which (Caleb excepted) perished in the Deserts. And of their sonnes there entered the Land of Canaan 76500. bearing armes: Agreeable to the greatnesse of this number was the greatest Territorie giuen, called afterward Iudea: within the bounds whereof were the portions allotted to Dan and Simeon included. And many Cities named in those Tribes, did first, as they say, belong vnto the Children of Iuda: who had a kinde of Soueraignie ouer them: as Succoth, Cariatiarim, Lachis, Bethsemes, Tiglag, Beer-sheba, and others. The multitude of people within this small Prouince (if it be meated by that ground giuen to this Tribe onely) were incredible, if the witnesse of the Scriptures had not warranted the report. For when Dauid numbered the people, they were found five hundred thousand fighting men.

50 The Cities of Iuda were many. But I will remember the chiefeft of them: beginning with Arad, or Horma, which standeth in the entrance of Iudea from Idumea: whose King first surprized the Israelites as they passed by the border of Canaan towards Moab, and tooke from them some spoyles, and many prisoners: who being afterward ouerthrown by the Israelites, the sonnes of Keni, the Kinsmen of Moses, obtained a possession in that Territorie: who before the comming of the Israelites, dwelt betwene Madian and Amalec.

Following this Frontier towards Idumea and the South, Ascensus Scorpionis, or Acrab- 60 bim is placed: the next to Arad: so called because of Scorpions, which are said to bee in that that place: from which name of Acrabbim, Hierome thinks that the name of the Toparchie called Acrabathena was denominated: of which we haue spoken in Manasses. On the South side also of Iudea they place the Cities of Iagur, Dimona, Adada, Cedes, Alma, Iethnam, and Afor or Chasfor, most of them Frontier Townes.

And then Zipp: of which there are two places so called: one besides this in the body of Juda, of which the Desart and Forrest adioyning tooke name: where Dauid hid himselfe from Saul. After these are the Cities of Efron, Adar, Karkah and Asemora, or Hajfmon, of no great fame.

Turning now from Idumaea towards the North, wee finde the Cities of Danna, Shemah, Amam, the other Afor, or Chasfor, Behaloth, and the two Sochoes: of all which see Iof. 15. also Carioth by Iofua. c. 15. v. 25. called Kerioth: whence Judas the Traitor was called If-carioth, as it were a man of Carioth. Then Hetham the abode of Sampson which Rehoboam recified. Beyond these towards the North border, and towards Eleutheropolis, is the Citie of Iethar, or Iatthir, belonging to the Leuites. In Saint Hieromes time it was called Iethira: and inhabited altogether with Christians: neere vnto this City was that remarkable battaile fought betwene Asa King of Juda, and Zara King of the Arabians, who brought into the field a Million of fighting men: and was notwithstanding beaten and put to flight: Asa following the victory as farre as Gerar, which at the same time he recovered.

Not farre from Iether, standeth Iarmuth, whose King was slaine by Iofua, and the City ouerturned. Next vnto it is Maresa the natie Citie of the Prophet Michea: Betwene it and Odolla, Judas Macchabeus ouerthrew Gorgias, and sent thence ten thousand Draques of siluer to be offered for Sacrifice.

Odolla or Ha-Illum it selfe was an ancient and magnificent Citie, taken by Iofua, and the King thereof slaine. Jonathas Macchabeus beautified it greatly. Then Celsor or Kels afterward Echela, where Dauid sometime hid himselfe: and which afterward he deliuered from the assaults of the Philistims: neere which the Prophet Abacuc was buried: whose monument remained, and was seene by S. Hierome.

Neere it is Hebron, sometime called the Citie of Arbah, for which the Vulgar hath Cariatharbe: the reason of this name they giue as if it signified the Citie of foure: because the foure Patriarchs, Adam, Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, were therein buried, but of Adam it is but supposed: and it is plaine by the places, Iofua 14. 14. and 15. 13. and 20. 11. that Arbah here doth not signifie foure, but that it was the name of the Father of the Giants called Anakim, whose sonnes it seemes Anak was: and Achiman, Shesbui, and Tilmai (whom Caleb expelled, Iof. 15.) were he sons of this Anak, Num. 13. 23. The name of Anak signifieth Torquem, a chaine worne for ornament; and it seemes that this Anak enriched by the spoiles which himselfe and his Father got, wore a chaine of gold, and so got this name: and leauing the custome to his posteritie, left also the name: so that in Latine the name of Anakim may not amisse be expounded by Torquati.

The Citie Hebron was one of the ancientest Cities of Canaan, built seuen yeres before Tsoar or Tanis in Egypt: and it was the head and chiefe Citie of the Anakims, whom Caleb expelled: to whom it was in part giuen, to wit, the Villages adioyning, and the rest to the Leuites. It had a Bishop in the Christian times, and a magnificent Temple built by Helen the Mother of Constantine.

Not farre hence they finde Eleutheropolis or the free Citie, remembred often by Saint Hierome. Then Eglon whose King Dabir associated with the other foure Kings of the Amorites, to wit, of Hierusalem, Hebron, Iarmuth, and Lachis, besieging the Gibeonites, were by Iofua utterly ouerthrowne. From hence the next Citie of fame was Emaus, afterward Nicopolis, one of the Cities of Gouernment or Presidencies of Iudea. In fight of this Citie Judas Macchabeus (after hee had formerly beaten both Apollonius and Seron) gaue a third ouerthrow to Gorgias Lieutenant to Antiochus.

In the year 1301. it was ouerturned by an earth-quake, saith Eusebius. In the Christian times it had a Bishops seate of the Diocese of Casaria of Palestine.

From Emaus toward the West Sea there are the Cities of Nahama, Bethdagon, and Gader or Gedera, or Gederothaima, of which and of Gederoth Iof. 15. v. 36. and 41. Then Azecha, to which Iofua followed the slaughter of the five Kings before named, a Citie of great great strength in the Valley of Terebinth, or Turpentine, as the Vulgar readeth, 1. Sam. 17. 2. whence (as it seemes) they feat it neere vnto Soco, and vnto Lebna of the Leuites.

Leuites. It resulted from the subiection of the Iewes while Ioram the sonne of Iosaphat ruled in Hierusalem: And next vnto this standeth Maceda, which Iofua utterly dispeopled.

On the other side of Emaus towards the East standeth Bethsur, otherwise Beethfora, and Bethfor: one of the strongest and most fought for places in all Juda. It is seated on a high Hill; and therefore called Bethsur (the house on the Rocks, or of strength.) It was fortified by Roboam, and afterward by Judas Macchabeus. Lysias fort. it; and Antiochus Eutapor by familie: Jonathas regained it: and it was by Simon exceedingly fortified against the Syrian Kings.

Bethsur is the next vnto it within fixe miles of Hierusalem, otherwise Lebeth: sometime Ephrata; which name, they say, it had of Calebs wife, when as it is so called by Mose: before Caleb was famous in those parts, Gen. 38. 16. Of this Citie was Abessan: or Israhel, Judge of Israel, after Iephthah, famous for the thirty Sonnes and thirty Daughters begotten by him. Elimelec was also a Bethlemite, who with his wife Naomi sojournd in Moab during the famine of Juda in the time of the Judges, with whom Ruth the daughter in law of Naomi returned to Bethlem: and married Booz, of whom Obed, of whom Israhel, of whom Dauid. It had also the honour to be the natie Citie of our Sauour Iesus Christ; and therefore shall the memorie thereof neuer end.

In Zabulon of Galilee there was also a Citie of the same name: and therefore was this 20 of our Sauour called Bethlem Iuda.

From Bethlem some foure or five mile standeth Thecua, the Citie of Amos the Prophet: and to this place adioyning is the Citie of Bethzacaria, in the way betwene Bethsur and Hierusalem: on whose Hills adioyning the glorious guilt shields of Antiochus shined like lamps of fire in the eyes of the Jewes. The Citie of Bezek was also neere vnto Bethlem, which Adoni-Bezek commanded, who had during his raigne tortur'd 70 Kings by cutting off the ioynts of their Fingers and Toes: and made them gather bread vnder his Table: but at length the same end befell himselfe by the sonnes of Juda, after they had taken him prisoner.

The rest of the Cities in this part (most of them of no great estimation) we may passe

30 by vntill wee come to the magnificent Castle of Herodium, which Herod erected on a Hill, mounting thereunto with 200. Marble steps, exceeding beautifull and strong. And towards the Dead Sea, and adioyning to the Desart of Israel, betwene it and Tekoa, is that climatus floridus, where in the time of Iehosaphat, the Jewes stood and lookt on the Madabites, Ammonites, and Edomites, massacring one another, when they had purposed to ioyne against Juda: neere which place is the Valley of blessing, where the Jewes the fourth day after, solemnely came and blessed God for so strange deliuerance.

Now the Cities of Juda which border the Dead Sea, are these; Aduran beautified by Roboam: and Tsohar which the Vulgar calleth Segor: so called because Lot in his praiser for it vged that it was but a little one: whence it was called Tsohar which signifieth a little one: when as the old name was Belah, as it is Gen. 14. 2. In the Romanes times it had a Garrison, and was called (as they say) Pannier: in Hieromes time Balexoma. Then Engaddi or Hen-gaddi, first Asafonthamar: neere vnto which are the Gardens of Balsammum, the most part of all which Trees Cleopatra Queene of Egypt sent for out of Iudea, and Herod who either feared or loued Antiochus her husband, caused them to be rooted vp and presented vnto her: which shee replanted neere Heliopolis in Egypt. This Citie was first taken by Chedorlaomer, and the Amorites thence expelled. It was one of the most remarkable Cities of Iudea; and one of the Presidencies thereof.

The rest of the Cities are many in the In-land, and among them Iesrahel, not that which was the Citie of Naboth, of which alreadie: but another of the same name, the Citie of Achinoan, the wife of Dauid, the mother of that Ammon, whom Absalom slew: also as somethinke the Citie of Amasa, *Absalom*s Lieutenant, and the commander of his Armie. But this seemeth to be an error grounded vpon the neere sense of the words; Israel and Iesrahel: and because the 2. Sam. 17. 25. Amasas father is called a Israhelite, who first of the Chro. 2. 17. is called an Ismaelite: indeed the Hebrew Orthographie sheweth that Amasas Father is not said to be of the Citie Iesrahel, but an Israhelite in Religion, though otherwise an Ismaelite.

In this Tribe there were many high Hills and Mountaines, as those of Engaddi vpon the the Dead Sea: and the Mountaines of Iuda, which begin to rise by Emaus, and end neere Taphna, and these part Iuda from Dan and Simoon. Of others which stand single, there is that of Hebron: at the foot whereof was that Oake of Mambre, where the three Angels appeared to Abraham, which S. Hierome calleth a Fir-tree; and saith, that it stood till the time of Constantine the yonger. There is also that Mountaine called Collis Achille, on the South of Ziph: on the top whereof the great Herod, inclosing the olde Castle, erected by Ionathas Macchabeus, and called Masada, garnished it with 27. high and strong Towers: and therein left Armour and furniture for an hundred thousand men, being as it seemeth a place vnaccessible, and of incomparable strength.

In the Valley forward called the Dead Sea, or the Lake Asphaltitis, this Countrie had to foure Cities, Adams, Sodom, Seboim, and Gomorrah, destroyed with fire from Heauen for their vnnaturall finnes.

§. III.

THE TRIBE OF REUBEN
and his Borderers.

†. I.

The seats and bounds of Midian, Moab, and Ammon, part whereof the Reubenites wanne from Sehon King of Hesbon.

IN the other side of the Dead Sea, Reuben the eldest of Jacobs sonnes inhabited: of whose children there were numbered at Mount Sinai 46000. who dying with the rest in the Desarts, there remained to possesse the Land promised 43700. bearing armes. But before we speake of these or the rest that inhabited the East side of Jordan, something of their borderers: to wit, Midian, Moab, and Ammon, whose Land in our writers are confusedly described, and not easily distinguished. And first wee are to remember that out of Abrahams kindred came mighty Families: as by Isaac and Jacob the Nation called Israel, and afterward Iewes: by Esau or Edom the Edumians: by Ismael the eldest sonne of Abraham, the Ismaelites: and by Keturah his last wife the Midianites. And againe by Lot, Abrahams brothers sonne, those two valiant Nations of the Moabites and Ammonites: all which being but strangers in the Land of Canaan (formerly possed by the Canaanites, and by the Families of them descended) these issues and alliance of Abraham, all but Jacob, whose children were bred in Aegypt, inhabited the frontier places adioyning.

Esau and his sonnes held Idumea, which bounded Canaan on the South, Ismael took from the South-east part of the Dead Sea, stretching his possession ouer all Arabia Petraea, and a part of Arabia the Desert, as farre as the Riuer of Tigris, from Sur to Hanilah.

Moab took the rest of the coast of the Dead Sea, leauing a part to Midian, and passing ouer Arnon, inhabited the plaines betwene Jordan and the Hills of Abarim or Arnon, as farre North as Essebon, or Chesbon.

Ammon late downe on the North-east side of Arnon, and possed the Tract from Rabbah afterward Philadelphia, both within the Mountains of Gilbead, and without them as farre forth as Arroer, though in Moses time he had nothing left him in all that Valley: for the Amorites had thrust him ouer the Riuer of Iaboc, as they had done Moab ouer Arnon. As these Nations compassed sundry parts of Canaan, so the border betwene the Riuer of Iaboc and Damascus was held by the Amorites themselves, with other mixt Nations: all which Territorie on the East side of Jordan, and on the East side of the Dead Sea, was granted by Moses to the Tribes of Reuben, Gad, and halfe Manasse; whereof that part which Moab had, was first possed by the Emims a Nation of Giants weakened and broken by Chedorlahomer, after expelled by the Moabites, as before remembred. That which the Ammonites held, was the Territorie and ancient possession of the Zamzumims or Zuzas, who were also beaten at the same time by Chedorlahomer, Amraphel, and the rest: and by them an easie way of conquest was prepared for the Ammonites.

Now where it is written that Arnon was the border of Moab, the same is to be vnderstood according to the time when Moses wrote. For then had Sehon or his Ancestor beaten beaten the Moabites out of the plaine Countries, betwene Abarim and Jordan, and driven them from Hesbon ouer Arnon; and this happened not long before Moses arrivall vpon that border, when Phaleg gouerned the Moabites. For he that ruled Moab when Moses past Arnon, was not the sonne of Phaleg, but his name was Balac the sonne of Zippor. And it may be that those Kings were electing, as the Edumians anciently were.

Now all that part of Moab betwene Arnon and Jordan, as farre North as Essebon, was inhabited by Reuben. And when Israel arrived there out of Aegypt, it was in the possession of Sehon, of the race of Canaan by Amoreus: and therefore did Iephthah the Iudge of Israel iustly defend the regaining of those Countries against the claime of the Ammonites: because (as he alleadged) Moses found them in the possession of the Amorites, and not in the hands of Moab or Ammon: who (saith Iephthah) had 300. yeeres time to recouer them, and did not: whence he inferreth that they ought not to claime them now.

And lest any should maruell why the Ammonites in Iephthahs time should claime to these Countries: whereas Moses in the place Numb. 21. v. 26. rather accounts them to haue bene the ancient possession of the Moabites, than of the Ammonites: it is to be noted that Deut. 3. 11. when it is said that the yron bed of Og was to be seene at Rabbath, the chiefe Citie of the Ammonites, it is also signified, that much of the Land of Og, which the Israelites possided, was by him or his Ancestors got from the Ammonites, as much of Sebons was from the Moabites.

And as the Canaanite Nations were seated so confusedly together that it was hard to distinguish them: so also were the sonnes of Moab and Ammon, Midian, Amalek, & Ismael. Yet the reason seemeth plaine enough why Ammon commanded in chiefe, in Iephthahs time; for sometime the one Nation, sometime the other of all those borderers acquired the Soueraignie: and againe that one part of the Land which Gad held, namely within the mountaines of Galaad, or Gilbead, and as farre South as Arroer belonged to the Ammonites. And therefore taking aduantage of the time, they then sought to recouer it againe. Yet at such time as Moses ouerthrew Sehon at Iabaz, the Ammonites had lost to the Amorites, all that part of their possession which lay about Arroer, and betwene it and Iaboc: Sehon and Og two Kings of the Amorites hauing displant both Moab and Ammon of all within the Mountaines. For it is written in the one and twentieth of Numb. v. 24. that Israel conquered the Land of Sehon from Arnon vnto Iaboc, euen vnto the children of Ammon, so as at this time the Riuer of Iaboc was the South bound of Ammon, within the Mountaines, when as anciently they had also possessions ouer Iaboc, which at length the Gadites possed, as in the the 13. chapter of Iosua, vers. 25: it appeares.

†. II.

Of the memorable places of the Reubenites.

THE chiefe Cities belonging to Reuben were these, Kedemoth, for which the Vulgar, without any shew of warrant, readeth Iethson. The Vulgar or Hierome followed the Septuagint, those two verses 36. and 27. in 21. Ios. being wanting in the olde Hebrew Copies, and the Septuagint read Kedson for Kedemoth, which Kedson by writing slip into Iethson.

This Citie which they gaue to the Leuites, imparts her name to the Desart adioyning: from whence Moses sent his Embassage to Sehon. In the same place of Iosua where this Kedemoth is mentioned, the Vulgar for Beiser & Willis, reads Bosor in solitudine Misfor, without any ground from the Hebrew: whence Adrichomius makes a Towne called Misfor, in the border betwene Reuben and Gad. Farther from Kedemoth neere the Dead Sea (for the Countrie betwene being Mountainous hath few Cities) they place two Townes of note, Lasa or Leshab, of which Genesis 10. verse 19. The Greekes call it Calirhoe: neere which there is a Hill, from whence there floweth Springs both of hot and cold, bitter and sweet water; all which soone after their rising, being ioyned in one streame, doe make a very wholesome bath, especially for all contraction of sinewes: to which Herod the elder, when hee was desperate of all other helpe, repaired, but in vaine. Others say that these Springs arise out of the hills of Maacherus in this Tribe. The like fountaines are found in the Pyrenes: and in Peru, called the Baths of the Inga's or Kings. The other town is Maacherus, the next betwene Lasa and Jordan: of all that part of the world the strongest In-land Citie and Castle, standing vpon a Mountaine every way vnaccessible. It was first fortified by Alexander Iannæus, who made it a frontier against the Arabians: but it was demolished by Gabinus, in the war with Aristobolus, faith Iosephus. It was thither (faith Iosephus) that Herod sent Iohn Baptist, and wherein hee was slaine: his armie soone after being vtterly ouerthrowne by Aretas King of Arabia, and himselfe after this murder neuer prospering. Not farre from Macherus was Bozor or Bozra, a towne of refuge, and belonging to the Leuites, and neere it Linias vpon Jordan, which Herod built in honour of Linias the mother of Tiberius Cæsar.

To the North of Linias is Setim, or Sittim: where the children of Israel embraced the daughters of Midian, or Moab: and where Phineas pierced the body of Zimri and Cosbi, with his speare, bringing due vengeance vpon them, when they were in the midst of their sinne: and from hence Iosua sent the Discouersers to view Ierico, staying heere vntill hee went ouer Jordan. As for the Torrent Setim, which in this place Adrichomius dreames of, reading Ios. 3. 18. irrigabit torrentem Setim: The vulgar hath torrentem spinarum: and Iunius, vallum Cedrorum: expounding it not for any particular place in Canaan: but for the Church, in which the iust being placed, grow as the Cedars, Psal. 92. 13.

The plaine Country hereabout, by Moses called The Plaines of Moab, where he expounded the Book of Deuteronomie to the people a little before his death, is in the beginning of the same book precisely bounded by Moses. On the South it had the great Desert of Paran, where they had long wandred. On the East it had Chaseroth, & Dizabab (of which two the former is that Gazorus, of which Ptolomie in Palestina; the later was a Tract belonging to the Nabathæi in Arabia Petraea, where was Mezabab, of which, Gen. 36. 39.) by the Geographers called Medana and Medaba. On the West it had Jordan, and on the North it had Laban (in Iunius Edition, by the fault of the Print, Lamban, Deuteron. 1. 1.) the same which the Geographers call Labies: and some confound it with Linias, of which euen now wee speake.

Also on the same North side towards the confines of Calesyria, it had Theophel: where about sometime Pella of Calesyria stood: which was in the region of Decapolis, and as Stephanus faith, was sometime called Butis. It is also noted in Moses to be ouer-against or neere vnto Suph, for which the Vulgar hath the Red Sea, as also Num. 2. 14. it translateth the word Suphah in like manner: whereas in this place of Deuteronomie there is no addition of any word in the Hebrew to signifie the Sea: and yet the Scripture, when this word is so to be taken, vith the addition of Mara, thereby to distinguish it from the region of Suph or Suphah: which doubtlesse was about these Plaines of Moab towards the dead Sea: where the Countrey being full of reedes, was therefore thus called: as also the dead Sea was called Mare Suph, for like reason.

The place in these large plains of Moab, where Moses made those diuine exhortations, some say was Bethabara where Iohn baptized, which in the storie of Gedeon is called Beth bara. Iosephus saies it was where after the Citie Abila stood, neere Jordan, in a place set with Palm trees: which sure was the same as Abel-sittim in the Plaines of Moab, Numb. 33. 49. (that some call Abel sathaim and Bel-sathim) which is reckoned by Moses in that place of Numbers for the 42. and last place of the Israelites incamping in the time of Moses: This place is also called Sittim; which word if we should interpret, we should rather bring it from Cedars, than from Thornes, with Adrichomius and others. It was the wood of which the Arke of the Tabernacle was made.

Toward the East of these plains of Moab, they place the Cities, Nebo, Baal-Meon, Sihma and Heshon the chiefe Citie of Sehon, and Elhabel, and Kiriathaima the seate of the Giant Emim. Of the two first of these Moses seemes to giue a note that the names were to be changed: because they tasted of the Moabites * Idolatrie. For Nebo (in stead of which Iunius, Es. 46. 1. reades Deus vaticinus) was the name of their Idoll. Oracle and Baal-meon is the habitation of Baal. Of the same Idoll was the Hill Nebo in these parts denominat: from whose top, which the common Translators call Phasgab, Moses before his death saw all the Land of Canaan beyond Jordan. In which storie Iunius doth not take Phasgab or Pisgab, for any proper name: but for an appellative, signifying a Hill: and so also Vatablus in some places; as Num. 21. 20. where hee noteth that some call Pisgab that top which looketh to Iericho, and Hair as it looketh to Moab, which opinion may be somewhat strengthened by the name of a Citie of Reuben mentioned Ios. 13. 20. called Albath-Pisga, which is as much as decurus Pisga: to wit, where the waters did runne downe from Pisga. In the same place of Iosua there is also named Beth-peor, as belonging to Reuben: so called from the Hill Peor: from whence also Baal the Idoll was called Baal-peor, which they say was the same as Priapus: the cheefe place of whose worship seemes to haue bene Bamoth-Bahal, of which also Ios. 13. in the Cities of Reuben: for which Num. 22. 41. they read the high places of Baal (for so the word signifieth) to which place Balaak first brought Balaam to curse the Israelites.

†. III.

Of diuers places bordering Reuben belonging to Midian, Moab or Edom.

10 There were besides these diuers places of note ouer Arnon, which adioyned to Reuben: amongst which they place Gallim, the Citie of Phalti: to whom Saul gaue his Daughter Michal from Dauid: but Iunius thinks this Towne to be in Beniamin: gathering so much out of Esay 10. vers. 29. where it is named among the Cities of Beniamin. With better reason perhaps out of Numb. 21. v. 19. wee may say that Mathana and Nahaliel were in those confines of Reuben: through which places the Israelites past after they had left the Well called Beer: Then Deblathaim which the Prophet Hieremie threatneth with the rest of the Cities of Moab.

Madian also is found in these parts, the chiefe Citie of the Madianites in Moab: but not that Midian or Madian by the Red Sea; wherein Iethro inhabited. For of the Midianites there were two Nations, of which these of Moab became Idolaters, and received an exceeding overthrow by a Regiment of twelue thousand Israelites, sent by Moses out of the plains of Moab: at such time as Israel began to accompanie their Daughters: their five Kings with Balaam the Soothsayer were then slaine: and their Regall Citie with the rest destroyed. The other Madianites ouer whom Iethro was Prince, or Priest, forgat not the God of Abraham their Ancestor; but reliued & assisted the Israelites in their painfull triualls, through the Deserts: and were in all that passage their guides. In the South border of Moab adioyning to Edom, and sometime reckoned as the chiefe Citie of Edom, there is that Petra which in the Scriptures is called Seilah, which is as much as rupes or petra. It was also called toothheel, as appears by the place 2. Reg. 14. It was built (faith Iosephus) by Rekem, one of those five Kings of the Madianites slaine as before is said: after whom it was called Rekem: Now they say it is called Crac and Mozera. The Soldans of Egypt, for the exceeding strength thereof, kept therein all their treasures of Egypt and Arabia: of which it is the first and strongest Citie: the same perhaps which Plinie and Strabo call Nabathe, whence also the Prouince adioyning tooke name: which name seemes to haue been taken at first from Nabaioth the sonne of Abraham by Kethura. For Nabathe is no where vnderstood for all Arabia Petraea, (at least where it is not mis-vnderstood) but it is that Prouince which neighboureth Iudea. For Pharan inhabited by Ismael, whose people Ptolomie calleth Pharanites, in stead of Ismaelites, and all those Territories of the Cusites, Madianites, Amalekites, Ismaelites, Edomites, or Idumeans, the Lands of Moab, Ammon, Hus, Sin, and of Og King of Basan, were parts of Arabia Petraea: though it bee also true, that some part of Arabia the Desert belonged to the Amalekites, and Ismaelites: all which Nations the Scriptures in the first of Chronicles the fifth calls Hagarims of Hagar.

This Citie Petra, Scourus besieged with the Roman Armie, & finding the place in shew impregnable, he was cōtent by the perswasion of Antipater, to take a composition of monie, & to quit it. Yet Amasis king of Iuda (after he had slaughterd 10000. of the Arabians in the valley called Salinarum) was also this Citie. S. Hierome findes Ruth the Moabite to be natural of this Citie. In the meane time when the Christians held the Kingdome of Hierusalem, it had a Latine Bishop, hauing before been vnder the Greeke Church. It is seated not far from Hor where Aaron died, & on the other side towards the North is the riuer of Zared or Zered, by which Moses incamped in the 38. Station. Adrichomius describeth the waters of Memrim, or rather Nemrim, in his Map of Reuben, not far hence, and betwene Zared and Arnon: and so hee doth the Valley of Saua: but the waters of Nimra, or Beth-Nimra (for which it seemes Adrichomius writ Nemrim) refresh the plains of Moab: and the confluence of those waters of Nimra are in the Tribe of Gad. Saua also cannot be found in this place, that is, to the South of Arnon, & vnder Midian. For after Abraham returned from the pursuit of the Assyrian and Persian Princes, the King of Sodom met him in the Valley of Saua, or Sauch, which is the Kings Dale, where Abraham set vp his Monument, as it seemes, not farre from Hierusalem. And at the same time Melchisedee King of Salem also

But Abraham comming from the North, and Melchizedec inhabiting, either neere Bethsan otherwise Scythopolis in the halfe Tribe of Manasse, or in Hierusalem (both places lying to the West of Jordan) could not encounter each other in Arabia: and therefore Saua, which was also called the Kings Dale, could not be in these parts.

†. IIII.
Of the Dead Sea.

Now because the Sea of Sodom or the Dead Sea, called also the Lake of Asphaltus, and the salt Sea (in distinction from the Sea of Tyberias which was fresh water) also to the Sea of the Wildernesse, or rather the Sea * of the plaines, is often remembered in the Scriptures, and in this storie also, therefore I thinke it not impertinent, to speake somewhat thereof. For it is like vnto the Caspian Sea, which hath no out-let or disburthening. The length of this Lake Iosephus makes 180. furlongs (which make 22. miles and a halfe of ours) and about 150. in breadth, which makes 18. of our miles and somewhat more. Plinie makes it a great deale lesse. But those that haue of late yeeres seen this Sea, did account it (saith, Weissenburg) eight Dutch miles (which is two and thirtie of ours) in length: and two and a halfe of theirs (which is ten of ours) in breadth. Of this Lake or Sea Tacitus maketh this report: Lacus est in immenso ambitu, specie maris, sapore corruptior, grauitate odoris accolis pestifer: neq. vento impellitur neq. pisces aut suetas aquis volucres patitur incertum unde superiecta ut solido feruntur, periti imperitiq. nandi perinde attolluntur, &c. That it is very great, and (as it were) a Sea of a corrupt taste: of smell infectious, and pestilent to the borderers. It is neither moued nor raised by the winde: nor indureth fish to live in it, or fowle to swimme in it. Those things that are cast into it, and the vnskillfull of swimming, as well as the skillfull, are borne up by this water. At one time of the yere it catcheth up Bitumen: the Art of gathering which, Experience (the finder of other things) hath also taught. It is vsed in the trimming of ships, and the like busineses.

And then of the Land, he speaketh in this sort: "The fields not farre from this Lake, which were sometime fruitfull and adorned with great Cities were burnt with lightning, of which the ruines remaine, the ground looking with a sad face, as hauing lost her fruitfulness; for whatsoever doth either grow or is set thereon, be it fruits or flowers, when they come to ripenesse, haue nothing within them, but moulder into ashes: Thus farre Tacitus. And it is found by experience, that those Pomegranates and other Apples or Oranges, which doe still grow on the bankes of this cursed Lake, doe looke faire, and are of good colour on the out-side, but being cut haue nothing but dust within. Of the Bitumen which this Lake catcheth vp, it was by the Greekes called Asphaltus. Vespasian desirous to be satisfied of these reports, went of purpose to see this Lake, and caused certaine Captiues to be cast into it, who were not onely vnskillfull in swimming, but had their hands also bound behind them, and notwithstanding they were carried on the face of the waters, and could not sinke.

†. V.
Of the Kings of Moab, much of whose Country within Arnon Reuben posselt.

OF the Kings of Moab, whose Country (within Arnon) Reuben posselt (though not taken from Moab but fro Sehon the Amorite) few are known. Iunius in the 21. of Numbers, vers. 14. nameth Abel, which seems to be the Ancestor or Predecessor of Balaam, the son of Zippor: which Balaam sent for Balaam to curse Israel. For fearing to contend with Moses by armes by the examples of Sehon and Og, hee hoped by the helpe of Balaams carlings or enchantments, to take from them all strength and courage, and to cast on them some pestilent diseases; And though Balaam at the first, moued by the spirit of God, blest Israel contrary to the hope and desire of Moab: yet being desirous in some sort to satisfie him, and to doe him seruice, he aduised Moab to send Madianitish Women among the Israelites: hoping by them, as by fit instruments of mischief, to draw them to the Idolatrie of the Heathen: but in the end hee receiued the reward of his falling from God, and of his euill counsaile, and was slaine among the rest of the Princes of Midian.

After these times the Kings of the Moabites are not named: sauing that wee finde in the first of Chronicles the fourth, that Iokim, and the men of Chozeba, and Iosb, and * So Iunius reads for the Hebrew Hareb euerie where, and also the edition of Vatablus, Deut. 3. 17. though Deut. 4. 4. it hath mare solitudinis, as also 2. Reg. 14. 25. the region of this name seems to be, because it ioynes to the plaines of Moab which are called Hareb Moab, Deut. 34. 1. as also we haue Cesulath in Harbath, that is in the plaines, to wit, of Zabulon, 1. Mach. 9. 2. whence Asdrichomias imagines a City in Zabulon called Arabia. a. Deser. terr. sancte.

Sareph, all being of the title of Iuda, sometime had the Dominion in Moab: but as it is written in the same Verse, These also are ancient things: to wit, as some expound it, the particulars of these mens Governments are no where extant or remaining: or as others, hee prius fuere, these Families of Iuda were once thus famous: but now their posterity chuse rather to abide in Babylon, and be Clay-workers to the King there.

Then we finde Eglon King of Moab, who with the helpe of Ammon, and Amalec mastered Israel, and commanded them eightene yeeres: which Eglon, Ehud slew in his owne house, and afterward 1000. of his Nation. What name the King of Moab had vnto whom David fled fearing Saul, it doth not appeare: or whether it were the same against whom Saul made Warre, it is not manifest, for neither are named. But in respect that this Moabite was an enemy to Saul, he receiued David, and releued him; knowing that Saul sought his life.

After this, David himselfe entred the Region of Moab, but not likely in the same Kings time: for hee slaughtered two parts of the people; and made the third part tributarie: whereupon it was said of David, Moab is my wash-pot, ouer Edom will I cast my shoe: meaning that hee would reduce them to such an abiection, and appoint them for base seruices: And that he would tread downe the Idumeans.

The next King after Dauids time, of the Moabites, whose name liueth, was Mesha: who falling from Iuda, (perhaps in remembrance of the seruicic of David) fastened himselfe to the Kings of Israel, and paid tribute to Ahab 100000. Lambes, and 200000. Rams, with the wooll: who reuolting againe from Israel after the death of Ahab, was inuaded by Iehoram: with whom ioyned the Kings of Iuda & Idumea: and being by these three Kings prest and broken, hee fledde to Kir-hareseth, as is elsewhere shewed. There is also mention made of the Moabites without the Kings name: when that Nation, assisted by the Ammonites and Idumeans, inuaded Iehoshaphat: and by reason of some priuate quarrels among themselves, the Moabites and Ammonites set vpon the Idumeans, and slaughtered them: and then one against another; so as Iehoshaphat had a notorious victorie ouer them all, without either blood or wound. Also in the time of Hieremie the Prophet, there was a King of Moab which is not named; which was after Mesha of Hierem. 27. Moab many descents: for Mesha liued with Iehoram, and this Moabite in Zedekias time, foureene Kings of Iuda comming betweene, who waited three hundred and odde yeeres.

§. V.

Of the memorable places of the Gadites, and the bordering places of Ammon.

HE Territory adioyning to Reuben, is that of Gad: whereof all that part which ioyned to the Mountaines, was sometime in the possession of the Ammonites, as farre to the South as Aroer. Of the children of Gad the seuenth son of Iacob by Zelpha, the hand-maid of Lea, there parted out of Egypt, and died in the Desarts, 45550. and of their sonnes there entred the Land promised, 45000. bearing armes: from the halfe Tribe of Manasse the Riuer of Iaboc diuided them: from Reuben the Cities of Heshbon, Elhele, and Aphec.

The chiefe Citie of Gad was Aroer: which they make to be the same with Ar, or Rabbath Moab, the great or commanding Moab. But the learned Iunius attending diligently to those words of Moses, Deut. 2. 36. Ab harahero, qua est in ripa fluminis Arnon, Civitate ipsa qua est in flumine, Where the Citie in the Riuer is distinguished from the Citie vpon the banke of the Riuer, (as also in like manner Ios. 12. v. 2. and c. 13. v. 9.) thinketh that Haraher which doubtlesse belonged to the Gadites (as Numb. 32. 34. it is said that they built it) was indeede seated neere Har of the Moabites, but diuerse from it. For that Har was neuer posselt by Moses, it is plaine Deuteronomie 2. 9. where God forbidding Moses to touch it, saith hee hath giuen Har for an inheritance to the sonnes of Lot. Now that this Citie, which in diuers places is said to be within and in the middle of the Riuer of Arnon (and so distinguished from Haraher, which is said in the same places to be on the banke of Arnon) is Har of the Moabites, the same Iunius proueth out of Numb. 21. 15. where Arnon is saide to be diuided into diuers streames, where or among which Har is seated: And the same is confirmed by the place of Ios. 13. 25. where Haraher is said to be seated before Rabbah: which Rabbah as it seemes, cannot bee the Rabbah of the Ammonites (for they seate not Harober neere it, nor in sight of it) and therefore by Rabbah heere we must vnderstand Rabbah of Moab, which they make to be Ar or Har: and so wee must needs distinguish it from Harober. And as for Har (which also gaue the name to the coast adioyning) it seemes it continued in the possession of the Moabites after they had once expelled the Giant-like people called Emims, first weakened by Chedorlaomer and his Associates: but Harober by the interchange of times suffered many ancient changes, as being wonne from the Moabites by Sebon, from him by the Israelites, and from them, as it seemes in the story of Iephtha, by the Ammonites: and from the Ammonites againe by the Israelites vnder the conduct of Iephtha. In S. Hieromes time the greatest part of this Citie perished by an earthquake, as also Zoar, in which Lot saved himselfe, in the destruction of Sodom, seated not farre hence: which they say was therefore called Vitula consternans, because as a wanton tumbling Heifer, she was thrice overthrowne with earth-quake: for which cause also Hierome seemes to thinke that this Zoar was called Salissa, or Bal-salissa, as if Baal had been a remainder of the old name Balah, or Belah, (of which Gen. 14.2.) and Salissa which hath a signification of the ternarie number, had alluded to the three earth-quakes.

Brochard takes Harober to be Petra, but erroneously, as before it is noted, seeing that Petra was in the South border of Moab, adioyning to Edom, whereas Harober is in the North-east border. Betweene Harober and Jordan they seate Dibon, which is attributed to the Gadites, because they are said to haue built it, Numb. 32. 34. though Iosua 13. 20. vers. 17. it is said that Moses gaue it to the Reubenites. Of this Citie among the rest of Moab, both Esay and Hieremie prophesied, that it should perish: and the Lakes about it runne with the blood of the Inhabitants. It was a great Village neere Arnon in Saint Hieromes time.

Keeping the banks of Arnon, one of the next Cities of fame to Aroer, was Bethnimrah, of which Esay prophesieth. That the waters thereof should be dried up: and all the vale of Moab withered. Not farre from Bethnimrah in this Tribe Adrichomius placeth Iogbeha, and Nobach or Nobe: of both which wee reade in the storie of Gedeon: and that Iogbeha was in Gad, built by the Gadites, it appeares, Numb. 32. 35. and therefore Nobach also must needs be in these parts; but whether in Gad or Manasse it is not certaine: only that it was anciently called Kenath, Moses witnesseth. Nobach also (saith hee) went andooke Kenath with her Townes, and called it Nobach of his owne name, where because the verses precedent speake of the Manassites, and because it is not likely that Moses would haue seated this seate of the Gadites from the rest, of which he spake before, v. 34. 35. 36. therefore it may seeme that this Nobach was in than part of Manasse, which was in the East of Iordans: though Adrichomius place it in Gad. For whereas hee supposeth it to be the same with Nob, which Saul destroyed, of this we shall speake in the Tribe of Benjamin. And as for that Karkor where Zebach and Salmunah rested themselves in their flight from Gedeon, to which place Gedeon marched through this Nabach and Iogbeha, though some place it in Gad, and make it the same with Kir-chares, of which Esay 15. and 2. Reg. 3. 25. yet there can be no certainty that it was in Gad: and if it be the same with Kir-chares, it is certaine that it was a principall Citie held still by the Moabites, and not in the Tribe of Gad.

In the body of this Tribe of Gad they place Hataroth: of which name the Scripture witnesseth that two Cities were builded by the Gadites; the former simply called Hataroth, the later Hataroth-Sophan: for which later the Vulgar makes two Cities, Roth and Sophan: the name Hataroth, is as much as Corona.

In the Valley of the Kingdome of Sebon, together with Bethnimrah, of which we haue spoken, Iosua. cap. 13. v. 27. nameth Beth-haram and Succoth: the former, Numb. 32. 36. (where it is called Beth-haram) together with Bethnimra, is said to haue been built by the Gadites, which (perhaps the rather, because in Iosua it is called Beth-Haram,) some take to be Bataramptha, (of which Iosephus) after by Herod called Iulias. But whether this Bataramptha were corrupted from Beth-Haram, or from Beth-Aramatha of which Aramatha there is mention in Iosephus) or from Beth-Rempphan (of which Rempphan, an Idoll of those Countries, wee read, Acts 7. 43. and to which Iunius referres the name of the Citie Rephah, 1. Machab. 37.) of this question it were hard to resolve. But touching Iulias (according to Iosephus sometimes Bataramptha) the same Iosephus placeth in the Region of Peraa, beyond Jordan, which Regio Peraa, as the Greeke word signifieth, is no more then Regio ultra, or, the Countrie beyond the River; and therefore they which labour to set downe the bounds of this Peraa, take more paines then needes. Fourteen Villages this Iulias had belonging vnto it, according to Iosephus. He makes it to haue bene built by Herod Antipas, and named Iulias, in honour of the adoption of Iunia, Augustus his Wife, into the Iulian family: by which adoption she was called Iulia. Another Iulias, hee saith was built by Philip the brother of Herod, in the lower Gaulanitis, which, he saith, is the same as Bethsaida.

Vpon the Sea of Galilee neere to Iulias in Peraa, (that is, in the Region ouer Iordan) they finde Ptolemaia, as it is called in Iosephus, for Beth-ezob, which is as much as domus bisphoi. Of a noble woman of this Citie, which for safegard in the time of Warre with the Romanes, came with many others into Hierusalem, and was there besieged, Iosephus in the place noted, reports a lamentable History; how for hunger she ate her owne childe; with other tragical accidents hereupon ensuing.

Of Succoth (which we said Ios. 13. is placed with Ben-haran, in the Valley of the Kingdome of Sebon) it is plaine by the story of Gedeon that it is neere vnto Iordan: where it is said, that as he was past Iordan with his three hundred, wearie in the pursuit of Zebach and Salmunah, hee requested reliefe of the men of Succoth: who denying him, and that with contempt, in Gedeons returne were by him tortured, as it seemes vnder a threashing Carre of Tribulum, betweene which and their flesh he put Thomes to teare their flesh as they were prest and trod vnder the Tribulum, and after which fort also Dauid vsed some of the Ammonites, though not with Thornes, but with yron teeth of the Tribulum. As for the name of Succoth, which signifieth such Tabernacles as were made in haste, either for Men or Cattell, Moses, Gen. 33. 17. witnesseth that the original of the name was from such harbours, which Iacob in his returne from Mesopotamia built in that place: as also the place beyond the Red Sea, where the children of Israel, as they came from Rameses in Egypt, had their first Station, was vpon like reason called Succoth: because there they set vp their first Tabernacles or Tents: which they vsed after for forty yeeres in the Wildernesse. In remembrance whereof, the Feast of Succoth, or Tabernacles was instituted.

Other foure Cities of Gad are named, Ios. 2. 138. Ramoth in Gilead, Machanajim, Chesbon, and Iahzer, all of them by the Gadites giuen to the Leuites, of which Iahzer, as Chesbon or Hesbon was a chiefe Citie of Sebon, whence Num. 32. 1. his Countrie is called the Land of Iahzer. It was taken by Moses, hauing first sent spies to view it. In the first of the Chronicles it is made part of Gilead. In latter times (as it may be gathered by the prophesie of Esay, touching Moab) it was possessed by the Moabites: to which place of Esay also Hieremie in a like prophesie alludes. It was at length regained (but as it seemes from the Ammonites) by Iudas Maccabeus: as it is 1. Macc. 5. 8. where Iunius out of Iosephus reades Iahzer, though the Greeke hath Gazer. For Gazer or Gezer (as he gathereth out of Iosua 16. 3. and Iud. 1. 29.) was farre from these Countries of Sebon, seated in the West border of Ephraim, not possessed by the Israelites, vntill Salomons time, for whom the King of Egypt wan it from the Canaanite, and gaue it him as a Dowrie with his Daughter.

Of Chesbon it may be maruelled that in the place of Iosua, and 1. Chron. 6. 81. it should be said to haue bene giuen to the Leuites by the Gadites, seeing Iosua 13. v. 17. it is reckoned for a principall Citie of the Reubenites: Adrichomius and such as little trouble themselves with such scruples, finding Cisbon, 1. Macc. 5. 36. among the Cities of Gilead, taken by Iudas Maccabeus, makes two Cities of one: as if this Cisbon had bene the Chesbon of Gad: and that of Reuben distinct from it: but the better reconciliation is, that it being a bordering Citie, betweene Gad and Reuben, was common to both, and so that the Gadites gaue their part to the Leuites, for so also it seemes that in like reason Dibon is said in one place built by the Gadites, and in another giuen to Reuben, as before is noted. Of Machanajim, which word signifieth a double Armie, wee reade Gen. 32. 2. that it was therefore so called, because the Angels of God in that place met Iacob in manner of another Hoste or company, to ioyne with his for his defence: as also Luke 2. 13. wee reade of a multitude of the Hoste of Heauen, which appeared to the shepherds, at the time of our Sauours birth: and so vnto the Godly King Oswald of Northumberland, when hee was soone after to ioyne battaile with the Pagan Penda of middle-England, Beda reports, that the like comfort appeared: whence the field where the Bataille was fought in the North-parts of England, is called Heauen-field. In this Citie of Machanaïm David abode during the rebellion of Abſalom: and the ſame for the ſtrength thereof Abner choſe for the ſeat of Iſhbobaſh, during the warre betweene David and the houſe of Saul.

Of the fourth Towne which was Ramoth in Gilead, weread often in the Scripture, for the recovering of which King Achab loſt his life. Iunius thinks that Ramatha-Miſſe, of which Iofua 13.26. was this Ramoth in Gilead. Concerning the place where Laban and Jacob ſware one to the other, as it was called Gilead, which is as much as a witneſſing heape, becauſe of the heape of Stones which Laban and his ſonnes left for a monument: ſo alſo that it was called Miſſepah, which ſignifieth ouer-looking becauſe there they called God to ouer-ſee and be witneſſe to their couenant: it is plaine by the place, Gen. 31.49. that in theſe parts there was not onely a Towne, but likewiſe a Region called Miſſepa, it appears, Iof. 11.3. where we read of the Chiuuities vnder Herman, in the Countrie of Miſſepa, * the Towne of Miſſepa, as it ſeemes both by this place, and in the eight verſe following, being nor in the Hill Countrie, but in the valley. But ſeeing that Iephta the Iudge of Iſrael, who after he came home from Tob, (whether his brethren had driuen him) dwelt in this Towne of Miſſepa, who doubtleſſe was of the Tribe of Manaſſe, and thence at firſt expelled by his brethren, it may ſeeme that they doe not well which place this Towne of Miſſepa rather in Gad, than in Manaſſe. By Iudas Macchabeus this Towne of Miſſepa (whether in Gad or in Manaſſe) was vtterly ſpoiled and burnt, and 20 males of it ſlaine: for it was then poſſeſt of the Ammonites.

Betweene Succoth (of which we haue ſpoken) and the Riuer Taboc was that Peniel or Penuel, which name ſignifieth Locum faciei Dei; A place where the face of God was ſeene: ſo called for memorie of the Angels appearing to Jacob, and wreſtling with him there: the churliſhneſſe of which Citie, in reſuſing to relieue Gideon, was the cauſe that in his returne he ouerthrew their Towre, and ſlew the chiefe Aldermen thereof. To theſe places of the Gadites, then adde Rogelim, the Citie of that great and faithfull ſubiect Barſilai, as it ſeemes, not farre from Mahanaim, where he ſuſtained King David, during Abſaloms rebellion. To theſe they adde the Towne of Gaddi, Arnon, & Alimis, of which Gaddi, being in Hebrew no more then Gaddita, is ignorantly made a name of a place. 30 Arnon alſo no where appears to be the name of a Towne, but ſtill of a Riuer. Alimis Adrichomius frames of Alimus, 1 Mac. 5.26. ſo that the name ſhould rather be Alima, but Iunius out of Iofephus reads Malla, for this in Alimis: and vnderſtanding Malla to be put for Millo, and to beas much as Monito, (as wee haue ſhewed touching the Millo of the Sichemites) hee takes this Malla, to be Miſſepa Moabitum, of which 1 Sam. 22.3. As for that Mageth which Adrichomius findes in this Tribe of Gad, it is that Mahacab, which Mofes noteth to be as farre as the furtheſt of Manaſſes, out of the bounds of this Tribe. So alſo Dathena, of which 1 Mac. 5.10. (which Iunius takes to be a Rithma, of which Numb. 33.18. a place of ſtrength in the Territorie of the Ammonites) and in like manner Minnith, and Abel vincarum, though by ſome they be attributed to 40 the Gadites, or to their borders, yet they are found farther off. For of the two laſt wee read in Iephta's purſuit of the Ammonites: ſeated as it ſeemes by that place of the booke of Iudges, the former of them in the South border, and the other of them in the Eaſt border, both farre removed from the Gadites. But the chiefe Citie of the Ammonites was neerer, and not farre from the borders of Gad. It is called in the Scriptures ſometime Rabbath, as Dent. 3.11. but more often Rabba. It is ſuppoſed to be that * Philadelphia which Ptolomie findes in Caſoſyria. Hierome and Caſtus in Arabia. It was conquered by Og from the Ammonites: but as it ſeemes neuer poſſeſt by the Iſraelites, after the ouerthrow of Og, but left to the Ammonites: whereupon at length it became the Regall ſeat of the Ammonites, but of old it was the poſſeſſion of the Zamzumims: which is as 50 much to ſay, as men for all manner of craft and wickedneſſe infamous. The ſame were alſo called Raphaim, of whom was Og, which recovered much of that which the Ammonites had got from his Anceſtors: who hauing bene firſt beaten by the Aſſyrians, and their aſſitants (as the Emims in Moab, and the Horims in Seir had bene) were afterward the eaſier conquered by the Ammonites, as the Emims were by Moab, and the Horims by the Idumeans. Yet did the races of Emoreus, of whom theſe Giants were deſcended, contend with the Conquerours for their ancient inheritance: and as Sehon of Heſbon had diſpoſſeſt Moab, ſo had Og of Baſan the Ammonites, and betweene them recovered the beſt part of all the Valley, betweene the Mountaines and Jordan. For this Og was alſo maſter of Rabba or Philadelphia: And in the poſſeſſion of the one or of the other of theſe two, Mofes and Iſrael found all thoſe Cities and Countries which were giuen to Reuben, Gad, and the halfe Tribe of Manaſſe. So that though it were 450 yeeres ſince that theſe Zamzumims or Raphaim were expelled, yet they did not forget their ancient inheritance: but hauing theſe two Kings of one kinred, and both valiant and vndertaking men, to wit, Og and Sehon, both Amorites, they recovered againe much of their loſt poſſeſſions, and thruſt the ſonnes of Lot ouer the mountaines, and into the Deſerts. And as the Kings or Captaines of Perſia and Aſſyria, (remembered in the 14. of Genefis) made way for 10 Ammon, Moab, and Edom, ſo by that great conqueſt which Mofes had ouer thoſe two Amorites, Og and Sehon, did the Moabites and Ammonites take opportunitie to looke backe againe into thoſe plaines, and when the Reubenites, Gadites, and Manaſſites forooke the worſhip of the liuing God, and became ſlothfull and licentious, they taking the aduantage inuaded them, and caſt them out of their poſſeſſions: and were ſometime 20 their maſters, ſometime their tributaries, as they pleaſed or diſpleaſed God: and according to the wiſedome and vertue of their Commanders.

In this Citie of Rabba, was the yron bed of Og found, nine cubites of length, and foure of breadth. The Citie was taken in Dauids time, and the inhabitants ſlaine with great ſeuerity, and by diuers tormes. At the firſt aſſault thereof Vriah was ſhot to death, 20 hauing bene by direction from Dauid appointed to be employed in the leading of an aſſault, where he could not eſcape: wherein alſo many of the beſt of the Armie periſhed: and wherein Dauid ſo diſpleaſed God, as his affaires had ill ſucceſſe afterward, euen to his dying day. From hence had Dauid the weighty and rich crowne of gold, which the Kings of Ammon ware: or which as ſome expound it, was vſed to be put on the head of their Idoll, waighing a talent, which is 60. pound waight after the common talent. In the time of Chriſtians it had a Metropolitan Biſhop, and vnder him twelue others.

The Mountaines which are deſcribed within this Tribe, and that of Manaſſe, with a part of Reuben, are thoſe that Ptolomie calleth the hills of Hippus, a Citie of Caſoſyria: and 30 Strabo * Trachones: the ſame which continue from neere Damaſcus vnto the Deſerts of Moab: and receiue diuers names, as commonly mountaines doe, which neighbour and bound diuers Countries: for from the South part, as farre Northwards as Aſeroth, the chiefe Citie of Og, they are called Galaad or Gilead, from thence Northward they are knowne by the name of Herman, for ſo Mofes calleth them: The Sidonians name them Shirion, but the Amorites Shenir, others Seir: of which name all thoſe Hills alſo were called, which part Iudea and Idumea: and laſtly, they are called Libanus, for ſo the Prophet Hieremie makes them all one, calling the high mountaines of Galaad, the head of Libanus. Theſe mountaines are very fruitfull, and full of good paſtures, and haue many trees which yelde Balfamum, and many other medicinable drugs. The Riuers of this Tribe are the waters of Nimrah, and Dibon, and the Riuer Taboc: Others doe alſo fancie another 40 Riuer, which triſing out of the Rockes of Arnon, falleth into Jordan.

§. VI.

Of the Ammonites, part of whoſe Territories the Gadites wanne from Og the King of Baſan.

His Tribe of Gad poſſeſt halfe the Countrie of the Ammonites, who together with the Moabites, held that part of Arabia Petraea called Nabatheae, as well within as without the mountaines of Gilead: though at this time when the Gadites wanne it, it was in the poſſeſſion of Sehon and Og, Amorites: and therefore Mofes did not expell the Ammonites, but the Amorites, who had thruſt the iſſues of Lot ouer the mountaines Trachones or Gilead, as before. After the death of Orthoniel the firſt Iudge of Iſrael, the Ammonites ioyned with the Moabites againſt the Hebrewes, and ſo continued long. Iephta Iudge of Iſrael had a great conqueſt ouer one of the Kings of 50 Ammon, but his name is omitted. In the time of Samuel they were at peace with them againe.

Afterward wee finde that cruell King of the Ammonites, called Nabas: who beſieging Labes Gilead, gaue them no other conditions but the pulling out of their right eyes. The reaſon why he tendred ſo hard a compoſition, was (beſides this deſire to bring ſhame shame vpon Israel) because those Gileadites vsing to carry a Target on their left armes, which could not but shadow their left eyes, should by losing their right, be vtterly disabled to defend themselves: but Saul came to their rescue, and deliuered them from that danger. This Nahas, as it may seeme, became the confederate of David, hauing friended him in Sauls time; though Iosephus thinks that this Nahas was slaine in the battaile, when Saul raised the siege of Iabes, who affirmeth that there were three Kings of the Moabites of that name.

Hannun succeeded Nahas: to whom when David sent to congratulate his establishment, and to confirme the former friendship which he had with his Father, he most contemptuously and proudly cut off the Ambassadors garments to the knees, and shaued the halfe of their beards. But afterward notwithstanding the aydes received from the Ammonites subiect to Adadazer, and from the Reguli of Rehob, and Maacah, and from Ishob, yet all those Arabians, together with the Ammonites, were ouer-turned: their chiefe Citie of Rabba, after Philadelphia, was taken; the Crowne which weighed a talent of gold was set on Dauids head; all such as were prisoners, David executed with strange severity; for with Sawes and Harrowes he tare them in pieces, and cast therest into Lime-kils.

Iosaphat gouerning Iuda, they assisted the Moabites their neighbours against him, and perished together. Offas made them Tributaries, and they were againe by Iotham infort to continue that Tribute, and to increase it, to wit, a hundred talents of siluer, ten thousand measures of wheat, and ten thousand of barley: which the Ammonites continued two yeeres.

The fift King of the Ammonites, of whose name we reade, was Baalis, the confederate of Zedechia: after whose taking by Nabuchodonosor, Baalis sent Ismael of the bloud of the Kings of Iuda, to slay Gedaliah, who serued Nabuchodonosor.

§. VII.

Of the other halfe of Manasse.

He rest of the Land of Gilead, and of the Kingdome of Og in Basan, with the Land of Hus, and Argob, or Trachonitis (wherein also were part of the small Territories of * Batania, Gaulonitis, Gessuri, Machati, and Auranitis) was given to the halfe Tribe of Manasse ouer Iordan, of which those three latter Prouinces defended themselves against them, for many ages. But Batanea Ptolomie setteth farther off, and to the North-East, as a skir of Arabia the Desert: and all those other Prouinces before named with Petrea, and Ituraa, he nameth but as part of Calosyria; as farre South as Rabba or Philadelphia: likewise all the rest which belonged to Gad, and Reuben, sauing the Land neere the Dead Sea, he makes a part of Arabia Petrea: for many of these small Kingdomes take not much more ground then the Countie of Kent.

Basan, or after the Septuagint, Basanitis, stretcheth it selfe from the Riuer of Iaboc to the * Machati and Gessuri: and from the Mountaines to Iordan, a Region exceeding fertile; by reason whereof it abounded in all sorts of Cattell. It had also the goodliest Woods of all that part of the world: especially of Oakes, which beare mast (of which the Prophet Zacharias, Howle, O yee Oakes of Basan) and by reason hereof they bred so many Swine, as * 2000. in one Herd were carried head-long into the Sea, by the vncleane spirits which Christ had cast out of one of the Gadarins. It had in it three score Cities walled and defended: all which, after Og and his sonnes were slaine, Iair, descended of Manasse, conquered, and called the Countie after his owne name, Auoish Iair, or the Cities of Iair.

The principall Cities of this halfe Tribe (for I will omit the rest) are these, Pella sometimes * Butis, otherwise Berenice; by Seleucus King of Syria, it is said to haue bene called Pella, after the name of that Pella in Macedon: in which both Philip the Father, and his Sonne Alexander the Great were borne. It was taken, and in part demolished by Alexander Ianneus King of the Iewes: because it refused to obey the Iewes lawes: but it was repaired by Pompey, and annexed to the Governement of Syria. It is now but a Village, saith Niger. Carnaim by the Riuer of Iaboc, taken by * Iudas Maccabaeus: where he * Another territory adioyning to Manasse, whose limits were confounded with some of these, was that Thibet, the country of Elias, as it is the 1 Kin. 16. 1. &c. of Tobias, Tob. 1. 2. it lay on the East to the tribe of Neft. on the right hand of it, as in Tob. 1. 2. &c. was possit by Colonies of the Israelites in the time of Saul after his victory ouer the Amalekites &c. I. 1. in those parts, as it is gathered out of the 1 Chr. 5. 10. whence it appears that it was part of Iordan, of which chap. 7. §. 4. f. 5. and 6. 2. So they call them of Manasse, of which Machath somewhat hath bin spoken toward the end of the fift Paragraph of this Chapter, see the 1 Mac. 5. 36. and Deut. 3. 14. and Ios. 12. 5. b Mar. 5. 13. c Anciently as it seemes it was called Topel, see above in the bounds of Manasse in this chapter. §. 4. f. 2. d 1 Mac. 5.

ser on fire the Temple of their Idols: together with all those that fled thercunto for Sanctuary; and neere it they place the Castle of Carnion, of which 2 Mac. 12. 22. Then the strong Citie of * Ephron neere Iordan: which refusing to yelde passage to * Iudas Maccabaeus, was forced by him by assault, and taken and burnt with great slaughter.

Iabes Gilead, or Iabes, was another of the Cities of this halfe Tribe; which being besieged by Nahas King of the Ammonites, was deliuered by Saul, as is elsewhere mentioned: In memory whereof these Citizens recovered, embalmed, and buried the bodies of Saul and his Sonnes: which hung despihtfully ouer the wals of Bethsan or Serjthopolis. * Gadara or Gadara is next to be named, seated by Plinie on a Hill neere the Riuer Hieromias, which Riuer Ortelius seemes to thinke to be Iaboc. At the foot of the Hill there spring forth also hot baths, as at Macherus. Alexander Ianneus after ten months siege war it, and subuerted it: Pompey restored it: and Gabinus made it one of the five Counties of Iustice in Palestine. Hierusalem being the first, Gadara the second, Emathor Amathus the third, Hierico, and Sephoris in Galilee, the fourth and fift. The Citizens impatiently bearing the tyranny of Herod, surnamed Ascalonitis, accused him to Iulius Caesar of many crimes: but perceiving that they could not preuaile, and that Herod was highly fauoured of Cesar, fearing the terrible reuenge of Herod, they slew themselves: some by strangling, others by leaping ouer high Towers, others by drowning themselves.

To the East of Gadara they place Sebei, in which, Iosephus ant. 5. 13. saith Septhia was buried: whence others reading with the Vulgar Iud. 12. 7. Sepultus est in Ciuitate sua Gilehad, (for in una Ciuitate Gilehad) imagine Gilehad to be the name of a Citie, and to be the same with Sebei. In like manner following the Vulgar, 1 Mac. 5. 26. where it readeth Caphor for Chesbon; the same Adrichomius imagineth it to be ampla & firma Gilehaditarum Ciuitas: so of one Citie Hesbon or Chesbon, which they call Essibon, the chiefe Citie of Sehon, in the Tribe of Reuben, hee imagineth two more: this Caphor in Manasse, and a Citie in Gad which he calleth Carbon, of which we haue admonished the Reader heretofore. Of Gamala (so called, because the Hill on which it stood, was in fashion like the backe of a Cammell) which Iosephus placeth not farre from Gadara, in the lower Gaulanitis ouer against Tarichea, which is on the West side of the Sea or Lake of Tiberias, seeth Iosephus in the fourth booke of the Iewish warre: where hee describes the place by nature to be almost inuincible: and in the storie of the siege, shewes how Vespasian with much danger of his owne person, entering it, was at first repulled, with other very memorable accidents: and how at length after the coming of Titus, when it was taken, many leaping downe the rockes with their wiues and children, to the number of five thousand, thus perished: besides foure thousand slaine by the Romans: so that none escaped, save onely two women that hid themselves.

About foure miles West from Gadara, and as much East from Tiberias (which is on the other side of the Lake) Iosephus placeth Hippus or Hippene, whence Ptolomie giues the name to the hills that compass the plaines in which it standeth: so that it may seeme to haue bene of no small note. It is seated farre from the hill Countie: on the East of the Lake, as also Plinie noteth lib. 5. cap. 15. It was restored by Pompey: after by Augustus added to Herods Tetrarchie: It was wasted by the Iewes, in the beginning of their rebellion: when by many massacres of their Nation, they were enraged against their borderers.

The next Citie of note, but of more ancient fame, is Edrehi or Edrai, wherein Og King of Basan chiefly abode, when Moses and Israel inuaded him: and neere vnto this his Regall Citie, it was that he lost the battaile and his life. It stood in S. Hierome time: and had the name of Adar or Adara. Not farre from these Townes neere Iordan, in this valley stood Gerasa or Gergessa, inhabited by the Gergesites, descended of the fift sonne of Canaan. Of these Gergesites wee reade Mar. 8. 28. that Christ comming from the other side of the Lake of Tiberias, landed in their coasts: where casting the Diuels out of the possessed, hee permitted them to enter into the herd of Hogges: in which storie, for Gergesites or Gergesins, S. Luke and S. Marke haue Gadarens: not as if these were all one (for Gergessa or Gerasa is a distinct Towne in these parts from Gadara) but the bounds being confounded, and the Cities neighbours, either might well be named in this story. This Citie receiued many changes and calamities: of which Iosephus hath often mention.

Of another Edrehi in Nepht, see Ios. 19. 37. Deut. 3. 1. & 10. Item Ios. 13. 31. Matth. 8. 28. Matth. 5. Luke 8.

tion. For besides other adventures, it was taken by L. Annus Lieutenant to Vespasian: and 1000. of the ablest young men put to the sword, and the Citie burnt. In the yeere 120. it was rebuilt by Baldwine King of Damascus: and in the same yeere recovered by Baldwine de Burgo King of Hierusalem: and by him utterly razed. Neere unto Genais is the village of Magedan, or after the Syriack Magedu, or after the Greeke Magedala, where the Pharisees and Sadducees desired of our Saviour a signe from heaven: the same place or some adioyning to it, which S. Marke calleth Dabmanutha. By the circumstances of which storie it appears that this coast lay betwene the Lake of Tiberias and the Countie of Decapolis. Brochard makes both these places to be one, and findes it to be Phiale, the fountaine of Jordan according to Iosephus: but this Phiale is too farre from the Sea of Galilee, and from Bethsaida, to be either Magdala or Dabmanutha. For as it appears by the storie, not farre hence towards the North was the Desert of Bethsaida, where Christ filled 5000. people with the fine Barley loaves and two Fishes.

On the North of this Bethsaida they place Iulias, not that which was built by Herod, but the other by Philip, which boundeth the Region Trachonitis towards the South. It was sometime a Village, and not long after the birth of Christ it was compassed with a wall by Philip the Tetrarch of Iturea and Trachonitis: and after the name of Iulia, the wife of Tiberius, called Iulias, as hath bene farther spoken in the Tribe of Gad: where it was noted that Iosephus makes this Iulias, to be the same as Bethsaida. Vpon the East side of the same Lake of Tiberias stands Corozaim, or Corazin, of which Christ in Mat. 20 them; Woe be unto thee Corazin.

But the principall Citie of all these in ancient time was Asteroth: sometime peopled with the Giants Raphaim: and therefore the Countie adioyning called the Land of Giants, of whose race was Og, King of Basan. In Genesis this Citie is called Asteroth of Carnaim, whence 1 Mac. 5. 26. it is called simply Carnaim, as Ios. 13. 21. it is called Asteroth without the addition of Carnaim. The word Carnaim signifieth a paire of Hornes, which agree well with the name of their Idoll Asteroth, which was the Image of a sheepe, as it is elsewhere noted, that Asteroth in Deuteronomie signifieth sheepe. Others from the ambiguity of the Hebrew take Carnaim, to have bene the name of the people which inhabited this Citie: and expound it heroes radiantes. For of old the Raphai which inhabited this Citie (Gen. 14. 5) were Giant-like men, as appears by comparing the words Deut. 3. 11. Og ex residuo gigantum; with the words, Ios. 13. 12. Og ex reliquijs Rapharum: but if the Carnaim (or Carnaim) were these Raphai, the word would not have bene in the duall number: neither would Moses in the place of Genesis have said the Raphai in Asteroth of the Carnaim, but either the Raphai in Asteroth of the Raphai, or some other way fitted for periphrasis: for this naming of both thus in the same clause, distinguisheth one from the other.

Not farre from Asteroth Adrichomius out of Brochard and Breidenbachius placeth Cedar, in the way out of Syria into Galilee, foure miles from Corazin. This Citie (saith he) is remembered in the Canticles, and in the booke of Iudith, and there are that of this Citie vnderstand Dauid in his 120. Psalme: and here the Sepulchre of Iob is yet to be seene, saith Breidenbach.

Now concerning the Texts which he citeth, it is so that the Greeke hath Galaad in stead of the word Cedar, which the Vulgar doth vse in that place of Iudith, and ioyneth Carmel and Galilee. The Canticles and the 120. Psalme doe rather proue that Cedar was not hereabout, than any way helpe Adrichomius. For that they speake of Scenita Cedarum, it is apparent, and as euident by the place in the Canticles that they were decolored, much more than any vnder the Climates of the Land of Canaan: whence Iunius out of Lampridius and Plinie placeth them in Arabia Petraea, farre from these parts. Touching the Sepulchre of Iob, it is certaine that the Arabians and Saracens (holding those places) saue many things to abuse the Christians, and to get money. Further, it may well be affirmed, that many (if not all) the historicall circumstances of Iob are so obscure, that we should rather by finding his Countie seeke to get some knowledge of him, than by any presumptions founded vpon him, inferre what his Countie was, and build vnto him a Citie by coniecture.

Of Iob himselfe, whether he was the same Iobab remembred in the 36. of Genesis, descended from Esau, and King also of Idumaea, though Rupertus, Lyranus, Oleaster, and Belarmine are of another opinion, yet S. Ambrose, Augustine, Chrysostome, and Gregorie, with with Athanasius, Hippolytus, Tranens, Eusebius Emisenus, Apollinaris, Eustachius and other, cited by S. Hierome in his 126. Epist. to Euagrius, take him for the same.

The Land of Hus or Hus wherein Iob dwelt is from the Greeke ὅς, which the Septuagint vse for the word Hus, translated by the Vulgar sometime Hus, as Iob 1. v. 1. sometime Ausitis, as Hierem. 25. 20. This Land is placed by Iunius between Palestina and Celestria, besides Chamatha (or Hamath) vnder Palmyrene in the Country called by Ptolomee Trachonitis or Bathanaea, the bounds of which Countries are confounded with Basan in this halfe Tribe of Manasses. And that this Land of Hus was thus seated, it may in part be gathered out of the place of Ieremie the 25. 20. where he reckons the Hushites among the promiscuous borderers of the Israhelites; whom hee therefore calleth promiscuous or miscellaneam turbam, because their bounds were not onely ioyned but confounded, and their Seignories mingled one with the other, but of this place the words of Hieremy, Lamentations 4. 21. speaking of the same prophetic, of which hee speaketh in the five and twentieth Chapter, must needs be expounded: as Iunius reads them, distinguishing the Land of Hus from Edom: O filia Edomi, o que habitas in terra Hus; O Daughter of Edom, O thou which dwellest in the Land of Hus. Now because the Vulgar doth not so distinguish, but readeth Filia Edom que habitas in terra Hus; Daughter of Edom which dwellest in the Land of Hus: Hence, as it seemes, some of the learned haue thought that Iob was an Edomite, as we haue said, and King of Edom, which if they vnderstand by it Idumaea or Edom, so called in Moses time, they are greatly mistaken, making this Land of Hus to be in Edumaea. For it is very probable that Esau when he first parted from Jacob, did not seate himselfe in Edom or Seir, which lieth on the South border of Judea, but inhabited Seir farre to the East of Jordan, and held a part of those Mountaines otherwise called Galaad, and Hermom, which by corruption the Sidonians call Shirion, and the Amorites Shenir for Seir; and from this his habitation did Esau encounter Jacob when he returned out of Mesopotamia, who passed by the very border of Esau his abiding. It is true that at such time as Moses wandered in the Deserts, that the posterity of Esau inhabited Seir to the South of Judea: for it is like that the Amorites who had beaten both Ammon and Moab, did also driue the Edomites out of those parts, who thence forward feared themselves to the South of Judea, bordering the Desert Paran, and stretched their habitations ouer the Deserts as farre as Hor where Aaron died.

Now for this Hus which gaue the name to a part of the Land of Trachonitis, whether it were Hus the sonne of Aram, as Iunius thinkes in his note vpon Gen. 10. 23. or rather Hus the sonne of Nachor, Abrahams brother, the question is doubtfull. For my part I rather incline to thinke, that it was Hus the sonne of Nachor: partly because these Families of Aram seeme long before to haue bene lost: and partly because in Iob 6. 32. 2. Elihu the fourth of Iobs friends, which seemes to be of Iobs owne Countrey, is called a Buzite, of Buz the brother of Hus, the sonne of Nachor: as also Hieremie 25. in the same continuation (though some other Nations named betwene) where Hus is spoken of, there Buz is also named. Neither doth it hinder our coniecture, that in the place of Iob 32. Elihu the Buzite is said to be of the Familie of Ram: (which Iunius expounds to be as much as of the Familie of Aram) for that by this Aram we are not to vnderstand Aram the sonne of Sem, Iunius himselfe maketh it plaine, both in his annotation vpon the beginning of his booke, where he saith that one of Iobs friends (which must beed be this Elihu) was of the posteritie of Nachor (as also in this place hee confesseth so much expressly,) and in as much as he readeth not de familia Aram, or Ram, but de familia Syria; like as elsewhere Laban who sprung of Nachor is called a Syrian.

As for the other three of Iobs friends (of whom by this note of Elihu his being of the Syrian Familie, or of the Familie of Nachor) it is implied that they were of other kindred: as also by the Septuagints addition, that this Elihu was of the Land of Hus, or Ausitis, it is implied that they thought onely Elihu to haue bene of Iobs owne Countrey.

Franciscus Brochard the Monke, in his description of the holy Land in the iourne from Acon Eastward, findeth Sueha, and Theman on the East of the Sea of Galilee: both very neere to the Land of Hus: whereof the one may seeme to haue denominated Bildad the Shuchite; the other Eliphaz the Themanite: two of the three friends of Iob, of the which Iob 2. 11. But Iunius thinks that the Shuchites were inhabitants of Arabia the Desert, descended of Shuach the sonne of Abraham and Retura: of whom Gen. 25. 2. perhaps, saith he, the same whom Plinie calls Sacaei. So also he thinketh the Themanites of whom Eliphaz was, to haue bene of Arabia the Desart: and Eliphaz himselfe to haue bene of the posteritie of Theman the sonne of Eliphaz, which was the sonne of Esau. And so also Nahamah, whence Tisphar the third of Iobs friends (which in this place of Job c. 2. v. 11. are mentioned) is by the same learned expositor, thought either to benamed of Thimnath by transposition of letters (which Thimnath, Gen. 36. 40. is named among the sonnes of Esau that gaue denomination to the places where they were seated) or else to be the same Nahamah, which Job 15. 41. is reckoned for a Citie of Iuda in the border, as he thinkes, of Edom. And yet I deny not but that nere the Land of Hus, in Basan, as it seems, in the Tribe of Manasses, there is a Region which at least in later times was called Switis, or of some like name. For this is euident by the Historie of Willielmus Tyrinus, which reports of a Fort in this Region of Suita or Suites (as he calls it diuersly) of exceeding great strength and vse for the retaining of the whole Countie: which, in the time of Baldwin the second King of Hierusalem, was with great digging through rockes recovered by the Christians: hauing not long before bene lost to the great disadvantage of the Countrey, while it was in the hands of the Saracens. The situation of this Fort is by Tyrinus described to be sixteene miles from the Citie Tiberias, on the East of Iordan: by Adrichomius foure miles Northward from the place where Iordan enters the Lake Tiberias at Corazin.

Other Cities of this part of Manasses named in the Scripture are these: Golan, Behefthera, Mitspa of Gilead, and Kenath, which after the comming of the Israelites was called Nobach. Of Nobach or Kenath, and Mitspa of Gilead, we haue spoken by occasion among the Cities of Gad: The two other were giuen to the Leuites, and Golan made one of the Cities of refuge: from which Golan we haue both Gaulanitis superior and inferior, off in Iosephus. Behefthera is accounted the chiefe Citie of Basan by some, but the writers corrupting the name into Bozra, it is confounded with Betsur or Bozra of Reuben, and with Bozra of Edom. Argob is off named for a Region in this Tract, and hence Hierome hath Arga, a name of a Citie placed by some about the waters of Merom (as they are called by Iosua) which make the Lake Samachonitis, as Iosephus calls it. This Lake being as it were in the midst betwene Casarea Philippi and Tiberias, through which as through the Lake of Tiberias, Iordan runneth, boundeth part of this halfe Tribe on the West. When the snow of Libanus melteth, it is very large, saith Brochard: otherwise more contracted, leauing the marish ground on both sides, for Lyons and other wilde beasts, which harbour in the shrubs that plentifully grow there.

Adioyning to this Lake in this Countrey of Manasses, Iosephus names two places of strength, fortified by himselfe in the beginning of the Jewes rebellion: Seleucia the one, and Sogane the other. In the North side of this halfe Tribe of Manasse, and in the North-east, the Scripture nameth diuers bordering places toward Damascus, as Tisadad, Chauran, and Chatsar-Henan, lying in a line drawne from the West, of which three Cities were read Ezek. 47. 15. with which also agrees the place Numb. 34. 8. where for Chauran, between Tisadad, and Chatsar-Henan, Ziphron is named. From this Chauran is the name of Auranitis regio, in Iosephus and Tyrinus, whose bounds (as also the bounds of Gessur and Mahachath or Macati, which were likewise borderers to Manasses toward the North-east) are vnknowne: onely that Gessur was of might, it appears in that David married Mahach the Daughter of Thalmay King of Gessur: by whom he had the most beautiful, but wicked, and vnforgotten Absalon.

§. I.

Of the Citie of Damascus, and the diuers fortunes thereof.

Damascus of all other in this Border, and of that part of the world, was the most famous, excelling in beautie, antiquitie, and riches, and was therefore called the Citie of ioy or gladnesse; and the House of pleasure; and is not onely remembered in many places of Scripture, but by the best Historians and Cosmographers. The Hebrewes, saith Iosephus, thinke it to haue bene built by Hus the sonne of Aram: of which

S. Eli.

S. Hierome vpon Esai seemeth to be: though in his Hebrew questions hee affirmeth that it was founded by Damascus, the sonne of Eliezer Abrahams Steward, a thing very vnlikely, seeing the Citie was formerly knowne by that name, as appears by Abrahams calling this his Steward Eliezer of Damascus. David was the first that subiected it to the Kingdome of Iuda, after the ouerthrow of Adadezer their King, but in Salomons time, Rezon recovered it againe, though he had no title at all or right to that principallitie: but David hauing ouerthrowne Hadadezer king of Sophenia (otherwise Syria Soba or Zobah) Rezon or Rezon with the remainder of that broken armie, invaded Damascena, and posselt Damascus in selfe, and became an enemie to Salomon all his life.

The next King of Damascus was Adad the Edomite, who flying into Egypt from David and Iobab, when they slew all the males in Edom, was there entertained, and married Taphnes the King of Egypts wiues sister: of whom Taphnes in Egypt was so called. This Adad returning againe, became an enemie to Salomon all his life, and (as some writers affirme) invaded Damascus, and thrust Rezon thence out. In the line of Adad that Kingdome continued nine descents (as hereafter may be shewed in the catalogue of those Kings of Syria) to whom the Assyrians and then the Gracians succeeded. This Citie was exceeding strong, compassed with waters from the riuers of Abanah and Parphar: whereof one of them prophane writers call Chrysorrhoas the golden river. Tinnus takes it for Adonis. The countrey adioyning is very fruitfull of excellent wines and wheats, and all manner of excellent fruits. It had in it a very strong Castle, built as it seemes by the Florentines, after it became Christian: the lillies being found cut in many marbles in that Citadell. Against this Citie the Prophets Amos, Esai, Hieremie and Zacharias, prophesied that it should be taken, burnt, demolished, and made a heape of stones. In the time of the last Rezon and tenth King of the Damascens, Teglatphalassar, inuited by Achaz King of Iuda, carried away the naturals of Damascus into the East: leauing of his owne nation to inhabit it. After that it was vtterly ruined by the Babylonians, saith Hierome vpon Esai: which thing was performed by Salmanassar, according to Tinnus in his note vpon that place, fve yeeres after the Prophecie. In time it was restored by the Macedonians, and the Ptolomies; but long after when Syria fell into the hands of the Romans, it was taken by Metellus and Lollius. In the time of the Christians it had an Archbishop: S. Hierome liuing, as hee affirmeth vpon the Acts, it was the Metropolis of the Saracens: being taken by Haomar their King from the Romans, in the yeere of our redemption 636. And in the yeere 1147. Conrad the third, Emperour of Rome, Lewes King of Fraunce, Baldwin the third King of Hierusalem, Henry Duke of Austria, brother to Conrad, Frederick Barbarossa afterward Emperour, Theodorick Earle of Flaunders, and other Princes assembled at Ptolomais Acon, on the sea coast, determined to reconer Damascus: but being betrayed by the Syrians, they failed of the enterprize.

In the yeere 1262. Hulon the Tartar incompast it, and hauing formerly taken the King, brought him vnder the wals, and threatened extreame torture vnto him, except the Citizens rendred the place: but they refusing it, the King was torne asunder before them, and in fine the Citie taken, Agab the sonne of Hulon was by his father made King thereof.

In the yeere 1400. Tamberlaine Emperour of the Parthians, invaded that region, and besieged the Citie with an armie of 1200000. (if the number be not mistaken.) He entered it, and put all to the sword, filling the ditch with his prisoners; those that retired into the Castle which seemed a place impregnable, hee ouertopped with another Castle adioyning: hee forbore the demolishing of the Citie in respect of the beauty of the Church, garnished with 40. gates or sumptuous porches. It had within it 9000. lawnes of gold and siluer: but while hee invaded Egypt, they againe surprized Damascus. Lastly, in his returne after three moneths siege hee forst it: the Mahometans prostrating themselves with their priests, desired mercie: But Tamberlaine commanding them to enter the Church, he burnt them, and it, to the number of 30000. and did so demolish it, as those that came afterwards to see their houses, knew them not by the foundations. And as a Trophey of his victorie hee raised three Towers with great Art, builded with the heads of those whom hee had slaughtered. After this it was restored and reposselt by the Soldane of Egypt, with a garrison of Mammalukes: And in the yeere 1517. Selimus Emperour of the Turkes wrested it out of the hands of the Egyptians:

in whose possession it now remaineth inhabited with Mabometans, and Christians, of all neighbouring nations.

§. II.

Of the first Kings of Damascus, and of the growing up of their power.

NOW be it that Damascus were founded by Hus the sonne of Aram, or by Damascus the sonne of Eliezer Abrahams steward, we finde no relation of their Kings, or Common-wealth till Dauids time: For it stood without the bounds of Canaan: and therefore neglected by Moses, Iosua, and the Iudges, as impertinent to that storie: But were it so that it had some reguli, or petty Kings ouer it, as all the Cities of those parts had, yet none of them became famous for ought that is left to writing, till such time as Dauid ouerthrew Adadazer prince of Sophena or Syria Zoba: the same Nation which Plinie calleth Nubai, inhabiting betwene Batanea and Euphrates. Now the better to vnderstand the storie of those Syrian Princes, whom soone after the Kings of Damascus made their vassals, the reader may informe himselfe, That on the North-east parts of the holy Land, there were three chiefe principalities, whereof the Kings or Commanders greatly vexed or disturbed the State or Common-wealth of Israel, namely Damascus or Aram, Sophena or Syria Zoba, and Chamath, or Chamath-Zoba, of which these were the Princes in Dauids and Salomons times: Razon or Rezon of Damascus, Adadazer of Syria Zoba, and Tobu of Chamath. But it seemeth that Damascus was one of the cities subiect to Adadazer when Dauid inuaded him, though when Saul made warre against Zoba, Damascus was not named. And as Iosaphus affirmeth, the leader of those succours, which were leuiued and sent to Hadad-Hezer from Damascus, had the name of Adad: who was in that battaile slaine with 22000. Aramites of Damascus: whereof, as of the ouerthrow of Adadazer, Rezon, the Commander of his armie, taking aduantage, made himselfe King of Damascus: Adadazer and Adad of Damascus being both slaine. About the same time Tobu King of Chamath or Iturea, hearing that his neighbour and enemy Adadazer was vtterly ouerthrowne, sendeth for peace to Dauid, and presenteth him with rich gifts, but in dolo saith S. Hierome; it was craftily done of him. Now to the North of the Holy Land, and to the West of Damascus, the Tyrians and Zidonians inhabited: but they for the most part were in league and peace with the Iudeans and Israelites. But to returne to the Kings of Syria, I meane of Syria, as it is taken in the Scriptures, containing Damascena, Soba or Zoba, and Chamath, or Iturea, to which I may adde Geshur, because it is so accounted in the second of Sam. 15. as ioyning in the Territorie to Damascus (for Syria at large is farre greater, of which Palestina it selfe is but a Prouince, as I haue noted in the beginning of this Tract:) It is not agreed among the Historians of former times, nor of our later writers, who was the first of those Adads of Syria Zoba, and Damascus.

Some account Rezon, other Adad of Idumaea: of whom it is written in the first of Kings, that Dauid hauing inuaded that Region, and left Ioab there to destroy all the male children thereof: Adad of the Kings seede, fled into Egypt; and was there married to Taphnes the Queenes sister, as before, who hearing of Dauids death, and of the death of his Captaine Ioab (whom indeede all the bordering Nations feared) he turned againe, and as Berning thinketh, this Adad did expell Rezon out of Damascus; and was the first of the Syrian Kings. To mee it seemeth otherwise. For as I take it, Adadazer the sonne of Rehob, whom Saul inuaded, was the founder of that Principallitie: and the first of Adads, who forsaking his Fathers name, as hee grev powerfull, rooke vpon him the stile of Adad, the great god of the Affyrians, saith Macrobius, which signified oneness or Vnitie. I also finde a Citie called Adada in the same part of Syria: of which, whether these Princes took the name, or gaue it, I am ignorant. For Adadazer, Ben-adad, Eli-adad were the same in name, with the differences of Ezer, Ben, and Eli, adioyned. Anthat Adadazer was of greatest power, it appeareth first, because it is against him, that Dauid vnderooke the warre: secondly, because hee leuiued 22000. Aramites out of the Territorie of Damascus: as out of his proper Dominions: for had the Damascens had a King apart, it is probable that the Scriptures would haue giuen vs his name; thirdly, because Syria Zoba, the most of which of Adadazer was King, was an exceeding large Territory, and contained of Arabia the Desert as far as to Euphrates, according to Plinie: and and the greatest part of Arabia Petraea, according to Niger. Whosoever was the first, whether Adadazer, or Adad of Idumaea, Rezon was the second: Who was an enemy to Israel all the dayes of Salomon. Besides the euill that Adad did, the euill that Hadad did, seemeth to be referred to Hadad of Idumaea, lately returned out of Egypt: to wit, 23. yeeres after he was carried thither.

The third king of Damascus, and of Zobah both, was Hezion; to Hezion succeeded Tabriemmon, or Tabremmon; to him Benhadad, as is proued in the first of Kings; For Asa King of Iuda the son of Abiam, the son of Roboam, the son of Salomon, being vexed & inuaded by Baasha, the successeur of Nadab, the son of Ieroboam, sent to Benhadad the son of Tabrimmon the sonne of Hezion, King of Aram, that dwelt at Damascus, to inuade Israel (while Baasha sought to fortifie Rama against Asa: thereby to block him vp, that he should not enter into any of the Territories of Israel) who according to the desire of Asa, hauing receiued his presents, willingly inuaded the Countrey of Nepthalim, and tooke diuers Cities, and spoiles thence: Asa in the meane while carrying away all the Materials, which Baasha had brought to fortifie Rama withall, and conuerted them to his owne vse.

This Benhadads Father Tabremmon was in league with Asa: and so was his Father Hezion: for Asa requirerh the continuance of that friendship from Benhadad, his sonne: though it seemeth that the gold and siluer sent him out of the Temple, was the most forcible argument. And that this Tabremmon inuaded Israel, before the enterprize of his sonne Benhadad, it is coniectured. For Benhadad when he was prisoner with Achab, spake as followeth: The Cities which my Father tooke from thy Father, I will restore: and thou shalt make streetes or keepers of the borders, for thee in Damascus: as my father did in Samaria. And herein there ariseth a great doubt (if the argument it selfe were of much importance) because Tabremmon was Father indeede to Benhadad which inuaded Baasha, at the request of Asa; But this Benhadad that twice entred vpon Achab, and was the second time taken prisoner, was rather the sonne of Benhadad, the first of that name, the confederate of Asa and Abiam, as before, than the sonne of Tabremmon. For betwene the inuasion of Benhadad the first, in Baashas time, and the siege of Samaria, and the ouerthrow of Benhadad by Achab, there past 49. yeeres, as may be gathered out of the reignes of the Kings of Israel. So that if we allow 30. yeeres of age to Benhadad, when he inuaded Baasha, and after that 49. yeeres ere he was taken by Achab, which make eighty lacking one, it is vnlikely that Benhadad at such an age should make warre. Besides all this, the first Benhadad came with no such pompe; but the second Benhadad vaunterh, that he was followed with 32. Kings: and therefore I resolute, that Benhadad the sonne of Tabremmon inuaded Baasha and Omri; and Benhadad the second inuaded Achab, at whose hands this Benhadad receiued two notorious ouerthrowes: the first at Samaria, by a fall of 700. Israelites: the second at Aphec, where, with the like number in effect the Israelites slaughtered 100000. of the Aramites; besides 27000. which were cruelt by the fall of the wall of Aphec. And this Benhadad, Achab againe setteth at liberty: to whom he rendereth those townes that his father had taken from the Predecessour of Achab, but being returned, he refused to render Ramoth Gilead, a frontier towne, and of great importance. Now three yeeres after (for so long the league lasted) Ramoth not being deliuered, Achab inuaded Gilead, and assiegeth the Citie, being assisted by Iosaphat. The Aramites came to succour and fight: in which Achab is wounded, and dyeth that night. After this, Benhadad sendeth the commander of his forces called Nauman, to Ioram the son of Achab to be healed of the leprosie, and though Elizeus had healed him, yet he picketh quarrell against Ioram: and when Ioram by Elizeus his intelligence, had escaped his plot, he sent men, and Chariots to take the Prophet, as is aforesaid. After Benhadad besieged Samaria again, and being terrified thence from heauen, he departeth home, and sickneth, and sendeth Azael with great gifts to Elizeus, to know his estate if he might liue. Azael returning, smothereth him. Zonaras and Cedrenus call this Benhadad Adar, and the sonne of Adar: Amos and Hieremie mention the towres of Benhadad. Iosaphus writeth that Benhadad and his successeur Azael were worshipped for Gods by the Syrians to his time, for the presumptuous Temples which they built in Damascus. The Syrians also boasted much of their antiquity, ignorant, saith he, that scarce yet 1100. yeeres are complete since their warres with the Israelites.

Hazael or Azael, the first King of the race of the Adads of Damascus, was annointed by Elisba, or Elizeus, when he was sent by Benhadad to the Prophet, to know whether Ben- hadad should recover his present sickness: He waged warre with Ioram, who received diuers wounds at the encounter at Ramoth in Gilead: from whence returning to be cured at Iezreel, he and the King of Juda, Ahaziah, or Ochozias, are slaine by Iehu, as before is said. After the death of Ioram, Azrael continued the warre against Iehu, and wasted Gilead, and all those portions of Gad, Reuben, and Manasse, ouer Iordan. Hethen inuaded Juda, and tooke Gath, but by gifts from Iosias he was auerted from attempting Hiernusalem: for he presented him all the hallowed things which Iehosaphat, Iehoram, and Ahaziah his fathers, Kings of Juda had dedicated; and which he himselfe had dedicated: and all the gold which was found in the treasures of the Lord, and in the Kings house. This was the second time that the Temple was spoiled to please the Adads of Damascus. For Asadid the present Benhadad with those treasures, when he inuited him to warre vpon Bascha King of Israel. And notwithstanding this composition betwene Iosias and Azrael; yet a part of his Armie spoiled the other Prouinces of Juda, and slaughtered many principall persons. Lastly, Azrael vexed Iosias the sonne of Iehu, and brought him to that extremitie, as he left him but fifty horsemen, ten Chariots, & ten thousand footemen of all his people.

§. III.

Of the latter Kings, and decay and overthrow of their power.

FTER Hazael, Benhadad the second, or rather the third of that name, the sonne of Hazael, reigned in Damascus: who fought against Israel, with ill successe: by Iosias King of Israel, the sonne of the vnhappy Ioachaz, as hee was foretold by Elisba the Prophet, beat Benhadad in three severall batels: and hee lost all those Cities to Israel, which his Father Hazael had taken violently from Israel.

After this Benhadad the sonne of Hazael, there succeeded three others by the same name, of whom the Stories are lost, onely Nicholaus Damascenus cited by Iosephus, makes mention of them: and in one of these Kings times it was that Ieroboam the second, the sonne of Iosias recovered Damascus it selfe, to Judah, saith the Geneua, but better in Latin, utique recuperabat Damascus; & Chamatham Iehuda pro Israele; that is, And how he recovered for Israel, Damascus & Chamatha of Juda; for these Cities sometimes conquered by David, did of right belong to the Tribe of Juda.

And it is likely that this conquest vpon the Adads was performed: the first of these three Adads then living, of whom there is no Story. For when as Iehoas the King of the ten Tribes had thrice ouercome the Syrians in the time of Benhadad the sonne of Hazael, and had recovered the Cities which Hazael had won from Israel, and so left his Kingdome to his sonne Ieroboam the second, it seemeth that this Ieroboam without delay, and hauing nothing else left for him to enterprize, instantly followed his fathers good fortune, and inuaded Damascus.

Razin, or Rezin, after Iosephus Rases, after Zonaras Raason, the 10. Adad, making league with Pekah, or Phacaz King of Israel, against Achaz King of Juda; both carry away a great number of prisoners. After this they both besiege Achaz in Hiernusalem: but in vaine. Then Adad alone inuadeth Elath, and bearing out the Iewes, maketh it a Colonie of Syrians. Wherefore Achaz brought Teglatphalassar against Razin, who tooke him, and beheaded him, and won Damascus: with whom ended the line of the Adads and the Kingdome of Damascus: the Assyrians becoming masters both of that and Israel. These Adads as they reigned in order are thus reckoned.

1. Adadexer the sonne of Rehob.
2. Rezin the sonne of Eliadad, or Razin.
3. Hazael.
4. Tabremmon.
5. Benhadad, who inuaded Bascha.

6. Benhadad the second, taken prisoner by Achaz.

7. Hazael, whom Elisba foretold, with teares, of his aduancement; the same who overthrew Ioram King of Israel, at Ramoth Gilead. And that there was a second Hazael which preceded Benhadad the third, it is not improbable, because that Hazael which tooke Geth, and compounded the warre with Iosias, made the Expedition thirty yeeres, and perchance more, more, after the first Hazael which stifled his master Benhadad, and had slaine Ioram the sonne of Achaz King of Israel. For Ias began to reigne in the 7. yeere of Iehu King of Israel; and after he had reigned 23. yeeres, the Temple was not yet repaired, after which (and how long we know not) it is said that Hazael took Geth, and turned his face towards Ierusalem. It is also some proofe that Hazael that tooke Geth, was not the same with Hazael that murdered Benhadad, because he could not at that time be of good yeeres, being as it seemeth, the second person in the kingdome, and Commander of Benhadad's men of warre. To this Hazael, be he the first or second, succeeded:

8. Benhadad the third, whom Ias King of Israel thrise ouerthrew.

9. Rezin or Rezin the last, who ioyned with Pekah King of Israel, against Juda, at which time Achaz King of Juda waged for his defence Teglatphalassar.

Now betwene Benhadad the third, and Rezin the last, Nicolaus Damascenus findes three other Kings of the Adads, which make twelue in all.

Fortherest of the Princes of Syria, which were but reguli, as those of Emath, and Gessur, we finde that Tobu was King of Emath or Chamath in Dauids time, to whom he sent 2. Sam. 8. 32 his sonne Ioram with presents, after Dauids victory against Adadexer. Also Senacherib Esa. 37 speaketh of a King of Emath, but names him not.

§. IIII.

20. Of other lesser Kingdomes of the Syrians, which being brought vnder the Assyrians, neuer recovered themselves againe.

F Gessur we finde two Kings named; to wit, Talmi, and his Father Amihur. To Talmi, whose daughter David married, it was that Abshalon fledde, who was his maternall grandfather. Of the Kings of Sophena or Syria, Soba, or Celosyria, there are two named, Rehob or Rehob the Father of Adadexer, and Adadexer himselfe, and it is plaine that after his death the seat of the Kings of Soba was transferred to Damascus, a Citie better fitting their greatnesse. After Rezin became Lord of both Principallities. And the race of these Kings of Syria, (which became so potent, and ioyned Soba, Damascus, Emath, and the Desert of Arabia with other Prouinces into one, vnder Rezin the second of the Adads) as it began with David, so it ended at once with the Kingdome of Israel. For Achaz King of Juda waged the Assyrians Teglatphalassar against Pekah King of Israel, and against Rezin the last King of Damascus: which Teglat first inuaded Damascus, and the region of Soba, and tooke Damascus it selfe, and did put to death Rezin the last, carrying the inhabitants captiue. This was the second time that the Assyrians attempted Israel. For first, Phul Belochus entred the borders thereof ( Menahem governing Israel ) who stooped the enterprize of Phul with a thousand talents of siluer: for this Phul Belochus, whose pedigree wee will examine hereafter, being scarce warme as yet in his seat at Babylon, which hee, with the helpe of his companion Arbaces, had wrested from Sardanapalus: hauing besides this King of Syria in his way, who seemed to be a great and strong Prince, was content to take the composition of a thousand talents of the King of Israel for that present time. But his sonne Teglat following the purpose of his Father Belochus, and finding so excellent an occasion, as the warre begun betwene Israel and Juda, Pekah commanding in the one, and Achaz in the other, his neighbour Rezin being also wrapt in that warre, and wasted in strength thereby, did willingly accept the offer of Achaz King of Juda, his impress and entertainment. So, first attempting Damascus, which lay in his path towards Israel, hee carried it (as is before remembered) and then with great ease possessed himselfe of the Cities of Nephtalim, leading with him a great part of the people captiue. And his sonne Salmanasser, whom Ptolomie calleth Nabonassar, after the reuolt of Hosea, forced Samaria, and rent that Kingdome asunder. So as the line and race of Ninus in Sardanapalus, whom Belochus supplanted; the race and Monarchie of the Syrian Adads in Rezin, whom Teglat slaughtered; the Kingdome of Israel in Hosea, whom Salmanasser ouerturned; happened neere about a time: that of Ninus in the dayes of Belochus, and the other two in the dayes of Teglatphalassar; and Salmanasser his son. For Sardanapalus perished, Osia ruling Juda; and the other two Kingdomes were dissolued, Achaz yet living.

Lastly, the Kingdome of Juda it selfe, being attempted by Sennacherib, the sonne of Salmanasser in vaine, and preserved for the time by God miraculously, was at length utterly vterly ouerturned. Hierusalem and the Temple burnt 132. yeeres after the captiuitie of Israel, and Samar: the destruction of Israel being in the ninth yeere of Hosea: that of Juda in the eleuenth of Zedechia. Now the Emperours of Assyria and Babylon held also the Kingdome of Syria, from the eight yeere of Salmanassar, to the last of Balsassar, whom 3603. Herodotus calleth Labyrinthus: in all about 200. yeeres. After these the Persians from 3811. rus to Darius their last King, held Syria about 200. yeeres.

Then Alexander Macedon tooke this among other Prouinces of the Persian Empire, and his successors the Seleucide reigned therein, till it became subiect vnto the power of the Romans, from whom it was wrested long after by the Saracens, and remaineth now in possession of the Turke, as shall be shewed in due place. Thus much of the nations bordering vpon the Israelites; with whom they had most to doe both in warre and peace, being the onely people, whose History in those ancient times carried an afflicted face of truth.

CHAP. XII.

OF THE TRIBE OF BENIAMIN, and of Hierusalem.

§. I.

Of diuers memorable places in the Tribe of Beniamin, wherof Hiericho, Gilgal, Mitspa, Bethel, Rama, Gobah and Gibba.

F the Tribe of Beniamin, the twelfth and yongest sonne of Isaac, whom he had by Rachel, there were mustered at Mount Sinai 35000. able bodies: all which perishing in the Desarts, there entered the Holy Land of their issues 45600. fit to beare Armes: and these had their Territory on this side Jordan, betwene Juda 30 and Ephraim: The Cities within this Tribe neere Jordan, are Lod, Haded, and Ono: of which, Lod and Ono were built by Shem 40 med a Beniamite: they were of which three re-inhabited with Beniamites, after the returne out of Captiuitie, as is mentioned, Nehem. 11. 35. and Esd. 2. 35. where Adrichomius reading Lod, Hadid, Ono, makes besides Hadid in Nehemia, a Citie called Lodbadid: This Hadid or Chadid was rebuilt by Sin 40 Macchabaeus.

Samarim or Tsemaraim, named of Tsemari, one of the sonnes of Canaan, was another of their Cities: and further into the Land standeth Iericho, one of the Toparchies, and the last of Juda, seated in a most fruitfull valley, adorned with many palmetrees: and there 40 fore elsewhere called the citie of Palmes. From the time of Iosua, who vterly destroyed it, it lay waste vntill the time of Ahab: in whose dayes Chiel of Bethel laid the new foundation of it, in the losse of Abiram his eldest sonne, and built the gates of it in the losse of his yongest sonne Segub: according to the curse of Iosua: in which and other respects, Hos. 1. 2. 14. calleth Iosua a Prophet. In after-times it was destroyed by Vespasian, and rebuilt by Adrian.

To the Southeast of Iericho stood * Halmon of the Leuites, of which Ios. 21. 18. To the South Beitaraba, of which Ios. c. 15. and c. 18. Then that Gilgal of which there is so much mention in the Scripture, where Iosua first ate of the fruits of the land, circumcised all those borne in the Desarts, and celebrated the Passeouer.

The reason of the name, or rather a memorable application of the Etymologie of this name (for it seemes by the place, Dent. 11. 30. that the name was knowne before the coming of the Israelites into Canaan) is noted Ios. 5. 9. Ob deuolutionem probri Egyptiaci, because their fore-skinnes (the people being there circumcised) were rumbled downe the Hill: which from thence was called Collis preputiorum. This Gilgal was also called Geliloth, as appears by comparing the places, Ios. 15. 7. and 18. 17. for it was in the borders of Jordan, of which Ios. 22. 13. and Geliloth signifieth borders. It stood (though in some distance) directly Eastward, ouer against the two * Hills Garazim and Hebal: vpon the one 40 of of which the blessings, and on the other the cursings were to be read to the people, both being the mountaines of Ephraim. Further, for the situation of this Gilgal, it is to be noted, that both it, and Mitspa of Beniamin (of which also wee read of in the Scripture) were seated about the midst of the length of the land of Canaan: for which reason * Sa- 2. 1. Sim. 7. 15. mus chose these two places, to either of which he came yeerly to giue iudgement to the Israelites; of which two, Gilgal (as is said) was neere Jordan on the East side of this Tribe; and Mitspa neere the West Sea, towards the land of the Philistims.

The third place, which is named with these two, whither also Samuel vsed yeerly to come, is Bethel: which also was seated in this Tribe of Beniamin. But to returne to Gilgal, 10 which was the first place where the Arke resided, after they past ouer Jordan (from whence it was carried to Silo, and thence to Kiriath-ieharam, and at length to Hierusalem) here in Gilgal it was that Iosua pitched vp the twelue stones, which were taken out of the channell of Jordan, when it was drie, that the Israelites might passe ouer it: by which Storie, as it is set down Ios. 4. it appears, that the same day that they passed ouer Jordan, they lodged at Gilgal. At the same Gilgal, to omit many other memorable things, it was that Samuel hewed Agag the King of the Amalekites in pieces. And as for Mitspa, whither Samuel came yeerly to giue iudgement, there also were often the greatest meetings held: as that for the reuenge of the Leuites wife against Gibba, and the Beniamites, Iud. 20. 1. and another against the Philistims, 1. Sam. 7. 12. Thither also Judas Macchabaeus gathered the Jewes, (when Hierusalem was posselt by the Heathen) as it is 1. Macc. 3. 47. in which place this reason of their meeting is added; Quia locus Orationi fuerat Mitspa antea 20 Israel. Touching this Mitspa, to avoid confusion, it is to be remembered, that the Scriptures mention foure places of this name: Mitspa of Juda, of which Ios. 15. 38. * Mitspa of Gilead, of which we haue spoken already in the Tribe of Gad: Mitspa of the Moabites, of which David for a while held himselfe, commending his Parents to the King of Moab. 1. Sam. 22. 3. and lastly, this chiefe Mitspa of the Beniamites. And as in this place the chiefe meetings were held both before Hierusalem was recovered from the Iebusites, and also in the time of the Macchabees (as wee haue said) when Hierusalem was held by the wicked vnder Antiochus; so also in the time of Hieremie, after the destruction of the Temple by the Chaldeys, Gedaliah whom Nabuchodonosor left in Jewry, as Gouvernour ouer those that were left in the land, held his abiding in this place: vntill (to the great hurt of the Jewes) hee was slaine by the treason of Ismael, one of the royall bloud of Juda, as it is Hierem. 41.

Neere vnto this Mitspa, the Scripture mentioneth Beth-car, after called Aben-Hezer, that is, the Stone of helpe: where Samuel pitched vp the pillar or Stone, for a Trophy against the Philistims.

Touching Bethel which (as it seemes) was the third place where Samuel held his chiefe meetings for the ministring of Iustice, that it was anciently called Luz, and how it was taken by the issue of Ioseph (though it belonged to the portion of Beniamin, as it is Nehem. 11. 31. and Ios. 18. 22.) and how another Citie called Luz, 4 neere adioyning to it, was built by the man of the Citie which shewed the entrance to the Spies, as it is Iudg. 1. and of the occasion of the name from Iacob's vision: and how Ieroboam, by erecting one of his calues heere, of Bethel (which signifieth the house of God) made it * Beth-aen, that is, the House of Vanitie, Hos. 4. 15. and 10. 5. as also other memorable things of this place, they are so well knowne, out of the Histories of the Scripture, that we may well passe them ouer.

The territorie of Bethel, which at the first belonged to the Kingdome of the tenne Tribes, from the time of the great victorie of Abia against Ieroboam (of which 2. Chron. 13.) was taken from them, and adioyned to the Kingdome of Juda: and so it continued, as appears by the Storie of Iosias: which performed the Prophecies against the altar of Bethel, 2. Reg. 23. whence those coasts 1. Macc. 11. 34. are called Apharema, which Greeke word signifieth as much as, A thing taken away, to wit, from the tenne Tribes. It was one of the three Seignories or Prefectures which Demetrius in his Epistle mentioneth, as added by him to the Dition of the Jewes, out of the Samaritan Country. A part of it, as appears 2. Chron. 13. 19. was Hephraim, which Ios. 18. 23. is called Hophram, belonging to this Tribe of Beniamin.

Not farre from this Bethel, in this Tribe, we finde three other Cities often mentioned 30 confines of the Kingdomes of Juda and Israel betwene Hai and Bethel. Ios. 7. 21. and 18. 12.

b See c. 9. §. 1. c Of this Rama I vnderstand the place N. Macc. 11. 34. where it is named for one of the 3. Prefectures which Demetrius yields to the Jewes out of the country of Samaria, this lying toward the East to Iericho: and Tyddes toward the West: and Apharema (of which euen now wee spake) lying in the midst betweene the two other. A first Rama it seemes there was in the Tribe of Simeon toward the South, which Ioseph. 9. 8. is called Rama of the South, and otherwise Beth-leth-beer.

d Gibba in construction, that is, Governing a gentiue case is Gibba: whence the Pulgar out of the Septuagint read Ioseph. 4. 33. Gibba. Phil. Natioth. The great Citie of Hui ouerthrowne by Ios. which Ios. 7. 2. is placed neere Beth-auen vpon the East of Bethel, was in this Tribe, as is proued Neh. 7. 10. 30. though it be not named by Iosua. c. 18. for it was burned by him and laid desolate, as it is Ios. 8. 28. In solidudinem in tumulum perpetuum; Another Citie of chiefe note is reckoned Ios. 18. 25. In this Tribe was Gibbon, the chiefe Citie of the Heuites: whose cunning to bind the Israelites by oath to fauour their liues, is set downe Ios. 9. whence they were reckoned among the Nethinai or Profelites: and were bound to certaine publique seruices in the house of God: which oath of sauing these Gibeonites, broken in part after by Saul, was by God punished by a famine, 2. Sam. 21. 1. This Gibeon or Gibbon with Almon and Iebab (of both which wee haue spoken) and with Hanothoth the natall place of Hieremie the Prophet, were said Ios. 2. 1. 28. to be giuen to the Leuites by the Beniamites. Neere to this Hanothoth was Nob, as appears 1. Reg. 2. 26. where Ebiathar the Priest, which was of Nob before it was destroyed by Saul, is sent to his grounds at Hanothoth: It is reckoned in the Tribe of Benjamin, Nehem. 9. 3. 1. and though in the time of Saul the residing place of the Arke was at Kiriah-iarim: yet by the lamentable tragedie of bloudshed, which Saul raised in this place (as it is set downe 1. Sam. 2. 1. and 22.) in the iudgement of Iunius, it is proued that the Tabernacle was there for a time.

Of a fourth Rama we read 2. Reg. 8. 29. which is Ramoth in Gilead. The first, which is most often mentioned, is Rama of Benjamin, seated as we said, neere Bethel the vttermost South-border of the Kingdome of the tenne Tribes: for which cause Baasba in the time of Asa King of Iuda, fortified it, to hinder those that did flee from him to Asa. Of this Rama or Ramatha I should rather thinke Ioseph was, that buried Christ: because it was neerer to Hierusalem, and after the captiuitie belonged to Iudea, as it appears Esd. 2. 26. where in that it is ioyned with Gebah, it is plain that he speaketh of that Rama with whose stones (after Baasba had ceased to build it) Asa (as it is 1. Reg. 25. 22.) built Gebah adioyning to it: both being in Benjamin. And as Rama was the South-border of the ten Tribes, so was Gebah the North-border of the Kingdome of Iuda: whence 2. Reg. 23. 8. wee read that Iosiah through all his Kingdome, euen from Gebah, which was the North-border, to Beer-sheba which was the South-border, destroyed the places of Idolatry.

The third Citie Gibba which was the Citie of Saul (the wickednesse of which Citie in the time of the Iudges had almost vtterly rooted out this Tribe) Adrichomius confounds with Gebah, making one of two (as they are evidently distinguished, Esai. 10. 27. of which word Gibba, in another forme Gibbath, hee imagineth Gibbaath another Citie in this Tribe, making two of one. The vicinitie of this citie also to Rama of Benjamin, appears Iud. 19. 13. where the Leuite with his wife, not able to reach to Rama, took vp his lodge ing at Gibba. By that place of 1. Sam. 22. 6. it seemes that there was in this Gibba some towne or Citadell called Rama: where Iunius reads in excelsu, for in Rama: but it may be that the name of the Kings palace in this citie, was Rama: as it seemes that in Rama of Sam. 1. 1. the name of the chiefe place where Samuel with the Colledge of Prophets abode, was Natioth. The great Citie of Hui ouerthrowne by Ios. which Ios. 7. 2. is placed neere Beth-auen vpon the East of Bethel, was in this Tribe, as is proued Neh. 7. 10. 30. though it be not named by Iosua. c. 18. for it was burned by him and laid desolate, as it is Ios. 8. 28. In solidudinem in tumulum perpetuum; Another Citie of chiefe note is reckoned Ios. 18. 25. In this Tribe was Gibbon, the chiefe Citie of the Heuites: whose cunning to bind the Israelites by oath to fauour their liues, is set downe Ios. 9. whence they were reckoned among the Nethinai or Profelites: and were bound to certaine publique seruices in the house of God: which oath of sauing these Gibeonites, broken in part after by Saul, was by God punished by a famine, 2. Sam. 21. 1. This Gibeon or Gibbon with Almon and Iebab (of both which wee haue spoken) and with Hanothoth the natall place of Hieremie the Prophet, were said Ios. 2. 1. 28. to be giuen to the Leuites by the Beniamites. Neere to this Hanothoth was Nob, as appears 1. Reg. 2. 26. where Ebiathar the Priest, which was of Nob before it was destroyed by Saul, is sent to his grounds at Hanothoth: It is reckoned in the Tribe of Benjamin, Nehem. 9. 3. 1. and though in the time of Saul the residing place of the Arke was at Kiriah-iarim: yet by the lamentable tragedie of bloudshed, which Saul raised in this place (as it is set downe 1. Sam. 2. 1. and 22.) in the iudgement of Iunius, it is proued that the Tabernacle was there for a time.

Micmas also in this Tribe Nehem. 9. 3. 1. was a place of fame, of which Esai. 10. 28. where also he nameth Gallim, and Migrom in this Tribe. In Micmas Saul had his Campe, 1. Sam. 13. 2. (when he left Gibba to Ionathan) and there also was Ionathan Macchabaeus his aboad, 1. Macc. 9. 73. Of Giscala in Galilee Iosephus makes often mention, but of any heere in Benjamin, which they make the natall place of S. Paul, whence (they say) when it was taken by the Romans, he failed with his parents to Tharsis, of this I find no good warrant. Other places of lesse importance I omit, & come to the Citie of Hierusalem and the Princes Princes and Gouvernours of this Citie: A great part whereof was in the Tribe of Benjamin, whence Ios. 18. 28. it is named among the Cities of Benjamin.

§. II.

Of diuers memorable things concerning Hierusalem.

At what time Hierusalem was built (which afterward became the Princeesse of all Cities) it doth not appeare. Some there are who imagineth that Melchisedee was the founder thereof in Abrahams time. But * according to others, that Citie * See in the out of which Melchisedee incourted Abraham (in his returne from the ouerthrow of the Affiryan and Persian Kings or Captaines, when Lot was made prisoner) standeth by the river of Iordan, in the halfe Tribe of Manasse bordering Zabulon, which was also called Salem, and by the Greekes Solima.

Hierusalem (whensoever or by whomsoever built) was a principall Citie in Iosua his time: yet not so renowned as Hazor the Metropolis (in those dayes and before) of all the Canaanites. Adonizedek (whom Iosua slew) was then King of Hierusalem. That it was belonging to the Iebusites it is manifest: for how long soeuer they held it before Moses time, they were Masters and Lords thereof almost 400. yeeres after him: euen till David warne it: and therefore in all likelihood, it was by the Iebusaei (the children of Iebuseus the sonne of Canaan) built: after whom it was called Iebus. And so much did that Nation relye on the strength of the place, as when David attempted it, they bragged that their lame, and blinde, and impotent people should defend it.

David, after he had by Gods assistance possesed it, and turned out the Iebusites, gaue it an exceeding great increase of circuit: strengthened it with a Citadell or Castle: and beautified it with many Palaces, and other buildings: changing the name from Iebussalem, the Citie of the Iebusites, to Hierusalem, which the Greekes call Hierosolyma. After Davids time Salomon amplified, beautified, and strengthened it exceedingly. For besides the worke of the Temple, which was no lesse admirable than renowned among all Nations, the Palaces, gates, and walles, could not any where in the world be exampled: and besides that it had 150000. inhabitants, the women and children not accounted. The ditch had 60. foot depth, cut out of the very rocke: and 250. foot of breadth: whereof the like hath feldome beene heard of, either since or before.

After the death of Salomon, and that the Kingdome of the Iewes was cut asunder, Shishac King of Egypt, and his predecessor, hauing bred vp for that purpose, Adad the Idumean, and Ieroboam, Salomons seruants: and both married to Egyptians: the State by the one disturbed, by the other broken: Shishac first inuaded the Territorie of Iuda, entred Hierusalem, and sackt it, and became Master not onely of the riches of Salomon, but of all those spoiles which David had gotten from Adadexer, Tohu, the Ammonites, and other Nations. It was againe sackt, and a part of the wall throwne downe by Ios King of Israel, while Amasia the twelfth King thereof gouerned Iuda.

Not long after Achaz the fifteenth King of Iuda impouershed the Temple, and presented Teglathphalassar with the treasures thereof. And Manasses the sonne of Ezekiah, the sonne of Achaz, by the vaunts made by Ezekiah, to the Embassadors of Medadach, lost the remaine, and the very bottome of their treasures. It was againe spoiled by the Babylonians, Iokim then reigning. But this vngratefull, Idolatrous, and rebellious Nation, taking no warning by these Gods gentle corrections and afflictions, but persisting in all kinde of impietie, filling the City euen to the mouth with innocent blood, God raised vp that great Babylonian King Nabuchodonosor, as his scourge and reuenger, who making this glorious Citie and Temple with all the Palaces therein, and the Walls and Towers which embraced them, euen and leuell with the dust, carried away the spoiles with the Princes and people, and crusht them with the heauie yoke of bondage and seruitude full seuentie yeeres, in so much as Sion was not onely become as a borne and plowed-up field, Hierusalem an heape of stone, and rubble, the mountaine of the Temple as a groue, or wood of thornes and briars, but (as Hierome speaketh) euen the birds of the ayre scorned to flie ouer it, or the beafts to tread on that defiled soyle.

Then 70 yeeres being expired, according to the Prophecie of Daniel, and the Iewes by the grace of Cyrus returned: the Temple was againe built, though with interruption and difficultie difficultie enough: and the Citie meanely inhabited, and without walls or other defences, for some 60. and odde yeeres, till Nehemia by the fauour of Artaxerxes rebuilt them. Then againe was the Temple and Citie spoyled by Bagofer, or Vagofes, the Lieutenant of Artaxerxes: after by Ptolomeus the first; then by Antiochus Epiphanes: and againe by Apollonius his Lieutenant. By Pompey it was taken long after, but not destroyed, nor robbed, though Craffus in his Parthian expedition tooke as much as hee could of that which Pompey spared.

But the damages which it sustained by the violence of sacrilegious Tyrants, were commonly recompensed by the industrie or bountie of good Princes, the voluntary contribution of the people, and the liberalitie of strangers. Before the captiuitie, the people of the land through the exhortation of godly Kings, made mahy and large offerings to repaire the Temple of Salomon. The wrong done by Ptolomeus Lagi to the second Temple, was requited by the bountie of his sonne Ptolomeus Philadelphus. The mischief wrought by Antiochus Epiphanes and his followers, was amended partly by the great Offerings which were sent to Hierusalem out of other Nations. Finally all the losses, which either the Citie or Temple had endured, might well seeme forgotten in the reigne of Herod that vsurping and wicked, but magnificent King, who amplified the Citie, new built the Temple, and with many sumptuous workes did to adorne them, that hee left them farre more stately and glorious than they had beene in the dayes of Salomon.

§. III.

Of the destruction of Ierusalem by the Romans.

IN this flourishing estate, it was at the coming of our Saviour Christ Iesus: and after his death and ascension, it so continued about 40. yeeres. But then did Titus the Roman, being stirred vp by God, to be the reuenger of Christ his death, and to punish the Jewes sinfull ingratitude, incompassed it with a Roman armie, and became Lord thereof. He began the siege at such time as the Jewes, from all parts, were come vp to the celebration of the Passouer: so as the Citie was then filled with many hundreds of thousands of all sorts; and no manner of prouision or store for any such multitudes. An extreame famine, with the ciuill dissension, oppressed them within the walles; a forcible enimie assailed them without. The Idumians also, who lay in wait for the destruction of the Jewes Kingdome, thrust themselues into the Citie, of purpose to betray it: who also burnt the Temple, when Nabuchodonosor tooke it. And to be short, there perished of all sorts, from the first besieging to the consummation of the victory, eleven hundred thousand soules: and the Citie was so beaten downe and demolished, as those which came afterward to see the desolation thereof, could hardly beleue that there had beene any such place or habitation. Onely the three Herodian towres (works most magnificent, and ouer-topping the rest) were spared, as well for lodgings for the Roman garriſons, as that thereby their victorie might be the more notorious and famous: for by those buildings of strength and State remaining, after-ages might iudge what the rest were; and their honour bee the greater and more shining, that there-ouer became victorious.

After this, such Jewes as were scattered heere and there in Iudea, and other Prouinces, began againe to inhabite some part of the Citie; and by degrees to rebuild it, and strengthen it as they could, being then at peace, and tributaries to the Roman State: but after 65. yeeres, when they againe offered to reuolt, and rebell, Aluis Adrianus the Emperour slaughtered many thousands of them, and ouerturned those three Herodian Towres, with all the rest, making it good which Christ himselfe had foretold; That there should not stand one stone vpon another, of that vngodfull Citie. Afterward, when his furie was appeased, and the Prophecie accomplished, he tooke one part without the wall, wherein stood Mount Caluarie, and the Sepulcher of Christ, and excluding of the rest the greatest portion, he againe made it a Citie of great capacitie, and called it after his owne name, AluCapitolia. In the gate toward Bethel, hee caused a Sowe to be cut in marble, and set in the front thereof, which he did in despite of the Jewes Nation: making an Edict, that they should not from thenceforth euer enter into the Citie, neither should they dare so much as to behold it from any other high place ouertopping it.

But

But the Christian Religion flourishing in Palastina, it was inhabited at length, by all Nations, and especially by Christians; and so it continued 500. yeeres.

It was afterward in the 636. yeare after Christ, taken by the Egyptian Saracens, who held it 400. and odde yeeres.

In the yeere 1099. it was regained by Godfrey of Buillon, by assault, with an exceeding slaughter of the Saracens, which Godfrey, when he was elected King thereof, refused to be crowned with a Crowne of gold, because Christ, for whom hee fought, was therein crowned with thornes. After this recovery, it remained vnder the successors of Godfrey fourescore and eight yeeres: till in the yeere 1197. it was regained by Saladine of Egypt: and lastly, in the yeere 1517. in the time of Selim, the Turkes cast out the Egyptians, who now hold it, and call it Cuzumbarec, or the Holy Citie. Neither was it Ierusalem alone that hath so oftentimes bene beaten downe and made desolate, but all the great Cities of the World haue with their inhabitants, in severall times and ages, suffered the same shipwracke. And it hath bene Gods iust will, to the end others might take warning, if they would, not onely to punish the impietie of men, by famine, by the sword, by fire, and by flauerie; but hee hath reuenged himselfe of the very places they possesse; of the walls and buildings, yea of the soyle and the beasts that feede thereon.

For, euen that land, sometime called holy, hath in effect lost all her fertilitie; and fruitfulness; witnesse the many hundreds of thousands which it fed in the daies of the Kings of Inda and Israel; it being at this time all ouer, in effect, exceeding stony and barraine. It also pleased God, not onely to consume with fire from heauen, the Cities of the Sodomites; but the very soile it selfe hath felt, and doth feele the hand of God to this day. God would not spare the beasts that belonged to Amalek, no not any small number of them to be sacrificed to himselfe; neither was it enough that Achan himselfe was stoned; but that his moueables were also consumed and brought to ashes.

§. IIII.

Of the vaine and malicious reports of Heathen writers, touching the ancient Jewes.

IF the originall of the Jewes, prophane writers haue conceiued diuerſly and injuriously. Quintilian speaks infamously of them, and of their leader; who (saith he) gathered together a pernicious Nation. Diodore and Strabo make them Egyptians. Others affirme that while Isis gouerned Egypt, the people were so increased, as Ierusalem, and Iudas led thence a great multitude of that Nation, with whom they planted the neighbour Regions; which might be meant by Moses and Aaron: for the name of Moses was accidental, because he was taken vp and saued out of the waters. But Iustine of all other most malicious, doth deriue the Jewes from the Syrian Kings; of Iustine. l. 36. whom, Damasius, saith he, was the first: and to him succeeded Abraham, Moses, and Israel. He againe supposeth (somewhat contrary to himselfe) that Israel had ten sonnes, among whom he diuided the land of Inda; so called of Iudas his eldest; who had the greatest portion. The yongest of the sonnes of Israel he calleth Ioseph: who being brought vp in Egypt, became learned in magickall Arts, and in the interpretations of Dreames, and signes prodigious, and this Ioseph (saith he) was father to Moses: who with the rest, by reason of their foule diseases, and lest they should infect others, were banished Egypt. Further, he telleth how these men thus banished, when in the Desarts they suffered extreame thirst and famine, and therein found reliefe the seauenth day, for this cause euer after obserued the seueneth day, and kept it Holy; making it a Law among themselves, which afterward became a branch of their Religion. Hee addeth also that they might not marrie out of their owne Tribes, lest disconcing their vncleanness, they might also be expelled by other Nations, as they were by the Egyptians. These and the like fables hath Iustine.

Cornelius Tacitus doth as grossly belie them, in affirming, that in the inmost Oratorie of their Temple, they had the golden head of an Asse, which they adored. But herein Tacitus forgetteth himselfe, hauing in the fifth booke of his owne Historie truly confessed of the Jewes, that they worshipped one only God: and thought it most prophane to represent sent the Deitie by any materiall figure, by the shape of a man, or any other creature: and they had therefore in their Temples, no Image or representation, no not so much as in any Citie by them inhabited. Somewhat like this hath Alexander Polyhistor, in Stephanus; who also makes Indas with Idumæa, the first parents of the Iewes.

Cited by Stephanus in Idumæa.

Claudius Iolaus draws them from Iudeus, whose parents were Sparton and Thebi; whence it came that the Spartans or Lacedæmonians challenged kindred of the Hebrewes: but they did it as descended of Abraham, saith Iosephus. Some of these reports seeme to haue beene gathered out of diuine letters; though wrested and peruered, according to the custome of the Heathen. For so haue they obscured and altered the Storie of the Creation; of Paradise, of the Flood; and giuen new names to the children of Adam in the first age: to Noah and his sonnes, in the second: and so to Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, Moses, and the rest of the Fathers, and leaders of the Hebrewes: all which sayings, as touching the Iewes and their originalls, Iosephus against Appion, and Tertullian haue sufficiently answered. For that the Hebrewes were the children of Arphaxad and Heber, no man doubteth: and so Chaldeans originallie, taking name either of Heber, the sonne of Sale, or else (saith Montanus) of wandering, as is before remembered. And therefore doth Stephanus, the Greeke Grammarians, deriue the Hebrewes or Iewes, from Arabon; hauing mistaken the name of Abraham, who was the sonne of Heber, in the sixth descent. Their ancient names were first changed by the two grand-children of Abram: for after Jacob, otherwise Israel, the chiefe part were called Israel, another part after Esau or Edom, Edomites; at length the remnant of Jacob, being most of the Tribe of Juda, honoured the name of Indas, the sonne of Jacob, and became Iudeans or Iewes: as also for a time in the name of Ephraim the sonne of Ioseph, the chiefe of the Patriarches of the tenne Tribes, the rest of the tenne Tribes were comprehended: but were first rooted out when the Kingdome of Israel fell. The Iudeans continued their names, though they suffered the same seruitude not long after, vnder Nabuchodonosor.

Tert. in Apol.

Caleb. f. 63.

The gouernement which this Nation vnder-went, was first paternall: which continued till they serued the Egyptians. They were secondly ruled by their Captaines and Leaders, Moses and Iosua, by a policie Diuine. Thirdly, they subiected themselues to Iudges. Fourthly, they desired a King, and had Saul for the first: Of whom and his successours, before we intreat, we are first to speake of their Gouernment vnder Iudges, after the death of Iosua: with somewhat of the things of Fame in other Nations about these times.

CHAP. XIII.

Of the memorable things that happened in the World, from the death of Iosua to the Warre of Troy: which was about the time of Iephtha.

§. I.

Of the inter-regnum after Iosua's death: and of Othoniel.

When Iosua was now dead, who with the aduice of the 70. Elders, and the high Priest, held authoritie ouer the people, and ordered that Common-weale: it pleased God to direct the Tribe of Juda (in whom the Kingdome was afterward established) to undertake the Warre against the Canaanites, ouer whom (with Gods fauour, and the assistance of Siméon) they became victorious.

In the first attempt which they made, they not only slew tenne thousand, but made Adonibezek prisoner: the greatest and cruellest Commander, both of the Canaanites and Perizites. This tyrants crueltie, as elsewhere hath beene signified, they returned in the same kinde vpon his owne head: and so by the torments which he now felt in his owne person (before no otherwise knowne vnto him but by his malicious cious imagination) made him confesse and acknowledge Gods iudgements against himselfe.

The Tribes of Iuda and Simeon did also master and possesse during this interregnum (or as some thinke, before the death of Iosua) the Cities of Azotus, Askalon, Ekron and Hierusalem, which they burnt, and the Iebusites after reedified. They tooke also the Cities of Hebron, Debir, or Kiriathsepher, and Zephath, afterwards Horma. And although it be not set downe in expresse words that any one person commanded in chiefe ouer the people, as Moses and Iosua did: yet it seemeth that Caleb was of greatest authority among them: and that he with the aduice of phinees directed and ordered their warres. For if any think that they proceeded without a Chiefe, the good successe which followed their undertakings witnesseth the contrary. And it was Caleb euen while Iosua gouerned, as appeares, Ios. 10. 39. that propounded the attempt of Debir, to the rest of the Captaines: for the performance of which enterprife, hee promised his Daughter Achsah, which he performed to Othoniel his yonger brother after the conquest: whose behaviour in that seruice was such, as (next vnto the ordinance of God) it gaue him the greatest reputation among them, and may be esteemed the second cause of his preferment and election for their first Iudge soone after. But while those of Iuda made warre with their borderers, from whom they onely recouered the mountainous Countries (for they could not driue out the inhabitants of the Valleys, because they had Chariots of Iud. 1. 19. 20. 17.) The rest of the Tribes fought also to enlarge and establish their owne Territories: in which warre they laboured with variable successe: for as the house of Ioseph recouered Bethel, or Luz, from the Hittites, so did the Amorites recouer from Dan all the plaine Countries, and forst them to saue themselves in the Mountaines. And now the Israelites vnmindfull of Gods benefits, and how often hee had miraculously a-fore-time defended them, and made them victorious ouer their enemies (the Elders beeing also consumed, who better aduised them in the Inter-regnum) did not onely ioyne themselves in marriage with the Heathen Nations: but (that which was more detestable) they serued the Idols of Baal, and Asteroth, with other the dead gods of the Canaanites and Amorites. And therefore did the Lord God whom they had prouoked with their idolatrie, deliuer them into the hands of the Aramites of Mesopotamia: whom Chusshan Rishathaim at that time commanded. But after they had felt the smart of Gods displeasure against them eight yeeres, it pleased him to haue compassion on his people, and to raise vp Othoniel to be their Iudge and Leader: who by Gods assistance, deliuered his brethren from oppression: and inforced the Aramites to returne into their owne Desarts, and into Mesopotamia adioyning; after which the Israelites had peace fourtie yeeres, during all the time of Othoniels gouernment. This Othoniel is thought by Tostatus to haue beene the yonger brother of Caleb, for as much as in the booke of Iudges hee is twice called Othoniel the Sonne of Cenaz, Calebs yonger brother. Others doe rather interpret those words (Calebs yonger brother) as if they signified the meanest of his kinned. Indeed it is not likely, that Calebs Daughter should marrie with her owne Vncle; yet it followes not therefore that Othoniel should haue beene the meanest of the kinned. Wherefore wee may better thinke that hee was the Nephew of Caleb, (as some learned men expound it) and as the very words of Scripture seeme to enforce. For Caleb was the sonne of Iephunneh, and Othoniel the sonne of Cenaz, Calebs yonger brother; that is, he was not brother to Caleb, but his yonger brothers sonne; to whom it was not onely lawfull, but commendable to marrie with his Cousin German Calebs daughter.

Now long it was from the death of Iosuah to the gouernment of Othoniel, it cannot be found: but it seemes to haue beene no short time. For many Warres were made in that space against the people of the Land. Laisb was then taken (as is thought) by the Danites; and the best Writers are of opinion, that betweene the times of Iosua and Othoniel that ciuill Warre brake out betweene the Beniamites and the rest of Israel, for the forcing to death of the Leuites Wife. For it is written, that in those dayes there was no King in Israel, but euery man did that which was good in his owne eyes. And as Iuda ledde the people against the Canaanites during the Inter-regnum, so was hee commanded to doe against Beniamin, euen by the Lord God, whose direction they craved, as wanting a Iudge to appoint what should be done, which sheweth it to haue beene when Iosua was dead, & before the gouernment of Othoniel, especially considering, that all other other times wherein they wanted Gouvernors, were spent vnder such oppression of strangers, as would haue giuen them no leaue to haue attempted such a ciuill Warre, if their power had beeneas great, as it was in the managing of this action, wherein they so weakened the body of their estate, by effusion of blood, that in many ages they could nor bring into the field such numbers as formerly they had mustered against their bordering enemies.

§. II.

Of the memorable things of this Age in other Nations: and of the difficultie in the computation of times.

Here liued in this Age of Othomiel, Pandon or Pandareus, according to Homer, the fift King of Athens: who began to rule in the twentieth yeere of Othomiel, and gouerned fortie yeeres. Hee was Father to Erichtheus: his Daughters were Progne and Philomela, so greatly mentioned in fables.

Cadmus also about this time obtained Thebes: of whose Daughter Semele was borne Dionysius, or Liber Pater: vnder whom Linus the Musician liued. In his time also the Cities of Melus, Paphus, and Tharsus, were built.

Ida and Dactylus flourished in this age, who are said to haue found out the vse of iron:

but Genesis hath taught vs the contrary, and that Tubalcain long before wrought cunning-lie both in iron & brasse. Not long after this time, Amphion and Zethus gouerned Thebes:

whom diuers Chronologers finde in Ehuds time. But S. Augustine making a repetition of those fables, which were deuised among the Gracians and other Nations, during the gouernment of the Iudges, begins with Triptolemus, of whose parentage there is as little agreement. Vines vpon the thirteenth Chapter of S. Augustine de Ciuitate Dei, and the eighteenth booke, hath gathered all the opinions of this mans progenie, where hee that desires his pedigree may finde it. Lactantius and Eusebius make him natieue of Attica: and the sonne of Eleusius King of Eleusina: which Eleusius by careful industrie had fed the people of that Territorie in the time of a great famine. This, when vpon the like occasion Triptolemus could not performe, fearing the furie of the people, he fled thence by Sea in a kinde of Galley or long Boat, which carried in her Prowe a grauen or carued Serpent; who because hee made exceeding great speed to returne and to relieue his people with Corne, from some neighbour Nation: it was fained by the Poets, that his Coach was carried by Serpents through the ayre.

Whether the times of these Kings which liued together with Othomiel, and after him with the rest of the Iudges and Kings of Israel and Juda, be precisely set downe, I cannot auow; for the Chronologers, both of the former and latter times, differ in many particulars, to examine all which would require the whole time of a long life: and therefore I desire to be excused, if in these comparisons I erre with others of better iudgement. For whether Eusebius and all that follow him, or his opposites (who make themselves for conuersant with these ancient Kings, and with the very yeere when they began to rule) haue hit the marke of time, of all other the farthest off and most defaced, I cannot but greatly doubt. First, because the Authors themselves, from whom the ancientest Chronologers haue borrowed light, had nothing for the warrant of their owne works, but coniecture: Secondly, because their owne disagreement and contention in those elder dayes, with that of our owne age among the labourers in times, is such, as no man among them hath yet so edified any mans vnderstanding, saue his owne, but that he is greatly distracted, after what patterne to erect his buildings.

This disagreement is found not onely in the reignes of Heathen Kings & Princes; but euen in the computation of those times which the indisputable authoritie of holy Scripture hath summed vp, as in that of Abrahams birth; and after in the times of the Iudges and the oppressions of Israel, in the times from the egression to the building of Salomons Temple, in the Persian Empire, the seuentie Weekes, and in what not? Wherefoeuer the account of times may suffer examination, the arguments are opposite, & contentions are such, as for ought that I see, men haue sought by so many wayes to vncouer the Sunne, that the dayes thereby are made more darke, and the clouds more condensed than before: I can therefore giue no other warrant, than other men haue done in these computations: and therefore that such and such Kings and Kingdomes tooke beginning in this or that yeere, I auow it no otherwise than as a borrowed knowledge, or at least as a priuate opinion: which I submit to better iudgements. Nam in priscis rebus veritas non ad quæm querenda; In ancient things we are not to require an exact narration of the truth, sayes Diodore.

§. III.

Of Ehuds time, and of Proserpina, Orithya, Tercus, Tantalus, Tityus, Admetus, and others that liued about those times.

After the death of Othomiel, when Israel fell backe to their former Idolatrie, God encouraged Moab to inuade and suppress them: to performe which he ioyned the forces of Ammon, and Amalec vnto his owne, and so (as all kinde of miserie readilie findeth out those whom God hath abandoned, or for a time with-drawne his helpe from, thereby to make them feele the difference betweene his gracc and his displeasure) these Heathen neighbouring Nations had an easie conquest ouer Israel: whom God himselfe exposed to those perils: within which they were so speedilie folded vp. In this miserable estate they continued full eigheteene yeeres vnder Eglon King of the Moabites, and his confederates. Yet, as the mercies of God are infinite, hee turned not his eares from their crying repentance: but raised vp Ehud the sonne of Gera to deliuer them: by which weak man, though maimed in his right hand, yet confident in the iustnesse of his quarrell, and fearing that the Israelites were too few in numbers to contend with the Head of those valiant Nations, he resolved to attempt vpon the person of Eglon, whom if he could but extinguish, hee assured himselfe of the following victory: especially giuing his Nation no time to reestablish their gouernment, or to chooe a King to command and direct them in the Warres. According to which resolution, Ehud went on as an Embassadour to Eglon, loaden with presents from the Israelites, as to appease him, and obtaining priuate acceffe vpon the pretence of some secret to be reuealed, he pierst his body with a Poniard, made of purpose with a double edge: and shutting the doores of his closet vpon him, escaped.

It may seeme that being confident of his good successe, hee had prepared the strength of Israel in readinesse. For suddenly after his returne, he did repasse Jordan: and inuading the Territory of Moab, ouerthrew their Armie consisting of 10000. able and strong men: whereof not any one escaped. After which victorie, and that Samgar his Successour had miraculously slaine 600. Philistims with an Oxe goade: the Land and People of Israel liued in peace vnto the end of fourescore yeeres from the death of Othomiel, which terme expired in the Worlds yeere 2691.

In the dayes of Ehud, Naomi with Eliamelech her husband, and with her two sonnes, traualled into Moab, and so the storie of Ruth isto be referred to this time. About the beginning of the fourescore yeeres which are giuen to Ehud, it was that Orcus King of the Molossians, otherwise Pluto, stole Proserpina, as shee walked to gather flowers in the fields of Hippomium in Sicilia: or (according to Pausanias) by the Riuer Cephissus, which elsewhere hee calleth Chemir, if hee meane not two distinct Riueres. This stealth being made known to Pyrrhous, with whom Hercules and Theseus ioyned themselves, they agreed together to recouer her: but Pluto or Orcus (whom others call Aidonius) had (as they say) a very huge Dogge, which fastened on Pyrrhous, and tare him in pieces, and had also worried Theseus, but that Hercules speedily rescued him: and by strength tooke and mastered the Dogge Cerberus: whereof grew the fable of Hercules his deliuering Theseus out of Hell. But Zeus, as I take it, hath writtent his storie somewhat more according to the truth. For Theseus and Pyrrhous, saith hee, attempted to steale Proserpina Daughter to Aidonius, King of the Molossians, who had Ceres to Wife, the mother of Proserpina: Proserpina being a generall name also for all faire women. This purpose of theirs being knowne to Aidonius, Theseus and Pyrrhous were both taken; and because Pyrrhous was the principall in this conspiracie, and Theseus drawne on by a kinde of affection or inforcement, the one was giuen for foode to Aidonius his great Dogge Cerberus, the other held prisoner, till Hercules by the instigation of Euristheus deliuered him by strong hand. The Molossi which Stephanus writes with a single (S) were a people of Epirus inhabiting aecre the Mountaines of Pindus: of which Mountaines Oeta is one of the most famous, where Hercules burnt himselfe. The Riuer of Acheron (which the Poets describe to bee in Hell) riseth out of the same Hills. There is another Nation of the Molossi in Thessali: but these are neighbours to the Cassiopei, saith Plutarch in his Greece questions.

The rape of Orithya the Daughter of Erichtheus, King of Athens, taken away by Boreas of Thrace, is referred to the time of Ehud. The Poets ascribe this rape to the Northwinde, because Thrace is situate North from Athens. In his time also Tereus rauished Philomela, of which the fable was deuised of her conuersion into a Nightingale. For Tereus hauing married her sister Progne, conducting Philomela from Athens to see her sister, forced her in her passage, and withall cut out her tongue, that shee might not come plaine; perswading Progne his Wife, that Philomela died in the mid-way: all which her brother in law's mercilesse behaviour towards her, Philomela expressed by her needle vpon cloth, and sent it to Progne. In reuenge whereof Progne caused her onely sonne Irys, to bee cut in pieces, and set before Tereus her husband, so drest as it appeared to be some other ordinary foode: of which when hee had eaten his fill, shee caused his head, hands, and feete, to bee presented vnto him: and then fled away with such speed towards Athens where her Father Pandion yet liued, as the Poets fained, that shee was turned into a Swallow. The place where it was performed, Strabo findes to be Daulis in Phocis: and the Tombe of Tereus, Pausanias hath built nere the Rockes Mergi, in the Territorie of Athens. By which, as also by the name Daulis, where these things are supposed to haue bene done (whence also Philomela is called Daulias ales) it appears that it is true, which Thucydides notes by way of digression in his Peloponnesian Warre, That this Tereus was not King in that which is now called Thracia, or in Odryse, (as the Poets call him Oirygius) but that Phocis a Countrie in Greece not farre from Attica, a Citie whereof is called Daulia, was in Pandion's time inhabited by Thracians: of which this Tereus was King: whence Pandion, to haue amitie with his neighbours, made him his sonne in law: as it is good to beleue, saith Thucydides, that Pandion King of Athens made that alliance with a neighbour King, from whom he might haue succour, rather than with any Tereus, that should haue held the Kingdome of Odryse, which was greatly distant from thence. The occasion that the Poets chose a Swallow for Progne to be turned into, may seeme to haue bene partly because, as Pausanias sayes, Daulide nec nidsficans, nec habitant in tota circum regione Hirundines: As if a Swallow, remembering the wrong that was there done to her, and her sister, did for euer after hate that place.

Nere this time Melampus (who is said to haue vnderstood the voyces of Birds and Beasts) flourished, being also esteemed for an excellent Physician. Hee restored to their former health the Daughters of Prætus King of the Argiues, who (as the Poets please) were made mad by Iuno: and thinking themselves to be Kine, fled into the Woods, fearing to bee constrained to the Plough: for in those Countries where the ground was light, they did vse often to plough with Kine.

In the seuen and fortieth yeare of Ehud, Tros began to raigne in Dardania, and gaue it his owne name; about which time Phemone the chiefe Priest of Apollo in Delpos, deuised the Heroicall Verse.

Of the same date was Tantalus, King of Lydia: whom Eusebius makes King of Phrygia: and also of that part of which the people were anciently Maones. Of Tantalus was deuised the fable that some Poets haue applied to the passion of loue: and some to the covetous that dare not inioy his riches. Eusebius calls this Tantalus the sonne of Iupiter, by the Nymph Pleta: Diaconus and Didymus in Zeuxes, giue him another Mother. He was said to be the son of Iupiter: as some will haue it; because he had that Planet in his ascendent, betokening wisdom and riches. It is said that when he made a feast to the Gods, hauing nothing more precious: he caused his owne Sonne to be slaine and drest to the banquet: of whom Ceres are part of one of the shoulders: whereby was signified that those men which seek after Diuine knowledge, preferre nothing on earth before it: no not the care of their owne children, of all else the most dearest. And where it was deuised, that hee had alwaies Water and Fruit offered to his lips, and yet suffered the torment of hunger and thirst, it was meant thereby, that though he abounded (by reason of his riches) in all delicacie of the world, yet his minde being otherwise and to higher desires transported, he enioyed no pleasure at all by the rest. Of whom Ouid:

Quærit

Quærit aquas in aquis, & poma sugacia captat
Tantalus, hoc illi garrula lingua dedit.

Here Tantalus in water seekes for water, and doth misse
The fleeing fruit he catcheth at: His long tongue brought him this.

This punishment, they say, was inflicted vpon him, for that he discovered the secrets of the gods: that is, because he taught wisdom and vertue to mortall men: which storie Cornelius Gallus hath elegantly exprest in Verse. Others expound this fable otherwise and say, That Tantalus, though hee excelled in riches, yet being thirstie of more abundance, was neuer satisfied. Of whom Horace against couetousnesse:

Tantalus à labijs sitiens fugientia captat
Flumina, quid rides? mutato nomine de te
Fabula narratur.

The thirsting Tantalus doth catch at streames that from him flee.
Why laughest thou? the name but chang'd, the tale is told of thee.

Others conceiue where it is fained of Tantalus, that he gaue the Nectar and Ambrosia of the gods to vaine and vnworthy men, that he was therefore by them in that sort punished. Of which Natalis out of Pindarus:

Immortalitatem quod furatus,
Cœtaneis conuiuiis
Nectar Ambrosiamque dedit.

Because that stealing immortalitie,
He did both Nectar and Ambrosia giue
To guests of his owne age, to make them liue.

Whereby it was meant, that the secrets of Diuinitie ought not to be imparted to the vnpure Vulgar. For as the cleaneest meates in a foule stomacke, are therein corrupted, so the most high and reuerend mysteries are often peruerred by an vnclane and defiled minde.

To you it is giuen (saith Christ in Marke) to know the mystrie of the Kingdome of God, but vnto them that are without, all things be done in parables. So is it said of him that hee expounded all things to his Disciples apart. And therefore doth Gregorie Nazianzene inferre vpon a place of S. Paul: Quod si Paulo licuisset effari ea, quorum ipsi cognitionem celum tertium & vsq. ad illud progesio suppeditauit, fortasse de Deo, nobis aliquid amplius de reſta ratione constaret; si Paul might haue uttered the things, the knowledge whereof the third beauen, and his going thither did bring vnto him, peraduenture we might know somewhat more of God.

Pythagoras saith Reuclin, thought it not the part of a wise man, Asino lyram exponere, aut mysteria, quæ ita reciperet, ut Sus tubam, & fidem græculus, & vnguenta Scarabæus: quare silentium indixit discipulis, ne vulgo diuinorum arcana pateſcerent, quæ meditando facilius, quàm loquendo apprehendantur; To set an Asse to a harpe, or to learne mysteries: which he would handle as a Swine doth a trumpet, or a Lay a viall, or Scarabæus and vnclane flies sueraigne ointment. Wherefore he commanded silence to his disciples, that they should not disclose diuine mysteries to the common sort, which are easier learnt by meditation than by babbling. And therefore did the Egyptians communicate their mysteries among their Priests in certaine Hieroglyphick letters, to the end that their secrets might be hidden from the Vulgar: and that they might bestow the more time in the contemplation of so their conuered meanings.

But to proceede with the contemporaries of Aod, or Ehud, with him it is also said, that Tityus liued whom Apollo slew, because he sought to force his Mother Latona. Euphorion hath it thus, that Tityus was the Sonne of Elara, the Daughter of Orchomenus; which Elara being beloved of Iupiter, to auoid Iuno's reuenge, he hid Elara in the earth, where she was deliuered of Tityus: whose Mother dying, and himselfe therein nourished, he was therefore called the sonne of the earth. Pausanias speaking of the graue of this Gyant, affirms that his body occupied the third part of a furlong. But Tibullus hath a louder lie of his stature out of Homer:

Por.

Hom. Od. 11.

Porrectusque nouem Tityus per iugera terra, Asiduus atro viscere pascit aues.

Nine furlongs stretch lies Tityus, who for his wicked deeds,
The hungry birds with his renewing liuer daily feeds.

This Strabo doth thus expound; that Apollo killing this cruell and wicked Tyrant of Panopea, a Citie in Phocis, it was fained by the Poets to the terrour of others, that he was still eaten in Hell by birds, and yet still liued, and had his flesh renewed.

Admetus King of Thesalie liued also in this Age, whom it is said that Apollo first serued to as a Herd-man, and afterward for his excellent wit was by him advanced; but hauing slaine Hyacinthus, he crost the Hellepont, and fled into Phrygia: where together with Neptune, he was entertained by Laomedon, and got his bread by working in bricke, for building of the wals of Troy, not by making the bricke leape into their places by playing on his Harpe: according to him in Ouid, which saith:

*Ilion aspicias, firmataque turribus altis
Mœnia, Apollineæ structa canore lyra.*

Strong Ilion thou shalt see with wals and towers high,
Built with the harpe of wife Apollo's Harmonie.

Thus the Poets: but others, that hee laboured with his hands, as hired in this worke, And that he also laboured at the building of the Labyrinth in Greece, all the Megarians witnesse, saith Pausanias.

Pausan. Att.

In these daies also of Ehud, or (as some finde it) in the dayes of Deborah, liued Perseus, the sonne of Iupiter and Danae, by whose Souldiers (as they sailed out of Peloponnesus, to seeke their aduenture on Africa side) Medusa, the Daughter and Successor of Phorcus, being weakly accompanied as she hunted, neere the Lake Triton, was surprised and slaine: whose beauty, when Perseus beheld, he caused her head to be embalmed, and carried into Greece: the beauty whereof was such and so much admired, and the beholders so astonished which beheld it, as thercof grew the fiction, that all that looked on Medusa's head, were turned into stones.

Triton a Lake of Africa, which Pollux
calleth *Pollan-

Euseb. in Chro.

Cecrops, the second of that name, and 7. King of Athens, and Acrisius the 13. or after Eusebius, the 14. King of the Argiues, began also their reignes, as it is said, in the time of this Iudge: of which the first ruled 40. yeares, and the second 31. yeares. Also Bellerophon liued in this age, being the sonne of Glaucus, the sonne of Sisiphus: who incited by Antea or Sthenobia, the wife of Prætus of the Argiues, to accompanie her, but refusing it, she accused him to her husband that he offered to force her: whereupon Prætus sent Bellerophon into Lycia, about some affaires of weight, betweene him and his sonne in law Iobates: giuing secret order to Iobates to dispatch him: but Iobates thinking it dishonourable to lay violent hands on him, imployed him against Chimæra, a Monster, vomiting or breathing fire. Now the gods (as the report is) pittying his innocency, sent him the winged Horle Pegasus, sprung vp of the blood of Medusa, formerly slaine by the souldiers of Perseus in Africa, to transport him, a horse that none other could master or bridle but Minerva: vpon which beast Bellerophon ouer-came Chimæra: and performed the other seruices giuen him in charge: which done, as hee returned toward Lycia, the Lycians lay in ambush to haue slaine him: but being victorious also ouer all those, he arrived to Iobates in safetie: whom Iobates for his eminent vertues honoured, first with one of his Daughters: and afterward with his Kingdome: after which hee grew so insolent, as hee attempted to flye vp to heauen vpon his Pegasus: whose pride Iupiter disdainig, caused one of his stinging flies so to vex Pegasus, as he cast off Bellerophon from his backe, into the Valley of Cilicia, where he died blinde; of which burthen Pegasus being discharged (as the fable goeth) flew backe to heauen: and being fed in Iupiter's owne stable, Aurora beg'd him of Iupiter to ride on before the Sunne. This tale is diuersly expounded, as first by some, That it pleaseth God to relieue men in their innocent and vnderferued aduersitie, and to cast downe those which are too high minded: according to that which is said of Bellerophon: that when he was exposed to extreame hazard, or rather certaine death, hee found both deliuerance and honour: but waxing proud, proud and presumptuous in his glorious fortunes, hee was againe throwne downe into the extremitie of sorrow, and euer-during miserie. Secondly by others, That vnder the name of Chimæra, was meant a cruell Pyrate of the Lycians, whose ship had in her prow, a Lyon, a Goate in the mid-ship, and a Dragon in the stearne, of which three beasts this Monster Chimæra was said to be compounded, whom Bellerophon pursued with a kinde of Galley, of such swiftnesse, that it was called the flying Horle: to whom the inuention of sailes (the wings of a ship) are also attributed. Many other expositions are made of this tale by other Authors: but it is not vnlikely, that Chimæra was the name of a ship, for so Virgil calleth one of the greatest ships of Aeneas.

L. 5. Æneid.

Ion also, from whom the Athenians (being ignorant of the antiquitie of their parent Iauan) deriue their name of Iones, is said to haue bene about Ehuds time: Homer calls them Iaones, which hath a neere resemblance to the word Iauan. Perhaps it might be so that Ion himselfe tooke name from Iauan: it being a custome obseruable in the histories of all times, to reuiue the ancient name of a fore-father, in some the principall of his issue.

The inuasion of India by Liber Pater, is by some reported as done in this age: but S. Augustine makes him farre more ancient: placing him betweene the coming out of Egypt, and the death of Iosua.

About the end of the 80. yeares, ascribed to Ehud, and Samgar, Pelops, flourished: who gaue name to Peloponnesus in Greece, now called Morea.

§. I I I I.

Of Deborah and her Contemporaries.

After Israel had liued in peace and plenty to the end of these 80. yeares, they againe began to forget the giuer of all goodnesse, and many of those being wome out, which were witnesses of the former miserie, and of Gods deliuerance by Ehud, and after him by Samgar, the rest began to returne to their former neglect of Gods commandements. For as Plentie and Peace are the parents of idle securitie, so is securitie as fruitfull in begetting and bringing forth both danger and subuersion: of which all estates in the world haue tasted by interchange of times. Therefore when their finnes were againe ripe for punishment, Iabin King of Hazor, after the death of Ehud, inuaded the Territorie of Israel; and hauing in his seruice 900. yron Chariots, besides the rest of his forces, he held them in subiection twentie yeares, till it pleased God to raise vp Deborah, the Prophetesse, who encouraged Barac to leue a force out of Nephtalim, and Zabulon, to encounter the Canaanites. That the men of Nephtalim were more forward than the rest in this action, it may seeme to haue proceeded partly from the authoritie that Barac had among them, being of the same Tribe; and partly from their feeling of the common grieuance, which in them was more sensible, than in others, because Hazor and Harosheth the chiefe holds of Iabin, were in Nephtalim. So in the dayes of Lepta the Gileadites tooke the greatest care, because the Ammonites with whom the Warre was, pressed most vpon them, as being their borderers. Now as it pleased God by the left hand of Ehud to deliuer Israel from the Moabites: and by the counsaile and courage of a woman, to free them from the yoke of Canaan, and to kill the valiant Sisera by Iael the Kenites wife: so was it his will at other times, to worke the like great things by the weakest meanes. For the mighty Affyrian Nabuchodonosor, who was a King of Kings, and resistlesse, he ouerthrew by his owne imaginations, the causers of his brutish melancholy: and changed his matchlesse pride into the base humility of a Beast. And to approue that he is the Lord of all power, he sometime punisheth by inuincible strength, as when he slaughtered the Armie of Senacherib by his Angell, or as hee did the Egyptians in Mosis time: sometime by dead bodies, as when he drowned Pharao by the waues of the Sea: and the Canaanites by haile-stones in the time of Iosua: sometimes by the ministrie of men, as when he ouerthrew the foure Kings of the East, Chedorlaomer, and his companions, by the household seruants of Abraham. He caused the Moabites and Ammonites to set vpon their owne confederate the Armie of the Edomites, and hauing slaine them to kill one another in the sight of Iehoshaphat: and of the like to these a volume of examples may be gathered. And to this effect did Deborah the Prophetesse speake vnto Barac in these words: But this journey that thou takest, shall not be for thine honour, for the Lord shall sell Sisera into the hands of a Woman. In which victorie all the strength of the Canaanite Iabin fell to the ground, euent to the last man: in the end of which Warre it seemeth that Iabin himselfe also perished, as appeareth by the last Verse of the fourth of Judges.

After all which Deborah giueth thanks to God, and after the acknowledgement of all his powerfullnesse, and great mercies, she sheweth the weake estate whereinto Israel was brought for their Idolatry by the Canaanites, and other bordering Nations, in these words: Was there a shield or speare seene among fortie thousand of Israel? She also sheweth how the Israelites were seuered and amased, some of them confined ouer Iordan, and durst not ioyne themselves to the rest; as those of Reuben in Gilead: that the Galbites kept the Sea-coast, and forsooke their habitations towards the Land; and the children of Dan who neighboured the Sea, crept into their ships for safety, shewing thereby that all were disperfed, and all in effect lost. Shee then curseth the inhabitants of Meros, who dwelling neere the place of the battaile (belike fearing the successe) came not out to assist Israel, and then blesteth Iael the wife of Heber the Kenite, who nailed Sisera in her Tent: shewing the ancient affection of that race to the Israelites. For though the Familie of Heber were forced in that miserable time of subiection, to hold correspondencie with Iabin the Canaanite, yet when occasion offered them meanes, they witnessed their loue and faith to their ancient friends. Lastly, shee desireth the Mother of Sisera who promised her sonne the victorie in her owne hopes: and fancied to her selfe, and described the spoiles both of Garments and Maidens by him gotten. For conclusion, shee directeth her praise and thanks to God onely victorious.

From the beginning of Iabins oppression to the end of that peace, which Deborah and Barac purchased vnto Israel, there passed 40. yeares. In which time the Kingdome of Argos which had continued 544. yeares, was translated to Mycena: The translation of this Kingdome Vines out of Pausanias writeth to this effect: After Danaus, Lyncus succeeded in Argos, after whom the children of Abas the sonne of Lyncus diuided the Kingdome: of which Acrisius being eldest, held Argos it selfe: Pratus his brother possesse Ephyra or Corinth, and Tirynthos, and other Cities with all the Territories towards the Sea, there being many monuments in Tirynthos, which witness Pratus possession, saith Pausanias.

Now Acrisius was foretold by an Oracle, that hee should be slaine by the sonne of his Daughter Danae: whereupon he caused her to be inclosed in a Tower, to the end that no man might accompanie her. But the Lady being exceeding faire, it is fained that Iupiter turned himselfe into a golden shower: which falling into her lap, begat her with childe: the meaning whereof was, that some Kings sonne, or other Worthy man, corrupted her keepers with gold: and enioyed her, of whom Perseus was borne, who when hee grew to mans estate, either by chance (saith Ctesias) or in shewing his grand-father the inuention of the discus, or leaden ball, slew him vnwillingly. After this Perseus, to auoide the infamie of Patricide in Argos, changed Kingdomes with his Vncle Pratus: and built Mycena. This imprisonment of Danae, Sophocles reporteth otherwise: and that shee was inclosed in a brazen vault, vnder the Kings Hall with her Nurse and Keepers. Vpon this close custodie Horace hath this witty obseruation:

*Inclusam Danaen, turris aenea,
Robustae fores, & vigilum canum
Tristes excubiae, munerant satis
Nocturnis ab adulteris:*

*Si non Acrisium Virginis abdita
Custodem pauidum, Iupiter & Venus
Risissent, fore enim tutum iter & patens, Conuerso in pretium Deo.*

*Aut non per medios ire satellites,
Exterumpere amat saxa, potius
Ictu fulmineo.*

The

The brazen Tower with dores close bar'd,
And watchfull bandogs frightfull guard,
Kept safe the maidenhead
Of Danae from secret loue:
Till smiling Venus, and wife Ioue
Beguild her Fathers dread.
For chang'd into a golden showre,
The god into her lap did powre
Himselfe; and tooke his pleasure.
Through gardes, and stonie wals to breake,
The thunder-bolt is farre more weake,
Then is a golden treasure.

The first Kings of the Argiues were these.

Inachus the first King, who began to reigne in the first yeare of Iacob, and the 61. of Isaac: from which time to the end of Sthenelus, Castor misreckoneth 400. yeares. This Kingdome before the translation, Eusebius accounteth to haue stood 544. yeares, others but at 417. Io was the Daughter of this Inachus: whom the Egyptians called Isis.

Phoroneus,
Apis,
Argus,
Piraeus,
Phorbas,
Triopas,
Crotopus,
Sthenelus,
Danaus,
Lyncus,
Abas,
Acrisius,
Pelops.

After the translation to Mycena, Mar. Scotus findes these Kings:

Perseus,
Sthenelus,
Eurystheus,
Agamemnon,
Aegisthus,
Orestes,
Tisamenus,
Penthilus and Cometes.

Of these Kings Mercator and Bunting leaue out the two first, and the last: beginning with Eurystheus: and ending with Penthilus. In Tisamenus time the Heraclidae returned into Peloponnesus: of which hereafter.

The Contemporaries of Barac and Deborah, were Midas who reigned in Phrygia: and Ilus who built Ilium: with others mentioned in our Chronologicall table, as contemporaries with Deborah.

S. V.

Of Gideon, and of Dædalus, Sphinx, Minos, and others that liued in this Age.

In Deborah and Barac being dead: the Midianites assisted by the Amalekites infested Israel. For when vnder a Judge who had held them in the feare of the Lord, they had enioyed any quiet or prosperity: the Judge was no sooner dead, than they turned to their former impietie. Therefore now the neighbouring Nations did

Ind. 5. did so master them in a short time (the hand of God being with-held from their defence) as to saue themselves, they crept into caues of the mountaines, and other the like places of hardest access: their enemies possessing all the plaines and fruitfull vallies: and in haruest time by themselves, and the multitude of their cattle, destroying all that grew vp: couering the fields as thicke as grasse-hoppers: which seruitude lasted seauentyeares.

Ind. 5. v. 5.

Ind. 5. 6. &amp; 7.

Then the Lord by his Angell stirred vp Gideon the sonne of Toasb, afterward called Ierubbaal: whose feare and unwillingnesse, and how it pleased God to hearken him in his enterpize, it is both largely and precisely set downe in the holy Scriptures: as also how it pleased God by a few select persons, namely 300. out of 32000. men, to make them know that he onely was the Lord of Hosts: Each of these 300. by Gideons appointment carried a trumpet, and light in a pitcher, instruments of more terrour than force, with which hee gaue the great Armie of their enemies an alarm: who hearing so loud a noise, and seeing (at the cracke of so many pitchers broken) so many lights about them, esteeming the Armie of Israel to be infinite, and stricken with a sodaine feare, they all fled without a stroke stricken: and were slaughtered in great numbers: two of their Princes being made prisoners and slaine. In his returne the Ephraimites began to quarrell with Gideon, because he made warre without their assistance, being then greedy of glory, the victorie being gotten: who (if Gideon had failed and fallen in the enterprise) would no doubt haue held themselves happy by being neglected. But Gideon appearing them with a milde answer, followed after the enemy, in which pursuite being tyred with trauaile, and weary euen with the slaughtering of his enemies, he desired reliefe from the inhabitants of Succoth, to the end, that (his men being refreshed) he might ouer-take the other two Kings of the Midianites: which had saued themselves by flight. For they were foure Princes of the Nations, which had inuaded and wasted Israel: to wit, Oreb and Seeb, which weretaken already, and Zebah and Salmunna which fled.

Gideon being denied by them of Succoth, sought the like reliefe from the inhabitants of Penuel, who in like sort refused to succour him. To both of these places he threatened therefore the reuenge, which in his returne from the prosecution of the other two Princes, he performed: to wit, that he would teare the flesh of those of Succoth with Thomes and Briars, and destroy the Inhabitants and Citie of Penuel: Now why the people of these two Cities should refuse reliefe to their brethren the Israelites, especially after so great a victorie: if I may presume to make coniecture, it seemes likely, first that those Cities set ouer Jordan, & in the way of all invasions, to be made by the Moabites, Ammonites and Midianites, into Israel, had either made their own peace with those Nations, & were not spoiled by them: or else they knowing that Zebah and Salmunna were escaped with a great part of their army, might feare their reuenge in the future. Secondly, it may be laid to the condition and dispositions of these men: as it is not rare to finde of the like humour in all ages. For there are multitudes of men, especially of those which follow the warre, that both enuie and maligne others, if they performe any praise-worthy actions, for the honour and safety of their owne Countrey, though themselves may be assured to beare a part of the smart of contrary successe. And such malicious hearts can rather be contented that their Prince and Countrey should suffer hazzard and want, than that such men as they dislike, should be the authors or actors of any glory or good to either.

A place in Beniamin, as it is thought.
Ind. 8. 10.

Now Gideon, how or wheresoeuer it were that he refreshed himselfe and his weary and hungry Souldiers, yet he followed the opportunity, and pursued his former victory to the vttermost: and finding Zebah and Salmunna in Karkor (suspecting no farther attempt vpon them) he againe surpris'd them, and slaughtered those 15000. remaining: and hauing put to the sword in the former attempt 120000. and withall he tooke Zebah and Salmunna prisoners: whom because themselves had exequuted Gideons brethren before at Tabor, he caused them both to be slaine: or (as it is written) at their owne request slew them with his owne hands: his Sonne whom he first commanded to doe it, refusing it; and in his returne from the consummation of this mercurious victory, he tooke reuenge of the Elders of Succoth, and of the Citizens of Penuel: forgiuing no offence committed against him: either by strangers or by his brethren the Israelites. But such mercy as he shewed to others, his owne children found soone after his death, according to

to that which hath beene said before. The debts of cruelty and mercy are neuer left unsatisfied: for as he slew the 70. Elders of Succoth, with great and vnusuall torments, so were his owne 70. sonnes all, but one, murdered by his owne bastard Abimelec. The like Analogie is obserued by the Rabbines, in the greatest of the plagues which God brought vpon the Egyptians, who hauing caused the male children of the Hebrewes to be slaine, others of them to be cast into the riuer and drowned: God rewarded them euen with the like measure, destroying their own first borne by his Angell, and drowning Pharaoh and his armie in the red sea. And hereof a world of examples might be giuen, both out of the Scriptures and other Histories.

In the end so much did the people reuerence Gideon in the present for this victorie, and their owne deliuerance, as they offered him the Soueraignty ouer them, and to establish him in the Gouernment; which he refused, answering; I will not reigne ouer you, neither shall my childe reigne ouer you, but the Lord shall, &c. But he desired the people that they would bestow on him the golden eare-rings, which euery man had gotten. For the Israelites, neighbours, and mixt with the Midianites, vied to weare them: the waight of all which was a thousand and seuen hundred Shekles of gold, which makes of our 2380. l. if we follow the account of the Shekle vulgar. And because he conuered that gold into an Ephod, a garment of gold, blew silke, purple, scarlet, and fine linnen, belonging to the High Priest onely, and set vp the same in his owne Citie of Ophrah or Ephra, which drew Israel to Idolatrie, the same was the destruction of Gideon and his house.

Exod. 28.
Ind. 8. 28.

There was another kinde of Ephod besides this of the High Priests, which the Leuites vied, and so did Dauid when he danced before the Arke: and Samuel, while he was yet young, which was made of linnen onely.

Now if any man demand how it was possible for Gideon with 300. men to destroy 120000. of their enemies, and afterward 15000. which remained; we may remember that although Gideon with 300. gaue the first alarme, and put the Midianites in rout and disorder: yet all the rest of the armie came into the slaughter, and pursuite, for it is written; That the men of Israel being gathered together out of Nephtalie, and out of Asher, and out of Manasse, pursued after the Midianites: for this armie Gideon left in tents behinde him, when he went downe to view the armie of his enemies, who with the noyse of his 300. trumpets came after him to the execution.

There liued with Gideon, Agem, the sonne of Pandion, who reigned in Athens: Euristheus King of Mycena: Atrcus and Thyestes the sonnes of Pelops, who bare dominion ouer a great part of Peloponnesus, and after the death of Euristheus, the Kingdome of Mycena fell into the hand of Atrcus. This is that Atrcus, who holding his brother in ialousie, as an attempter, both of his wife and Crowne, slew the children of Thyestes, and causing their flesh to be drest, did therewith feast their father. But this cruelty was not vnreueged. For both Atrcus and his sonne Agamemnon were slaine by a base sonne of Thyestes, yea the grand-children, and all the linage of Atrcus died by the same sword.

In Gideons time also those things were supposed to haue beene done, which are written of Dadalus and Icarus. Dadalus, they say, hauing slaine his Nephew Attalus, fled to Minos, King of Crete, for succour; where for his excellent workmanship he was greatly esteemed, hauing made for Minos a Labyrinth, like vnto that of Egypt. Afterward he was said to haue framed an artificiall Cowe for Pasiphae the Queene, that she, being in loue with a faire Bull, might by putting her selfe into the Cowe, saistie her lust, a thing no lesse vnnatural than incredible, had not that shamelesse Emperour Domitian exhibited the like beastly spectacle, openly before the people of Rome, in his Amphitheater, of purpose, as may seeme, to verifie the old fable. For so it appeares by those verses of Martial, wherein the flattering Poet magnifieth the abominable shew, as a goodly Pageant, in those vicious times.

*Iunctam Pasiphaen Dicto credite Tauro
Vidimus, accepit fabula prisca fidem.
Nec se miratur Casar, longeva vetustas
Quicquid fama canit, donat arena tibi.*

But concerning that which is reported of Pasiphae, S. vires makes a lesse vn honest construction of it, thinking that Dædalus was of her counsaile, and her Pandar for the enticing of a Secretarie of Minos called Taurus, which signifieth a Bull, who begather with childe, and that the being deliuered of two sonnes, the one resembling Taurus, the other her husband Minos, it was fained that she was deliuered of the Monster Minotaur, halfe Man and halfe a Bull. But this practise being discouered, and Dædalus appointed to be slaine, he fled out of Crete to Cocalus King of Sicily: in which passage he made such expedition, as it was fained that he fashioned wings for himselfe and his sonne to transport them. For whereas Minos pursued him with boats which had oares onely, Dædalus framed sailes both for his owne boate, and for his sonnes, by which he outwent those that had him in chase. Vpon which new inuention, Icarus bearing himselfe ouerbold, was too ouerborne and drowned.
M m

It is also written of Dædalus, that he made Images that could moue themselves, and goe, because he carued them with legs, armes, and hands; whereas those that preceded him, could onely present the body and head of those men, whom they cared to counterfeit, and yet the workmanship was esteemed very rare. But Plutarke, who had seene some of those that were called the Images of Dædalus, found them exceeding rude.

Heriml. Plat.
Paus. lib. 9.

With Gideon also flourished Linus the sonne of Apollo, and Terpsichore, who instructed Thamiris, Orpheus, and Hercules. He wrote of the Creation, of the Sunne and Moones course, and of the generation of liuing Creatures, but in the end he was slaine by Hercules his scholler with his owne harpe.

Strab. l. 9.

Againc, in this age those things spoken of Sphinx and Oedipus, are thought to haue beene performed. This Sphinx being a great robber by sea and land, was by the Corinthians Armie, led by Oedipus, ouercome. But that which was written of her propounding of riddles, to those whom she mastered, was meant by the rockie and vnaccessible mountaine neere Thebes, which she defended; and by Oedipus dissoluing her probleme, his victorie ouer her. She was painted with wings, because exceeding swift, and with the body of a Lyon for her cruelty. But that which Palephatus reports of Sphinx, were more probable, did not the time disproue it, for he calls her an Amazonite, and the wife of Cadmus: who when by her helpe he had cast Draco out of Thebes (neglecting her) he married the sister of Draco, which Sphinx taking in despitefull part, with her owne troupe she held the mountaine by Thebes; from whence she continued a sharpe warre vpon the Thebans, till by Oedipus ouerthrowne. About this time did Minos thrust his brother out of Crete, and held sharpe warre with the Megarians, and Athenians, because his sonne Androgeus was slaine by them. He possesse himselfe of Megara, by the treason of Scylla, daughter of Nisus the King. He was long Master of the sea, and brought the Athenians to the tribute of deliuering him euery yeere feuen of their sonnes: which tribute Thebes released, as shall be shewed, when I come to the time of the next Iudge Thola. In the end he was slaine at Camerinus or Camicus in Sicilia, by Cocalus the King, while he pursued Dædalus: and was esteemed by some to be the first law-giuer to those Islands.

Arist. pol. l. 1.

To this time are referred many decds of Hercules, as the killing of Antæus the Gyant, who was said to haue 60. and odde cubites of length, which though Plutarke doth confirme, reporting that there was such a body found by Sertorius the Roman, in Lybia, where Hercules slew Antæus: yet for my selfe I thinke it but a lowd lye. That Antæus was of great strength, and a cunning wrestler, Eusebius affirmeth: and because he cast so many men to the ground, he was fained to be the sonne of the Earth. Plinie saith, that he inhabited neere the gardens Hesperides in Mauritania. S. Augustine affirms that this Hercules was not of Greece, but of Lybia: and the Hydra also which he ouercame, Plato expoundeth to be a subtle Sophister.

§. VI.

Of the expedition of the Argonautes.

ABout the cleuenth yeere of Gideon, was the famous expedition of the Argonautes: of which many fabulous discourses haue beene written, the summe of which is this.

Pelias the sonne of Neptune, brother by the mothers side to Æson, who was Iasons father, reigning in Iolcus a town of Thessalie, was warned by the Oracle of Apollo to take heed of him that wore but one shoe. This Pelias afterward sacrificing to Neptune, inuited Iason to him, who coming hastily, lost one shoe in passing ouer a brooke: whereupon Pelias demanded of him what course he would take (supposing hee were able) against one of whom an Oracle should aduise him to take heede: to which question when Iason had briefly answered, that he would send him to Colchos, to fetch the golden fleece, Pelias immediately commanded him to vndertake that seruice. Therefore Iason prepared for the voyage, hauing a ship built by Argus, the sonne of Phryxus, by the counsell of Pallas: wherein he procured all the brauest men of Greece to saile with him: as Typhis the Master of the ship, Orpheus the famous Poet, Castor and Pollux the sonnes of Tyndarus, Telamon and Peleus, sonnes of Æacus, and fathers of Ajax and Achilles, Hercules, Theseus, Zetes and Calaïs the two winged sonnes of Boreas, Amphiarus the great Soothsayer, Meleager of Calidon that slew the great wilde boare: Ascalaphus and Talmenus or Almenus the sonnes of Mars, who were afterwards at the last warre of Troy, Læertes the father of Ulysses, Atalanta a warlike virgin, Idas and Lyncæus the sonnes of Aphareus, who afterwards in fight with Castor and Pollux slew Castor, and wounded Pollux, but were slaine themselves: Lyncæus by Pollux, Idas by Iupiter with lightning.

These and many other went with Iason in the ship Argo: in whose prow was a table of the beech of Dodona, which could speake. They arriued first at Lemnos; the women of which Iland, hauing slaine all the males, purposing to leade an Amazonian life, were neuertheless contented to take their pleasure of the Argonauts. Hence they came to the Country about Cyzicus: where dwelt a people called Doliones: ouer whom then reigned one Cyzicus: who entertained them friendly: but it so fell out, that loosing thence by night they were driuen by contrary windes backe into his port, neither knowing that it was the same Hauen, nor being knowne by the Doliones, to be the same men: but rather taken for some of their bordering enemies: by which means they fell to blowes, inasmuch that the Argonautes slew the most part of the Doliones together with their King Cyzicus: which when by day-light they perceiued, with many teares they solemnized his funerall. Then departed they againe and arriued shortly in Myssia, where they left Hercules and Polyphemus the sonne of Elates, who went to seek Hylas the darling of Hercules, that was rauished by the Nymphes.

Polyphemus built a towne in Myssia, called Cios, wherein he reigned. Hercules returned to Argos. From Myssia the Argonautes sailed into Bythinia, which then was peopled by the Bebryces, the ancient inhabitants of the Countrey, ouer whom Amycus the sonne of Neptune was then King. He being a strong man, compelled all strangers to fight with him, at whorle bats, in which kinde of fight he had slaine many, and was now himselfe slaine by Pollux. The Bebryces in reuenge of his death slew all vpon Pollux, but his companions rescued him, with great slaughter of the people. They sailed from hence to Salmysseus, a towne in Thrace (somewhat out of their way) wherein Phineus a Soothsayer dwelt, who was blinde and vexed with the Harpyes. The Harpyes were said to be a kinde of birds, which had the faces of women and foule long clawes, very filthy creatures, which when the table was furnished for Phineus, came flying in, and deuouring or carrying away the greater part of the victuals, did so defile the rest, that they could not be endured. When therefore the Argonautes craued his aduise, and direction for their voyage: you shall doe well (quoth he) first of all to deliuer me from the Harpyes, and then afterwards to aske my counsaile. Whereupon they caused the table to be cotered, and meat set on; which was no sooner set downe, then that presently in came the Harpyes, and played their accustomed pranks: when Zetes and Calaïs the winged yong men saw this, they drew their swords, & pursued them through the ayre; some say that both the Harpies and the yong men died of wearinesse in the fight, & pursuit. But Apollonius saith that the Harpyes did couenant with the youths, to doe no more harme to Phineus, and were thereupon dismissed. For this good turn Phineus gaue them informations of the way, and aduertised them withall of the dangerous rocks, called Symplegades, which by force of winds running together, did shut vp the passage: wherefore he willed them to put a pigeon before them in the passage: & if that passed safe, then to adventure after her: if not, then by no means to hazard themselves in vain. They did so; & perceiuing that the pigeon had onely lost a piece of her taile, they obserued the next opening of the rocks, and then rowing with all their might, passed through safe, onely the end of the poepe was bruised.

From thence forward, (as the tale goeth) the Symplegades haue stood still: for the gods, say they, had decreed that after the passage of a ship, they should be fixed. Thence the Argonautes came to the Mariandyni, a people inhabiting about the mouth of the riuer Parthenius, where Lycus the King entertained them courteously. Here Idmon a Sooth-sayer of their company was slaine by a wilde boare; also here Typhis died: and Ancus vnderooke to steare the ship. So they passed by the riuer Thermodon, and mount Caucasus, and came to the riuer Phasis, which runs through the land of Colchos. When they were entred the haue, Iason went to Aetes the King of Colchos, and told him the Commandement of Pelias, and cause of his comming, desiring him to deliuer the golden Fleece, which Aetes, as the Fable goeth, promised to doe, if hee alone would yoke together two brazen hooft buls, and plowing the ground with them, sowe dragonsteeth, which Minerva had giuen to him, being part of those which Cadmus did sowe at Thebes. These buls were great and fierce, and breathed out fire: Vulcan bad giuen them to Aetes.

Whilest Iason was in a great perplexity about this taske, Medea the daughter of Aetes, fell into a most vehement loue of him, so farre forth, that being excellent in Magique, she came priuile to him, promising her helpe, if he would assure her of his marriage. To this Iason agreed, and confirmed his promise by oath. Then gaue she to him a medicine wherewith she bad him to annoint both his body and his armour, which would preserve him from their violence: further she told him, that armed men would rise out of the ground, from the teeth which he should sowe, and set vpon him. To remedy which inconuenience, she bad him throw stones amongst them as soone as they came vp thicke, wherupon they would fall together to blowes, in such wise that hee might easily slay them. Iason followed her counsaile; wherto when the euent had answered, he againe demanded the Fleece. But Aetes was so farre from approuing such his desire, that he deuised how to destroy the Argonautes, and burne their ship; which Medea perceiuing, went to Iason, and brought him by night to the Fleece, which hung on an Oake in the groue of Mars, where they say it was kept by a Dragon, that neuer slept. This Dragon was by the Magique of Medea cast into a sleepe: so taking away the golden Fleece, she went with Iason into the ship Argo; hauing with her, her brother Abysrtus.

Aetes vnderstanding the practises of Medea, prouided to pursue the ship, whom when Medea perceiued to be at hand, she slew her brother, and cutting him in pieces, she scattered his limbs in diuers places, of which Aetes finding some, was faine to seeke out the rest, and suffer his daughter to passe: the parts of his son he buried in a place, which thereupon he called Tomi; the Greeke word signifieth Diuision. Afterwards he sent many of his subiects to seeke the ship Argo, threatning that if they brought not backe Medea, they should suffer in her stead. In the meane while the Argonautes were driuen about the Seas, and were come to the Riuer Eridanus, which is Po in Italic.

Iupiter, offended with the slaughter of Abysrtus, vexed them with a great tempest, and carried them they knew not whither; when they came to the Ilands Abysrtides, there the ship Argo (that there might want no incredible thing in this Fable) spake to them, and said, that the anger of Iupiter should not cease, till they came to Asia, and were clesed by Circe, from the murder of Abysrtus. Now they thereupon sayling betweene the coasts of Lybia and Gallia, and passing through the sea of Sardinia and along the coast of Hetruria, came to the Ile of Aea, wherein Circe dwelt, who clesed them. Thence they sayled by the coast of the Syrens, who sang to allure them into danger: but Orpheus on the other side sang so well that he stayed them. One-ly Butes swamme out vnto them, whom Venus rauished, and carried to Eylibaum in Sicilie to dwell.

Hauing past the Syrens, they came betweene Scylla and Charybdis, and the stragling rocks which seemed to cast out great store of flames and smoake. But Theseis and the Nereides, conueyed them safe through at the appointment of Iuno. So they coasted Sicilie, where the beeces of the Sunne were, and touched at Corcyra, the Iland of the Phaeaces, where King Alcinous reigned. Meane while, the men of Colchos, that had bene sent by Aetes in quest of the ship of Argo, hearing no newes of it, and fearing his anger, if they fulfilled not his will, betooke themselves to new habitations: some of them dwelt in the mountaines of Corcyra, others in the Ilands Abysrtides, and some comming to the Phaeaces, there found the ship Argo, and demanded Medea of Alcinous: whereto Alcinous made answer, that if she were not Iasons wife; they should haue her; but if she were already married, he would not take her from her husband. Arete, the wife of Alcinous, hearing this, married them: wherfore they of Colchos not daring to returne home, stayed with the Phaeaces; so the Argonautes departed thence; and after a while came to Crete. In this Iland, Minos reigned, who had a man of brasse giuen to him (as some of the Fables say) by Vulcan. This man had one veine in his body reaching from the necke to the heele, the end whereof was closed vp with a brazen naile, his name was Talus: his custome was to runne thrice a day about the Iland for the defence of it. When he saw the ship Argo passe by, he threw stones at it, but Medea with her Magique destroyed him. Some say that she slew him by potions, which made him mad; others, that promising to make him immortall; she drew out the naile that stopt his veine, by which meanes all his blood ranne out, and he died; others there are that say he was slaine by Pean, who wounded him with an arrow in the heele. From hence the Argonautes sailed to Agina, where they were faine to fight for fresh water. And lastly, from Agina they sailed by Eubaea and Locris home to Iolcos, where they arriued, hauing spent foure whole moneths in the expedition.

Somewhere are that by this iourney of Iason vnderstand the mysterie of the Philosophers stone, called the golden Fleece, to which also, other super-fine Chymists draw the vnelue labours of Hercules. Suidas thinks that by the golden Fleece was meant a golden booke of Parchment, which is of sheepe-skin; and therefore called golden, because it was taught therein how other metals might be transmuted. Others would signifye by Iason, wisdom, and moderation, which ouer-commeth all perils: but that which is most probable is the opinion of Dercilus, that the story of such a passage was true, and that Iason with the rest went indeede to rob Colchos, to which they might arriue by boate. For not farre from Caucasus there are certaine steepe falling torrents which wash downe many graines of gold, as in many other parts of the world; and the people there inhabiting vie to set many fleeces of wooll in those descents of waters, in which the graines of gold remaine, and the water passeth through, which Strabo witnesseth to be true. The many rocks, straits, sands, and Currents, in the passage betweene Greece and the bottome of Pontus, are Poetically conuerted into those fiery buls, the armed men rising out of the ground, the Dragon cast asleepe, and the like. The man of brasse, the Syrens, Scylla and Charybdis, were other hazards and adventures which they fell into in the Mediterran sea, disguised, as the rest, by Orpheus, vnder poeticall morales: all which Hommer afterward vied (the man of brasse excepted) in the description of Vlysses his traualles, on the same Inland-seas.

§. VII.

Of Abimelech, Tholan, and Iair, and of the Lapythæ, and of Theseus, Hypolytus, &c.

After the death of Gideon, Abimelech his base sonne begotten on a Concubine of the Sechemites, remembering what offers had bene made to his father by the people, who desired to make him and his their perpetuall Princes; and as it seemeth, supposing (notwithstanding his fathers religious modesty) that some of his brethren might take on them the Soueraignie, practised with the inhabitants of Sechem (of which his mother was native) to make election of himselfe; who being easily moued with the glory, to haue a King of their owne, readily condescended: and the better to enable Abimelech, they borrowed 70. pieces of siluer of their idoll Baalberith, with which treasure he hyred a company of loose and desperate vagabounds, to assist his first detestable enterprise, to wit, the slaughter of his 70. brethren, the sonnes of Gideon, begotten on his wiues, of which he had many; of all which none escaped but Iotham the youngest, who hid himselfe from his present furie: all which he executed on one stone, a cruelty exceeding all that hath bene written of in any age. Such is humane ambition, a monster that neither feareth God (though all-powerfull, and whose reuenges are without date and for euerlasting) neither hath it respect to nature, which labourerth the preferuation of euery being: but it rageth also against her, though garnished with beautie which neuer dieth, and with loue that hath no end. All other passions and affections, by which the soules of men are tormented, are by their contraries oftentimes resisted or qualified. But ambition, which begetteth euery vice, and is it selfe the childe and darling of Satan, looketh onely towards the ends by it selfe set downe, forgetting nothing (how fearefull and inhumane so euer) which may serue it: remembering nothing, whatsoeuer iustice, pietie, right or religion can offer and alleadge on the contrary. It ascribeth the lamentable effects of like attempts, to the error or weaknesse of the vnder takers, and rather praiseth the aduerture than feareth the like successe. It was the first sinne that the world had, and began in Angels: for which they were cast into hell, without hope of redemption. It was more ancient then man, and therefore no part of his naturall corruption. The punishment also preceded his creation, yet hath the Diuell which felt the smart thereof, taught him to forget the oneas out of date, and to practise the other, as besitting euery age, and mans condition.

Iotham, the yongest of Gideons sonnes, hauing escaped the present perill, sought by his best perswasions to alienate the Sechemites, from the assisting of this mercilesse tyrant, letting them know, that those which were vertuous, and whom reason and religion had taught the safe and happy estate of moderate subiection, had refused to receiue as vnlawfull, what others had no power to giue, without direction from the King of Kings: who from the beginning (as to his owne peculiar people) had appointed them by whom and how to be gouerned. This hee taught them by the Oliue, which contented it selfe with its fannesse, the Figge tree with sweetenesse, and the Vine with the good iuyce it had: the Bramble onely, who was most base, cut downe all the rest, and accepted the Soueraigntie. He also foretold them by a Propheticall spirit, what should befall them in the end, and how a fire should come out of the Bramble, and consume the Cedars of Libanon.

Now (as it is an easie matter to call those men backe whom rage without right led on) Gaal the sonne of Ebed withdrew the Citizens of Sechem, from the seruice of Abimelech: who therefore after some assaults entered the place, and mastered it; and in conclusion fired the towne, wherein their Idoll Baalberith was worshipped, and put all the people of all sorts to the slaughter. Lastly, in the assault of the Castle or Tower of Teber, himselfe was wounded in the head with a stone throwne ouer the wall by a woman, and finding himselfe mortally brused, he commanded his owne page to pierce his body, thereby to auoid the dishonour of being slaine by so feeble a hand.

While Abimelech vsurped the Gouernment, the Lapithae and Centaures made war against the Thebanes. These Nations were descended of Apollo, and were the first in those parts that deuised to mannage horses, to bridle and to sit them: in so much as when they first came downe from the mountaines of Pindus, into the plaines, those which had neuer seene horsemen before, thought them creatures compounded of men and horses; so did the Mexicans when Ferdinando Cortes the Spaniard first inuaded that Empire.

After the death of Abimelech, Thola of Issachar gouerned Israel 23. yeeres, and after him Iair the Gileadite 22. yeeres, who seemes to be descended of Iair the sonne of Masse, who in Moses time conquered a great part of Gilead, and called the same after his owne name, Hanoth Iair. For to this Iair there remained thirtie of those Cities, which his ancestor had recovered from the Amorites. Of these Iudges, because there is nothing else written, it is an argument that during all their times, Israel liued without disturbance and in peace.

When Iair iudged Israel, Priamus began to reigne in Troy, who at such time as Hercules sacked Ilium, was carried away captiue with his sister Hesione into Greece, and being afterward redeemed for ransom, he rebuilt and greatly strengthened, and adorned Troy; and so farre enlarged his Dominions, as he became the supreme Lord in effect of all Asia the lesse. He married Hecuba the daughter of Cisseus King of Thrace, and had in all (saith Cicero) fiftie sonnes, whereof seauenteene by Hecuba, of whom Paris was one; who attempting to recouer his aunt Hesione, tooke Helena the wife of Menelaus, the cause of the warre which followed.

Theseus the tenth King of Athens began likewise to reigne in the beginning of Iair: some writers call him the sonne of Neptune and Aethra: but Plutark in the storie of his life finds him begotten by Aegeus, of whom the Gracian sea betwene it and Asia the lesse tooke name. For when Minos had mastered the Athenians, so far as he forst them to pay him him seuen of their sonnes euery yeere for tribute, whom he inclosed within a Labyrinth, to be deuoured by the monster Minotaur: because belike the sonnes of Taurus, which he begat on Pasiphae the Queene, had the charge of them: among these seuen Theseus thrust himselfe, not doubting by his valour to deliuer the rest, and to free his Countrie of that slaerie occasioned for the death of Androgeus, Minos his sonne.

And hauing possesst himselfe of Ariadnes affection, who was Minos daughter, he receiued from her a bosome of thred, by which he conducted himselfe through all the crooked and inextricable turnings of the Labyrinth, made in all like that of the Citie of Crocodiles in Egypt; by meane whereof hauing slaine Minotaur, he found a ready way to returne. But whereas his father Aegeus had giuen order, that if hee came backe with victorie and in safetie, he should vie a white saile in signe thereof, and not that mournefull blacke saile, vnder which they left the port of Athens. This instruction being either forgotten or neglected, Aegeus descrying the Shippe of Theseus with a blacke saile, did cast himselfe ouer the rockes downe into the Sea, afterward called of his name Aegeum.

One of the first famous acts of Theseus, was the killing of Sciron, who kept a passage betwene Megara and the Peloponnesian Isthmos, and threw all whom hee mastered into the Sea, from the high rockes. Afterward he did the like to Cercyon, by wrestling, who vied by that Art to kill others. Hee also ridde the Countrie of Procrustes, who vsed to bend downe the strong limbes of two trees, and fastened by cordes such as hee tooke, part of them to one and part to the other bough, and by the springing vp tare them asunder. So did he root out Periphetes and other mischieuous theues and murderers. Hee ouerthrew the armie of the Amazons, who after many victories and vastations, entered the Territorie of Athens. Theseus hauing taken their Queene Hippolyta prisoner, begat on her Hippolytus; with whom afterward his mother in law Phedra, falling in loue, and hee refusing to abuse his fathers bed, Phedra perswaded Theseus that his sonne offered to force her: after which it is fained, that Theseus besought Neptune to reuenge this wrong of his sonnes, by some violent death. Neptune taking a time of aduantage, sent out his Sea-Calues, as Hippolytus passed by the sea shore, and so affrighted his horses, as casting the Coach ouer, hee was (by being intangled therein) torne in pieces. Which miserable and vnderstanded destinie, when Phedra had heard of, she strangled her selfe. After which it is fained, that Diana entreated Esculapius to set Hippolytus his pieces together, and to restore him to life: which done, because he was chaste, she led him with her into Italie, to accompanie her in her hunting; and field sports.

It is probable that Hippolytus, when his Father sought his life, thinking to escape by Sea, was affronted thereat, and did receiue many wounds in forcing his passage and escape; which wounds Esculapius, to wit, some skillfull Physician, or Chirurgion healed againe; after which he passed into Italy, where he liued with Diana, that is, the life of a hunter, in which hee most delighted. But of those auncient prophane Storics, Plutarch faith well, that as Cosmographers in their descriptions of the world, where they finde many vaste places whereof they know nothing, fill the same with strange beasts, birds, and fishes, and with Mathematicall lines; so doe the Gracian Historians and Poets imbroder and intermixe the tales of ancient times, with a world of fictions and fabulous discourses. True it is, that Theseus did many great things in imitation of Hercules, whom hee made his patterne, and was the first that gathered the Athenians, from being dispersed in thinne and ragged villages: in recompence whereof, and for deuising them lawes to liue vnder, and in order, hee was by the beggerly, mutable, and vngratefull multitude, in the end banished. Some say per Ostracismum, by the Law of Lottes, or names written on shelles, which was a deuice of his owne.

Hee stole Helen (as they say) when she was fiftie yeers old, from Aphidna, which Citie Castor and Pollux ouerturned, when they followed after Theseus to recouer their sister. Erasistratus and Pausanias write that Theseus begot her with childe at Argos, where she erected a Temple to Lucina: but her age makes that tale vnlikely to bee true, and so doth Ouid, Non tamen ex facto fructum tulit ille petitus, &c. The rape Eusebius findes in the first of Iair, who gouerned Israel 22. yeeres, to whom succeeded Iephth or Iephte fixe yeeres, to whom Izzan who ruled seuen yeeres, and then Habdon eight yeeres: in whose time was the fall of Troy. So as, if Theseus had a childe by her in the first of Iair, (at which which time wee must count her no lesse than fiftene yeres old, for the women did not commonly begin so young as they doe now) she was then at least two and fiftie yeres old at the destruction of Troy: and when shee was stollen by Paris eight and thirtie: but herein the Chronologers doe not agree. Yet Eusebius and Bunting with Halicarnassus doe in effect consent, that the Citie was entred, and burnt in the first yere of Demophon King of Athens, the successor of Mnestheus, the successor of Theseus, fiftene dayes before the Summer Tropique; and that about the eleuenth of September following, the Troians crost the Hellespont into Thrace, and wintered there, and in the next spring that they navigated into Sicilia, where wintering the second yeere, the next summer they arrived at Laurentum, and builded Lavinium. But Saint Augustine hath otherwise, that when 10 Polyphides governed Sicyon, Mnestheus Athens, Tautanes Assyria, Habdon Israel, then Aeneas arrived in Italie, transporting with him in twentie shippes the remainder of the Troians: but the difference is not great: and heereof more at large in the storie of Troy at hand.

In Sicyonia Phaeus the two and twentieth King, reigned eight yeres, beginning by the common account in the time of Thola. His successors, Adraustus, who reigned foure yeres, and Polyphides who reigned thirteene, are accounted to the time of Iair, so is also Mnestheus King of Athens, and Atrous, who held a great part of Poloponnesus. In Assyria, during the government of these two peaceable Iudges, Mitreus and after him Tautanes reigned. In Egypt Amenophis, the sonne of Ramses, and afterwards 20 Annemenes.

S. VII.

Of the warre of Thebes which was in this age.

IN this age was the warre of Thebes, the most ancient that euer Greeke Poet or Historian wrote of: Wherefore the Roman Poet Lucretius, affirming (as the Epicures in this point held truelie against the Peripateticks) that the world had a beginning, vrgeth them with this obiection.

*Si nulla fuit gemitalis origo
Rerum, & mundi, semperque aeterna fuere,
Cur supra bellum Thebanum, & funera Trois,
Non alius alij quoque res cecimere poeta?*

If all this world had no originall,
But things haue euer beene as now they are:
Before the siege of Thebes or Troyes last fall,
Why did no Poet sing some elder warre?

It is true that in these times Greece was very saluage, the inhabitants being often chased 40 from place to place, by the captaines of greater Tribes: and no man thinking the ground whereon hee dwelt his owne longer than hee could hold it by strong hand. Wherefore merchandize and other intercoure they vsed little, neither did they plant many trees, or sow more corne than was necessary for their sustenance. Money they had little or none, for it is thought that the name of money was not heard in Greece, when Homer did write, who measures the valew of gold and brasse by the worth in cattell; saying that the golden armor of Glaucus was worth an hundred Beeues, and the copper armour of Dionedes worth nine.

Robberies by land and sea were common and without shame, and to steale horses or kine was the vsuall exercife of their great men. Their townes were not many, whereof 50 those that were walled were very few, and not great. For Mycena the principall Citie in Peloponnesus was a very little thing, and it may well be thought that the rest were proportionable: briefly, Greece was then in her infancie, and though in some small townes of that halfe Ile of Peloponnesus, the inhabitants might haue enioyed quietnesse within their narrow bounds; as likewise did the Athenians because their Country was so barren, that none did care to take it from them: yet that the land in generall was very rude, it will easily appeare to such as consider, what Thucydides the greatest of their Historians hath written to this effect, in the praeface to his Historie. Wherefore, as in these latter times times, idle Chroniclers vie when they want good matter, to fill whole books with reports of great frosts, or dry summeres, and other such things which no man cares to read; so did they who spake of Greece in her beginnings, remember onely the great floods which were in the times of Ogyges, and Deucalion: or else rehearse fables of men changed into birds, of strange monsters, of adulterie committed by their gods, and the mighty men which they begat, without writing ought that fauoured of humanitie before the time of the warre of Thebes: the brieft whereof is this.

Oedipus the sonne of Laius King of Thebes, hauing beene cast forth when he was an infant, because an Oracle foretold what euill should come to passe by him, did afterwards in a narrow passage contending for the way, slay his owne father, not knowing either then or long after, who he was. Afterward hee became King of Thebes, by marriage of the Queene Iocasta, called by Homer Epicaste: on whom, not knowing her to be his mother, he begat two sonnes, Eteocles and Polynices. But when in proceffe of time, finding out by good circumstances, who were his parents, hee vnderstood the grieuous murder and incest hee had committed, hee tore out his owne eyes for griefe, and left the Citie. His wife and mother did hang her selfe. Some say that Oedipus hauing his eyes pulled out, was expelled Thebes, bitterly cursing his sonnes because they suffered their father to be cast out of the Towne, and ayded him not. Howsoeuer it were, his two Sonnes made this agreement, that the one of them should reigne 10 one yeere, and the other another yeere; and so by course rule interchangeably. But this appointment was ill obserued. For when Polynices had after a yeres gouernment resigned the Kingdome to his brother: or (according to others) when Eteocles had reigned the first yeere, hee refused to giue ouer the rule to Polynices. Heereupon Polynices fledde vnto Argos, where Adraustus the sonne of Talaas then reigned, vnto whose palace comming by night, he was driuen to seeke lodging in an out-houfe, on the backefide.

There he met with Tydeus the sonne of Oeneus, who was fledde from Calydon: with whom struing about their lodging, hee fell to blowes. Adraustus hearing the noyse, came forth and tooke vp the quarrell. At which time perceiuing in the shield of Tydeus a Bore, in that of Polynices a Lyon, hee remembred an olde Oracle, by which he was aduised to giue his two daughters in marriage, to a Lyon and a Bore: and accordingly hee did bestow his daughter Argia vpon Tydeus, and Deipyle vpon Polynices, promising to restore them both to their Countries. To this purpose leuying an armie, and assembling as many valiant Captaines as he could draw to follow him, he was desirous among others to carrie Amphiaras the sonne of Oicleus a great Soothsayer, and a valiant man, along with him. But Amphiaras, who is saide to haue foreseene all things, knowing well that none of the Captaines should escape, saue onely Adraustus, did both vtterly refuse to be one in that expedition, and perswaded others to stay at home. Polynices therefore dealt with Eriphyle the Wife of Amphiaras, offering vnto 40 her a very faire bracelet, vpon condition that shee should cause her husband to assist him. The Soothsayer knowing what should worke his destinie, forbade his wife to take any gift of Polynices. But the bracelet was in her eye so precious a iewel, that she could not refuse it. Therefore whereas a great controuersie, betweene Amphiaras and Adraustus, was by way of compromise put vnto the decision of Eriphyle, cyther of them being bound by solemne oath to stand to her appointment: shee ordered the matter so, as a Woman should that did loue a bracelet better than her husband. Hee now finding that it was farre more easie to foresee than auoide destinie, sought for such comfort as reuenge might afford him, giuing in charge vnto his sonnes, that when they came to full age, they should kill their mother, and make strong warre vpon the 50 Thebans.

Now had Adraustus assembled all his forces, of which, the seuen chiefe leaders were, himselfe, Amphiaras, Capaneus, and Hippomedon (instead of whom some name Mecisteus) all Argiues, with Polynices the Theban, Tydeus the Aetolian, and Parthenopeus the Arcadian sonne of Meleager and Atalanta. When the Armie came to the Nemeean Wood, they met a woman whom they desired to helpe them to some water; she hauing a childe in her armes, laid it downe, and led the Argiues to a spring: but ere shee returned, a Serpent had slaine the childe. This woman was Eriphyle the daughter of Thoas the Lemnian, whom shee would haue saued when the women of the Ile slew all the the males by conspiracie, intending to leade an Amazonian life. For such her picie, the Zemnian wiues did sell her to Pirates, and the Pirates to Lycurgus Lord of the Country about Nemaa, whose young sonne Opheltes or Archemorus, she did nurse, and lost, as is shewed before. When vpon the childes death shee hid her selfe for feare of her master, Amphiarus told her sonnes where they should finde her: and the Argiues did both kill the Serpent which had slaine the childe, and in memorie of the chance, did institute solemne funerall games called Nemean, wherein Adrastus wanne the prize with his swift horse Arion, Tydeus with whorle bats, Amphiarus at running and quoiting, Polynices at wrestling, Parthenopaus at shooting, and one Laodocus in darting. This was the first institution of the Nemean games, which continued after famous in Greece for very many ages.<sup>10</sup> There are, who thinke that they were ordained in honour of one Opheltus, a Lacedemonian. Some say by Hercules, when he had slaine the Nemean Lyon: but the common opinion agrees with that which is heere set downe.

From Nemaa the Argiues marching onwards, arriued at Citheron, whence Tydeus was by them sent Embassadour to Thebes, to require of Eteocles the performance of Covenants betwene him and Polynices. This message was nothing agreeable to Eteocles, who was throughly resolu'd to hold what he had, as long as he could: which Tydeus perceiving, and intending partly to get honour, partly to trie what mettle was in the Thebans, he made many challenges, and obtained victorie in all of them, not without much enuy and malice of the people, who laid fiftie men in ambush to intercept him at his returne to the armie, of which fiftie he slew all but one, whom he sent backe to the Citie as a reporter and witnesse of his valour. When the Argiues vnderstood how resolu'd Eteocles was, they presented themselves before the Citie, and incamped round about it. Thebes is said to haue had at that time seuen gates, which belike stood not far asunder, seeing that the Argiues (who afterward when they were very farre stronger, could scarce muster vp more thousands then Thebes had gates) did compassse the towne. Adrastus quartered before the gate Homoloides, Capaneus before the Ogygian, Tydeus before Crenis, Amphiarus at Proctus, Hippomedon at Anchais, Parthenopaus at Electa, and Polynices at Hypsisia. In the meane season, Eteocles hauing armed his men, and appointed Commanders vnto them, tooke aduise of Tiresias the Soothsayer, who promised victorie to the Thebans,<sup>30</sup> if Menecius the sonne of Creon a principall man of the Citie, would vow himselfe to be slaine in honour of Mars the god of warre. So full of malice and pride is the Dinell, and so enuious at his Creatours glory, that hee not onely challengeth honour due to God alone, as oblations and sacrifice with all Diuine worship, but commandeth vs to offer our selues, and our children vnto him, when he hath sufficiently clouded mens vnderstanding, and bewitched their wils with ignorance and blinde deuotion. And such abominable sacrifice of men, maides, and children hath he exacted of the Syrians, Carthaginians, Galles, Germanes, Cyprians, Egyptians, and of many other, if not of all Nations, when through ignorance or feare they were most filled with superstition. But as they grew more wise, so did he waxe lesse impudent in cunning, though not lesse malicious in designe.<sup>40</sup> Ring the continuance of such barbarous inhumanitie. For King Diphilus in Cyprus without aduise of any Oracle, made the Idoll of that Country rest contented with an Oxe in stead of a man. Tiberius forbade humane sacrifices in Africa, and crucified the Priests in the groues where they had practised them. Hercules taught the Italians to drowne men of hay in stead of the liuing: yet among the saluages in the West Indies these cruell offerings haue beene practised of late ages: which as it is a sufficient argument that Satans malice is onely couered and hidden by this subtiltie among ciuill people: so may it serue as a probable Coniecture of the barbarismes then reigning in Greece. For Menecius, as soone as he vnderstood that his death might purchase victorie to his people, bestowed himselfe (as he thought) vpon Mars, killing himselfe before the gates of the Citie. Then<sup>50</sup> was a battaile fought, wherein the Argiues preuailed so farre at the first, that Capaneus aduancing ladders to the walls, got vp vpon the rampart: whence, when he fell or was cast downe, or (as Writers haue it) was stricken down by Iupiter with a thunder-bolt, the Argiues fled. Many on each part were slaine in this battell, which caused both sides to desire that Eteocles and Polynices might trie out the quarrell in single fight: whereto the two brethren according, slew each other.

Another battell was fought after their death, wherein the sonnes of Astacus behaued themselves very valiantly: Ismarus one of the sonnes slew Hippomedon, which was one of

of the seuen Princes: Parthenopaus being another of the seuen (who was said to haue been so faire that none would hurt him when his face was bare) was slaine by Amphidicus, or as some say, by Periclymenus the sonne of Neptune: and the valiant Tydeus by Menalippus: yet ere Tydeus died, the head of Menalippus was brought vnto him by Amphiarus, which he cruelly tore open, and swallowed vp the braines. Vpon which fact, it is said, that Pallas, who had brought from Iupiter such remedie for his wounds, as should haue made him immortall, refused to bestow it vpon him: whereby perhaps was meant that his honour which might haue continued immortall, did perish through the beastly rage that he shewed at his death.

<sup>10</sup> The host of the Argiues being wholly discomfited, Adrastus and Amphiarus fledde: of whom Amphiarus is said to haue bene swallowed quicke into the earth, neere to the river Ismenus, together with his Chariot, and so lost out of mens sight: being peraduenture ouerwhelmed with dead carkasses, or drowned in the riuer: and his body neuer found, nor greatly sought for. Adrastus escaped on his good horse Arion, and came to Athens, where sitting at an Altar called the Altar of Mercie, hee made supplication for their aide to recouer their bodies. For Creon hauing obtained the Government of Thebes after the death of Eteocles, would not suffer the bodies of the Argiues to bee buried: but caused Antigone, the onely daughter then liuing of Oedipus, to bee buried quicke, because shee had sought out and buried the body of her brother Polynices, contrary to Creons Edict. The Athenians condescending to the request of Adrastus, did send forth an Armie vnder the Conduct of Theseus, which tooke Thebes, and restored the bodies of the Argiues to Sepulture: at which time Euadne the wife of Capaneus, threw herselfe into the funerall fire, and was burnt willingly with her husband. But it little contented the sonnes of those Capitaines which were slaine at Thebes; that any lesse reuenge should bee taken of their fathers death, then the ruine of the Citie: wherefore tenne yeere after hauing leuied forces, Egialeus the sonne of Adrastus, Diomedes of Tydeus, Promachus of Parthenopaus, Sthenelus of Capaneus, Thersander of Polynices, and Euripylus of Menestus, marched thither vnder the conduct of Alcmaeon the sonne of Amphiarus: with whom also went his brother Amphilochus. Apollo promised victory if Alcmaeon<sup>30</sup> were their Capitaine, whom afterward by another Oracle hee commanded to kill his owne mother.

When they came to the Citie, they were incountr'd by Laodamas the son of Eteocles then King of the Thebans, (for Creon was onely Tutor to Laodamas) who though he did valiantly in the battaile, and slue Egialeus, yet was he put to the worst, and driuen to flie, or (according to Apollodorus) slain by Alcmaeon. After this disaster the citizens began to desire composition; but in the meane time they conuayed themselves with their wiues & children away from thence by night, and so began to wander vp and downe, til at length they built the Towne called Eteia. The Argiues, when they perceiued that their enemies had quitted the Towne, entring into it, sacked it, threw downe the walls, and layd it waste,<sup>40</sup> howbeit it is reported by some, that the Towne was saued by Thersander, the sonne of Polynices, who causing the Citizens to returne, did there reigne ouer them. That he saued the Citie from vtter destruction, it is very likely, for he reigned there, and led the Thebans to the Warre of Troy, which very shortly after ensued.

§. VIII.

Of Iephtha, and how the three hundred yeeres which he speaketh of, Iud. i. v. 28. are to be reconciled with the places, Act. i. 3. 20. 1. Reg. 6. 1. together with some other things touching Chronologie about these times.

<sup>50</sup> AFTER the death of Iair (neere about whose times these things hapned in Greece, & during whose government, & that of Thola, Israel liued in peace & in order) they revolted again from the law & seruice of God, and became more wicked & idolatrous than euer. For whereas in the former times they worshipped Baal & Asteroth, they now became followers of all the Heathen nations adioyning, and imbraced the idolls of the Aramites, of the Zidonians, Moabites & Ammonites: with those of the Philistims. And as before it pleased God to correct them by the Aramites, by the Amalekites, and Midianites: so now he scourged them by the Ammonites, and afterward by the Philistims. Now among the Israelites, those of Gilead being most opprest, because they bordered vpon vpon the Ammonites, they were inforst to seeke Iephtha, whom they had formerly despised and cast from them, because he was base borne; but he (notwithstanding those former iniuries) participating more of godly compassion, than of diuillish hatred and reuenge, was content to leade the Gileadites to the Warre, vpon condition that they should establish him their Gouernour after victory. And when hee had disputed with Ammon for the Land, disproued Ammons right, and fortified the title of Israel by many arguments, the same preuailing nothing, he began the warre; and being strengthened by God, overthrew them: and did not onely beate them out of the plaines, but forst them ouer the mountaines of Arabia, euen to Minnith, and Abel of the vineyards, Cities exprest heretofore in the description of the holy Land. After which victory it is said, that he performed the vaine vow which he made, to sacrifice the first liuing creature hee encountered, comming out of his house to meet him; which happened to be his owne daughter, and onely childe, who with all patience submitted her selfe, and onely desired two months time to bewaile her Virginitie on the mountaines of Gilead; because in her the issues of her Father ended: but the other opinion that shee was not offered, is more probable, which Bortheus and others proue sufficiently.

Iud. 19.
* The persecution of the Ammonites lasted 18 yeeres, and ended in the World 2820. in which yeere Iephtha began, Iud. 11.

After these things the children of Israel, of the Tribe of Ephraim, either enuious of Iephtha's victorie, or otherwise making way to their future calamitie, and to the most grievous slavery that euer Israel suffered, quarrelled with Iephtha, that they were not called to the Warre, as before time they had contested with Gideon. Iephtha hereupon enforced to defend himselfe against their fury, in the encounter slew of them two and forty thousand, which so weakened the bodie of the Land, as the Philistims had an easie conquest of them all not long after: Iephtha, after he had iudged Israel sixe yeeres, died: to whom succeeded Ibzan, who ruled seuen yeeres: after him Elon was their Iudge tenne yeeres: in all which time Israel had peace. Eusebius findes not Elon, whom hee calleth Adon, for in the Septuagint, approved in his time, this Iudge was omitted.

Now before I goe on with the rest, it shall be necessary vpon the occasion of Iephtha's account of the times Iud. 11. 28. (where he sayes that Israel had then posselt the East side of Jordan 300. yeeres) to speake somewhat of the times of the Iudges, and of the differing opinions among the Diuines & Chronologers: there being found three places of Scriptures touching this point seeming repugnant, or disagreeing: the first is in this dispute betwene Iephtha and Ammon, for the right and possession of Gilead: the second is that of S. Paul, Acts 13. the third is that which is in the first of Kings. Iephtha here challenge the possession of Gilead for 300. yeeres: Saint Paul giueth to the Judges, as it seemes, from the end of Iosua, to the last of Heli, 450. yeeres. In the first of Kings it is taught, that from the departing of Israel out of Egypt, to the foundation of Salomons Temple, there were consumed 480. yeeres. To the first Beroaldus findeth Iephtha's 300. yeeres to be but 266. yeeres, to wit, 18. of Iosua, 40. of Othoniell, 80. of Aod and Samgar, 40. of Debra, 40. of Gideon, 3. of Abimelech, 23. of Thola, and 22. of Iair: But Iephtha (saith Beroaldus) putteth or proposeth a certaine number, for an vncertaine: Sic ut dicat annum agi prope trecentisimum, ex quo nullus item ea de re mouerit Israel; So hee speaketh (saith he) as meaning, that then it was about or wel-nigh the three hundredth yeere, since Israel possessed those Countries, no man making question of their right. Codoman on the contrary findes more yeeres than Iephtha named by 65. to wit, 365. whereof 71. were spent in Israels captiuitie, at severall times, of which (as Codoman thinketh) Iephtha forbore to repeat the whole summe or any great part, lest the Ammonite should haue iustly objected, that 71. of those yeeres, the Israelites were in captiuitie and vassals to their neighbour Princes, and therefore knowing that to name three hundred yeeres, it was enough for prescription, he committed the rest.

To iustifie this account of 365. yeeres, besides the 71. yeeres of captiuitie or affliction, to be added to Beroaldus his 266. hee addeth also 28. yeeres more, and so maketh vp the summe of 365. These 28. yeeres hee findeth out thus: twenty yeeres hee giues to the Seniors betwene Iosua and Othoniell: and where Beroaldus alloweth eightene yeeres to Iosua his gouernment, Codoman accounts that his rule lasted 26. according to Iosephus; whereas Saint Augustine and Eusebius giue him 27. Melancthon 32. The truth is, that this addition of 28. yeeres is farre more doubtfull than the other of 71. But though wee admit not of this addition, yet by accounting of some part of the yeeres of affliction (to wit, 34. yeeres of the 71.) if wee adde them to the 266. yeeres of Beroaldus, which reckoneth none of these, wee haue the iust number of 300. yeeres. Neither is it strange that Iephtha should leaue out more then halfe of these yeeres of affliction: seeing as it is already said, the Ammonites might except against these 71. yeeres, and say, that during these yeeres, or at least a good part of them, the Israelites had no quiet possession of the Countries in question. Martin Luther is the Author of a third opinion, making those 300. yeeres remembered by Iephtha, to be 306. which odde yeeres, saith hee, Iephtha omitteeth. But because the yeeres of euerie Iudge as they reigned, cannot make vp this number of 306: but doe onely compound 266. therefore doth Luther adde to this number, the whole time which Moses spent in the Desarts of Arabia Petraea, which fortie yeeres of Moses added to the number which Beroaldus findeth, of 266. make indeede 306.

But I like nothing in the Text to warrant Luthers iudgement herein: for in the dispute betwene Iephtha and Ammon for the Land of Gilead, it is written in the person of Ammon in these words: Because Israel took my Land, when they came up from Egypt, from Arnon vnto Iaboc, &c. now therefore restore those Lands quietly or in peace. So by this place it is plaine that the time is not to be accounted from Moses departure out of Egypt: but from the time that the Land was posselt. For it is said, Quia cepit Israel terram maram; Because Israel took my Land: and therefore the beginning of this account is to be referred to the time of the taking: which Iephtha answereth also confirmeth in these words: When Israel dwelt in Heshbon, and in her Townes, and in Arer & in her Townes, and in all the Cities that are by the coast of Arnon 300. yeeres: why did ye not then recover them in that space? for as this place speaks it directly, that Israel had inhabited and dwelt in the Cities of Gilead 300. yeeres: and therefore to account the times from the hopes or intents, that Israel had to possesse it, it seemeth somewhat strained to me, for we doe not vse to reckon the time of our conquests in France, from our Princes intents or purposes, but from their victories and possessions.

Iunius neuertheless likes the opinion of Luther, and sayes, that this time of 300. yeeres hath reference, and is to take beginning from the first of Iephthas narration: when hee makes a brieue repetition of Moses whole iourney: to wit, at the sixteenth Verse of the eleventh Chapter of Judges, in our translation in these words: But when Israel came up from Egypt, &c. and therefore Moses his 40. yeeres (as he thinkes) are to be accounted, which make the number of 305. yeeres: and not onely the time in which Israel posselt Gilead, according to the Text and Iephthas owne words: of which I leaue the iudgement to others; to whom also I leaue to iudge, whether we may not beginne the 480. yeeres, from the deliuerance out of Egypt to the Temple, euen from the first departure out of Egypt, and yet finde a more probable reconciliation of Saint Pauls and Iephthas account with this reckoning, than any of those that as yet haue bene signified. For first, touching Iephthas three hundred yeeres of possession of the East side of Jordan, it is to be remembered, that for a good while before the Israelites possessed it, Sehon and Og had dispossessed Moab and Ammon thereof: so that when the Israelites had conquered Sehon and Og, the right of possession which they had, passed to Israel; and so Iephtha might say that they had possessed those Countries 300. yeeres, reckoning 266. yeeres of their owne possession, and the rest of the possession of the two Kings Sehon and Og, whose right the Israelites had by the law of conquest.

The second place disputed in this of S. Paul, Act. 13. that from the end of Iosua to the beginning of Samuel, there past 450. yeeres. And this place Luther vnderstandeth also besides the letter (as I finde his opinion cited by Funfius Krentzheimius, and Beza) for I haue not read his Commentaries. For he accounteth from the death of Moses, to the last yeere of Heli, but 357. yeeres: and this he doth the better to approve the times from the regression out of Egypt to the building of the Temple, which in the first King. 6. is said to be 480. yeeres.

Now forasmuch as S. Paul (as it seemes) findes 450. yeeres from the death of Iosua, to the last of Heli, and leaues but thirty yeeres for Saul and Samuel, who gouerned 40. for David who ruled 40. and for Salomon who wore the Crowne three whole yeeres ere the foundation of the Temple was laid; therefore Luther takes it, that there was error in the Scribe, who wrote out this piece of Scripture of S. Paul: to wit, Then afterward hee came vnto them Iudges about 450. yeeres, vnto the time of Samuel the Prophet: the words then afterward, being cleerely referred to the death or after the death of Iofua, as shall bee hereafter proued. But where Saint Luke rehearsing the words of Saint Paul, wrote 350. yeeres (saith Luther) the Scribe in the transcription being deceived by the affinitie of those two Greeke words, whereof the one signifieth 300. and the other 400. wrote Tetracosiois, for Triacosiois; 400. yeeres, for 300. yeeres; and 450. for 350. This he seeketh to strengthen by many arguments: to which opinion Beza in his great annotations adhereth. A contrary iudgement to this hath Codoman: where Luther and Beza begin at Moses death, he takes his account from the death of Iofua, and from thence to the beginning of Samuel he makes 430. yeeres: to wit: of the Iudges (not reckoning Sampsons yeeres) 319. and of yeeres of seruitude and affliction vnder strangers, 111. Thereason why he doth not reckon Sampsons twenty yeeres, is because hee thinkes that they were part of the 40. yeeres, in which the Philistims are said to haue oppressed Israel. For it is plaine, that during all Sampsons time they were Lords ouer Israel. So then of the Iudges, besides the 111. yeeres of seruitude, Codoman reckoneth (as I haue said) 319. yeeres, which two summes put together make 430. yeeres, and whereas Saint Paul nameth 450. yeeres, hee findes 20. yeeres to make vp Saint Pauls number, to haue bene spent after the death of Iofua by the Seniors, before the Captiuitie of Cushan, or the election of Othoniel: which 20. yeeres added to 430. make 450. according to Saint Paul. To approue this time of the Elders, he citeth two places of Scriptures, namely the 24. of Iofua, and the second of Iudges, in each of which places it is written, that Israel serued the Lord all the daies of Iofua, and all the daies of the Elders that ouer-lived Iofua: so as to these times of the Elders, Codoman giueth 20. yeeres, which make as before 450. according to Saint Paul. Neither would it breed any great difficultie in this opinion, if heere also the 20. yeeres of the Seniors, betwene Iofua and Othoniel, should be denied. For they which denie these yeeres, and make Othoniels 40. to beginne presently vpon the death of Iofua, as in the beginning of this reckoning they haue 20. yeeres lesse than Codoman, so toward the end of it (when they reckon the yeeres of affliction apart from the yeeres of the Iudges) in the number of Sampsons yeeres, and of the 40. yeeres of the Philistims oppressing the Israelites, they haue 20. yeeres more than Codoman. For they reckon these 40. yeeres of oppression all of them a-part from Sampsons 20. but Codoman, as is said, makes Sampsons 20. to bee the one halfe of the 40. of the Philistims oppressions; so that if the 20. yeeres of the Seniors, be not allowed to Codoman, then he may reckon (as the letter of the Text seemes to inforce) that the Philistims in any Inter-regnum, before Sampson iudged Israel, vexed the Israelites 40. yeeres, besides the 20. while Sampson was their Iudge; and so the reckoning will come to 450. yeeres betwene the end of Iofua, and the beginning of Samuel, though we admit not of an Inter-regnum of the Seniors, betwene Iofua and Othoniel. For, if the times of their affliction be summed, they make 111. yeeres, to which if we adde the yeeres of the Iudges, which are 319. we haue the iust summe of 450. And this computation either one way or other, may seeme to bee much more probable, than theirs that correct the Text, although we should admit of their correction thereof, and reade with them 350. for 450. For whereas they conceiue that this time of 350. yeeres, is to beginne immediately, or soone after the death of Moses: certainly the place of Saint Paul doth evidently teach the contrary, though it bee received for true that there was vitium scriptoris in the rest. For these be Saint Pauls words: And about the time of fortie yeeres, God suffered their manners in the wilderneffe: And hee destroyed seven Nations in the Land of Canaan, and diuided their Land to them by lot. Then afterward hee gaue vnto them Iudges about 450. yeeres, vnto the time of Samuel the Prophet. So as first in the eighteenth verse hee speaketh of Moses and of his yeeres spent in the wilderneffe, then in the nineteenth verse hee commeth vnto the acts of Iofua; which were, that hee destroyed seven Nations in the land of Canaan, and diuided their Land to them by lot. In the twentieth verse it followeth: Then afterward hee gaue them Iudges about 450. yeeres, &c. and therefore to reckon from the death of Moses, is wide of Saint Pauls meaning, so farre as my weake vnderstanding can pierce it. The only inconuenience of any waight in opinion of Codoman touching this place in the Acts, is that it seemes irreconcilable with the account, 1. Reg. 6. 11. For if indeede there were spent 450. yeeres betwene the end of Iofua and the beginning of Samuel, certainly there must needs be much more than 480. yeeres between the beginning of the Israelites journeying from Egypt, and the foundation of the Temple by Salomon. To this difficultie

Iud. 11. 28.

Iunius in the 21. of Iud. mor.

Codoman

Codoman answereth, that these 480. yeeres, 1. Reg. 6. 11. must begin to be reckoned, not in the beginning, but in the ending of their journeying from Egypt, which he makes to be 25. yeeres after the beginning of Othoniels gouernment; from whence if yee cast the yeeres of the Iudges, with the yeeres of seruitude (which summes according to his account, of which we haue already spoken, make 397. yeeres) and so to these yeeres adde the 40. of Samuel, and Saul, and the 40. of Dauid, and the 3. of Salomon, wee shall haue the iust summe of 480. yeeres. Neither is it hard (saith hee) that the annus egressionis, 1. Reg. 6. 11. should be vnderstood egressionis non incipientis sed finitis; the yeere of their comming out of Egypt (for so it is in the originall) or the yeere after they came out of Egypt, may well be vnderstood for the yeere after they were come out thence, that is, after they had ended their wandring from thence. For so wee finde that things which were done 40. yeeres after they had set foot out of Egypt, are said to haue beene done in their going out of Egypt, as Psal. 134. When Israel came out of Egypt, Jordan was driven backe, and Deut. 4. 45. These are the testimonies which Moses spake when they came out of Egypt. And thus farre it seemes wee may very well agree with Codoman, for the interpretation of the ab exitu, to be as much as quum exiissent, or ab exitu finito: for if Iunius, Deut. 4. 45. doe well reade quum exiissent, for in exitu, as it seemes that heerein he doth well, why may not we also, to auoid contradiction in the Scripture, expound ab exitu to be, postquam exiissent?

20 The next point to be cleared, is how their journeying should be said not to haue had end vntill the 25. yeere after the victory of Othoniel. To this Codoman answereth, that then it had no end till when all the Tribes had obtained their portions, which happened not vntill this time: at which time the Danites at length seated themselves, as it is declared Iud. 18. For doubtlesse to this time the expedition may most conueniently be referred. And thus without any great inconuenience to him appearing doth Codoman reconcile the account of Iephtha, and S. Paul, with that in the first of Kings, c. 6. Now where as it is said that the expedition of the Danites was when there was no King in Israel: to this Codoman answereth, that it is not necessary that wee should suppose that Othoniel liued all those 40. yeeres of rest, of which Iud. 3. 11. so that by the 25. yeere after his victory, either he might haue bene dead, or at least, as Gideon did, hee might haue refused all souerainty, and so either way it might truly be said that at this time (to wit, the 25. yeere after Othoniels victorie) there was no King in Israel. This opinion of Codoman, if it were as consonant to other Chronologers grounding their opinions on the plaine Text, where it is indisputable, as it is in it selfe round enough and coherent, might perhaps be received as good: especially considering, that the speeches of S. Paul haue not otherwise found any interpretation, maintaining them as absolutely true, in such manner as they found, and are set down. But seeing that he wanteth all helpe of authority, we may iustly suspect the supposition whereupon his opinion is grounded; it being such as the consent of many Authors would hardly suffice to make very probable. For who hath told Codoman, that the conquest of Laisb, by the Tribe of Dan, was performed in the five and twentieth yeere of Othoniel? Or what other probability hath he than his owne coniecture, to shew that Othoniel did so renounce the office of a Iudge after five and twenty yeeres, that it might then be truly said there was no King in Israel, but euery man did that which was good in his owne eyes?

Now concerning the rehearfall of the Law by Moses, and the stopping of Jordan, they might indeede be properly said to haue bene, when Israel came out of Egypt; like as wee say that King Edward the first was crowned when hee came out of the holie Land, for so all iournies with their accidents commonly take name from the place eyther whence or whither they tend. But I thinke that hee can finde no such phrase of speech in Scripture as limitch a journey by an accident, or saith by conueruing the proposition, when Jordan was turning backe, Israel came out of Egypt. Indeede most vnproper it were to giue date vnto actions commenced long after, from an expedition finished long before, namely to say, that King Edward at his arriual out of Palestina, did winne Scotland, or died at Carlele. How may wee then beleue that enterprize performed so many yeeres after the diuision of the Land, (which followed the conquest at the iournies end) should be said to haue been at the time of the departyre out of Egypt? Or who will not thinke it most strange, that the most notable account of time, seruing as the onelie guide for certaine ages in sacred Chronologie, should not take name and beginning from from that illustrious deliuerance out of Egypt, rehearsed often by God himselfe among the principall of his benefits to Israel, wherof the very day and moneth are recorded in Scripture (as likewise are the yeere and moneth wherein it expired) and the forme of the yeere vpon that occasion changed, but should haue reference to the surprizing of a Town by fixe hundred men, that robbed a Chappell by the way, and stole from thence Idols to be their guides, as not going to worke in Gods name: For this accident whereupon Codoman buildeth, hath either no time giuen to it, or a time farre different from that which he supposeth, and is indeed rather by him placed in such a yeere, because it best stood with his interpretation so to haue it, than for any certaintie or likelihood of the thing it selfe.

Wherefore we may best agree with such as affirme that the Apostle Saint Paul did not herein labour to set downe the course of time exactly (a thing no way concerning his purpose) but onely to shew that God, who had chosen Israel to be his people, deliuered them out of bondage, and ruled them by Judges and Prophets, vnto the time of Saul, did raise vpon our Lord Jesus Christ out of the seede of Dauid the King, in whose succession the Crowne was established, and promise made of a Kingdome that should haue no end. Now in rehearsing briefly thus much which tended as a Preface to the declaration following (wherein hee sheweth Christ to haue bene the true Messias) the Apostle was so farre from labouring to make an exact calculation of times (the History being so well knowne and beleued of the Iewes to whom he preached) that he spake as it were at large of the 40. yeeres consumed in the wilderness, wherof no man doubted, saying that God suffered their manners in the wilderness about 40. yeeres. In like manner he proceeded, saying, that from the diuision of the Land vnto the dayes of Samuel the Prophet, in whose time they required to haue a King, there passed about 450. yeeres. Neither did he stand to tell them, that an hundred and eleuen yeeres of bondage mentioned in this middle while, were by exact computation to be included within the 339. yeeres of the Judges: for this had bene an impertinent digression from the argument which hee had in hand. Wherefore it is not a worke so needfull as laborious, to search out of this place that which the Apostle did not here intend to teach, when the summe of 480. yeeres is so expressly and purposely set downe.

Now that the words of S. Paul (if there be no fault in the Copie through error of some Scribe) are not so curiously to be examined in matter of Chronologie, but must be taken, as hauing reference to the memorie and apprehension of the vulgar, it is euident by his ascribing in the same place 40. yeeres to the reigne of Saul: whereas it is manifest that those yeeres were diuided betwene Saul and Samuel; yea, that farre the greater part of them were spent vnder the gouernment of the Prophet, how soeuer they are here included in the reigne of the King. As for those that with so much cunning forsake the general opinion, when it fauoureth not such exposition as they bring out of a good minde, to helpe where the need is not ouer great; I had rather commend their diligence, than follow their example: The words of S. Paul were sufficiently iustified by Beroaldus, as hauing reference to a common opinion among the Scribes in those dayes, that the 111. yeeres of seruitude were to be reckoned apart from the 339. yeeres ascribed to the Judges; which account the Apostle would not in this place stand to contradict, but rather chose to speake as the vulgar, qualifying it with a quasi, where he saith, quasi quadringentis & quinquaginta annis; As it were foure hundred and fifty yeeres. But Codoman being not thus contented, would needs haue it be so indeed; and therefore disioynes the members to make the account euent. In so doing hee dasheth himselfe against a notable Text, whereupon all Authours haue builded (as well they might and ought) that purposely and precisely doth cast vp the yeeres from the departure out of Egypt, vnto the building of Solomons Temple, not omitting the very Moneth it selfe.

Now (as commonly the first apprehensions are strongest) hauing already giuen faith to his owne interpretation of Saint Paul, he thinketh it more needfull to finde some new exposition for that which is of it selfe most plaine; and to examine his owne coniecture vpon a place that is full of controuersie. Thus by expounding, after a strange methode, that which is manifest by that which is obscure, he loseth himselfe in those waies wherein before him neuer man walked. Surely if one should vrge him to giue reason of these new opinions, he must needs answer, That Oshiel could not gouerne about 25. yeeres, because then was the taking of Laisb, at which time there was no King in Israel; That the

Danites must needs haue taken Laisb at that time, because else we could not reckon backwards from the foundation of the Temple to any action that might be termed the coming of Israel out of Egypt, without excluding the yeeres of seruitude; And that the yeeres of seruitude must needs be included, for that otherwise hee himselfe should haue spent his time vainely, in seeking to please S. Paul with an exposition. Whether this ground be strong enough to vphold a Paradoxe, I leaue it to the decision of the iudicious Reader.

And now to proceed in our storie. To the time of Iephia are referred the death of Hercules, the rape of Helen by Paris, and the prouisions which her husband Menelaus, reigning then in Sparta, and his brother Agamemnon King of Mycene, made for her recovery. Others refer this rape of Helen to the fourth yeere of Ibzam: from which time, if the Warre of Troy (as they suppose) did not begin till the third of Ailon or Elon, yet the Greekes had sixe yeeres to prepare themselves: the rule holding not true in this War, longa preparatio belli celerem affert victoriam; That a long preparation begets a speedy victorie: for the Greekes consumed tenne yeeres in the attempt: and Troy, as it seemes, was entered, sacked and burnt in the third yeere of Habdon.

Three yeeres after Troy taken, which was in the sixt yeere of Habdon, Aeneas arrived in Italie. Habdon in the eighth yeere of his rule, died, after hee had bene the Father of 40. sonnes and 30. grand-children. And whereas it is supposed, that the 40. yeeres of Israels oppression by the Philistims (of which Jud. 13. v. 1.) tooke beginning from the ninth yeere of Iair, and ended with the last of Habdon: I see no reason for that opinion. For Ephraim had had little cause of quarrell against Iephia, for not calling them to War ouer Jordan, if the Philistims had held them in seruitude in their owne Territories: and if Ephraim could haue brought 42000. armed men into the field, it is not likely that they were then oppressed: and had it bene true that they were, who will doubt but that they would rather haue fought against the Philistims with so powerfull an Armie for their owne deliuerance, than against their owne brethren the Israelites? But Amnon being ouerthrowne, it seemed at that time, that they feared no other enemy. And therefore these 40. yeeres must either be supplied elsewhere, as in the time of Samson, and afterward: or else they must be referred to the inter-regnum betwene the death of Habdon, and the deliuerance of Israel by Samson, such as it was.

CHAP. XIII.

Of the Warre of Troy.

§. I.

Of the Genealogie of the Kings of Troy, with a note touching the ancient Poets how they haue observed Historically truth.

THE Warre at Troy with other stories hereupon depending (because the ruine of this Citie, by most Chronologers is found in the time of Habdon, Iudge of Israel, whom in the last place I haue mentioned) I rather choose here to intreat of in one entire narration, beginning with the lineall descent of their Princes, than to breake the story into pieces by rehearsing a-part in diuers yeeres, the diuersitie of occurrences.

The Historie of the ancient Kings of Troy is vncertaine, in regard both of their originall, and of their continuance. It is commonly held that Teucer and Dardanus were the two founders of that Kingdome. This is the opinion of Virgil: which if he (as Reineccius thinks) tooke from Berosus, it is the more probable: if Amnius borrowed it of him, then it rests vpon the authority of Virgil, who saith thus:

*Creta Iouis magni medio iacet insula Ponto:
Mons Idaeus ubi, & gentis cunabula nostrae.*

Centum

*Centum Vrbes habitant magnas, uberrima regna:
Maximus unde Pater (si ritè audita recorder)
Teucus Rhæteus primum est aduectus ad oras:
Optantisque locum regno. Nondum illum ex arces

In the maine Sea the Ile of Creete doth lie:
Where Ioue was borne, thence is our progenie.
There is mount Ida: there in fruitfull Land
An hundreth great and goodly Cities stand.
Thence (if I follow not mistaken fame)
Teucer the eldest of our grand-fires came To the Rhœtean shores: and reigned there Ere yet faire Iliou was built, and ere
The Towers of Troy: their dwelling place they sought
In lowest vales. Hence Cybels rites were bought:
Hence Corybantian Cymbales did remoue:
And hence the name of our Idæan groue.

Thus it seemeth by Virgil, who followed surely good authoritie, that Teucer first gave name to that Countrie, wherein he reigned ere Troy was built by Dardanus: of which Dardanus in the same booke he speaks thus:

*Est locus, Hesperiam Graij cognomine dicunt:
Terra antiqua, potens armis atq; robore glebe.
OEnotrij coluere viros: nunc fama minores
Italiam dixisse, ducis de nomine gentem.
Hæ nobis propria sedes: hinc Dardanus ortus:
Iasiusq; Pater, genus à quo Principe nostrum.*

Hesperia the Gracians call the place:
An ancient fruitfull Land, a warlike race,
OEnotrians held it; now the later progenie
Giues it their Captaines name, and calls it Italie;
This feate belongs to vs, hence Dardanus,
Hence came the Author of our stocke, Iasius.

*Atq; equidem memini (fama est obscurior annis) Auruncos ita ferre senes, hic ortus ut agris
Dardanus Idæas Phrygia penetrauit ad vrbes, Threiciamq; Samum, quæ nunc Samothracia fertur.
Hinc illum Coryti Tyrrhena ab sede profectum,
Aurea nunc solio stellantis regia cæli Accipit, &c.*

Some old Auruncans, I remember well,
(Though time haue made the fame obscure) would tell
Of Dardanus, how borne in Italie:
From hence he into Phrygia did flie.
And leauing Tuscaine (where he earst had place)
With Corytus did faile to Samothrace;
But now inthronized he sits on high,
In golden Palace of the starrie skie.

But contrarie to this, and to so many Authors, approving and confirming it, Reineccius thinks that these names, Troes, Teucris, and Thracis, are deriued from Tiras or Thiras the son of Iaphet: and that the Dardanians, Mysians, &c. Ascanians, mixt with the Trojans, were were Germane Nations, descended from Asbkenaz, the sonne of Gomer: of whom the Countrie, Lake, and Riuer of Ascanius in Asia tooke name. That Asbkenaz gaue name to those places and people, it is not unlikely: neither is it unlikely, that the Ascanij, Dardani, and many others, did in after-times passe into Europe: that the name of Teucer came of Tiras, the coniecture is somewhat hard. Concerning Teucer, whereas Halicarnassæus makes him an Athenian, I finde none that follow him in the same opinion. Virgil (as is before shewed) reporteth him to be of Crete, whose authority is the more to be regarded, because he had good meemes to finde the truth, which it is probable that he carefully sought, and in this did follow, seeing it no way concerned Augustus (whom other-whiles he did flatter) whether Teucer were of Crete or no. Reineccius doth rather embrace the opinion of Diodorus, and others that thinke him a Phrygian, by which report he was the Sonne of Scamander and Ida, Lord of the Countrie, not founder of the Citie; and his Daughter or Neece Batia was the second wife of Dardanus, founder of Troy. Reineccius further thinks that Atlas reigned in Samothracia, and gaue his Daughter Electra to Corytus, or Coritus: and that these were Parents to Chryse, first wife to Dardanus. Virgil holds otherwise, and the common Tradition of Poets makes Dardanus the sonne of Electra by Iupiter, which Electra was the Daughter of Atlas, and wife to Coritus King of Hetruria, to whom she bare Iasius. Annius out of his Berosus finds the name of Camboblascon, to whom he giues the addition of Coritus, as a Title of dignitie, making him Father of Dardanus and Iasius; and further telling vs very particularly of the faction betwene these Brethren, which grew to such heate, that finally Dardanus killed his Brother, and thereupon fled into Samothrace. The obscuritie of the historie giues leaue to Annius of saying what he list. I that loue not to vse such libertie, will forbear to determine any thing herein. But if Dardanus were the Sonne of Iupiter, it must haue bene of some elder Iupiter than the Father of those that liued about the Warre of Troy. So it is likewise probable that Atlas the Father of Electra was rather an Italian than an African, which also is the opinion of Boccace. For (as hath often bene said) there were many Iupiters, and many of almost every name of the Gods; but it was the custome to ascribe to some one the acts of the rest, with all belonging to them. Therefore I will not greatly trouble my selfe with making any narrow search into these fabulous antiquities, but set downe the Pedigree according to the generall fame; allowing to Teucer such Parents as Diodorus giues, because others giue him none, and carrying the line of Dardanus in manner following.

Atlas

Concerning the beginning and continuance, the Troian Kingdome, with the length of every Kings reigne, I have chosen good Authors to be my guides, that in a Historie, whereon depends the most ancient computation of times among the Greekes, I might not follow incertainties, ill cohering with the consent of Writers, and generall passage of things elsewhere done. And first for the destruction of Troy, which was of greater note than any accident befalling that Citie while it stood, it is reckoned by Diodorus Diod. l. 14. to be 780. yeeres more ancient than the beginning of the ninth fourth Olympiad. Where as therefore 372. did passe betwene the beginning of the Olympiads, and the first yeere of the 94. it is manifest that the remainder of 780. yeeres, that is, 408. yeeres went betwene the destruction of Troy, and the first institution of these games by Ishitus, if the authority of Diodorus be good prooffe, who elsewhere tels vs, that the returne of the He-raculide, which was 80. yeeres after the fall of Troy, was 328. yeeres before the first Olympiad. Diod. in pref.

Hereunto agrees the authoritie of Dionysius Halicarnassensis, who placing the foundation of Rome in the first of the fourth Olympiad, that is, four and twentie yeeres after the beginning of those games, accounts it 432. later than the fall of Troy. Solinus in express words, makes the institution of the Olympiads by Iphitus, whom he calleth Iphiclus. 480. yeeres later then the destruction of Troy. The summe is easily collected by necessity inference out of diuers other places in the same booke. Hereunto doth Eusebius reckoning exclusively agree: and Eratosthenes, (as he is cited by Clement Alexandrinus) makes vp out of many particulars, the same totall summe, wanting but one yeere, as reckoning likewise exclusively.

The other collections of diuers Writers that are cited by Clemens in the same place, doe neither cohere any way, nor depend vpon any collaterall Historie, by which they may be verified.

The destruction of Troy being in the yeere before the Olympiads foure hundred and eight: we must seeke the continuance of that from the beginning to the end, out of Eusebius, who leades vs from Dardanus on-wards through the reines of foure Kings, by the space of two hundred and foue and twenty yeeres, and after of Priamus, with whom also at length it ended. As for the time which passed vnder Laomedon, we are faine to doe, as others haue done before vs, and take it vpon trust from Annius his Authors, beleeuing Manetho so much the rather, for that in his account of the former Kings reines, and of Priamus, he is found to agree with Eusebius, which may giue vs leaue to thinke that Annius hath not herein corrupted him. But in this point we neede not to be very scrupulous: for seeing that no Historie or account of time depends vpon the reigne of the former Kings, but onely vpon the ruine of the Citie vnder Priamus, it may suffice that we are carefull to place that memorabile accident in the due yeere.

True it is, that some objections appearing waightie, may be alleaged in maintenance of different computations, which with the answers I purposely omit, as not willing to dispute of those yeeres, wherein the Greekes knew no good forme of a yeere, but rather to make narration of the actions which were memorable, and acknowledged by all Writers, whereof this destruction of Troy was one of the most renowned.

The first enterprife that was vnder-taken by generall consent of all Greece, was the last warre of Troy, which hath bene famous euent to this day, for the numbers of Princes, and valiant Commanders there assembled: the great battailes fought with variable success: the long indurance of the siege; the destruction of that great Citie; and the many Colonies planted in sundry Countreies, as well by the remainder of the Trojans, as by the victorious Greekes after their vnfortunate returne. All which things with innumerable circumstances of especiall note, haue bene deliuered vnto posteritie, by the excellent wits of many writers, especially by the Poemes of that great Homer, whose verses haue giuen immortalitye to the action, which might else perhaps haue bene buried in oblivion, among other worthy deedes, done both before and since that time. For it is true which Horace saith;

Vixere fortes ante Agamemnona

Multi, sed omnes illachrimabiles

Vrgentnr, ignotia longa

Noçe : carent quia vate sacro

Many

Many by valour haue deferu'd renowne
Ere Agamemnon: yet lye all opprest
Vnder long night, vnwept for, and vnknowne:
For with no sacred Poet were they blest.

Yet so it is, that whilst these writers haue with strange fables, or (to speake the best of them) with Allegories farre strained, gone about to enlarge the commendations of those noble vndertakers: they haue both drawne into suspicion that great vertue which they fought to adorne, and filled after-ages with almost as much ignorance of the Historie, as admiration of the persons. Wherefore it is expedient that wee seeke for the knowledge of such actions, in Histories; learning their qualities who did manage them, of Poets, in whose workes are both profit and delight: yet small profit to those which are delighted otherwise; but such as can interpret their fables, or separate them from the naked truth, shall finde matter in Poems; not vnworthy to be regarded of Historians. For those things excepted which are gathered out of Homer, there is very little, and not without much disagreement of Authors, written of this great warre. All writers consent with Homer; that the rape of Helen by Paris the son of Priamus, was the cause of taking armes: but how he was herunto emboldned it is doubtfull.

§. II.

Of the Rape of Helen: and strength of both sides for the warre.

Erodotus fetcheth the cause of this rape from very farre; saying, That whereas the Phenicians had rauished Io, and carried her into Egypt, the Greekes to be reuenged on the Barbarians, did first rauish Europa, whom they brought out of Phenicia into Creta, and afterward Medea, whom they fetcht from Colchos, denying to restore her to her father, till such time as they might be satisfied for the rape of Io. By these deedes of the Greekes, Paris (as the same Herodotus affirmes) was imboldened to doe the like; not fearing such reuenge as ensued. But all this narration seemes frivolous. For what had the King of Colchos to doe with the iniurie of the Phenicians? Or how could the Greekes, as in reuenge of Io, pleade any quarrell against him, that neuer had heard the name of Phenicians? Thucydides a writer of vnquestionable sinceritie, maketh it plaine, that the name of Barbarian was not vsed at all in Homers time, which was long after the warre of Troy; and that the Greekes themselves were not then called all by one name, Hellenes, as afterwards. So that it were vnreasonable to thinke, that they should haue sought reuenge vpon all Nations, as barbarous, for the iniurie received by one: or that all people else should haue esteemed of the Greekes, as of a people opposed to all the world; and that euen then when as the Greekes had not yet one common name among themselves. Others with more probability say, that the rape of Helen was to procure the redeliuery of Hesione, King Priamus his sister, taken formerly by Hercules, and giuen to Telamon. This may haue been true. For Telamon (as it seemes) was a cruel man, seeing his owne sonne Teucer durst not come in his sight, after the warre of Troy, but fled into Cyprus, onely because his brother Ajax (which Teucer could not remedie) had slaine himselfe. Yet, were it so, that Hesione was ill intreated by Telamon, it was not therefore likely, that Priamus her brother would seeke to take her from her husband, with whom she had liued about thirtie yeeres, and to whom she had borne children which were to succede in his Dominion. Whereupon I thinke that Paris had no regard either to the rape of Europa, Medea, or Hesione: but was meere incited by Venus, that is, by his lust, to doe that which in those dayes was very common. For not onely Greekes from Barbarians, and Barbarians from Greekes, as Herodotus discourseth, but all people were accustomed to steale women and cattell, if they could by strong hand or power get them; and hauing stollen them, either to sell them away in some farre Countrey, or keepe them to their owne vse. So did Theſeus, and Pirithous attempt Proserpina; and so did Theſeus (long before Paris) rauish Helen. And these practices, as it appears in Thucydides, were so common, that none durst inhabite neere vnto the Sea, for feare of piracy, which was accounted a trade of life no lesse lawfull then merchandise: wherefore Tyndareus the father of Helen, considering the beauty of his daughter, and the rape which Theſeus had made, caused all her wooers, who were most of the principall men in Greece, to binde themselves by solemne oath, that if shee were taken from her husband, they should with all their might helpe to recouer her. This done, he gaue free choise of a husband to his daughter, who chose Menelaus, brother to Agamemnon. So the cause which drew the Greekes vnto Troy in reuenge of Helens rape, was partly the oath which so many Princes had made vnto her father Tyndareus. Hereunto the great power of Agamemnon was not a little helping; for Agamemnon, besides his great Dominions in Peloponnesus, was Lord of many Ilands: he was also rich in money, and therefore the Arcadians were well contented to follow his pay, whom he embarked for Troy in his owne ships, which were more then any other of the Greece Princes brought to that expedition.

Thus did all Greece, either as bound by oath, or led by the reputation and power of the two brethren, Agamemnon and Menelaus, or desirous to partake of the profit and honour in that great enterprise; take armes against the Troians. The Greekes Fleet was (by Homers account) 1200. sayle, or thereabouts: but the vessels were not great: for it was not then the manner to build ships with decks; onely they vsed (as Thucydides saith) small ships, meete for robbing on the Sea; the least of which carried fiftie men, the greatest 120. euery man (except the Captaines) being both a Marriner and a Souldier. By this proportion it appeares that the Grecian army consisted of 100000. men, or thereabout. This was the greatest armie that euer was raised out of Greece: and the greatnesse of this armie doth well declare the strength and power of Troy, which ten whole yeeres did stand out against such forces: yet were the Troians which inhabited the Citie, not the tenth part of this number, as Agamemnon said in the second of Homers Iliads; but their followers and aydes were very many and strong. For all Phrygia, Lycia, Misia, and the greatest part of Asia the lesse, tooke part with the Troians. The Amazones also brought them succour. And Rhesus out of Thrace, and Memnon out of Affyria (though some thinke, out of Ethiopia) came to their defence.

§. III.

Of the Grecians journey, and Embassage to Troy, and of Helenaes being detained in Egypt; and of the Sacrificing of Iphigenia.

Herefore the Greekes vnwilling to come to triall of armes, if things might be compounded by treatie, sent Menelaus and Vlysses Embassadors to Troy; who demanded Helen and the goods were taken with her out of Menelaus his house. What answer the Troians made hereunto it is vncertaine. Herodotus from the report of the Agyptian Priests, makes it very probable, that Helen was taken from Paris before his returne to Troy. The summe of his discourse is this.

Paris in his returne with Helen, being driuen by foule weather vnto the coast of Egypt, was accused for the rape of Helen by some bondmen of his, that had taken Sanctuaty. Proteus then King of Egypt, finding the accusation true by examination, detained Helen, and the goods taken with her, till her husband should require them: dismissing Paris without further punishment, because he was a stranger. When therefore the Greekes demanding Helen had answered, that she was in Egypt, they thought themselves deluded, and thereupon made the warre, which ended with the ruine of Troy. But when after the Citie taken, they perceiued indeede she had not bene there, they returned home, sending Menelaus to aske his wife of Proteus. Homer and the whole Nation of Poets (except Euripides) vary from this Historie, thinking it a matter more magnificent and more gracefull to their Poems, for the retaining of a faire Lady, than that they endured all by force, because it lay not in their power to redeliuer her. Yet in the fourth of his Odysses, Homer speaks of Menelaus his being in Egypt, before hee returned home to Sparta; which voyage it were not easily beleueed, that he made for pleasure: and if he were driuen thither by contrary windes, much more may we thinke that Paris was likely to haue bene driuen thither by foule weather. For Paris immediately vpon the rape committed, was enforced to flye, taking such windes as he could get, and rather enduring any storme, than to commit himselfe to any Hauen in the Greece seas: whereas Menelaus might haue put into any port in Greece, and there haue remained with good entertainment, vntill such time as the winde had come about, and serued for his Nauigation.

One great argument Herodotus brings to confirme the saying of the Egyptian Priests, which is, that if Helen had bene at Troy, it had bene viter madnesse for Priamus to see so many miseries befall him, during the warre, and so many of his sonnes slaine for the pleasure of one, who neither was heire to the Kingdome (for Hector was elder) nor equall in vertue to many of the rest. Besides, it may seeme that Lucian spake not more pleasantly than truly, when he said that Helen, at the warre of Troy, was almost as old as Queene Hecuba, considering that she had bene ravished by Thesus the companion of Hercules, who tooke Troy when Priamus was very young; and considering further, that she was sister to Castor and Pollux (she and Pollux being said by some to haue bene twins) who sailed with the Argonautes, hauing Telamon the father of Ajax in their companie before the time that Hesione was taken; on whom Telamon begat Ajax, that was a principall Commander in the Troian warre. But whether it were so that the Troians could not, or would not restore Helen, so it was that the Embassadors returned ill contented, and not very well intreated; for there wanted not some that aduised to haue them slaine. The Greekes hereupon incensed, made all haste towards Troy: at which time Calchas (whom some say to haue bene a runnagate Troian, though no such thing be found in Homer) filled the Captaines and all the Hoste with many troublesome answers and diuinations. For he would haue Agamemnons daughter sacrificed to appease Diana, whose anger he said withstood their passage. Whether the yong Lady were sacrificed, or whether (as some write) the goddesse was contented with a Hinde, it is not needfull here to be disputed of. Sure it is, that the malice of the diuell, which awaits for all opportunities, is neuer more importunate, than where mens ignorance is most. Calchas also told the Greekes, that the taking of Troy was impossible, till some fatal impediments were remoued: and that till ten yeeres were past, the towne should hold out against them. All which notwithstanding, the Greekes proceeded in their enterprise, vnder the command of Agamemnon, who was accompanied with his brother Menelaus; Achilles the most valiant of all the Greekes, his friend Patroclus, and his Tutor Phenix; Ajax and Teucer, the sonnes of Telamon; Idomeneus, and his companion Meriones; Nestor, and his sonnes Antilochus, and Thrasymedes; Vlysses, Mnesthus the sonne of Petrus, Captaine of the Athenians; Diomedes the sonne of Tydeus, a man of so singular courage; the wise and learned Palamedes, Ascalaphus, and Idmenus, the sonnes of Mars, who had sailed with the Argonautes; Philoctetes also the sonne of Paan, who had the arrowes of Hercules, without which Calchas said, that the Citie could not be taken; Ajax the sonne of Oileus, Penelcus, Thoas, Eumelus, Tyndarus, Euripilus, Athamas, Sthenelus, Tlepolemus the sonne of Hercules; Podalirius, and Machaon, the sonnes of Ascalapius; Epeus, who is said to haue made the wooden horse, by which the towne was taken; and Protesilaus, who first leapt on shore, neglecting the Oracle that threatened death to him that landed first.

§. IIII.

Of the Acts of the Grecians at the siege.

Here, and many other of lesse note, arriuing at Troy, found such sharpe entertainment, as might easily perswade them to thinke that the war would be more than one yeeres worke. For in the first encounter, they lost Protesilaus, whom Hector slew, and many other, without any great harme done to the Troians: save only that by their numbers of men, they won ground enough to incampe themselves in, as appeareth in Thucydides. The principall impediment which the Greekes found, was want of victuals, which grew vpon them by reason of their multitude, and the smallnesse of their vessels, wherein they could not carry necessaries for such an armie. Hereupon they were compelled to send some part of their men, to labour the ground in Cherronesse: others to rob vpon the Sea for the reliefe of the Campe. Thus was the war protracted nine whole yeeres, and either nothing done, or if any skirmishes were, yet could the towne receiue little losse by them, hauing equall numbers to maintaine the field against such Greekes as continued the siege, and a more safe retrair if the enemy got the better.

Wherefore Ouid saith, that from the first yeere, till the tenth, there was no fighting at all: and Heracles commendes as very credible, the report of Herodotus, That the Greekes did not lye before Troy the first nine yeeres: but only did beate vp and downe the seas, exerci-exercising their men, and enriching themselves, and so by wasting the enemies Country, did blocke vp the towne, vnto which they returned not, vntill the fatal time drew neere when it should be subuerted.

This is confirmed by the enquire which Priamus made, when the Greece Princes came into the field, the tenth yeere, for he knew none of them; and therefore sitting vpon an high tower (as Homer tels) he learned their names of Helen: which though it is like to be a fiction, yet could it not at all haue bene supposed that he should be ignorant of them, if they had shewed themselves before the towne so many yeeres together. Betwene these relations of Thucydides and Herodotus, the difference is not much, the one saying that a few of the Greekes remained in the Campe before Troy, whilst the rest made purveyance by land and by sea: the other, that the whole armie did spend the time in wasting the sea-coasts. Neither doe the Poets greatly disagree from these authors: for they make report of many townes and Ilands wasted, and the people carried into Captiuitie, in which actions Achilles was employed, whom the armie could not well, nor would haue spared, if any seruice of importance had bene to be performed before the Citie. Howsoeuer it was, this is agreed by generall consent, that in the beginning of that Summer, in which Troy was taken, great booties were brought into the Campe, and a great pestilence arose among the Greekes: which Homer saith that Apollo sent in reuenge of his Priests daughter, whom Agamemnon had refused to let goe, for any rancome: but Heracles interpreting the place, saith that by Apollo was meant the Sunne: who raised pestilent fogs, by which the armie was infected, being lodged in a moorish picce of ground. And it might well be that the campe was ouer-pestered with those, who had bene abroad, and now were lodged all close together: hauing also grounded their ships within the fortifications.

About the same time arose much contention betwene Agamemnon and Achilles about the bootie, whereof Agamemnon, as Generall, hauing first chosen for his part a captive woman, and Achilles in the second place chosen for himselfe another, then Ajax, Vlysses, and so the rest of the chiefe Captaines in order: When the Soothsayer Calchas had willed that Agamemnons woman should be restored to her father Apollo's Priest, that so the Pestilence might cease, then did Agamemnon greatly rage and say, that hee alone would not lose his part of the spoyle, but would either take that which had bene giuen to Achilles, or that which had fallen to Ajax, or to Vlysses. Hereupon Achilles defied him, but was faine to suffer all patiently, as not able to hold his Concubine by strong hand, nor to reuenge her losse otherwise than by refusing to fight, or to send forth his Captaines. But the Greekes encouraged by their Captaines, presented themselves before the Citie without him and his troupes.

The Troians were now relieued with great succours, all the neighbour Countries hauing sent them aide: partly drawne to that warre by their Commanders, who assisted Priamus for money, wherewith he abounded when the warre began (as appears by his words in Homer;) or for loue of himselfe and his sonnes, or hope of marriage with some of his many and faire daughters; partly also (as we may well guesse) incited by the wrongs receiued of the Greekes, when they wasted the Countries adioyning vnto Troy. So that when Hector issued out of the towne, he was little inferior to his enemies in numbers of men, or qualitie of their Leaders. The principall Captaines in the Troian armie, were Hector, Paris, Deiphobus, Helenus and the other sonnes of Priamus: Antas, Antenor, and his sonnes, Polydamas, Sarpedon, Glaucus, Asius, and the sonnes of Panthus, besides Rhesus, who was slaine the first night of his arriuall; Memnon, Queene Penthesilea, and others who came towards the end of the warre. Between these and the Greekes were many battels fought: the greatest of which were, that at the tombe of King Ilus vpon the plaine: and another at the very trenches of the Campe, wherein Hector brake through the fortifications of the Greekes, and began to fire their ships; at which time Ajax, the sonne of Telamon with his brother Teucer, were in a manner the only men of note that remaining vnwounded, made head against Hector, when the state of the Greekes was almost desperate.

Another battell (for so antiquitie calls it) or rather the same renewed, was fought by Patroclus, who hauing obtained leaue, drew forth Achilles troopes, relieuing the wearie Greekes with a fresh supply. Agamemnon, Diomedes, Vlysses, and the rest of the Princes, though sore wounded, yet were driuen to put on armour, and with helpe of Patroclus, repelled repelled the Troians very hardly. For in that fight Patroclus was lost, and his body, with much contention recovered by his friends, was brought backe into the Campe: the armour of Achilles which he had put on, being torne from him by Hector. It was the manner of those warres, hauing slaine a man, to strip him and hale away his body, not restoring it without ranfome, if he were one of marke. Of the vulgar little reckoning was made: for they fought all on foot, slightly armed, and commonly followed the successe of their Captaines; who rode not vpon horses, but in Chariots, drawne by two or three horses, which were guided by some trustie followers of theirs, which draue vp and downe the field, as they were directed by the Captaines, who by the swiftnesse of their horses presenting themselves where neede required, threw first their Iauelins, and then alighting fought on foot, with swords and battel-axes, retiring into the ranks of footmen, or else returning to their Chariots when they found cause, and so began againe with a new dart as they could get it, if their old were lost, or broken. Their armes defence were helmets, brest-plates, bootes of brasse or other metall, and shields commonly of leather plated ouer. The offensiu were swords and battel-axes at hand, and stones, arrowes or darts when they fought at any distance. The vse of their Chariots (besides the swiftnesse) was to keepethem from wearinesse, whereto the leaders were much subiect, because of their armour, which the strongest and stoutest were heauiest: also that from them they might throw their Iauelins downewards, with the more violence. Of which weapon I finde not that any carried more than one or two into the field: wherefore they were often driuen to returne to their Tents for a new one when the old was gone. Likewise of armours they had little change or none; euery man (speaking of the chiefe) carried his owne compleat, of which if any piece were lost or broken, he was driuen to repaire it with the like, if he had any fitting, taken from some Captaine whom he had slaine, and stripped: or else to borrow of them that had by such means gotten some to spare. Whereas therefore Achilles had lost his armour which Hector (as is said before) had taken from the body of Patroclus, he was faine to await the making of new, ere he could enter the fight: whereof he became very desirous, that he might reuenge the death of Patroclus his deare friend.

At this time Agamemnon reconciled himselfe vnto Achilles, not onely restoring his concubine Brisis, but giuing him very great gifts, and excusing former matters as well as he might. In the next battell Achilles did so behaue himselfe, that he did not onely put the Troians to the worst, but also slew the valiant Hector, whom (if Homer may herein be beleued) he chased three times about the wals of Troy. But great question may be made of Homer's truth in this narration. For it is not likely that Hector would stay alone without the Citie (as Homer doth report of him) when all the Troians, were fled into it: nor that he could leape ouer the riuers of Xanthus and Simois, as he must haue done in that flight: nor that the Troians perceiuing Hector in such an extremitie, would haue borne to open some of their gates and let him in. But this is reported onely to grace Achilles, who hauing (by what meanes soeuer) slaine the noble Hector, did not onely carry away his dead body, as the custome then was, but boring holes in his feet, and thrusting leatherne thongs into them, tyed him to his Chariot, and dragging him shamefully about the field, selling the dead body to his father Priamus for a very great ranfome. But his cruelty and couetousnesse were not long vnreunged; for he was shortly after slaine with an arrow by Paris, as Homer sayes, in the Scean gate, or as others in the Temple of Apollo, whither he came to haue married Polyxena the daughter of Priamus, with whom he was too farre in loue, hauing slaine so many of her brethren, and his body was ranfomed (as Lycophron saith) at the selfe-same rate that Hectors was by him sold for. Not long after this, Penthesilea Queene of the Amazons arriued at Troy; who after some prooffe giuen of her valour, was slaine by Pyrhus the sonne of Achilles.

§. V.

Of the taking of Troy, the wooden Horse, the Booke of Dares and Dyctis, the Colomes of the reliques of Troy.

Finally, after the death of many worthy persons, on each side, the Citie was taken by night, as all writers agree: but whether by the treason of Aeneas and Antenor; or by a wooden Horse, as the Poets, and common fame

(which

(which followed the Poets) haue deliuered, it is vncertaine. Some write that vpon one of the gates of Troy called Scean, was the image of a horse, and that the Greekes entering by that gate, gaue occasion to the report, that the Citie was taken by an artificall horse. It may well be that with some woodden engine, which they called an Horse, they either did batter the wals, as the Romans in after-times vsed to doe with the Ramme: or scaled the wals vpon the sudden, and so tooke the Citie. As for the hiding of men in the hollow body of a woodden horse, it had bene a desperate aduerture, and seruing to no purpose. For either the Troians might haue perceiued the deceit, and slaine all those Princes of Greece, that were inclosed in it (which also by such as maintaine this report they are said to haue thought vpon: or they might haue left it a few dayes without the Citie (for it was vnkely, that they should the very first day both conclude vpon the bringing it into the towne, and breake downe their wals vpon the sudden to doe it: ) by which meanes they who were shut into it, must haue perished for hunger, if they had not by issuing forth vnseasonably discovered the inuention. Whereas further it is said, that this horse was so high and great, that it could not be brought into the towne through any of the gates, and that therefore the Troians were faine to pull downe a part of their wall to make way for it, through which breach the Greekes did afterwards enter: it is hereby manifest that the inclosing of so many principall men was altogether needlesse, considering that without their helpe there was way sufficient for the armie, so that the surprising of any gate by them was now to no purpose.

John Baptista Gramay in his History of Asia, discoursing of this warre, saith that the Greekes did both batter the wals with a woodden engine, and were also let into the Citie by Antenor, at the Scean gate: the townsmen sleeping and drinking without feare or care, because the fleet of the Grecians had hoisted saile, and was gone the day before to the Ile of Tenedos, thereby to bring the Troians into securitie. That the Citie was betrayed, the books of Dares and Dyctis must proue, which whether we now haue the same that were by them written, it may be suspected; for surely they who haue made mention of these writers in ancient times, would not, as they did, haue followed the reports of Homer and others quite contradietorie in most points to these two authors, without once taking notice of the opposition, which they hauing serued in that warre made against the common report: had it not bene that either those bookes were euery in those times thought friuolous; or else contained no such repugnancie to the other authors as now is found in them.
